

Gift of Mr Alfred Holman.

The Argonaut.

VOL. XI. NO. 1.

SAN FRANCISCO, JULY 1, 1882.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

"FROM SISKIYOU TO SAN DIEGO."

"From the Sierras to the Sea."

The Morning Call, in reporting the speeches at the late Democratic Convention, and thus preserving to the future those splendid specimens of American oratory, has done a grand thing for the literature of the future. In perpetuating those models of American eloquence, and handing them down to future ages in all the glow and richness of their pristine beauty; in preserving the rich imagery and glowing diction of the well-rouded periods of Clay Webster Taylor, of J. Campbell Shorb, of Halloway of Los Angeles, O'Grady of Fresno, Oulahan of San Joaquin, Tom Fowler of Tulare; of Donnelly, Crogan, Grattan, Quilty, Greavy, and O'Levy; of Judge Enos, Judge Terry, Judge Archer, Judge McGarvey, Judge Lamar, Judge Flournoy, and Judge Niles Searls; of Ball, White, Martin, Whipple, Lowell, Morehouse, Byrne, Platt, and Harry Hammond, and the other eloquent men, it has given to the scholars of the future an else unwritten page in the gilded book of Democratic eloquence. This will, to an extent, repair the misfortune that in the age of Athenian and Roman oratory, the art of stenographic writing being unknown, some of the glowing periods and burning thoughts of Demosthenes and Cicero have escaped us. It repairs to an extent the destruction of the Alexandrian library, where were stored the early treasures of the learning of the classic age. It makes less to be regretted the fact that we have not preserved in all their fullores the orations of Clay and Webster, and the debates of our early statesmen. When at some future and, we hope, not distant period the wanderer from Milpitas shall sit upon the pinnacle of Seal Rock to contemplate the ruins of the Democratic party, he will read with pride from an old Argonaut, in which he carried his lunch, the following eloquent extracts from the orations of Democratic speakers at the California State Convention of 1882. Doctor J. Campbell Shorb said:

In the exuberance of ecstatic delight, and with heartfelt pleasure as pure as the chaste icicles that hung from the eaves of Diana's temple, and with deep solicitation for the welfare of the Democratic party, I rise upon both my feet to place in nomination for Governor the honored name of Clay Webster Taylor, all of Shasta. I love California, from Siskiyou to San Diego, from the Sierra to the sea, with all my heart and all my soul, and all the rest, residue, and entire remainder of my physical anatomy. California has been a mother to me, full of love, kindly interest, and boundless sympathy. She has hurried in oblivion all my sins and all my transgressions. When the Lord created the universe, He looked around, and said it was good enough for ordinary mortals, but there must be a new and better piece of handiwork for the Democracy, and He created California. Thus loving California, I want to see her governor a man whose courage, whose intellect, and integrity give promise of as bright a fortune in the future as the destiny of California, herself a natural-born leader of men, a natural tribune of the people, and one who will become its idol, when in the course of time they find that ambition can not reach him, nor aggregated wealth frighten, nor gold soil the palm of his hand at the helm of State. Before God I feel that I present such a character in the person of Clay Webster Taylor, of Shasta. Why, as I pronounce those names, "Clay, Webster, Taylor," what a panorama of history opens itself to my contemplation! Clay! When the story of valor, chivalry, patriotism, and genius is told in the universities of the future, it shall ring with the name and genius of Harry Clay, Kentucky's favorite son; and when the historian dwells on the dangers that surrounded the infancy of this republic, and threatened the disruption of this glorious empire of equally free and coequal States, how brilliant in the sombre twilight of the past grows the giant form of Webster, whose dearest words, still ringing fresh in our ears—"Liberty and union now and forever, one and inseparable"—are as fresh to us to-day as when they fell, like molten lava, on the ears of the senators of the United States fifty years ago. And when we come to Taylor, what man who has an atom of love in his heart for California will not reverence the name of Taylor?—the good old hero of Palo Alto, of the Mexican war? The hero of Resaca de la Palma threw down the walls of the City of Mexico, and gave us California. California! God bless her, the sweetest, bravest commonwealth ever seen by humanity since Adam and Eve, hand-in-hand, walked out of the gates of Paradise under the curse of Almighty God. We give, then, Clay Webster Taylor, all of Shasta; they sprang from the people; they belong to the people. Let us give them back to the people. We can give no better men. They are their idol, their champion, their offspring, and before God I do not believe that the people desire to repudiate them.

No one but our eloquent Democratic friend could make the "sombre twilight" brilliant, and none but him could pour "molten lava" into a Democrat's ears without making him jump with the ear-ache. This was followed by a masterly and eloquent address by Doctor Briland, also of Shasta. Mr. Griffith, of Fresno, then came forward, and, in the hush of the expectant multitude, announced the name of Campbell Pericles Berry:

The most illustrious of all the Northern statesmen that California, all the way from the ice-cold regions of Siskiyou to the tropical groves of San Diego; from the snow-capped summits of the Sierras to the jeweled beach at Pescadero, has ever produced; member of Congress, author of Campbell's poems, and one of the "coming camels" of California. He does not belong to Sutter County only; he belongs to all of California, from Siskiyou to San Diego, from the Sierras to the sea. He comes from an illustrious Roman ancestry, whose proud motto, "Stem-mata Quoad Faciunt" was engraved, by dint of his own invincible courage and indefatigable diligence, through the long curriculum.

Here the gentleman cried out, like Cæsar when he had the fever, for water, and the rest of his splendid sentence was drowned in a goliath of gurgling drink. He continued:

Campbell Pericles Berry, before he came to California, was a comrade of Roger Williams, who was banished from Massachusetts for uttering the sentiment that all Germans have a right to worship King Gambrinus in oblations of brimming beer, in foaming schooners on Sunday, so long as they do not interfere with the privilege of the distressed and unhappy sons of Erin to drink whisky the balance of the week. Now, then, my fellow-members, we verily believe that should you honor Mr. Berry with the nomination for the governorship of the State of California, that on the day of the election, in November next, when the sun goes down into the great Pacific, the heacon lights of victory will burn in every hamlet and city and blaze on every hill, from the snow-capped summit of Shasta to the hoary head of Mount San Diego; from the cloud-capped peaks of the Sierras to the wave-washed sands of the Pacific coast. We believe that he, above all others who has been or may be named to this convention, is nearer to the people, and that he will unite the Democracy, in the language of your motto, "from Del Norte to San Diego, and from the Sierras to the sea."

Then came Judge Lamar, of San Francisco, who presented the name of the Honorable James A. Johnson, of San Francisco:

The exalted position for which I will present his name, and the august presence of this tribunal before which I appear for that purpose, would appall me were I not sustained and supported by a grateful remembrance of his many eminent public services, his fidelity to the people, and the affection of the people for James A. Johnson. They have cause to admire him; they have a right to love him. No man has ever held office in the State of California, from Siskiyou to San Diego, from the Sierras to the sea, who has a purer or cleaner record of public service than James A. Johnson, and he is better known and more loved by the people of this State than any other living man. Mr. Johnson, with a heart as brave, and a spirit as dauntless as the knight who, in the revolutionary times, first crossed the Alleghenies, whose emblem was the horse's shoe, and whose motto was sic pivot transcurrere montes, he mounted his horse and set out on the campaign, crossing and recrossing that vast Himalaya of the Coast Range, climbing the Sierras, descending the valleys, visiting every village, hamlet, and camp, proclaiming the gospel of the Constitution, and rallying the scattered and disheartened forces of the Democracy, from Siskiyou to San Diego, from the Sierras to the sea. In Congress, amid the storms of fanaticism, and the moral carnage that followed in the wake of the civil war, when many good and bold men trembled and halted, and timid men shrank from the front, Johnson stood in the breach, the undaunted champion of Democracy, and the true and trusted tribune of the people. When all around him into the seething maelstrom of official corruption fell the servants and representatives of the people, James A. Johnson stood up firm as a rock, the impersonation of integrity and honor. He never bent the knee or yielded obedience to the enemies of the people; he never lost his head nor his heart in the glamour of wealth or the prestige of power. Again I repeat it, Johnson is the man whom the people desire. Nominate him for Governor and all along the seven hundred miles of California's vast latitude, from the Sierras to the sea, will be heard the shouts of the Democracy, like the music of many waters—a grand diapason of political redemption.

Then Colonel Flournoy dealt a hand for George Hearst; but as he did not once use the eloquent simile "from the snow-capped summits of Mount Shasta," etc., or once name the "grand old" party, we omit his speech as deficient in those glittering specimens of oratorical jewelry with which most of the speeches were so richly adorned. When Messrs. Clay, Webster, and Taylor came forward to make their speech there was the wildest silence. These gentlemen said:

Mr. President, and Gentlemen of the Convention, Fellow-citizens and Fellow-Democrats: There perhaps never was a time within the history of our State when her Democracy was gathered together under such auspicious circumstances as those which now surround us. Gathered as we are here beneath the snow-capped and hoary brow of Mount Shasta; from the Sierras to the sea; from the climes of the sunny south; from the east and from the west; from every village and hamlet throughout the length and breadth of our glorious commonwealth of farmers and miners, the professional, the artisan, and the mechanic, we are here assembled as the representatives in council of that grand old party which, from the time of its inception by its immortal founders, has ever been, and ever shall be the true, tried friend and champion of the people; obedient to their wishes, and subservient to their will and pleasure, and at the same time the ever-vigilant, untiring, eternal, uncompromising, and valiant foe of their would-be tormentors and oppressors, advocating the grand old Jeffersonian principles which were laid down by the fathers who have preceded us, and which is our mission to-day, and has ever been. In every country which raises hordes of bloodless and soulless capital on the one side, and toiling, saving, honest, and patient humanity on the other, the grand old Democratic party, true to its time-honored principles, is ever found warmly battling for the cause of human flesh and blood; defending their inherent and inalienable rights and privileges. We, to-day, as citizens of this commonwealth from Siskiyou to San Diego, from the Sierras to the sea, may stand, and we may thank God that we have the glorious privilege of standing forth in our pride of manhood, and pointing to the glorious record of the Democratic party. It is the proudest event of our lifetime that we have the privilege to say that we are Democrats; that we love and honor the principles of the party; and we have no further claim upon the grand organization—no claim except that it has ever been our privilege and our duty, since it became our privilege to cast a vote at all, to cast it or and in the interests of the grand old Democratic party. When we go from this convention, let us go, every one of us, as a major-general at the head of an army, organizing our forces for battle. Let us organize them, and when the eventful day shall come, let us march to the polls, and with an eye single to the good of our country and to the Democratic party, let us rain such a shower of ballots as will prove, when the work is done and the ballots count, we will have rolled up such an overwhelming majority as will simply appall our opponents. Then we may gather together in our assembly, and under the gallant leadership of those who have brought victory, let us give one grand shout which shall reach to heaven, and shall echo across the continent like an electric shock to our brethren of the East, that once again the gallant Democracy of California has rescued the State government from radical rule, and has again placed it in the grand galaxy of Democratic States. Let us go forth as our Democratic party from this convention, with our coats pulled off and our sleeves rolled up, try to do battle in the cause of Democracy, untiring and unceasing, until the final verdict is recorded, "Democracy, well done, thou good and faithful servant," and is hailed on in brilliancy from Siskiyou to San Diego, from the Sierras to the sea.

"Hordes of bloodless and soulless capital" is good; the "grand old Democratic party" is good, but the metaphor of Democratic major-geerals going forth to battle in their shirt-sleeves, with only one eye on the offices, and shouting across the Rocky Mountains from the Sierras to the Atlantic Ocean, is a little mixed. But that is only natural, when Clay, Webster, and Taylor are all talking together. John Daggett was nominated as a "Democratic war-horse," not one of those like Joh's, that smelt the hattle from afar, for John admitted that he had attended every Democratic convention for twenty-two years. The delegates, in sympathy for this well-worn, and doubtless ring-honed and spavined specimen of party hack, put no one in nomination against him, and he had a limp over all by himself.

To illustrate the toplofical height of nonsense to which panegyric may be carried, listen to this as to the qualifications and character of a candidate for the Supreme Bench:

If absolute purity of character, unimpeachable integrity, marked ability; if intellectual and physical vigor of the most splendid type; if education of the most liberal character, a thorough training in law, profound experience on the bench and at the bar, combine to present qualifications which fit a gentleman for this high position; if, indeed, they combine to present surroundings, morally, professionally, intellectually, and physically that almost illustrate the character of an ideal judge, I contend that these endowments and qualifications are presented and realized to-day in the person of Judge Evans, of San Francisco.

No man ever lived whose life and hearing would justify such an encomium, and certainly not Judge Evans, who came out of the struggle with thirty-five votes from the San Francisco delegation, and not the best part of that. Mr. Armstrong, of Alpine, was recommended for the Supreme Bench because "he studied law in my office five years. He has been my partner, and has been a partner of James T. Farley." Judge Sepulveda was advocated by a sophomore young elocutionist in this fashion:

The native sons appeal to you; and it seems as if there were an uprising from your valleys and a crying out from the peaks of your mountains to nominate one of your own sons.

Judge Wallace, late Chief-Justice of our Supreme Court, made the following hid for Congress at large:

Wherever the Democratic standard is unfurled, in its shadow I will fight, and I will follow it; and whenever the principles of the Democratic party are as they are in the platform which you have adopted, then my efforts will be to maintain and support them. I understand that we are anti-monopoly. I understand that in every line and in every word of that platform anti-monopoly is written in blazing words, in living letters; opposed to the monopoly of the national banks; opposed to the monopoly of the railroads; opposed to the monopoly of the telegraph, and to all that brood which Republican policy has brought upon the country for the purpose of taking away from the many to enrich the few.

Then Mr. Charles Sumner flung his oratorical cap into the chandelier, and said:

A hundred and eighty thousand people confessedly under the heel of Leland Stanford and Charles Crocker! I wish you to understand that I have no political or personal affiliations that will deter me from doing my duty when in Washington, as I shall be if I have your nomination. I believe these things can be accomplished. "What!" says one, "do you think a saucy boy from California can go among those three hundred experienced old heads, and make an impression in one year?" Yes, one man—one uncompromising, relentless man—with the principles of your party, can stand in your national legislature, and Bill Stow and all his troupe will be defeated.

The prize was awarded to Sumner, and Judge Wallace was the most mortified of all the candidates who got the grand bounce. Great allowance must be made for the enthusiasm and excitement that sometimes carry men off their balance in times like these; but we are convinced there never has been in this State or elsewhere a more ludicrous exhibition of meaningless words and absurd metaphors than were strung together at this Democratic Convention. We reproduce them that their authors may calmly peruse them, and be ashamed of them, and that the sober, risiog, thinking young men, who are in the future to manage our public affairs, may avoid imitating them.

The following letter from a lady in the East to a relative in this city will be found well worth perusal:

We of the East do not underrate the trials of all sorts and descriptions you endure from the Chinese coming to your shores. You possess our entire sympathy. Do not we suffer ten-fold from the Irish who flock here by the hundreds of thousands? And are they not made citizens of the republic as soon as they reach land, and sometimes before? Do they not control nearly all our Eastern cities? They vote themselves into all the offices, tax us what they please, dispose of the funds, (most of which find their way into their own pockets,) leaving our cities bankrupt; they live without work, browbeat and insult honest Americans in the most offensive manner, in defiance of all law; maintain grog-shops on every street-corner; swagger, in a half-intoxicated state, through the streets, to the intense disgust and alarm of every decent man and woman, and convert the glorious terms "liberty" and "freedom" into lawlessness and unrestrained license. They hate laws and despise authority. Witness their behavior in Ireland. In all the world there is no better government than in England. Our own laws are framed from hers. Yet they defy all efforts to bring order out of chaos, and delight in every crime known to the decalogue. Nothing but our great extent of country can save us. Don't you suppose they carry this same malicious, malignant, and dangerous spirit with them here? Should an opportunity ever occur, they will seek to strangle and kill, if possible, the good nation that has fed and nourished them. They have no love of country. As for servants, both men and women, time would fail me to recount the ills we suffer from their impudence, laziness, untidiness, propensity for destroying others' goods, larcenies both large and small, etc., etc. Indeed, coming in daily contact with this selfish, ignorant, insolent class adds largely to the burdens of life, and deprives us of many a joy that otherwise might be ours. I do not speak for myself particularly, but for the whole community. I agree with you entirely as to their not being allowed to vote. To my mind, those who come to the country should consider themselves highly favored in the enjoyment of the benefits arising from good laws, protection to life and property, and freedom to all. They should not be allowed to vote or hold office; but the knowledge that their children, born on this soil having attained the age of twenty-one, might have that privilege to them the great boon and blessing longed and hoped for, now, the constitution confers more benefits and favors on the native-born, and this can not be right.

MR. DUX'S DECEASE.

An English Satire on American Administration of Justice.

"So, you quit us to-morrow morning?"

"Yes, marm; I guess they're a-goin' to hang me at ten o'clock sharp."

I opened wide eyes and ears as I heard this fragment of conversation. At the moment I was standing on the threshold of a cell. But such a cell! It looked more like a boarding-house parlor. The windows were barred, it is true; the walls were whitewashed, and the lock of the door was ponderous; but on the floor there was a soft carpet, and against the walls were arranged chairs and ottomans.

In the middle of the room, some of them seated, some standing, a dozen ladies, in visiting costume, formed a circle round a gentleman. The latter was in correct evening dress—white cambric tie, swallow-tailed coat, white kid gloves, and hoots that reflected one like a polished shield.

"That's the assassin," whispered the detective, who was showing me round, (ten dollars a day, meals not included.)

I could not restrain a movement of surprise.

"It's James Dux," he continued, taking no notice; "he's under sentence of death."

In the monotonous voice of a professional guide he went on to tell me the story of the man who was the focus of so much attention.

"A criminal of the highest class, this Dux. He began in an intelligent way by only attacking respectable people, worth ten thousand dollars or so. Four times he has cheated the gallows. The first time he bought off the witnesses; the second time he bought off the jury; the third time he did business with the judge. But a fatal accident was his ruin. The paper he found on a banker he assassinated turned out to be counterfeit. James had killed a confrère by mistake. Not being able to get together money enough to make his innocence clear, he was found guilty. He was going to be sent aloft, when a comrade starting in trade offered to buy the fraudulent bank-notes at a sacrifice. He said he calculated he could pass them on his customers out West. With the sum thus realized James was able to persuade the Governor of the State to take a disinterested view of his case, and he was let off.

"But Dux never got over the turn it gave him. He became kinder stupid—lost his head. He took to robbing the first that came in his road. One evening, in an out-of-the-way suburb, he knocked out the brains of an old man with a sledge-hammer for the sake of a miserable watch of no value.

"Caught in the act by a young policeman who thought he had a chance of distinguishing himself, James was brought up in court for the fifth time. The evidence was overwhelming, the defense weak, the jury indifferent. While the dozen in the box were trying whisky cocktails, Judge Blackstone rose in the middle of a cloud of cigar-smoke and pronounced sentence of death, giving the poor fellow only three months' leisure to read the Bible in. His time is up this afternoon."

"And that is the prisoner," I exclaimed: "the man in the dress-clothes?"

"Yes, that's Dux," he answered. "He's converted, you know. At present he is a great object of interest. Our richest ladies pay all his expenses. The best ladies come round regular to comfort him. He is going to die beautifully, we expect. It is a great victory for the Hardshell Baptist Church. You'll see that James will make a truly sanctified end."

Meantime the assassin, reconducting one of his lady visitors to the door, passed quite close to me, and I had the opportunity of taking his likeness in my mental camera.

He was a low-sized, thick-set, ill-built man, with a face blotched with whisky pimples, a low forehead, a cold eye, and the limbs of a long-armed ape. What a sinister and grotesque caricature this hestial wretch was, tricked out in the garb of good society, his big bony toes making humps on the patent leather of his dandy pumps, and his close-cropped hair glistening with some perfume, which could not kill the fetid odor that exuded from his vulgar body.

A lady advanced toward the assassin, and presented him with an immense white bouquet—the symbol of purity of soul. But as she tried to murmur a few appropriate words, emotion overcame her, and she swooned.

The condemned felon had taken the flowers with a careless air, sniffed them, and jerked them over his shoulder to a corner of the room, where I perceived a mass of fragrance and bloom thrown in huddled heaps like so much refuse.

"The poor creatures are nervous, do you mind," said James, compassionately. "They should take a horn of gin before risking themselves here."

"Allow me to introduce to you my only daughter, Miss Blackstone," said a gentleman of judicial bearing, hurrying forward to make way for a lovely young girl who leaned on his arm.

The murderer howled.

The young lady courtesied.

The judge did his best to imitate one and the other; that that is to say, as far as his corpulence would permit him.

"Papa has spoken often about you," said the pretty girl, with a whimper. "I am really sorry you can not dine with us to-morrow."

"It's out of the question, miss, and I deeply regret it," said Dux, with a coarse laugh.

The young lady blushed, and lowered her eyes.

"Unless, you know, your father would consent to revise his judgment," continued the felon.

"Ah, James," said the judge, with a blending of formality and the cold amiability of the hench, "it is, as you say, out of the question. Business is business, you know;" and hending toward Dux, he whispered, "it would be as much as my appointment is worth to do anything at present."

"It must be a terrible thing, Mr. Dux, to be hanged!" interrupted the young girl.

"A moment's pain, more or less, Miss Blackstone; a short moment—do you hear?" said the judge. "It is the death I would prefer for myself."

"Well, that's as how it is," insinuated Mr. Dux. "I dare say it's sweet enough, if the trap works proper and the rope is experienced. By the bye, judge, would you kindly are that the rope is comfortably soaped?"

"Willingly, my friend. Any favor I can grant you under the circumstances you are at liberty to ask."

Mr. Blackstone left with his daughter. The latter turned back several times in the hope to catch a parting glance of the assassin.

I afterward learned that on the dawn of the following morning she forwarded a basket of magnificent flowers to the condemned cell.

"More posies!" cried Dux, when he saw them. "These women folk are fools. There's only one in the lot—my gal Jane—who knows the right stuff to give a citizen of the great United States to help him to die. She sent me a gallon of old Bourbon."

By this time a crowd of new arrivals had invaded the cell, which had been transformed into an audience chamber. It was a deputation of prominent citizens, who requested to be received by the lion of the day.

The orator of the crowd made three paces toward the condemned man, and exhibiting a handsome case in morocco and gold, he delivered the following discourse with much dignity and feeling:

"Dear Mr. Dux, permit the inhabitants of Humanityville at large, and conjoined with them the members of the jury, the sheriff, and the different persons who assisted at your trial, as well as the prison officials, also the members of the police force who took part in your capture, to offer you, through me as medium, this feeble testimonial of the esteem with which you have inspired us all; not only by your calm resignation and the attitude, in every respect worthy of a gentleman, which you have known how to preserve during the many days of your detention and throughout the ordeal of the proceedings in court, but likewise by the truly Christian sentiments which have led you to pardon those whose action may have contributed to bring about your condemnation. Accept, I beg of you, in the names of all my fellow-citizens and in my own, this modest gift. We heartily wish that it may prove useful and agreeable to you during the last hours of your terrestrial sojourn."

Mr. Dux extended both his hands, and received from those of the orator a superbly enameled massive gold watch.

He weighed it in his right palm for a few seconds, turned it over, and then applied it to his right ear.

"Is it going?"

"Oh, yes," answered the donors in chorus.

"Keep good time?"

"Oh, yes."

"Jeweled?"

"Rather."

"Horizontal escapement?"

"Oh, yes?"

"American built?"

"You bet."

"Well, I'm sure I'm very much obliged, but while you were about it you might have given me a hand-made ticker."

Here the members of the deputation saw that the series of explanations were exhausted. After having shaken hands with the courageous Mr. Dux—whom they passed by in Indian file—they discreetly withdrew.

A second deputation was ushered into the room.

After the customary salute the leader of the procession spoke his speech in these terms:

"Respected sir, I am the twin brother, and these ladies and gentlemen are the nearest relatives and most intimate friends of the late George Brown, whom you slew on the night of the thirty-first of August last, by sundry blows of a sledge-hammer, in order to possess yourself of a nickel watch which he had bought for five dollars.

"Desiring to make known to the public the sentiments of admiration and respect with which your conversation has filled us, we pray you to accept our humble homage in the shape of a complete suit of clothes for your own use. We will take it as an inestimable favor if you will wear them at to-morrow morning's ceremony."

James Dux ejected a quid toward the pile of bouquets heaped behind him, and having tumbled his cheek with a fresh plug of tobacco, he took the bundle, tore off the paper-covering, and successively unfolded the coat, waistcoat, and trousers, examining the texture of the stuff with the touch of a connoisseur.

"Are these English articles warranted, you know?"

"Oh, yes," chorused the group of relatives and friends.

"Latest fashion?"

"Oh, yes."

"Buttons solidly sewn on—no slopshop work?"

"Oh, yes."

But as he pursued his examination sudden creases puckered his forehead, and in a voice trembling with anger he exclaimed:

"Where are the suspenders? There aint no suspenders to the pants, nor buttons to the coat-sleeves!"

The members of the deputation regarded each other with an embarrassed air. A whispered colloquy took place among them. At last two of the youngest of the party hurried out, and the orator, regaining his presence of mind, gave Mr. Dux his assurance that the forgotten articles would be supplied without delay.

"All right," said the assassin; "let's say no more about it."

At that moment a smothered sob was heard.

It came from one of the two orphan daughters left by poor George Brown.

"Oh, Mr. Dux," she murmured amid her tears, "how did you find it in your heart to kill our good father?"

"It was his own fault," answered James. "He provoked me by making an exhibition of that durned watch. I could not resist the temptation. Only for that all-fired time-piece I should have died of hunger, like a man, before I would have dreamed of robbery. It was more than imprudent—it was downright immoral on his part."

"The Browns were always too fond of ostentation," loudly declared a fat lady with a red face, who was no other than the president of the Society for the Protection of Penitent Assassins. "Poor man," she resumed, turning toward Dux, "you are dying a victim to the deplorable vanity of our relative. For my part, I am of the emphatic opinion that it is high time to pass a law interdicting the parade of articles of value."

"That's a fact," assented Mr. Hiram K. Anthropologus, secretary of the Society; "a saint himself could not resist.

Brown was entirely to blame. He only got what he deserved. But you, Mr. Dux, tell me, please, when the temptation assailed you to kill George in order to get his watch, did you suffer much?"

"Terrible, sir, terrible. When I saw him pull it out to look at the hour, I thought he wanted to rile me. That's a thing, you know, no citizen of this free country can stand without getting his dander up. It sort of affected me in the stomach first, then in the legs, and then in the head. I tried to resist, and even made an attempt to run away. But I can't tell how it came to pass; I wasn't equal to it; and when calmness returned I was stooping over the man, a sledge-hammer in my hand, and his skull was smashed!... No matter, it can't be helped now that it is over. I forgive him from the bottom of my heart."

"Poor man!" cried all the ladies in a tone of profound commiseration, and then began a rivalry between them as to who should give a farewell token to the condemned.

"Do take this porte-monnaie," said one.

"And this flask of smelling-salts," said another.

"Here is my box of pulmonic wafers," added a third. "They are a sovereign remedy against asthma and difficult breathing."

Dux took everything that was offered him; but all went the way of the bouquets before long.

A tumult in a corner put an end to these effusions of friendliness. An unfortunate wretch, all rags and patches, his cheeks hollow from long fasting, was struggling in the clutches of some half-dozen persons.

"I have caught him!" screamed a female voice. He was attempting to steal the game pie sent for James Dux!

"Gentlemen, if you please, ladies," gasped the poor beggar, "I have not tasted food for two days, and—and I never murdered anybody."

He was flung neck and crop out of the room.

A negro domestic here entered, and announced to Mr. Dux that dinner was served in an adjoining apartment.

The company filed out into the dining-room of the governor of the jail, which had been amiably placed, together with the governor's plate and French cook, at the disposal of the prisoner and his friends for the occasion.

The condemned man took his station in the seat of honor, Judge Blackstone on his right, and the district-attorney on his left. A popular preacher of the Talmage type said grace before meat, and made an impromptu prayer, in the course of which he made some eloquent allusions to the ceremony of the following day.

Mr. Dux ate heartily and drank copiously, and burst into frequent explosions of good-humor, which were vastly admired by the guests. The repast was a veritable banquet in its plenteousness, a fête in its joyous spirit. Several effective selections of music were performed during the courses on a harmonium by the leader of the popular preacher's choir. After the coffee came liquors stronger than wine, and with them came the toasts. The shortest and most delicate of those was given by the twin brother of George Brown in the following neat speech:

"Ladies and gentlemen: Our urbane and much-to-be-regretted friend James is on the eve of his departure. May the dejection of his leave-taking be softened and its pains be abridged."

Dux got on his legs, and in a robust voice, responded as follows:

"Ladies and gentlemen: This I shall ever look upon as the happiest and proudest moment of my career. Its remembrance shall not quit me till my dying hour. In many a former period of my existence I was cast down by disappointment, and often almost gave way to despair. Little did I then imagine that I should one day have the privilege of enjoying this honor. It was furthest from my hopes that I should have the pleasure of being entertained by such a distinguished circle until I gave that rooster, Brown, his pass-out checks for the other side of Jordan. The death of that miserable sinner has made a new man of me, has regenerated me, and filled me, so to speak, with a second life. From the moment my sentence was pronounced by my friend, the judge here, I felt myself another being—indeed, I may safely say, without boasting, that I should have lived in complete ignorance of the joy one feels in the consciousness of being good unless I had undertaken that job which procures me the novelty of being strangled to-morrow. Oh, my friends, would that you were all in the ranks of the just, like your humble servant! It is a blessed and profitable thing, I guess, to be awakened to the truth, to read pious tracts, and eat spring chickens and canvas-back ducks! Personally, I can affirm that I forgive sincerely all who have had a part in my murder. I haven't an ounce of animosity in my composition against any of you. If I were let go free to-morrow I would not hurt a hair of the head of an unborn babe. No, indeed, I would not. But to-morrow I shall be at home, and my business prospects will be brighter than those of any citizen in these States. Yes, to-morrow I shall be walking arm in arm with the prophets—to-morrow I would not exchange my log cabin in Zion for the White House at Washington. From the golden side of the clouds I shall cast an eye of pity on you poor sinners down here below, in the depths of this vale of tears. It is not for you to attain to the glory I shall have reached, for you have done nothing to entitle you to the recompense. Nevertheless, I pardon you all. I pardon the judge, I pardon the jury, I pardon the witnesses, who, by their depositions, have been the cause of my premature dissolution. I even pardon that contemptible old rooster, George Brown himself. There isn't an atom of resentment in my soul."

Everybody was melted to tears.

"He is a saint," said the popular preacher.

As for the judge, his emotion was so great that he had to hide it in a napkin behind a harricade of four empty bottles of California wine.

As I left the room after this valedictory banquet I could hear the clergyman recommending those who had obtained reserved tickets for the execution to come early, and not to fail to bring their children with them, as the sight was sure to be edifying.—Tinsley's Magazine.

Monsieur Ferdinand de Lesseps is seventy-seven years of age, but as sprightly and evergreen as of yore. His young and charming wife is about to present him with a tenth olive-branch.

RAMBLES AMONG BOOKS.

Scott's Tribute to Mrs. Siddons: With the most commanding beauty of face and form, and varied grace of action; with the most noble combination of features, and extensive capability of expression in each of them; with an unequalled genius for her art, the utmost patience in study, and the strongest ardor of feeling, there was not a passion which she could not delineate; not the nicest shade; not the most delicate modification of passion which she could not seize with philosophical accuracy, and render with such immediate force of nature and truth, as well as precision, that what was the result of profound study and unwearied practice, appeared like sudden inspiration. There was not a height of grandeur to which she could not soar, nor a darkness of misery to which she could not descend; not a chord of feeling, from the sternest to the most delicate, which she could not cause to vibrate at her will. She had reached that point of perfection in art where it ceases to be art, and becomes a second nature. She had studied most profoundly the powers and capabilities of language, so that the most critical sagacity could not have suggested a delicacy of emphasis by which the meaning of the author might be more distinctly conveyed, or a shade of intonation by which the sentiment could be more fully or more faithfully expressed. While the performers of the past or present time have made approaches to excellence or attained it now and then, Mrs. Siddons alone was pronounced faultless; and in her the last generation witnessed what we shall not see in ours—no, nor our children after us—that amazing union of splendid intellectual powers with unequalled charms of person, which, in the tragic department of her art, realized the idea of perfection.—From Mrs. Jameson's "Art Sketches."

The Mannerisms of Dickens: Is there anything in Dickens's manner as a writer which may prevent the continuance of his extraordinary popularity? No writer can be great without a manner of his own; and that Dickens had such a manner his most supercilious censor will readily allow. His terse narrative power, often intensely humorous in its unblushing and unwinking gravity, and often deeply pathetic in its simplicity, is as characteristic of his manner as is the supreme felicity of phrase, in which he has no equal. As to the latter, I should hardly know where to begin and where to leave off were I to attempt to illustrate it. But, to take two instances of different kinds of wit, I may cite a passage in Guster's narrative of her interview with Lady Dedlock: "And so I took the letter from her, and she said she had nothing to give me; and I said I was poor myself, and consequently wanted nothing;" and, of a different kind, the account of a conversation with Macready, in which the great tragedian, after a solemn but passionate commendation of his friend's reading, "put his hand upon my breast and pulled out his pocket-handkerchief, and I felt as if I were doing somebody to his Werner." These, I think, were among the most characteristic merits of his style. It also, and more especially in his latter years, had its characteristic faults. The danger of degenerating into mannerism is incident to every original manner. There is mannerism in most of the great English prose-writers of Dickens's age—in Carlyle, in Macaulay, in Thackeray—but in none of them is there more mannerism than in Dickens himself. In his earlier writings, in "Nicholas Nickleby," for instance, (I do not, of course, refer to the Portsmouth hoards,) and even in "Martin Chuzzlewit," there is much staginess; but in his later works his own mannerism had swallowed up that of the stage, and, more especially in serious passages, his style had become what M. Taine happily characterizes as le style tourmenté. His choice of words remained throughout excellent, and his construction of sentences clear. He told Mr. Wilkie Collins that "underlining was not his nature;" and in truth he had no need to emphasize his expressions, or to bid the reader "go back upon their meaning." He recognized his responsibility as a popular writer in keeping the vocabulary of the language pure; and in "Little Dorrit" he even solemnly declines to use the French word trousseau. In his orthography, on the other hand, he was not free from Americanisms; and his inter-punctuation was consistently odd. But these are trifles; his more important mannerisms were, like many really dangerous faults of style, only the excess of characteristic excellences. Thus it was he who elaborated with unprecedented effect that humorous species of paraphrase which, as one of the most imitable devices of his style, has also been the most persistently imitated. We are all tickled when Grip, the raven, "issues orders for the instant preparation of innumerable kettles for purposes of tea;" or when Mr. Pecksniff's eye is "piously upraised, with something of that expression which the poetry of ages has attributed to a domestic bird when breathing its last amid the ravages of an electric storm;" but in the end the device becomes a mere trick of circumlocution. Another mannerism which grew upon Dickens, and was faithfully imitated by several of his disciples, was primarily due to his habit of turning a fact, fancy, or situation round on every side. These, and certain other peculiarities, hardened into the style of Dickens, and, for instance, in the "Tale of Two Cities," his mannerisms may be seen side by side in glittering array. By way of compensation, the occasional solecisms and vulgarisms of his earlier style (he only very gradually ridded himself of the cockney habit of punning) no longer marred his pages; and he ceased to break or lapse occasionally, in highly impassioned passages, into blank verse. From first to last Dickens's mannerism, like everything which he made part of himself, was not merely assumed on occasions, but was, so to speak, absorbed into his nature. It shows itself in almost everything that he wrote in his later years, from the most carefully elaborated chapters of his books down to the most deeply felt passages of his most familiar correspondence, in the midst of the most genuine pathos and most exuberant humor of his books, and in the midst of the sound sense and unaffected piety of his private letters. Future generations may, for this very reason, be perplexed and irritated by what we merely stumbled at, and may wish that what is an element hardly separable from many of Dickens's compositions were away from them, as one wishes away from his signature that horrible flourish which in his letters he sometimes represents himself as too tired to append.—From A. W. Ward's "Charles Dickens."

OLD FAVORITES.

Florence Vane.
I loved thee long and dearly,
Florence Vane;
My life's bright dream and early
Hath come again;
I renew in my fond vision
My heart's dear pain,
My hopes and thy derision,
Florence Vane!

The ruin, lone and hoary,
The ruin old,
Where thou didst hark my story,
At even told;
That spot, the hues elysian
Of sky and plain,
I treasure in my vision,
Florence Vane!

Thou wast lovelier than the roses
In their prime;
Thy voice excelled the closes
Of sweetest rhyme;
Thy heart was as a river
Without a main,
Would I had loved thee never,
Florence Vane!

But fairest, coldest wonder,
Thy glorious clay
Lieth the green sod under;
Alas the day!
And it boots not to remember
Thy disdain,
To quicken love's pale ember,
Florence Vane!

The lilies-of-the-valley
By young graves weep;
The daisies love to dally
Where young maidens sleep.
May their bloom, in beauty lying,
Never wane
Where thine earthly part is lying,
Florence Vane!

—Philip Pendleton Cooke.

Song of Margaret.
Ay, I saw her; we have met—
Married eyes, how sweet they be!
Are you happier, Margaret,
Than you might have been with me?
Silence! make no more ado!
Did she think I should forget?
Matters nothing, though I knew,
Margaret, Margaret.
Once those eyes, full sweet, full shy,
Told a certain thing to mine;
What they told me I put by,
Oh, so careless of the sign.
Such an easy thing to take,
And I did not want it then;
Fool! I wish my heart would break;
Scorn is hard on hearts of men.
Scorn of self is bitter work—
Each of us has felt it now;
Bluest skies she counted mirk,
Self-betrayed of eyes and brow;
As for me, I went my way,
And a better man drew nigh,
Fain to earn, with long essay,
What the winner's hand threw by.
Matters not in deserts old,
What was born, and waxed, and yearned,
Year to year its meaning told,
I am come—its deeps are learned;
Come, but there is naught to say—
Married eyes with mine have met.
Silence! Oh, I had my day,
Margaret, Margaret.

—Jean Ingelow.

The Game of Chess.

Well, you are happy. I have found content.
I will not think of all she might have lent
By her kind love and presence to my life.
The time is past for that—she is your wife.
My dream is over now, so wild and sweet—
It was at best a dear, delicious cheat.
I can sit calmly by and see her look,
As we two play, steal slyly from her book,
And rest with deep devotion on your face.
And I with cold indifference can trace
Your likeness in her child, and even take
The darling up and kiss him for her sake.
The past with me is dead. No vain regret
Remains to make me wish I could forget.
I wonder much if she has told you all.
Ah, let me think: 'twas in the early fall.
I fancy, woman-wise, she deems it best,
For you and me, to let the matter rest.
The leaves were gold and russet, and the skies
As tender as the softened light in eyes
Where love holds court. We wandered down the lane,
Your wife and I—she then was Florence Vane—
To where a stile abruptly stops the way;
We had been there before that very day.
She stood and looked upon the scene; and I Stood with her. Field, and woods, and sky
Were all aglow; the clouds burned crimson fires;
The scented winds woke love-impassioned lyres
Within the groves; meanwhile the drowsy herd
Went slowly home, yet spoke we not a word.
The weary robin with his bleeding breast
Flew by to nestle in his downy nest;
And all the landscape faded to the sight,
Leaving the creek a winding streak of light;
And, glimmering through the pallid mists afar,
Serene and splendid rose the Evening Star.
Something—perhaps the spirit of the hour—
Made me a little bold, and gave me power
Unusual over language; then I took
The hand you hold, and sought her downcast look.
I could not tell if most she frowned or blushed,
But when she spoke all other sounds were hushed.
Why tell her answer? Let it all suffice
To learn the sequel in her married life.
You have my qu'en! That comes of careless play,
And idle thought of that autumnal day.
An evil wind—I prove the proverb true—
In losing her I've fairly mated you.
The game is mine. The game of Life as well.
I would not change my lot now since the spell
That held me fast is broken. You may see
A bliss in wedlock all unknown to me.
And yet that well remembered smile makes vain
This boasted coldness, and recalls my pain.

—N. G. Shepherd.

THE SWEET GIRL GRADUATE.

How the Trotting-Horse Reporter Coached a Chicago Rosebud.

"I would like to see an editor," said a girl of rather prepossessing appearance as she opened the door of the editorial room yesterday afternoon.

"That is not a particularly herculean task, miss," said the horse reporter, and the adherent of Iroquois smiled a bland 2:10½ smile, which seemed to reassure the young lady.

"Of course," she said, "I don't exactly know which editor I want to see, because—"

"Oh, that's all right," said the advocate of the Saratoga scale for two-year-olds. "We don't expect people who come around here to know anything." And again the quarter-stretch smile heaved forth in all its splendor.

"Well," said the young lady, "I am going to graduate next week, and mamma said that perhaps if I read my essay to some editor he would point out any little defects in it, and show how they could be remedied."

"Mamma told you that, did she?"

"Yes, sir."

"Your maternal ancestor," said the horse reporter, "is evidently a person of great mental fertility. What is the title of your essay?"

"Life's Possibilities," was the reply.

"That is certainly a comprehensive subject," remarked the compiler of the 2:30 list, "and in the case of lovely woman may include anything, from being mistress of the White House to hanging out red flannel shirts."

"Would you like to hear my essay, sir?"

"Well," replied the young man, who once began the report of a lecture with the somewhat startling announcement that "Henry Ward Beecher, whose name has been so worthily borne for several years by one of the most successful trotting stallions in this country, appeared before a large audience last evening," "I can not allow a lie to pass my ruby lips, and am therefore constrained to say that I am not wildly infatuated with the scheme you mention, but still you can read this essay. I am young, but tough."

"Schoolmates," began the girl, "we stand upon the verge of a shoreless sea, the—"

"Hold on," said the horse reporter. "Come back and get the word again."

"Why, what's the matter, sir?" asked the young lady.

"That's all wrong," was the reply. "How can any one stand upon the verge of a shoreless sea? If a sea's got a verge it isn't shoreless by quite considerable. You might as well say you were sitting in the arm-chair of a chairless parlor. I suppose you have been there."

The young lady blushed, and said she really didn't know.

"I reckoned you'd grasp the simile," said St. Julien's friend. "Chicago girls may not be beautiful, but they are superbly fly. Now, we'll change that line to 'We stand upon the shore of a sea that stretches away as far as the eye can follow, until its shimmering surface is kissed by the purple rim of a horizon that bends to meet its laughing waves as the mother bends over her baby boy—all gentleness and love'—now that's a daisy sentence. Then the Ship of Life racket is a pretty good one."

"The what?" asked the young lady.

"The Ship of Life racket," replied the horse reporter. "You take that sentence about the shimmering sea being kissed by the horizon for a starter, and then you go ahead and tell how, when sombre Night has spread its sable pall over forest and moorland, over palace-hall and humble cot, there gleams forth, in all its pure radiance, the clear, steady light of a high and noble purpose, never fading, even when dark clouds of despair hang heavily athwart the horizon, and the lurid flash of the distant lightning, followed by the hoarse rumbling of the thunder, like the mutterings of a mighty giant, foretell the coming of a storm in which the very elements shall rage in blind fury against each other. That's a corker, ain't it?"

"I suppose so," was the reply.

"You het it, sis; only you mustn't forget to get in words like 'lurid flash' and 'pure radiance,' because they're what set out the balance of the slush. I know, because I've been through college myself."

"Have you?" said the girl.

"Yes. I know you wouldn't suspect it, because I don't smoke cigarettes or ride a hicycle; but I've been there, all the same."

"Is that all I should write?—that about the storm?" the girl asked.

"Well, I should say not. You want to describe the squall in all its dreadful splendor, and tell a nice, easy lie about a stately ship that has come from the far-away islands of the Southern seas, where the breezes are laden with the balmy odor of spices, and all that kind of rubbish, you know. Then work up the peroration. Tell how the good ship, almost in sight of home, is attacked by the tempest. Give 'em a great talk about the erstwhile placid surface of the mighty deep being lashed into ungovernable fury by the fierce winds that seem to laugh a wild, a demoniac laugh in very glee at the destruction they are causing. And then, when everything looks as dreary, and desolate, and hopeless as the editorial page of a Milwaukee paper, lug out the light, gleaming in all its pure radiance again, and have the ship get safely into port. Then say that the ship is the Ship of Life, and the light of a mother's love, or something like that, and sit down. You'll be sure to hit 'em hard if you do this."

"Do you really think so?"

"It's dead certain."

"Then I shall follow your advice; and let me thank you for your kindness," said the girl, as she started for the door.

"Don't forget about the lurid glare, sis," shouted the horse reporter.

"I will remember it, sir," was the reply, accompanied by a smile.

"And the pure radiance of the flame," he continued. "A flame without a pure radiance is of no earthly account in a graduating essay."

"I won't forget," and another smile was wafted down the hallway. "And now good-by, sir."

"Au revoir," said the horse reporter. "Come in after you are married, and I will put you on to me for your first baby."—Joseph Medill in the Chicago Tribune.

SOCIETY.

Notes and Gossip.

Mrs. Oates, of Santa Rosa, who has been visiting in this city, has returned home. Miss Ada Johnson leaves on a visit to the Misses McMullin in a few days. Mr. and Mrs. F. G. Edwards are at Duncan's Mills; later in the season they will visit Santa Cruz and Monterey. Miss Helen Richmond is summering in Napa County. Mr. and Mrs. P. G. Martin, who were married at the Baldwin Hotel on the nineteenth ult., and who subsequently went to Santa Cruz on a brief bridal tour, have returned. Justice Field will return from Oregon on or about the tenth inst. Mr. and Mrs. W. C. Graver, who are recreating in San Benito County, will return home next week. Mrs. Duncan Kennedy leaves for the East in a few days. Mrs. Grattan and Miss Bessie Grattan, who have spent the past six months in Washington, and are now in New York, will leave that city for home in a few days. Mrs. John A. Paxton, who has been at the Palace for a week or two, has returned to her summer place in Sonoma County. Mrs. Colonel Dickinson, who has been sojourning at Santa Cruz for more than a month, has gone to San José, where she will remain until after the Fourth. Mrs. J. W. Gashwiler and family are at Santa Cruz. Companies F and G, Second Regiment, N. G. C., accompanied by the Oakland Light Cavalry and a section of artillery, will leave here to-day for Santa Cruz, and go into camp in the large handsome field back of Mrs. Pope's, where they will remain until after the Fourth; the place of encampment will be called "Camp Dimond." A grand civil and military ball will be given at the Ocean House on Tuesday evening next. The First Infantry, under Colonel Dickinson, proceeds to "Camp Sheehan," San José, to-day, to remain until next Saturday. Receptions will be held this evening and on Monday and Wednesday evenings next by the regiment, and arrangements are being made by parties in San José for a military hop on Tuesday evening next. Sleeping cars have been sent down to Monterey for the accommodation of guests at the Hotel del Monte, and a dress-ball will be given on Tuesday evening next, and hops every evening except Sunday until the middle of July—music by Ballenberg. Dr. and Mrs. Burgess are at Santa Cruz. The Earl of Hope, a handsome young English nobleman, who lately arrived in New York, leaves Chicago for San Francisco during the latter part of the present month. Mrs. C. Bernard and Miss Fannie Curtis have gone East, to remain away a year. Mrs. W. T. Wallace and Miss Belle Wallace have returned from Paso Robles. Mr. and Mrs. Henry Crocker, who left here for the Eastern States a few days ago, are at the Gilsey House, New York. Mrs. Carroll Cook, who has been visiting in Santa Barbara for some time past, will return to her home in Oakland in a day or two. Miss Eleanor Gibbon left for the Yosemite Valley on Saturday last, to be absent three weeks. Miss Carrie Gray, of Oakland, is visiting friends in El Dorado County. William H. Crocker graduated at Yale on Wednesday last, and will sail for Europe with his father and mother, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Crocker, and his sister, Miss Hattie Crocker, on Saturday next. Miss Kate H. Russell and Miss Eva Wardwell, of Oakland, are camping in the Santa Cruz mountains, near Felton. Hon. B. B. Redding and W. Brown leave this morning for Shasta and St. Cloud River, to be gone ten days. Lieutenant Powell, U. S. Signal Service, sailed for Point Barrow on the schooner Leo, on Saturday last. Mrs. Doctor Bird, of San Quentin, and Miss May Miller, daughter of Samuel Miller, left here for the Yosemite a day or two ago. Miss Maillard, who has been upon an extended Eastern visit, has returned to her home at San Rafael. Mrs. Flood and Miss Flood, who have been staying at Etna Springs for a short time, have returned to Menlo. Mrs. Seymour and family, of Oakland, have returned from the Mariposa Grove and Yosemite. General J. C. Fremont arrived in Tucson on his way to Mazatlan a few days ago. Mr. and Mrs. Molineux, who went to the Yosemite last week, have returned. George E. Whitney and two of his daughters, of Oakland, have gone to Puget Sound to remain until August. Miss Ivy Hagar, of Oakland, has returned from Monterey. Mrs. Spooner and Miss Hammond have returned from the Yosemite. Mr. and Mrs. M. H. Kimball, of Los Angeles, celebrated their silver wedding in that city in splendid style on Monday evening last. Mrs. Colonel W. B. Lent and Miss Fannie Lent and Johnny Boyd, who have been visiting the Yosemite and Big Trees, returned a day or two ago. James Donohue and a party of ten ladies and gentlemen left here for the Yosemite and Big Trees on Monday last. Mrs. Irving M. Scott, Miss Alice Scott, and Miss Belle Grant are at the Sierra Madre Villa. Miss Kate Atkinson is at the Yosemite. Mr. and Mrs. G. R. Sanderson and Mr. and Mrs. E. H. Sanderson are at the Sierra Madre Villa. J. W. Wilcutt and family, Mr. and Mrs. H. P. Drexler, and Mrs. Mathews are at the Yosemite. Mrs. Emma F. Colton is visiting Mrs. Joseph Davidson in Sacramento. Frank Staples has returned to Tucson; Mrs. Staples is still at San José. W. Wesley Moore, a member of the choir of Trinity Church, New York, entertained the guests of the Hotel del Monte with choice selections of music in the main parlor of the hotel on Monday evening last. Mr. and Mrs. Francis Blake, of Oakland, who have been visiting the Geysers, have returned. Louis McLane and family are at the Tamalpais, San Rafael. Mrs. William M. Stewart has returned from Carson, and is at the Geysers with her daughter Mabel. Bishop and Mrs. Kip have gone to Alameda, for a few weeks' rest. Paymaster C. A. McDaniel, of the Ranger, is again at the Palace. Mrs. General Miller will return to Washington in August, and Senators Miller and Farley and their families will return to the State shortly after. Senator Fair returned from Washington on Monday last. J. W. Mackay, who arrived in New York with his daughter some three weeks ago, will visit Nevada shortly, so it is given out, to prospect for the succeeding United States Senatorship; Mrs. Mackay is also in New York, having arrived there a few days after her husband and daughter. Mrs. Senator Jones will spend a few weeks at Long Branch after the adjournment of Congress. Captain H. C. Dearborn, who went East some few weeks ago, returned on Wednesday. Lieutenant-Commander Livingstone, U. S. N., arrived in the East on Sunday last. F. H. Clark and J. H.

Ayres, U. S. N., are at the Baldwin. Ensign Stoney is at the Occidental. Mrs. James Carolan is spending some time at the Blue Lakes. Mrs. B. B. Redding, who has been spending some three or four weeks in and near Boston, is now in New York. Miss Stella Howe, of Oakland, is at the Calaveras Big Tree Grove. Miss Mollie Dodge has returned from Menlo Park. Mrs. J. R. Jarboe is at Soda Bay. The engagement of Lieutenant A. L. Mills, U. S. A., and Miss Addie Paddock, daughter of Bishop Paddock, of Tennessee, has been announced.

SAN FRANCISCO FASHIONS.

A leading house has just received several costumes from Paris, of exceeding richness. One is worth two hundred and fifty dollars, and displays every color of the rainbow. It is a carriage or reception costume, made short. The skirt is of bronze-colored gros-grain, finished around the base with a thick heavy ruching composed of stripes about one inch wide, and pinked out on both sides. There are nine rows of these stripes, and all bunched together as close as they can be, and of various colors; bronze, light blue, and light pink forming the combination. Over the front of the skirt, and reaching about three-quarters of a yard up, growing deeper as they near the back widths, are a number of box-pleats of corded silk with a satin gloss. The surface or upper part of the pleats, which are three inches wide, display clusters of brilliant roses, rose-buds, and leaves of many tints upon a cream-white ground. The under part of the pleats and the space between them display a mass of stripes, rather narrow, and of numberless tints of brown, with an occasional narrow stripe of pink and blue together. The effect is very charming. As a finish to this part of the costume there is a short apron front laid in fine folds, that crosses the front scarf-like, and meets in the back, which is covered with soft puffs of the bronze. Placed a little to the left is a sash of the brilliant part of the dress. It is held in position by a buckle of imitation diamonds. The body that accompanies this skirt is pointed, both front and back, made of the bronze, and corded with the colored material, a puffing of which trims the back part of the sleeves, and also forms a collar made into a puff. Another costume is of a light delicate shade of blue, and shows a large quantity of passementerie of blue cord and blue-tinted beads. Panels of this passementerie adorn the front at intervals until they reach the back, where a fan-shaped pleated piece is let in, joined at the sides with trimming to correspond. Falling over it is a sash of surah satin of the same shade. The body is also of pointed design, with a deep square collar formed with the passementerie. This costume is lovely in the extreme. Some pretty patterns were shown me in another establishment, but these were intended for every-day traveling suits, or to be worn at watering-places. They were grass linen, some embroidered on the fabric, and others with embroidered appliqué, with a chain-stitch, some in blue, some in red, and others in black. They were marked at thirty-five dollars a pattern, and warranted to do up as well as new when placed in the laundress's charge. Quite a novel and pretty little cape has recently been introduced, and is only intended to be worn on such occasions when a cloak or larger wrap is not wanted; and yet it is a good protection to the throat and chest. It reaches a little below the shoulders, meets in front, laps over, is carried up to the left side of the neck, and there confined with a bow, cord and tassel, or any sort of trimming with which the dress is set off. Detached patterns in embroidery are among the latest novelties. Embroidery has made such rapid advancement that it now begins to appear in veiling of all descriptions, the principal designs being fruit and flowers on grounds of every color. An entire dress may be made of this fabric, or it may be combined with any nice goods, and used as drapery. It is said to be very pretty with foulards; or, when done in light, brilliant colors, is very effective over black silk or satin. It is worn over white silk, and perhaps thus made up is more suitable for young ladies. But the most sought-after costumes for general wear at the present time are all of the soft, clinging woolen materials, such as cashmere and camel's hair. Such goods in the very best quality are shown in great variety by all our leading merchants. In raw, undyed materials there is a large quantity of pretty novelties, such as beige, muslin, delaine, cashmere, taffetas, vigogne, and armure. These goods are of course light in material, and may be trimmed and made up with something of the same shade, or in bright colors, just as fancy requires. Another fashion at present is for chenille. It is used upon every possible occasion, but mostly for scarfs and collars, though many fichus are seen in chenille. Berthas, made of black jetted lace, are again the fashion. They are made round or pointed, and nearly cover the shoulder. They range in price from five dollars up to twenty-five. But the very latest novelty is "digitated" hose. They have not yet made their appearance in our city, but a merchant told me that he had ordered some, which would soon be here. The digitated hose is where each toe finds its place in the same manner as a finger in a glove. One can imagine they would look exceedingly cunning when the shoe was off. In hosiery there is a passion for the very brightest colors possible, and tinsel is elaborately introduced. Some of the most elegant and expensive kind are those with point lace insertion. Terra-cotta, the new shade, is finding much favor with the ladies for gloves, also tan and buff shades, and from eight to ten buttons in length. Then there are the chamois and the wash-leather. These are wrinkled at the wrist, and generally stitched on the backs. Silk gloves and mitts, long and loose-wristed, come in all shades. There is also the stockingette, or Jersey glove. The last named are not only worn with black suits as formerly, but are seen with every colored toilet. The new shade of brick-red in gloves is a new comer, and promises to be quite popular, especially when a black silk or satin costume is worn. Very few artificial flowers are now worn, all preferring the natural ones. Ostrich feathers, the milliners tell me, are the vogue for elderly ladies in dressing the hair. The fashion for arranging the hair now is of the most simple style. All false hair is being discarded, and one's own hair is carelessly rolled in a knot, and held together with a silver arrow or any pretty ornament. The front hair covers the forehead as much as possible in crimps, rings, and little curls. HELENA.

June 25, 1882.

THE PACIFIC NEWPORT.

Who and What are to be Seen In and Around Monterey.

June 29, 1882.—Monterey, with her Pacific Grove on the one side, and her Hotel del Monte on the other, is happy. Her star is in the ascendant, and she is jealous of no one; or if she is, she doesn't show it. She has slept the sleep of the intemperate Knickerbocker, to be sure, and she has been despised as plebeian; for many years she was undoubtedly the Cinderella of the sea-side resorts upon this side of the continent. But, ah! she has found her little glass slipper, and it is not strange that some of her more pretentious sisters are worried. Still, there is no occasion for feeling. In the bustle of life there are cakes and ale enough for all; and if the hotels here all swarm with people, including the Hotel del Monte and the habitations at the Grove, so also are accommodations at Santa Cruz, Pescadero, Soquel, Camp Goodall, and Aptos at a premium. Monterey, with its Hotel del Monte, is no more of a surprise than is Newport, with its Casino. Newport flourished more than two hundred years ago, and was the first, and for many years, the only watering-place in America. Monterey was the first capital of California, and it also flourished as the earliest sea-side resort upon our side of the continent. It is just one hundred years ago that Washington and Rochambeau visited Newport and tripped it in the light fantastic with Miss Champlin and Miss Lawton; and it is nearly half a century since Burton and Fremont danced with the Castilian girls to the music of an indifferent guitar. If there are gambrel-roofed houses at Newport, sided with shingles instead of clapboards, more than one hundred years old, and in a good state of repair, so there are to-day habitable adobes in Monterey that were built long before the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown. The mansion where Washington met Rochambeau in 1780 still stands in good order at Newport; a cross erected by Serra and Portala, more than a century ago at Monterey, is still to be seen near where the patient pilgrims landed. The house of worship in which Berkeley preached in 1725 at Newport is still standing; the adobe church in which Junipero Serra celebrated high mass only fifty years later at Monterey has not yet disappeared in ruins. Indeed, if the natives of the quaint old colonial quarter of the famous Eastern town look over the newer portion where the rich summer residents have built their magnificent villas, and where the dazzling Casino welcomes its substantial patrons, so also do the octogenarians of the curious old adobe municipality upon our side gaze with wonder and admiration at the Del Monte and its gardens, and the multitudes of young men who make the regular British trot to and from the club-house. As at all other sea-side resorts, the hatching hour is the hour of all others at Monterey; and from ten until twelve in the morning the heath presents an extremely lively appearance; the loud halloo, the cheerful laugh, the shrill scream, and other sounds of merriment mingle with the roar of bounding billows like notes from the fancy stops of an organ blending with its deep diapason or still deeper bass. The bay spreads out before you with all its outlines of land and sea, steeped and softened in the silvery haze of its atmosphere, which sometimes imparts to the scene a vague, dreamy look, and keeps one in doubt often whether it be a picture or the thing itself that fixes the eye of the beholder. Its waters, for the most part, "only heave with a summer swell," and never wear the savage aspect of "cataract seas" that continually thunder a few miles down the coast at Lohos and Cypress Points.

It is just now the zenith of the season at the Hotel del Monte, and Ballenberg, who has been dropping in upon us for a month, came down on the twenty-fourth instant to remain several weeks, which means that we are to hereafter have hops nightly, except Sunday evenings, which are to be given up to "sacred music" such as we used to have last year and the year before. Quite a number of the ladies who have helped swell the throngs that have gathered here during the past two years, are elsewhere this season. Miss Halladay, whose elegant piano exhibitions delighted so many last summer, is in London, and her sister is in New York; Miss Bessie Grattan is in Washington; Mrs. Colonel Eddy and Miss May Eddy are in Switzerland; Mrs. Charles Crocker and Miss Hattie Crocker are in New York; Mrs. Senator Miller and Miss Dora Miller are in Paris; Miss Juliet Shaffer is in Boston; the four Misses Sutro are in Paris; the Misses Maggie and Alice Hamilton are in England, and one of them is Lady Waterlow; pretty Flora Sharon that was in Belmont, and is now Lady Hesketh; Mrs. Holliday is in New York; Miss Coleman that was in Mrs. Fred May; Miss Emma Cole has married, and is in New York, and her new name is Brown; Miss Woodward is Mrs. Raum, and she is in Italy; Mrs. Drury Melone will spend the summer at the family place in Napa County; Mrs. Schmiedell and Miss Schmiedell will content themselves at San Rafael; Mrs. Henry Crocker is in New York; and there are many more, whose names I do not now recall, scattered here and there, elsewhere than here, whose presence at this place during preceding seasons added perceptibly to the pomp and consequence of this so-called "Queen of American Watering-places."

The following named ladies are at the Hotel del Monte at present, and will remain until after the Fourth:

Mrs. Fisher Ames, Mrs. Breeze and maid, and the Misses M. and S. Breeze. Mrs. Aug. J. Bowie and maid, Miss Bowie, Mrs. John Corning, Mrs. B. Crocker, Miss Crocker, Miss Maggie Eysse, Mrs. Friedlander and maid, the Misses Friedlander, Mrs. Colonel Horace Fletcher and maid, Mrs. James Freeborn, Miss Griffin, Mrs. E. Goodall, Miss Gallatin, Mrs. J. L. Griffing, Miss Griffing, Mrs. A. E. Head and maid, Miss Head, Miss Hull, Mrs. W. P. Harrington and maid, Miss M. A. Harrington, Miss F. A. Harrington, Mrs. Samuel Host, Mrs. George Haggerman, Mrs. Charles Haggerman, Mrs. J. H. Hatch, Mrs. J. H. Jewett, Mrs. M. P. Jones, Mrs. A. Jenks, Miss H. Jolliffe, Mrs. W. S. Keyes and maids, Mrs. G. Kilburn, Mrs. John Lee, Miss Lee, Mrs. Governor F. F. Low, Miss Flora Low, Mrs. Ariel Lathrop, Mrs. J. L. Moody, Mrs. H. Matthews, Miss C. M. Matthews, Mrs. W. P. Morgan, Mrs. McMichael, Miss May McMichael, Mrs. Charles McLaughlin, Mrs. Joseph Mailliard, Mrs. Charles Miller, Miss M. Miller, Miss Maud Miller, Miss B. Miller, Mrs. J. P. Pierce, Miss Pierce, Miss K. Pierce, Mrs. A. Poett, Mrs. A. H. Rutherford, Mrs. J. T. Sloan, Mrs. F. J. Sullivan, Mrs. Leland Stanford and maid, Mrs. A. L. Tubbs, Miss N. K. Tubbs, Mrs. D. J. Tallant, Miss A. Tallant, Mrs. W. H. Taylor, Miss Taylor, Miss Carrie Taylor, Mrs. Tevis, Mrs. J. Toy, Miss Clara Taylor, and Mrs. H. B. Williams. B. C. T.

A LAWLESS LOT.

How the Modern Lacedaemonians Conduct their Vendettas.

The schoolmaster is abroad—the scholars also—and the education of the young idea in the district of Kotrones is at a standstill. I am the cause. I am informed that the only building among the huts which are scattered around the hay, in which I can get any accommodation, is the school-house. The teacher has therefore dismissed the scholars from attendance, during the time I remain at Kotrones, and the building is at my disposal. My bed is made on the teacher's platform, which is raised a couple of feet above the hard mud floor. I have the choice of any of the half dozen rickety desks to write and eat at.

I am well disposed to rest, as I have been on foot for the last eight hours, climbing over the mountain from the village of Skutari, where I spent last night. My mule was only able to carry my portmanteau up the steep zig-zag path, which at times approached so nearly the perpendicular that I often expected to see the animal roll over the irrepressible guide Georgi, as he urged on the mule. Georgi is never quiet. When not shouting at the mule, he is either talking or singing. I envy the ease with which he steps lightly from one piece of rock to another, never turning a hair, as I follow puffing, panting, and perspiring. As we begin the descent the mule seemed to resign the control of his limbs, and could not make any special effort to place his feet firmly, as often as not letting his four legs all come down sliding together.

There is too much talking outside of the closed door of the school-house, which is about four feet from the head of my bed, to allow me to enjoy much sleep. Georgi is giving the news of the past fortnight from the other side of the mountain—we are the only people who have crossed for that period—to the natives, by whom we had been seen some hours ago as we appeared at the top of the red, stony ridge. They have in consequence assembled to interview us.

The arrivals continue. I can hear the metal ring of the stock of each fresh comer's gun as he places it on the rocky ledge round the building, to lean against the mud wall, and the reiterated greeting to Georgi. I will go out and get my introduction over as soon as possible, then lie on my rug in the shade of the school-house, with the sea coming up to within a few paces of my feet. In this position I find myself in a few moments, after I have shaken hands with all the party.

I direct Georgi to continue some information he was giving, which was being listened to with the greatest interest when my presence and presentation interrupted him. He does so, and I take this opportunity to examine the group who are now seated or reclining all about me. They look rather fierce. Nearly all wear beads, and those who affect shaving date the last touch of the razor from the feast-day, ten days ago. All have heavy sheep-skin cloaks, though the thermometer is ninety degrees. The theory that causes these cloaks to be worn winter and summer is, that in the winter they keep the heat in, and in summer they keep it out. These cloaks cover fearfully dirty fustanellas and jackets. Some have no covering on their heads, others a black cap. Each has round his waist a gathered-up leather apron, so as to form a receptacle for a small armory of immense pistols and long knives—the latter in sheaths. Their guns, as I have said, are against the wall of the house.

I begin to listen to what Georgi is saying. It seems that in consequence of some misfortune which had happened in this place a little while ago, a boy, native of one of the little hamlets about Kotrones, had been cruelly seized at Skutari, and taken to Sparta, where something unpleasant was anticipated for him. As more details are given, the exact story, as it appears to my Western ears, takes the following shape:

The boy, aged thirty years—all unmarried men under forty are called boys in Greece—finding a man who belonged to a hostile village under a tree asleep, shot him dead. This little circumstance had probably escaped his memory, as some days after he appeared at Skutari, when some overzealous official, having a prejudice against murder, arrested and sent the murderer to Sparta for trial. His father was one of my visitors, and spoke bitterly and with great excitement against the people of Skutari for having allowed the arrest to be made.

"What will be the sentence if convicted?" I ask. "Death by the guillotine," replies the father, with a slight smile, which further questioning enlightens me is caused by the disparity between the awful sentence and what will actually happen to his son—a few months' imprisonment, till he can be quietly released through the influence of one of the members of the Greek Chambers for Laconia, of whom the old man speaks proudly as his kombaros. The subject is dropped with the remark that had the boy stayed at Kotrones till the matter had been forgotten, all this fuss and bother would have been avoided. I begin to recollect where I am. "All who enter here leave law behind," might be appropriately written at the mountain pass.

These men before me could rob me, and keep me for ransom. All King George's horses and all King George's men could not help me in the least; but I need be under no apprehension. I came as a stranger, wishing harm to none. Their honor is concerned that I should be in perfect safety. Should the value of a drachma be stolen from me, the offender would be instantly discovered and punished. The situation, however, is strongly suggestive of the desirability of producing a good impression, and my manner is quite winning, as I continue by my questions to learn some curious facts concerning the country I am in. Trade there is none. We are on the shore of a beautiful bay, opening out into the Mediterranean; but there is not a vessel or a boat belonging to the place. When the people can not destroy fish along the shores with dynamite, they live without, and on what their little plots of fertile ground produce, which consists of corn, olives, vegetables, cheese, (made from the milk of their goats,) and very rarely, on some great feast day, kid's flesh. Some simple articles are got from Skutari, by selling what they can spare from their wool and cheese.

"We are mountaineers," says one of the party, who has brought himself to my prominent notice by coming and setting quite close to me, and telling me that his wife's sister's husband is first cousin to the Nomarch's wife at Sparta, and in this rather circuitous manner constitutes himself a sort of government official of the place. "We are mountaineers, and, as from boys we have always guns in our hands, would make the best soldiers in the world. We could live, if necessary, on bread alone for weeks. None of us go as soldiers. The government can't make us. We would go if there is a war with Turkey, and then the way we would fight would astonish the world."

"What would you do if a detachment of soldiers came here to enforce the enlistment laws?" I ask, timidly, and in a tone of apology for the audacious idea. "We would do what we did to King Otho's Bavarian soldiers, who came here to make us pay taxes. We seized all the soldiers, and put them to ransom—one drachma each." "A war ship could come, and then—" My friend and all the group laugh with great contempt. "A war ship! Listen," he says, "and I will tell you what we did to a French frigate a few years ago, which came in the bay for fresh water. A party of officers on shore had been rude to some of our women. We fired on them, and wounded several. They ran to their boats, and returning to the frigate, brought back two hundred men. By the time they landed, we were up in the mountain there with our goats and families. Had they attempted to follow us, we could have shot them down without their catching a glimpse of us. They wisely retired after burning our houses, which, as we afterward built them up in a week, was no great matter."

I am reminded of the drowsy husband, who, when awakened and told of the death of his wife, said: "How sorry I will be in the morning." I feel that these accounts of the place will be very interesting when I am not so sleepy. At this moment a remark of the guide Georgi to one of the men thoroughly arouses me. "Demetri," he says, "they told me at Skutari that you shot a girl last week." Demetri, who is a round-faced, shock-headed, good-natured looking man, replies: "Oh, that was quite an accident. You know as well as any one that we never fire on women. It was this way: The girl's father, the Spanos, (without hair on his face,) is brother to Aristide, who fired at me last Easter. One day I got a good aim at the Spanos, and at the moment I fired, the girl, who had been behind a tree, so that I could not see her, caught sight of me, and ran to her father, calling out to warn him. She got the ball in her arm. She is all right now."

Here is a revelation. I am in the midst of civil war. I find that there is a vendetta between the people I am with and the villagers of the little hamlet which lies about two miles off on the other side of the bay. This vendetta has been so long in existence that no one remembers its origin. It is perpetuated by the desire to revenge the frequent attacks made on each other. When any of the men of one village get a chance they have a shot at the males of the other, and vice versa.

My official—or rather officially connected—friend tells me that these internecine proclivities will not interfere with the working of the red marble quarry, if I want to get marble. The quarry lies between the two villages. Should men be hired exclusively from one village, the people of the other would not let them work. They would constantly fire on them. It will be arranged in this way: Men from each village will be hired to work on alternate days, so that they shall not meet. In fact, an armistice will be proclaimed for mutual benefit, so long there is work to be done. Here is a fine opportunity for the peace society. Work the red marble quarry, erect a temple dedicated to peace, and by so doing banish war from Laconia.

I wonder if the Trojan war would have taken place if petroleum springs had been found on the plains of Troy? Homer could not certainly have sung an iliad about an Athenian-Trojan joint stock oil company, with Priam and Agamemnon on the board of directors.

But, great heavens! what is this? The hay has gone. I am standing on the high hill, in place of looking at it. The scene has changed entirely. Before me is stretched a plain many miles in extent. At the further end, on a height at the entrance of a narrow mountain gorge, is a city of dark buildings, some of which are topped with gilded bands glittering in the sun. The walls I lean on are made of enormous stones, and surround a city crowded with low, flat-roofed houses. Men clothed in strange dresses crowd around me, shouting, with much accompanying gesticulation, in a language I can not understand. They are fronting to the plain. On that plain is a mass of men and horses intermingled, seething together, and from which rise maddened shouts. The horrid shriek of horses in their death-agony is heard. But see! From the white-clad mass, whose helmets sparkle as each unit composing it moves incessantly, a fringe of men spread out. This is quickly increased, till large bodies are formed moving quickly over the plain. It is flight. The shouts of the victors are taken up by those at the walls about me, like the distant rumbling of thunder culminating in a peal which breaks over my head.

"The Mykenians flee, Argos is saved, and—"

"The kerios had better sleep in the house," says Georgi; "this thunder will bring rain."

No wonder, after hearing of the fights of the villagers of Kotrones I dream of the battles between the Argos and Mykenians.

ALEITHEIA.

KOTRONIS, Laconia, May 25, 1882.

Mr. Oscar Wilde, says London Life, writes home to say that he is about to visit Japan; though whether he is going to teach art or to learn it in the empire which yields us the lacquer-ware, the fans, the umbrellas, and the blue-and-white which modern England loves, is not quite plain. One thing, however, seems certain—that Mr. Oscar Wilde leaves America richer by four thousand pounds than when he reached it. There is high authority for playing the fool to save one's life; and Mr. Wilde may, perhaps, argue that few lives are worth four thousand pounds.

The Prince of Wales lately received a diverting reply from the Mayoress of a midland county-town, whom he offered to escort to the refreshment-room. "Thank your Highness," said the dame, "but I'm shampooing a couple of young ladies, and I don't like to leave them."

MUSICAL NOTES.

Concerts of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club.

After an absence of nine months or more, the talented members of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club have revisited San Francisco, and have enriched the musical history of our city by two of their delightful concerts. These took place last week in Platt's Hall, and, considering the lateness of the season, were largely attended. All who listened last year to this little company of gifted musicians have treasured the memory of their refined and skillful playing as something to be long held in full recollection.

The concerted numbers of the first programme were: The overture to "Raymond," by Ambrose Thomas; the quintette in A, opus eighteen, by Mendelssohn; a quartette, by Raff, "The Miller's Pretty Daughter"; and a kaleidoscope of popular melodies, arranged by Schultze—the latter, it may be remarked in passing, not attaining to the height of what the French call a "mad success," in either musical worthiness or cordiality of reception.

Curiosity had been expressed by some who listened to the quintette last year as to whether their playing, after a lapse of time, could have power to renew that peculiar charm which originally exercised such a fascination over their hearers. Would the strings, the flute, and the clarionette again unite to breathe forth that subtle sorcery of sound which seemed more like an exhalation than a measured and calculated result? or did enthusiasm invest our first impressions of these players with a magic and high perfection, all disproportioned and falsely imagined? The question was by no means insignificant. People are too often disenchanted, and rudely robbed of cherished ardors by second meetings and second hearings, not to be somewhat anxious regarding the fate of their own opinions when past experiences promise to reproduce themselves. It was something more than a relief, therefore, to many of the audience when, with the opening notes of the "Raymond" overture, that mellow and finished tone arose, so familiar and beautiful to us of old, and the spell that had lingered these ten months gone reasserted itself, fresh and fervent as before.

No instrument had learned self-aggrandizement in the colonies; not one had forgotten its loyalty to the Quintette as a whole; and in the lovely Mendelssohn number, with its poetical passages, and tenuous, vibrating pianissimos, nothing more smooth or more refined could possibly be asked. The fascinating little "Mill" story had lost none of its romantic simplicity, and was given with great delicacy, while all the accompaniments of the evening were played with traditional taste and excellence. The one misfortune of the performance took to itself form in the "Kaleidoscope." This astonishing composition, which was nothing more or less than a medley compounded of all manners and conditions of well-known melodies, might perhaps have found favor with a less select and discriminating audience than that which greeted the club on this occasion. It was doubtless intended as a pure tribute from the sacrifice of musicianly feeling to a misunderstood public; but considered as a propitiatory offering it was so clearly wasted that the experiment is not likely to be repeated.

At the second concert a strictly classical programme included as ensemble numbers the overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor," by Nicolai; the quartette in A, Op. 18, by Beethoven, and the "Tema Convariazioni," from the Clarionette Quintette, Op. 108, by Mozart, all of which were most thoughtfully rendered.

Miss Cora R. Miller, who accompanies the club, has added largely to the pleasure given by their concerts. Miss Miller's voice is a clear, well-balanced soprano, better adapted, in quality and in her use of it, to the florid and embellished style of music than to ballad singing. Her ability and promise awaken a lively interest in regard to her future; for although she sings at present with ease, conscientious accuracy, and a very pleasing grace, her force, freshness, and evident earnestness hint of still brighter triumphs to come. A suggestion of throatiness in some of her medium lower tones is to be deplored, but, taken all in all, her singing has been a source of great enjoyment.

Miss Miller's first number was the difficult Polacca from Mignon, by Thomas, which was brilliantly and beautifully interpreted. As an encore, "The Little Mountain Maid," by Mr. Redding, was given. Other selections were: "It was a Dream," by Cowen; a scena and aria from "La Traviata"; "To Sevilla," by Dessauer, and several light little encore songs. The aria from "Traviata" was well rendered, and calls for great praise. Specially adapted to Miss Miller's voice, it was her most effective contribution, and was warmly acknowledged.

Of the other soloists it is almost needless to speak individually. Mr. Schnitzler's broad, powerful, and fully vocalized violin tone is still the wonder and joy that it has been. His numbers were an arrangement of Russian airs, by Wieniawski, and Hungarian airs by Ernst, with encores.

Mr. Giese's cello sings, laughs, and weeps as of yore, and the same electric thrill answers to the touch of his bow. Beside encores, Mr. Giese played a Fantaisie on themes from "La Fille du Régiment," by Servais, and one on themes from "Il Barbiere," also by this author. From Mr. Ryan, with his picturesque face and warm serenity of manner, we had the "Pastorale Amoroso," from the clarionette concerto by Crusel, and a Fantaisie on themes from "Le Postillon," by Ryan. The exquisite quality of Mr. Ryan's tone was emphasized anew, and his numbers were enthusiastically received. Mr. Schade put all the birds to shame with the fluency and sparkle of his flute variations, and threw a delicately plaintive tunelessness into the unadorned melodies he played. His selections were a Fantaisie on a well-known melody of Chopin's, and "La Mélancolique" by Reichardt. One of his encores, an arrangement of Mendelssohn's familiar "Spring Song," was particularly good.

Before their final departure for the East two more concerts will probably be given by the quintette. These entertainments will take place some time in August, and are sure to be of interest to all lovers of music.

F. A. SAN FRANCISCO, June 29, 1882.

"There is no victory I have ever gained—in my victories put together—that gives more satisfaction than this over Hearst,"—Stoneman.

VANITY FAIR.

"At the Jerome Park races," says the New York correspondent of the Cincinnati Enquirer, "I saw many beautiful toilets on beautiful women, but the latter were in so many instances palpably brazen that the pleasure of viewing them was greatly marred. One in particular was a beauty, of course, and finely dressed, though rather loudly. Her toilet was made of drab rep silk with crimson watered silk trimmings. Underneath the short, full French paniers were set long panels, with space enough between each to show a full ruche of the rep goods at the foot of the underskirt, faced with crimson. A long, slender Louis XIV. bodice simulated a waistcoat, and the crimson vest was closely shirred. The coat-sleeves were closely buttoned up the back of the arm to the elbow, and faced with crimson, giving the appearance of a piping to the edges showing beyond ruby buttons. Over her hands and forearms were drawn drab undressed kid gloves, faced with crimson cord. Around her waist was a gold-linked girdle, from which was suspended a black velvet pocket, lined with crimson and tied with crimson ribbons. Her hat was in the Rubens shape, of drab straw, trimmed with a wreath of roses; and she carried a parasol of drab satin, lined with crimson and adorned with Spanish lace ruffles. Her shoes were Newport ties of patent leather, cut out very low, and showing black silk stockings. Very unsophisticated was she, if one were to judge by the rather deceptive appearances. It was hard to tell whether her artless ways and affected ignorance of everything about horse-racing were intended to fool her rich companion, or simply to impress others."

Girton College, of Cambridge, England, says the Boston Gazette, has set a new fashion that strikes cold horrors to the hearts of sweet girl graduates. Instead of the everlasting white elaborations which have distinguished the graduating attire from other mortal dress, the Girton girls received their degrees in gowns precisely like those worn by masculine undergraduates. The cap and gown on a pretty girl is not so bad, but what will be the use of wading through college if she can't show some fine feathers on the final day?

Ladies select with care the color of the lining of their parasols, so as to form an effective background when the fair one lays it "carelessly" over her shoulder. A correspondent of Progress, who has delved into the mysteries of the subject, writes that if chosen wisely the lining brings out all the points, not only of the complexion, but of the hair and eyes. Brunettes are best suited with a shrimp (sic) pink, and blondes with a Nile green. Much thought is required to decide which color will do always—when the lady is flushed, when she is pale, etc. All sorts of odd handles are used for parasols. They are of cherry, ash, or twisted willow, in simple crutch or straight-cut fashion. Those of whangewood are coiled to form true love-knots. Some have a champagne cork for a tip. There are unique hox-wood handles, that have knobs formed of the nana-root in its natural shape. A large ribbon-bow must be fastened to all handles just above where the hand grasps the stick.

A novel fête champêtre is about to take place in the gardens of the Countess de Gilly, in Paris. All the ladies are to be dressed in Watteau costumes, and the men as peasants; and three cottages have been hastily built up, where the make-believe villagers are to drink milk, and eat strawberries and brown bread. Cows will be grazing on the lawn, and are to be milked by the amateur peasants. Poor cows!

Mysterious whisperings, says the American Queen, are heard of the reported matrimonial alliance between Oscar Wilde and Miss Howe, the lovely and far more than ordinarily accomplished daughter of Mrs. Julia Ward Howe. No one has forgotten how Mrs. Howe took up the social club in defense of Oscar; memory recalls her published letter protesting against ridicule of Wilde, and she it is who has had the æsthetic lad most at her dinner table. If the report be true—and it seemingly is—what a charming way Oscar has chosen to exhibit his appreciation of Mrs. Howe's social labors in his behalf! Miss Howe has lived abroad with her mother for years, and when, not long ago, she took part in private theatricals in the American Colony in Paris, she created a furore, and the young Parisians went mad over her beauty and grace.

"Tennis dresses," remarks Labouchere in London Truth, "are very pretty this summer, and I fear that men will have more cause than ever to wonder how women and girls can manage to run about as they do with their waists so tightened in. The prevalence of belts is one cause of the continued mischief. There is a peculiarity about these that every one must have noticed. There is never a hole quite in the right place. One is too tight, and the next too loose. Where is the girl who prefers the loose one? She is the exception to the rule, for nineteen out of every twenty will drag the buckle into the tight hole, even if they squeeze themselves into an almost breathless condition in so doing."

It is probable that Mr. Fritsch, of New York, says the American Queen, will be the first man in America to offer a reward for a button. He was presented last season with a set of twelve large buttons, for his coaching-club top-coat. They were sent from across the ocean, hand-made, and entirely unique. Each button bears a miniature painting of some coaching scene—the stables, the start, on the road, reaching home, and so on. Without any of these buttons the set is incomplete, and its beauty is spoiled. One of them has mysteriously disappeared since the spring parade. Whether it is lost, strayed, or stolen, nobody knows. And it would not be well for the thief, if it is stolen, to let some of the muscular members of the coaching-club lay hands on him, for the buttons are the club's pets.

Mr. Mackay, the Nevada king of cash, says a New York journal, and his daughter, so frequently engaged by the newspapers to various noblemen, arrived from Europe in the Servia, and straightway took apartments in the Roman House, as did many passengers by the same steamer. Envious and jealous as well as rival hotel-keepers in the neighborhood say this was all not "on account of Eliza," but on account of Mr. Mackay's friendship for and intimacy with E. S. Stokes, whose interest in the Hoffman is well known. In the old days, good they may have been. Stokes and Mackay met in Nevada, since which time the former has always spoken very kindly of the latter. The Hoffman is more of a "stag" than a family hotel, and Mrs. Grundy says she wonders why on earth Mr. Mackay should have gone there, and taken his daughter too. The reason is very simple: because he wanted to, and has the proud privilege of making his own selection of caravansaries.

"You'll see," said a court official to a Sun reporter, "if among a certain class of foolish girls the fashion of wearing a white bandkerchief pendant from the waist, as Blanche Douglas does, is not widely imitated, just as the style of dress and white wax beads worn by Jennie Cramer at the time of her death were copied last summer."

A few of the long, tight-fitting coats, resembling ulsters in all but the coarseness of material, were seen at Jerome Park races, says a New York journal. One of fine claret-colored cloth, lined with pink silk, and trimmed in front with three or four rows of buttons in variegated shades, was worn with a Gainsborough hat with pink and claret-colored plumes. A departure from the present system of making wedding gifts, which throws the onus of the affair exclusively on the guests, is recorded at a recent silver wedding. A supper was given whereat a present in silver was placed before the occupant of each seat, the name of the guest being inscribed in a little silver book at every plate. Of course, the participants of the repast came not empty-handed, and as an offering of silver is de rigueur in such cases, it was observed that the rejoicings over the event were so diffused as to penetrate even the home of the remote silversmith.

The American custom of women walking unattended has gained wide favor in London, where hitherto each demoiselle had to be accompanied by chaperone or duenna in order to be considered respectable. The propriety of such conduct has been fully and favorably discussed by the Queen and other leading society journals. Of course there are "Arries" of high and low degree; and if a young lady dresses in a manner that challenges notice, and uses her eyes in the "come, follow me" style that we must all have occasionally seen practiced, she has only herself to thank for anything that may happen. But a girl of such character is safe nowhere, and neither maid, mother, nor husband will steer her safe from quicksands. Our concern is not with her, but with our modest, pure daughters and sisters, of whom there are such an enormous majority. Fifteen years ago girls could not walk alone in London, neither could they drive in hansoms either with each other or with gentlemen. Why? Because it was not the fashion. That fashion like many others has exploded, and we now wonder what impropriety our grandmothers saw in a vehicle so little offensive in itself. Now young ladies of the highest rank walk about unattended with as much freedom from rudeness or insult as our American girls do at home.

The Prince of Wales has set his heart on reviving the gaiety of London, and goes to work as if he meant it. Every night he may be seen at one or more theatres, every morning flashing along the causeway in his low phaeton, every afternoon riding or driving in the park. He evidently feels the great want of life and animation, and the dullness which has been eating into the very heart of trade, and rendering the middle-class population so completely dependent on each other that the upper class has been regarded as of no use in the general movement. The prince aims at nothing less than to restore the balance, and render the upper ten as dependent on trade as trade has hitherto been dependent on them.

A wooden wedding which has attracted a great deal of attention in Europe, where such affairs are unknown, occurred not long since at the residence of the Vicomte and Vicomtesse René de Coetoggan, on the avenue Bois de Boulogne, Paris. The vicomtesse was formerly Georgie Blake, of New York, sister of Mrs. Charles J. Whitmore, and the vicomte belongs to one of the oldest families in Brittany. There were many notabilities present in fancy dresses. Two countesses wore Romanian garb. Miss Helen Stanley wore the costume of an "eccentric rooster." A Bashi-Bazouk, Syrian officer, and Gaulish warrior were also represented. The host and hostess received their guests holding the traditional long pole surmounted by a large bouquet between them, and they had a great variety of quaint and elegant presents.

A stunning parasol in pink and silver brocade is decorated by a wreath of blush roses with dark velvet leaves. The maritime bandle is tied with a pink moiré bow, which undoubtedly makes it happy.—Gloves a yard long are imported to wear with dresses that have short sleeves.—Long-throated girls wear necklets of roses and buds with their summer evening dresses, and leave the enormous corsage bouquets to their stout sisters.—A novelty in house arrangements is being introduced into a dwelling-house in London. Extensive excavations are being made in the cellar, so that the necessary machinery may be placed there to raise a table in the basement, which is all set and ready for breakfast, dinner, or supper, up to the dining-room.—It turns out that the Marquis de Leuville, who has figured conspicuously in New York in what Puck has called the "chromo-literary" set, the last half year, is a son of the famous Madame Tussaud, of London wax-work renown. He is entitled to his title, for he bought and paid for it in France; but it is not the title that tells of birth and estates.—The Marquis of Anglesey, who recently left his young American wife, is said to have lost one hundred and fifty thousand pounds sterling at the racing meetings of the last fortnight.—At a Boston luncheon party, the other day, the Chinese cook sent up a mould of jelly containing a glass of water filled with live gold-fish. How the fish got into the jelly, and how they lived afterward, was a distracting conundrum for the guests, who viewed the puzzle with enthusiasm. But the Heatben Chinees wouldn't tell.

LITERARY NOTES.

The latest number of the "English Men of Letters" series is "Charles Dickens," by Professor A. W. Ward. It consists of a rather condensed review of the principal events of his life, together with a running criticism of his various writings. A very good specimen of this latter is given in the "Rambles Among Books," which appears on another page. Published by Harper & Bros., New York; for sale by Bancroft; price, seventy-five cents.

The late Professor William R. Hodgson, of the University of Edinburgh, completed and published, just previous to his death, a work entitled "Errors in English." This had an extensive sale in England, and is now reprinted in America as revised by F. A. Teale. It is arranged in the form of a vocabulary, and proves probably the most convenient and complete reference book of its kind. Published by D. Appleton & Co.; for sale by the booksellers.

One of the most impartial and unprejudiced volumes of the "Campaigns of the Civil War" series is "Atlanta," by Major-General Jacob D. Cox. The author was in command of the Twenty-third Army Corps, and consequently derived most of his information from personal observation. The book, as a natural sequence, treats mostly of General Sherman, and his military capacity. The author treats this personage with great fairness, not by any means covering him with adulatory praise, but stating all the faults as well as the merits of his character. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York; for sale by Bancroft; price, $1.

The fifth and last number of the new edition of Bret Harte's works is "Condensed Novels and Stories." The stories consist of "The Story of a Mine," "Thankful Blossom," "The Twins of Table Mountain," and "Jeff Briggs's Love Story," all of which have appeared in various periodicals, and have become nearly as popular as some of Bret Harte's earlier shorter stories. The "Condensed Novels" are perhaps as well known as any of the author's works. They opened up a field which had many later occupants, though none of them can approach Harte in keen insight into an author's mannerisms and peculiarities. Published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston; for sale by Bancroft; price, $2.

Announcements: Doctor Stone, late pastor of the First Congregational Church, is about to publish a volume of twenty sermons, entitled "Leaves from a Finished Pastorate."—Among the announcements of Messrs. Macmillan & Co. are: "The Coming Democracy," by George Harwood; "Spinosa," by Rev. Dr. Martineau, and a volume of "Lectures on Art," by Lucy Crane, illustrated by Walter Crane.—The August number of the Atlantic will contain as a frontispiece a new steel engraved portrait of Emerson.—It is reported that Miss Alcott is the author of the new and far from striking novel, "Aschenbroedel." It suggests also the hand of the author of "An Earnest Trifler."—Mr. Edward Jenkins's "Paladin of Finance" is republished in this country by J. R. Osgood & Co.

There are two classes of persons to whom "My Irish Journey," by Thomas Carlyle, will be of interest: to the educated Irishman who is familiar with the topography of his own country, and has some curiosity to read what the cynical Scot has to say about its men and scenery, and to the inner-brotherhood who comprise the most passionate admirers of Carlyle. To the rest of the world it will prove too great a waste of time to wade through the jerky and dyspeptic comments on pigs, Pats, and Papis, in order that one may extract from the mass here and there a diamond. When the diamond is found, however, it is generally of the first water. The priests come in for a great share of the author's wit, as do also the big, loud-mouthed, rollicking, "squireen," Irishmen. Carlyle never fails to pensively and with much self-complacency make note of the fact when he has managed to get the better of one of these fellows, as when he writes with a sort of chuckle, "Shea talked largely, wanted me to open on O'Connell that he might hear him well denounced; but I wouldn't." With all his cynicism, however, he displays much feeling for the destitution and poverty which he saw, and constantly remarks: "God help these struggling and wretched people. My sympathy is with them!" Published by Harper & Bros., New York; for sale by Bancroft; price, $1.

The frontispiece of the July Harper is an admirable engraving of the late Emerson. The two principal papers are H. W. Lucy's "Glimpses of Great Britain," being the portraits and descriptions of the principal English nobles and M. P.'s, and the article on Egyptian mummies and pyramids entitled "Lying in State at Cairo." G. W. Sheldon's "Old Ship-Builders of New York" will interest many old residents of that metropolis.—The Century also contains an engraving of Emerson. "Among the Thlinkites of Alaska," and the "Bee-Pastures of California," both interest this coast, so also will "The American Yacht," for it is written with reference to San Francisco bay, as well as Eastern ports.—The Atlantic continues Thomas Hardy's "Two on a Tower," and also prints a posthumous poem by Longfellow, "Doctor Zay," is developing into one of the brightest stories of the season, and bids fair to win Miss Phelps new fame.—Macmillan's for June contains the continuation of Julian Hawthorne's "Fortune's Fool," "The Roman Camp at Saalburg," by T. Hodgking, "Three Months' Holiday in Norway," by E. A. Arnold, and a charming little poem by May Probyn entitled "The Welcome."—In the North American Review for July, the leading article is a study of "Emerson as a Poet," by Edwin P. Whipple. Désiré Charney contributes the eleventh article in the series on "The Ruins of Central America," and records the discovery of a great ruined city in the hitherto unexplored country of the Lacadones, Guatemala. There are two papers on the civil service question: one, "The Things which Remain," by Gail Hamilton, and "The Business of Office-Seeking," by Richard Grant White. Finally, Francis Marion Crawford, son of the American sculptor, writes of "False Taste in Art."—The Californian for July begins with a poetic tribute to James F. Bowman, from the pen of Miss Ina D. Colbrith; the leading paper is "A Fragment of China," by Will Brooks, accompanied by four illustrations from sketches by Theodore Wores. Those who have seen the originals will be disappointed, although the engraver has probably done his best, and the pressman probably his worst. Mr. Wores shows singular ability in selecting and handling the picturesque side of the Chinese quarter. Poems and stories, serial and short, go to make up the number, which is a reasonably good one.

Miscellany: There are eight Browning societies in England.—A correspondent of the Critic suggests Mr. Clarence King as the author of "Guernedale."—An original subscriber's copy of Turner's "Liber Studiorum" was sold in London recently for five hundred and nine dollars.—The lady who writes under the name of "Sarah Tytler" is really Mrs. Henrietta Keddle.—The public taste for the Zola literature is said to have lately cooled in France.—In a sale which has just taken place at Bradford, in Yorkshire, was sold an old chest from a farmhouse at Ilkley, which upon its centre panel bore the following inscription: "Jon Longfellow and Mary Rogers were married ye tenth day off April, Anno Dm. 1664." These are supposed to be ancestors of Longfellow the poet.—An English writer doubts if a single work treating on pedigree or matters of family research has been published in the English language during the last twenty years which has not benefited by the stores of knowledge accumulated by the late Colonel Chester's unwearied labors. For many years Colonel Chester directed his energies to the elucidation of the ancestry of Washington. The results of this work have not yet been made public.—John Morley, after retiring in November from the editorship of the Fortnightly Review, will devote all the time not given to editing the Pall Mall Gazette to purely literary work.—The love and esteem which Doctor John Brown's countrymen bore to him may be conjectured from the fact that seven years ago, when his health began to fail, a sum of more than thirty thousand dollars was collected for him without the slightest publicity. The kindly author of "Rab and his Friends" knew nothing of it until the amount, partly in a check and partly in the shape of an annuity, was put into his hands, the list of the contributors first having gone into the fire.

A JAUNT IN JALISCO.

A Traveler's Notes on Men and Customs in Modern Mexico.

We reached San Blas on a summer midnight, and at three o'clock the following afternoon we started for Tepic. From San Blas, the seaport of Jalisco, to Tepic, the distance is some fourteen leagues over an atrocious road, crossing a range of hills, and ascending four thousand feet. On this journey from the tierras calientes, or the low lands of the coast, to the elevation of Tepic, the brilliancy and beauty of the fireflies attracted my attention more than anything else. They render the whole space for a height of several yards from the ground one flashing, scintillating scene. No pen can give the smallest idea of the exceeding loveliness of the country. As the dean said of the strawberry—doubtless God might have made a better country, but doubtless He never did. Until very recently the district of Tepic had no legal existence. It had not been erected into a State, nor reduced to a territory, but was governed by a purely military occupation; but lately it has been erected into a State—the State of Nayarit—consequently the lovely little city is a capital.

Losada, an Indian of the Sierra of Alica, in 1855 made the district of Tepic practically an independent State, and he maintained it so for twenty years. He carried his arms as far as Sebastian, but having sacked that place, he retired, and confined his rule to the line of the barranca of Mochitile. In 1875 a dream of ambition took possession of him, and with some twelve thousand Indians he marched on Guadalajara, where he was defeated. Shortly afterward he was captured and shot. At the time of the French intervention they did not attempt the reduction of Losada, but asked and obtained leave to pass through his country on their road to Mazatlan. The little State of Nayarit has wonderful resources in the agricultural way. Its elevation above the sea level brings it within the range or realm of the coffee plant, while its coast lands, or tierras calientes, give the Cuba or cigar tobaccos. In addition to coffee and tobacco, cotton, sugar, and rice, the leading staples of the world, all grow. These people have been derided for scratching the ground with a forked stick, but when it gives them such crops why need they turn it over with an implement which, if broken, they could with difficulty mend?

The houses of Tepic, and of all Mexican towns, are like a leaf out of a Spanish romance—blank walls, the windows heavily barred, tile-roofed, and the main entrance looking into a patio, (court-yard,) which is a living mass of greenery and flowers. The iron gratings are for the purpose of keeping thieves out. The people have no police. In two or three quarters of a town there may be a cuartel of soldiers, but the policeman is unknown. In the capital they have a sort of semi-soldier, called gendarme—adapted from the French—but only in the capital. Hence every man goes armed, as in California in early days. The prison-like aspect of the houses in Tepic and elsewhere—blank walls pierced with few windows—is not due entirely to the desire to exclude the sun; it is part of the same system that begets the iron gratings. A blank wall presents fewer facilities for climbing. The result is agreeable. There is a delightful seclusion about the patio. You sit in its ample corridors with all the delightful feeling of being out of doors. There are other merits in their methods of building. The very thick adobe walls, plastered, of course, inside and outside, clean and white; the heavy, hewed beams; the tiled roof, and the tiled floors, are each and every one of them a good thing. The massive pillars that support the roof of the corridor, with the fine arches thrown from one to the other, have an ever-pleasing effect. Then all the apartments are large. Everything is on a scale of amplexity that in itself is agreeable.

Tepic has street-cars, which go out to the loma on the one side, and to the alameda on the other. Loma is the Spanish word for hill, and the loma of Tepic is a gently rising elevation just outside the southern boundary. The alameda, with its walks and drives, is a large and pretentious plaza. The loma is where I first saw the Mexican youth gotten up in all his glory for a paseo a caballo. Nothing can be finer than his superb horsemanship. A saddle, handsomely stamped, with rich fur (sea otter) flaps, neatly mounted with a silver rim around the pommel and seat, a handsome cloth, bridle not too heavily plated, trousers with a row of small silver buttons down the outside, unblacked leather riding boots, a wide-brimmed hat with bullion band, and a youth who rides his beast as if it were a part of him, is a sight well worth seeing.

It appears probable there will be a railway in Tepic in another year, when I fancy the place will be something of a resort for people from the north. It needs only that the first few should come out of curiosity to insure their returning and bringing others with them. A brief experience will enable Americans to perceive that Mexico is no longer the country that General Scott walked through, or Bazaine at a more recent date.

Nothing can be more elaborately punctilious than the manners of the Mexicans. Wishing to show you attention, people call on you, and remain literally two or three bours. This goes on in the morning, and then de capo in the afternoon. The habits of the upper class are to rise when you please, from six o'clock on. On your appearance down stairs a servant gives you coffee and bread. Toward one o'clock a meal called breakfast is taken, lasting an hour. During this time all business is suspended throughout the city. At eight o'clock in the evening a meal is taken called cena. At the meals—and, in fact, at all times—the people dress carefully. On the road between Tepic and Guadalajara, stopping in one of the various mining towns, I wandered into a school-house, and examined the children's school-books. In the "Second Reader" the chapter on manners a stranger would be apt to imagine reflected an ideal code rather than a practical one. He would be wrong. The hundred points of punctilio that are there noted are acted on by these people in their daily life. I read that it is very bad manners to cut a tortilla with a knife. Of course I had done nothing else, and must needs have appeared a bopeless vulgarian.

One would hardly read much in this country, if one were in business here. The evenings are so delightful, and the cena—the meal corresponding to our dinner—is taken so late, and one rises so early, that the evening, what there is of it, would probably be passed al fresco, after the fashion of the country. The two hours that are abstracted from the middle of the day for la comida, (our breakfast and lunch rolled into one,) and its ensuing rest, would more likely pass in dawdling and talk than in square reading.

When one travels in Mexico, he must avail himself of the diligence, or provide himself with a mule. I rode a mule. You must carry all your conveniences with you—knife, fork, spoon, towels, soap, candles, coffee or chocolate, and your camp-bedstead, unless you want to sleep on a board. You roll your clothes up in your blanket, and tie it on behind your saddle. The rest you put in a pair of saddle-bags, called cantinas, that hang on the horn of the saddle in front. From not finding knives and forks where you stop in the mining towns, one must not think these people eat with their fingers. With every meal they have tortillas, (the tortilla with frijoles is the universal staple of food,) which they tear into pieces, and with which they scoop up the other food, eating the tortilla and food all together. So they have a saying, that they ought to be the richest people in the world, for they eat up a spoon at every meal.

August is one of the months of the rainy season. Over the entire face of the country the rain falls once a day this season of the year. It is rare for it to rain at all before noon, and the more usual hour is toward two P. M. Often only two or three heavy showers pass over. True, the water that falls is comparatively enormous, coming down in torrents of immense drops, forming a curtain that may hide completely objects half a mile distant. Only three or four days during the season does the rain hold on steadily into the night, and all the forenoon is brilliant and beautiful, and of a very delightful temperature—seldom hot. It is a fine sight to see one of these afternoon storms, when you are on the top of one of the ranges. Glorious heaps of white vapor begin rolling up—some massive, towering above the rest, in which you can almost see how the chilled column of air is shot up above the rest by the slope of some mountain peak. Then the masses darken at points, and let down a dark-gray curtain, which you know is rain. You hear the thunder beginning to roll, and all the while are yourself in a flood of sunlight, and refreshed by the cool air of the approaching storm. The storm commonly rolls away as suddenly as it came.

The magnificence of the scenery in the entire district is indescribable, especially when one is passing over these ranges, and plunging into cañadas of the most picturesque sort, rank with a strange vegetation. The pines and oaks are stunted and poor; but the madroños and other trees are splendid. One of the commonest wild trees is the guava. One sees them everywhere, covered with fruit, which, while it makes a delicious jelly, tastes like a mean apple. The country is a paradise in no hyperbolic sense, where every prospect pleases, and only roads are vile. Roads did I say? There is not one wagon road in all Jalisco. The fine old paved roads of the Spaniards are now mule trails following the beds of torrents, and the paving-stones have been used to mend the stone fences around the corn-fields.

Where wheeled vehicles are not in use, the arriero, or owner of pack-mules, is naturally a person of much and deserved consideration. To begin with, he is a citizen of means; in the next place, he is punctiliously honest—both sources of distinction in any country. His work is very hard, and his life a rough one. A pack-train demands patience, and his never fails. He could not get on if it did. The packs will, from time to time, get disarranged, and at the first symptom of disarrangement that mule must be got out of the line and repacked. This sometimes happens in places where the mule can not leave the line. Then you will see the arriero clap his shoulder to the loosened pack, and press up one of these heavy trails till he reaches a place where the mule can stand at one side. To pack, or rearrange a pack, requires two men; he cries out and the next man comes tumbling up or down the mountain, as the case may be, more like a goat than a human being, to lend a hand. His honesty is professional of course. His business could not go on with any deviation, however trifling, from scrupulous accountability. He carries most of the treasure about the country. From the mining districts, a treasure train, (conducta), with regular guard goes once a month to the mint. But once coined, the arriero becomes the channel of remittance. The diligence is robbed sometimes, though not nearly as often as an Arizona stage, but the arriero's train very rarely. He is vigilant, and armed, of course. He occasionally loses a mule, but that is more apt to be in the town, where vigilance is relaxed, than on the road. On the road he is a rough and tough-looking customer, always pleasant and obliging, however; but when you meet him in town, he may be in broadcloth, and at your merchant's house as a guest. As in California in the "old time," you must not judge anybody by his garments on the road. The well-dressed man is frequently one of the traveling mozos or servants, who are given to making an appearance like the dragoon in Syria, while the weather-beaten, travel-stained man may be a haciendero or a merchant.

As to some of the trails, they are something of which a mere description will give no idea whatever. In places you should before entering the trail, for if two animals should meet on it, there is a slim chance of being able to return, and none of passing. But the cliffs and cañadas are something tremendous—great masses of stones thrown and writhed in a confusion that no fancy can adequately picture, while high above, and beyond all, the grand cordillera of the Sierra Madre rises to the sky. In the wildest and least accessible spot are found (among crags, and plunging down into chasms) the mining works of the old Spaniard—the conquistador. Nothing else raises so lively a sense of his superhuman energy and indomitable strength, both of body and will, as to trace his mining works among these mountains. True, he did it by the hands of slaves—he enslaved a whole population, one numbering millions; but when you realize on the ground all that this very enslavement implies, it adds to the greatness of his achievements more than it detracts from them. The conquest of India was a feat that dazzles imagination. It was far less a feat than that of the Spaniard who conquered the Indian first and Nature afterward.

June 27, 1882.

THE BRITON ABROAD.

National pride and love of country is one of the characteristic virtues of humanity. It exists with all races; extends from polar snows to equatorial sands; is met in the squalid hut of the Hottentot, and in the palaces of a superior civilization. Its mode of expression is as varying as are the habits and qualities of the individuals dominated by it. At times in its display rising to the loftiest patriotism, when national exigencies demand its exercise, in common life it is apt to degenerate into offensive bluster or amusing whimsicalities and oddities. The American type of national character is strongly marked by this feature of national egotism; and in common with other national peccadillos, the almost universal expression of this trait has been derided and censured by the writers of other countries. To our British brethren especially, does this mote in the eye of America seem particularly aggravating. No chance for a fling at Americans for their national egotism is ever passed by the average Britisher. Unconsciously indulging the same weakness, he contrasts at every turn the points of difference between England and America in speech and act, always making his mental entries in favor of his own country. And yet national egotism is the lawful inheritance of America from her parent, England. Along with our rich legacy of language, literature, laws, and customs from the mother country, came a goodly share of national pride and pluck. In the matter of national pride America is confessedly the equal of England, but in the individual expression of his national idiosyncrasies and prejudices the Britisher abroad is calmly and sublimely unapproachable. The purpose of the present sketch is to briefly outline two types only of the Britisher abroad. Their representatives are familiar to most Americans. For convenience they may be designated as the Bigoted Britisher, and the "Blawsted" Britisher. They flourish in their fullest perfection in English-speaking America.

The bigoted Britisher is an expatriated man. He is in America what the nihilist is in Europe, except that the object of his dislike is not a personal autocrat, but the necessity which drove him to this "damned Republican hole." The wonder is that the bigoted Britisher consents to live under his hard lot. He has long ago renounced the hopeless task of trying to imbue us with his ideas of aristocracy and class distinction, and has relapsed into a sullen obstinacy to what he terms the barbarisms of American social life. His protest against everything American finds silent expression in the tweed suit and mutton-chop whiskers. In most cases he is sprung from parents who at home only sniffed the aroma of aristocracy from afar. His father was supported through life by the thought that though he might some day see death, he had yet enjoyed the ecstasy of passing to Lord Broadacre his morning newspaper in the railway train, for which he was snubbed by his lordship. His mother always lived in the unrealized hope of encountering Lady Broadacres at the Christmas soup-kitchen or the charity fair. The son of Lord Broadacres is now a rancher in Colorado—an enthusiastic Republican, and undistinguishable in attire and speech from any cowboy; but our tweed-suited and mutton-chopped Britisher continues in spirit to shake the dust from his feet against the U. S. A. and American institutions, as he each day saunters to his enforced labor at a clerk's desk. He meets other bigoted Britishers like himself. They compare notes, and count up the many weary days of their pilgrimage through the valley of the shadow of social equality, and sitting down with freshly filled meerschaums, like the Jews by the waters of Babylon, weep over the recollections of their melancholy exile. The bigoted Britisher has never been home since his arrival here. Sustained, however, by an unflinching trust, he endures until Providence arranges that he can get his valise packed, and return to the Jerusalem of his dreams. His brother exiles accompany him to the steamer, and there, with streaming eyes and looks of unutterable disappointment, watch the ship which bears him to a happier world. In six months he who was the bigoted Britisher reappears among his brother exiles, and says that he couldn't well live at home without his old friends. Later on it comes out the English sky was rather cloudy and lachrymose; that English society was just a little "starchy"; that the English women were as shy as chamois; that out of London everything was "as dull as ditch-water, you know"; that the English Sunday is an unspeakably awful institution, and that it is not a bad place to live in if a man has plenty of money, and can go to Paris for half a year, and to Italy for another three months. So the bigoted Britisher grows more silent about his mother country.

The "blawsted" Britisher is the insular cub which the British lion sends abroad to infest the world. In this way North America and Australia have fallen to the English-speaking race. The "blawsted" Britisher is not necessarily an irreclaimable insular cub. He may at once renounce his whining and incivility and drop into his new surroundings, or he may remain a bigoted Britisher after much of his "blawstedness" has disappeared. The best type, however, of the "blawsted" species are to be seen among the new arrivals at our hotels, or at the fashionable boarding-houses. He may be a lord, or a baronet, or the son of a city alderman who made a fortune by selling salt fish, or making soap, or taking rubbish-cleaning contracts from some large London parish; or he may be the son of a colonist, who has sent him to see the world on the profits of a sheep-farm or some other colonial industry. In the latter case, though he has never seen England, his British bluster, swagger, and contempt of American institutions are, if possible, more pronounced and intolerable than that of the home production, until, by a gradual course of social attention, he gets the rough points of his prejudice worn smooth. Or, worse than all, he may be a club-loafing littérateur—a literary snob who has come to write a book on Americans by the light of English club prejudice.

After all, some allowance must be made for the "blawsted" Britisher. He is but human, and the toadyism of American plutocrats insensibly exaggerates his foibles. Even the most cross-eyed of men would strain to move his paws at and high-toned.

SAN FRANCISCO, June 22, 1882.

PUBLISHERS' NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Subscription, $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance—postage prepaid. City subscribers served by carriers at $4.50 per year, or 10 cents per week. Sample copies free. Single copies, 10 cents.
 News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders from the trade should be addressed.
 No traveling canvassers employed. Order by mail, or through your local News Dealer.
 Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as new addresses.
 The American News Company, New York, and branches, are Agents for the Eastern trade. The Argonaut can be ordered from any News Dealer in the United States or Europe.
 Persons mailing single copies of the Argonaut must affix a two-cent stamp.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."
 A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

ENTERED AT THE SAN FRANCISCO POSTOFFICE AS SECOND CLASS MATTER.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PIXLEY - - - - - Editor.

SATURDAY, JULY 1, 1882.

CONTENTS:

Page.	Page.
EDITORIALS:
How the Corporations Ran the Democratic Convention—Are we to Accept the Results of Fraud and Chicanery as the Will of the People?—What Merit is there in General Stoneman?—A Review of the Other Nominees—Their Past Political Careers—How Billy Carr and Chris Buckley tried to marshal the Irish Brigade for George Hearst—Shall America Pay any more Money to Support the Land-League Tramps?—An Analysis of the Irish Population and its Vote on this Coast—A few Good Men for the Next Governorship.....8-9	RAMBLING AMONG BOOKS..... 3
FROM THE SIERRAS TO THE SEA..... 1	OLD FAVORITES..... 3
MR. DUX'S DECEASE..... 2	THE SWEET GIRL GRADUATE..... 3
	SOCIETY NOTES AND GOSSIP..... 4
	THE PACIFIC NEWPORT..... 4
	SAN FRANCISCO FASHIONS..... 4
	A LAWLESS LOT..... 5
	MUSICAL NOTES..... 5
	VANITY FAIR..... 6
	LITERARY NOTES..... 6
	A JAUNT IN JALISCO..... 7
	THE BRITON ABROAD..... 7
	BOB AND BETTY..... 10
	STORYTELLERS..... 11
	THE LATEST VERSE..... 11
	DRAMA:
	Betsy B.'s Letter—The Diamonds of the Stars—Theatrical Gossip.....12-13
	THE TUNEFUL LIAR..... 14

The result of the San José convention is the haldest and most naked fraud that subtle political trickery has ever played off upon an intelligent community. The whole thing, from beginning to the ending, from the first "whereas" of the platform to its ultimate period, from its very respectable and gentlemanly figure-head down to the small letter "y" that closes the name of the last nominee for the Board of Equalization, is a sham and false pretense. It is put forth by shrewd, hired, political managers, in the interest of no class that is honest, and no principle. It was a fight in which Blind Buckley for himself, a mob of money-making ward politicians in San Francisco for themselves, W. W. Stow for the railroad, Bill Carr for Haggin and Tevis, agents of the San Francisco Gas Company, the Spring Valley Water Company, John C. Maynard for the chivalry, Kearney for the shovelry, and all the money-making mob of political adventurers and party swash-bucklers met and mixed in a Donnybrook encounter, with the false cries of "anti-monopoly," "anti-railroad," "anti-Chinese," "anti-Sunday-law," "anti-radicalism," and "anti-Republicanism," mixed in most inextricable confusion. It was a side-splitting, mirth-provoking farce, with honest, good, intelligent, and honorable gentlemen from the country taking part and made to play characters in the comedy; a sort of Greek chorus to stamp when the "grand old Democratic party" was alluded to; made to cheer when the blazing heacons of victory were flashed in their faces—those heacon fires that are to light up the melancholy days of our coming November from "Siskiyou to San Diego, from the Sierras to the sea," and made to stamp, cheer, roar, and throw up their applauding hats when the "grand old Democratic party" was alluded to as the "ANTI-MONOPOLY" organization of California. The Democracy have two full months to enjoy themselves, for a saw-horse or rocking-chair can heat a blooded racer while he is stabled, haltered, and being groomed for the contest. The Democracy has two full months to make its artillery shell the woods, and during that time it can keep itself awfully busy in explaining in what respect and for what act is General Stoneman entitled—by reflecting men—to be considered as an anti-monopolist or an anti-railroad man. What has he ever done? What single act of his is there during his residence in California to identify him as anti-anything in political life? As a minority member of the Railroad Commission he has acquired a reputation for opposing corporate exactions in the way of fares and freights. He has been on that board some impossible and unintelligent of reduction. He has entered some feeble, propotests. He has voted "no" when his associates voted "yes," and "yes" when they voted "no." Inquiringly and respectfully we ask, what has he done, or what has he resolutely attempted to do, except surrender to the railroad militia? To what ACT can his friends and admirers point as stamping him with the brains and the courage to stand up in resentful and aggressive antagonism against corporations, and against the power and influence of wealth? His military career would be a guaranty that he would not fear the mob, or stand in awe of an alien riot. His whole life is an earnest of honorable purpose. He is a gentleman, soldier, scholar, and an honest man, and it is not improbable that, in the improbable event of his election, he will make an excellent governor. Should he be elected he will have very little to do with railroad affairs or with corporations, and hence it is that this sham cry of "anti-monopoly" seems to us so absurd. We do not intend to say that which, in any respect, shall seem to undervalue the negative virtues of the military candidate for Governor. Events may render it necessary for us to support him, and vote for him. We reserve to ourselves this privilege, till we see whether the Republican party will place in nomination for Governor some man of independence, courage, and brains, who belongs to himself, thinks for himself, and will be Governor of California in the event of his election. Messrs. Ross and Sharpstein were fairly entitled to renomination for the supreme bench. They were industrious workers, have gained experience, and have proved themselves possessed of qualities quite as essential as that more subtle learning which enables Judge McKinstry to save a murderous wretch from a deserved death by the strangulation of hemp through an ever so finely spun technicality of law. Common sense is a valuable acquisition even upon the hench. We hope the Republican party will secure higher and better talent for its ticket than is represented by Sharpstein and Ross, and if it does not, we shall hope for their election. Charles Sumner for Congress is an eccentric, bright-witted, energetic, honest-minded, enthusiastic, crack-brained, Democratic crank. He is a good speaker, and is dead in earnest against the railroad. He would walk to Washington before he would travel on a pass; and if he got there—which he never will—would he in the most harmless place, where he could be of no possible injury to the railroad, and where he would find of how little account mere cheek and impudence are in accomplishing anything. Thompson for Secretary of State is well enough. Daggett for Lieutenant-Governor is well enough. January for State Treasurer is well enough. Welcker for Superintendent of Schools is not well enough. John W. McCarthy for Clerk of the Supreme Court, and Willey for Surveyor-General, both having been born in California, ought to be more than well enough, and as neither of them made speeches in the convention at San José, they may be very sensible and competent young men. We hope they are. Over the political grave of the good General Rosecrans we step lightly. We scatter flowers over it. We remember his unkind conduct to our dead leader, the murdered one, hut—well, let that pass, poor man. He has a hee in his honnet, and he was a soldier on our side. Dunn for Controller, Marshall for Attorney-General, and Gildea for Board of Equalization, were nominations entirely unfit to be made. But the place where skim-milk masquerades as cream is in the candidates for Railroad Commissioners and Board of Equalization. The candidates for Congress are exceptionally weak. John R. Glascock is the most respectable; but there is no man among them who has within him the elements of success. There is no broad-minded thinker; no man of independent and resolute courage; no one who possesses oratorical ability, or who stands one chance in the three hundred presented to him of making a mark or accomplishing any result in the House of Representatives. The ticket as a whole is weak, and, when analyzed, when records are exposed, and when the mode of the nominations are understood, it will be weaker than it now is. Of the twenty-four candidates twelve are from the South, fourteen were disloyal during the war, eight are from the North, two were born in Ireland, and two in California; two served in the Union army, and two in the Confederate; nineteen are Protestants, and five are Roman Catholics; and out of the twenty-four, twenty-one have held office before, and twelve are chronic office-seekers who have held or sought office all their lives.

Kearney is not a fool. He has more sense than the average Democrat, and more courage than the average politician. He was one of the recent lobby at San José, for Kearney feels deeply interested in the anti-monopoly movement, and will stump the State in the interest of the Stoneman Democracy. Kearney, Judge Wallace, George Hearst, Clay Taylor, Johnson, Terry, Frank McCoppin, Judge Hager, John H. Moore, Tom Fowler, Timmin, ex-Governor Irwin, Evans, (the ideal judge,) Sepulveda, Jackson Temple, Thomas Jefferson Bowers, Murphy, of Del Norte, Russ Stevens, Paul Shirley, and Barney Wolff, will all take the stump and work with enthusiasm for the "grand old Democratic party." They will light the heacon-fires of Democracy on the hoary snow-clad summit of Mount Shasta, and keep them blazing all the way down to where the towering peaks of San Bernardino glisten 'in the sombre twilight of the setting southern sun, and from the golden glory of the Sierra's blazing crest to where the silver waves of the Pacific kiss with velvet lips the flower-fringed ocean shore of San Diego. All these eloquent old disappointed political fossils will toot their anti-monopoly horns, if they don't catch a fish. Kearney went to San José in the interest of Democracy, and had the sense to advocate an American ticket. He heggd the party leaders that they would put no Irishman on guard this time. "Give thim a clane American deal, and drown the Argonaut's fire," said Kearney. But they had not the sense to see it, and put Dunn and Gildea on. "Dunn was heat last toime by the Irish, and will be again," said Kearney; "Gildea was a tailor in El Dorado, and he hasn't a dollar in the wurruld; a nice man that same to aquilize American taxes." Kearney gives a very amusing account of the way Billy Carr and Chris Buckley managed George Hearst's fight. "The plan was to hold the San Francisco boys in reserve; start wid the country strength, and thin add a few votes each hallot, to show a growing strength. But divil a hit could you hold the chaws hack," said Kearney; "they war hound to vote for Hearst; and whin the San Francisco roll was called you should jist have haired thim. 'Twas this-a way:

"Ryan?"....."Hurst!"
 "Murphy?"....."Hairst!"
 "Haley?"....."George Hurst!"
 "Barry?"....."Hoorst!"
 "Hayes?"....."Farge Hairst!"
 "Creighton?"....."Misthur Hurrst!"
 "Donnovan?"....."G. Hairst!"
 "McCarthy?"....."Hoorst!"
 "Kirman?"....."Hurst!"
 "Gallagher?"....."Joorge Hoorst!"
 "Shehan?"....."G. Hairst!"
 "Connolly?"....."Farge Hoorst!"
 "Kelley?"....."Hurst!"
 "Cadogan?"....."Hairst!"
 "Flynn?"....."Hairst!"
 "Mahoney?"....."Hoorst!"
 "O'Kane?"....."Misther Hoorst!"

And so on down, through Hammill, Ward, Cleary, O'Donnell, O'Brien, McGreevy, Fitzgerald, Fay, Dunphy, Mahon, Kane, and the others, each accenting and emphasizing the name in a different way—some trilling the "R," some hitting off the word quick, some prolonging it as though it was spelled "G-e-a-o-r-g-e H-o-u-e-r-r-e-s-s-t," putting in all the vowels and consonants in the endeavor to make the most of the only speech they were permitted to utter. This description, to be appreciated, should be heard in the rich and mocking hroque of Kearney, as he takes off the accent of his countrymen. We would recommend it as a good exercise in elocution for our school-boys. Let them try it aloud. When the farmers came to vote they caught the spirit of the occasion, and country delegates responded for "Hoorst," "Hurrst," and Hairst," in all the imitative varieties of the Irish vernacular, making a great deal of fun. And then to think that this was a Boyne Water victory for the Irish, and that the Orange of Los Angeles triumphed over the Red-mouthed of San Francisco. Kearney stumps the State for the Democracy. God hless Ould Oireland!

It is shameful impudence on the part of any foreign nationality to transplant their home quarrels to this country. The class most offending in this particular is the Irish. For thirty years our country has been disturbed by the agitation of Irish politics. Twice within that period we have been appealed to for money and provisions to relieve the starving Irish. Twice famine has put up its prayer for relief, and America has nobly and generously responded. When hunger invades Ireland we must forget and forgive the political agitators, and put our hands in our purses to drive the gaunt, red-jawed wolf from the doors of Irish cabins, where men, women, and children hunger. To such an appeal there is no denial, and we would have none. Public meetings in aid of such charity we would encourage. At such meetings eloquence is not misspent, and money not misappropriated. But when it comes to assemblages for stirring Irish resentment to the blood-red heat of passion against land-laws, landlords, and England; when appeals are made for money to resist the legal evictions of non-rent-paying tenants, to furnish arms and a skirmishing fund for Fenians, and money to carry on a political agitation against a country with which we are at peace, the question is a different one. If there has been one, there have been a hundred such gatherings in San Francisco. The United States is divided into eleemosynary districts, and the industry of hegging money in aid of political agitation in Ireland is reduced to a system. Party tramps with their secretaries cover the land, demanding coin. The Irish business man, laborer, and servant-girl are heset with exactions in the name of patriotism and religion; the priest gives his sanction to the demand, and the Democratic party is made to play a part in this scheme of money-getting. Women and children are pressed into the service to beg for alms. What becomes of the money no one knows. There are headquarters in Paris, in London, and in New York, each with officers, servants, secretaries, and agents, all living at the expense of the American-Irish, and all living well. We, as Americans, have no interest in Irish politics, and Irish-Americans have no right to agitate this business in our midst. In France a struggle is going on—republicanism against Bourbon, Orleans, and Bonaparte. Party spirit runs high at café and boulevard. There have been rebellions, uprisings, and civil war in France; but we do not recall an instance in America where any appeal, outside of Frenchmen, has been made for aid, or an attempt been made to identify French and American politics. Party spirit runs high in Germany; but when the German comes to America he leaves his politics and party resentments behind him. There is no other people but the Irish who transport their quarrels to our soil, and make them active here. We know of no reason why we should be more indulgent to Catholic quarrels with Protestants, when they are brought from Londonderry to New York, than we should be if French communists should parade in our streets with the red flag of the commune in defiance of the French Republican, Royalist, or Bonapartist. We know of no better reason for the St. Patrick's Day parade in honor of a mythical saint, with its religious banners, insignia of Pope and Church, its ecclesiastical paraphernalia, bap, sunburst, green flags, Irish regiments, and Hibernian societies, than for a parade of any other religious or national class with the peculiar emblems of their religion or nationality. There is no law—as we are advised—against a procession of Buddhists with their sacred images through our streets, or of Russian nihilists, Italian carabinieri, French communists, or German socialists; but we submit it to our respectable Irish fellow-citizens and to their men of intelligence to decide whether such exhibitions would not be inappropriate. We write this in answer to the charge made against the Argonaut that it selects the Irish out from the foreigners as its target for attack. The Irish invite the assault. They are constantly doing things that nobody else would ever conceive, and we have a right to charge them with offensive aggressions which no other people ever undertake. The Argonaut would be a most peaceful and docile bull if the Irish matadors would discontinue waving their green flag.

Any one who has ever crossed the plains by pack-train or wagon has observed the peculiarity of the coyote. One hungry beast, under the shadow of night, will so change and modify his voice as to make one think there are a thousand coyotes abroad. They will so multiply themselves in the changing cadences of their hungry bark that there seems to be a wilderness of the hybrid wolves. So with the Pope's political Irish. If one could but close his eyes and listen to their yalp, he would fancy himself on the field by the Boyne Water, or the top of Tara, with all Erin's harps out of tune. A simile comes up for our use when we contemplate the Irish in politics—the devil shearing the sow, "great cry and little wool." These reflections arise as we read the census figures of Oregon and New Mexico. The population of Oregon is 174,768, of which but 3,659 are of Irish birth. New Mexico has a population of 119,565, of which only 795 were born in Ireland. And yet if one should heed the political bark of the Irish wolf, he would fancy the party woods were full of them. Let us analyze the Oregon Irish. One male adult to five gives seven hundred and thirty-one. Let us throw off the odd thirty-one as unnaturalized. Let us throw off, say, two hundred for those respectable, intelligent, and modest North of Ireland Protestants and South of Ireland gentlemen who mind their own business, and we have five hundred Pope's Irish politicians scattered throughout the State of Oregon, and yet where is heard the roar of ocean, the dashing of the Columbia, the murmur of the Willamette, there mingles the bluster and blarney of the noisy Irish demagogue demanding recognition for the "Irish vote"; demanding the moral influence of Oregon for the oppressed tenantry of the "most distressful" old country; demanding a recall of the American minister—one of America's best citizens and brightest poets—because he will not embroil his country in a war with England over five criminal Irish-American adventurers; demanding their share of offices, and boasting that all the patriotism and all the valor that saved our national Union was Irish; demanding, in their insolence, that other foreigners should be driven out of Oregon. These numbers, we assume, are fairly representative of the Irish vote in California, and yet Democrats and Republicans fairly tremble when they think they hear the roar of the Irish lion. The best work the Argonaut has done, or can do, to society, to the political parties, and to the Irish themselves, is to interpret the bray of this animal, strip him of his false skin, show him up—hoofs, horns, and tail—and demonstrate that he is what the fox found the village church-bell to be—nothing but an empty-headed, brazen-cheeked, long-tongued, good-for-nothing, noisy creature, all voice "et praterea nihil"—"Sound and fury, signifying nothing." Yet these people, gathering together in San Francisco on the sand-lot, at the corner grocery, on the steps of the mint, in ward-clubs, at their land-league meetings, in Hibernian societies, in Irish military organizations, in funeral processions, and in riotous demonstrations, so multiply themselves that they have frightened the Democracy into absolute cowardice, and impressed everybody with their voting force and political influence. When the Argonaut undertook to expose this sham, it was regarded as the thirteenth labor of Hercules. It was even supposed that it required some moral and physical courage to undertake it. It required no courage. The trick of turning the waters of the river Alpheus through the stables of King Augeas by Hercules, suggested to us to direct a stream of intelligence and sound sense through the nozzle of our weekly paper, and sluice off all the mystery, sham, and pretentious buncombe that enveloped the whole Irish question. The first result of our efforts was a municipal victory, in which the Irish were scooped. The second is the result at San José, where the honest country Democracy and the chivalry have scooped the Irish again. J. P. Dunn of the Sand-lot, and Gildea, are the only bones thrown to the wolf that bowled through our streets with his gleaming fangs. More than three years ago Mr. John Patrick Dunn was elected auditor of San Francisco, on an occasion when society paraded the streets at night in armed protection of its property; when men defended their houses from conflagration with arms; when in the streets of San José, where the convention was held, an alien English adventurer paraded in an open barouche, dragging a hangman's rope to intimidate American electors. Perhaps this Pope's Irish Democrat can now become Controller of the State of California; but we do not believe it. We nominate Henry W. Brickwedel against him, subject to the Republican State Convention, and thus as between two foreigners, no native Americanism intervening, let us see to what extent the people of California are stuck after Holy Roman Ireland, pure and simple.

The removal of Mr. White, and the appointment of Mr. Charles Gorham, the brother of Mr. George C. Gorham—or Black-and-Tan—as coiner of the San Francisco Branch Mint is a declaration on the part of the President that civil service reform is not to be considered by him in the waning months of his administration. It is an evidence that Black-and-Tan himself is regarded as of sufficient importance to be considered in the making of California appointments. It is understood also that the removal and the appointment are triumphs of Page over General Miller. Perhaps not; for in the necessities of political life it often becomes necessary to make strange companions, and sometimes apparently irreconcilable antagonists make concessions that perplex those who do not know the inside working. The Republican party is by no means harmonious, and if Mr. Page should—as it is understood he will—press his claims for a gubernatorial nomination, it is quite possible that the present seemingly harmonious condition of the party may be disturbed. If Mr. Page should become the nominee of the party for Governor, there would be trouble in the camp. If Mr. Page and his friends shall endeavor to run the next State Convention in antagonism to General Miller and his friends, the unpleasantness will be pronounced. If Mr. Estee entrusts his candidacy to the "b'hoys" element of San Francisco, and secures a delegation by the use of the hired machine, he will meet with the same fate in the Republican Convention that George Hearst met in the Democratic Convention. The country is honest, if it knows itself; it is honest, if it is properly informed of what is going on; it is intelligent and quick to understand the situation. There are fifty gentlemen in the ranks of the Republican party; there are men in every county in the State who are competent and available candidates for Governor, and who, if nominated, and nominated by independent and honorable men, and have nothing to conceal from the people, can beat General Stoneman. We have time and time again indicated the kind of men who ought to be placed in nomination by the Republicans—men of brains and courage, and of whom specific pledges need not be required because of their known intelligence and integrity. This is true not only of the office of Governor, but of Railroad Commissioners and the Board of Equalization. James McM. Sbafter of Marin County, ex-Chief Justice Rhodes of Santa Clara, Hon. John F. Swift of San Francisco, Hon. Newton Booth of Sacramento, Donald McRuer of San Francisco, Mr. Jewett of Marysville, E. A. Davis of Yuba, Irving Scott of San Francisco, Joseph Russ of Humboldt, Mayor Blake of San Francisco, D. G. Payne of Santa Clara, Socrates Huff of Alameda, John Mansfield of Los Angeles, J. P. Stearns of Santa Barbara, Sperry or Doak of San Joaquin, Charles Felton of San Mateo, Cyrus Wheeler of Sacramento, Hilborne of Solano. These names come to us as we write. They are honorable men, who, if elected to office, would first inform themselves of the duties they would be called upon to perform, and would then conscientiously perform them. There are other and as good or better men all over the State; modest men who have not the cheek to press themselves for office. What the Argonaut would like to aid in bringing about is a thoroughly deliberate State Convention, where Republicans can meet in consultation; where measures can be discussed, and men considered; where there is an open, free, and deliberate exchange of opinions. Let us choose for Governor some man of brains; a man who would bring to the discharge of his administrative duties intelligent capacity. For Controller and Treasurer let us have men of financial sense, and for members of Congress, comprehensive, brainy, eloquent men—all things else being equal, gentlemen preferred. For judges and for Attorney-General we really ought to have lawyers if they are attainable. For the Railroad Commission, and Board of Equalization, we should like to be able to get on without consulting W. W. Stow, the railroad, the corporations, the great land-owners, the millionaires, Higgins, Gannon, Chute, Peter Donohue, Charles Webb Howard, Frank Page and his flunkies, General Miller and his friends, or Black-and-Tan and his gang. General Miller has made a good senator; Mr. Frank Page has done good service in Congress upon the Chinese question, and Black-and-Tan is no end of use in doing necessary dirty work for the party; but when we who stay at home and pay taxes meet together to choose the officers of a State government for the management of our State affairs, we ought to be let alone, and we ought to have our own way, and Federal officers, Government stipendiaries, corporation agents, ward-strikers, and political vagabonds who pay no taxes, ought to mind their own business.

The Reverend Mr. Lines, of St. Luke's Episcopal Church, resigns his pastorate, and after a visit to Eastern relatives, will enter upon missionary duty in San Bernardino, Southern California. The parish of St. Luke will miss its young clergyman, and the country round about Riverside will be fortunate in getting him. He has built up a congregation in the Western Addition, and he will do it again in a broader field. He is young, enthusiastic, and in earnest; has sense, courage, and push; he looks upon his profession as one demanding practical works. In parish duty he is indefatigable; in the performance of his clerical ministrations he recognizes natural forces, does not ignore the laws of science, believes in the rotary motion of the earth, in gravitation, centrifugal and centripetal forces; will not dash his brains out against a geological rock; has common sense, and when asked some metaphysical spiritual conundrum regarding miracles, inspiration, immaculate conception, transubstantiation, election, foreordination, total depravity, original sin, future punishment, and the ten times ten thousand other catechetical brain-posers, has the courage to answer, "I don't know." He is abreast with the science of the age, keeps step to its progress, thinks the church a live institution, and believes he has a field of useful labor in it. Beside all this, he is loyal to Bishop Kip, and has aided, with the other young clergymen and all the lay gentlemen of the bishopric, to uphold his hands—now growing old and feeble—against the machinations of certain Episcopal Jesuits, who for these many years have intrigued against him. We wish our young Episcopal friend success in his new field of labor.

The Sunday-law was enacted by a Democratic legislature. After reposing as a dead letter for a time it was revived in aid of the Irish temperance movement, inspired by the Catholic Church, and given new vitality under a legal decision of Chief-Justice Morrison, an American Democrat, who owes his election to the sole fact that he is a Catholic convert and candidate of the sand-lot. The Democratic convention, hoping to catch the German vote, resolves against sumptuary laws, and refuses to put a German on their ticket. Germans are fond of lager, but unless they think through their bellies and see under their moustaches, they won't be caught by this. Nicht wahr?

Police-Inspector Waddy, of New York, has recently died from eating pie and drinking milk. He was very conscientious in the performance of his duty. We know several police officers who drink whisky, don't eat pie, sbrisk their duty every chance they get, and are yet living to a good old age. Moral—Do not eat pie, do not drink milk, do not do your official duty, and you will live to a good old age.

Will S. Green, of the Colusa Sum, received thirty votes for Railroad Commissioner. We believe him now, when he says he had rather edit the columns of the Sum. He would rather be maintaining the high and noble prerogative of an American citizen, than to be a party dog and bay the political moon. "Sour grapes set the children's teeth on edge."

Twenty-five thousand greasy and unkempt immigrants are the daily average now landing at Castle Garden for distribution throughout our country. The land and government that can digest the ignorance, crime, squalor, disease, and dirt that is embraced in an annual million of immigrants must have the stomach of an ostrich.

Mr. Russ Stephens, of Sacramento, late deputy-controller under Browne, thinks of emigrating to Ireland, starting a sand-heap of his own, and running for controller of the Irish currency, whenever that most distressful people whip the English government, and establish a nation.

BOB AND BETTY.

Their Struggle to Prevent their Course of Love from Running Smooth.

Betty clasped her hands under her head, and yawned a little as she looked at pretty Emily Ashton.

"Indifferent?" she said; "well, really, Emmy, it's such an old story, you know; we've been brought up on it, Bob and I; how can we be enthusiastic?"

Mrs. Ashton sighed. "You are the most impossible couple," she said. "Ah, Betty, how time changes everything! Five years ago you were a child, Bob was in college, and I was a bride; now you are the bride, and I am a widow at twenty-three."

"I am not a bride yet," said Betty, aggressively.

"No, but you will be to-morrow. Is there another girl in the world, I wonder, who would insist upon spending the afternoon before her wedding-day out in the woods with a parcel of noisy children? Have you no romance, no sentiment, no imagination? Why, child, for weeks before I was married I was in a perfect dream. Do you never feel like that? Have you no regrets for the life of girlish freedom you will leave behind?"

Betty looked up at the blue October sky, as it shone between the yellow beeches. "I shall not leave it behind," she said. "Bob and I get on so well together, and my life will be so little changed only to go from our house across the street to Bob's; the homestead is his, you know, since his mother died. As to getting married, I want it done quietly."

At this minute a shrill Swiss jodel sounded from the river, and a slender cedar boat shot into sight. There were two young men in it. One held the rudder cords, and flung a cigarette into the river as they came up; the other was pulling the boat, and looking back over his left shoulder to make a landing.

"Catch the painter, Betty," said Bob.

"How late you are; we are ravenous," replied Betty, as she obeyed him.

When the boat was tied, and Bob had introduced his friend, Joseph Hardy, the young men built a fire, and Betty made coffee, and Jack, and Rudolf, and Lottie were called from their beech-nutting, and everybody was very lively and witty, and unromantically hungry, and altogether they had a very jolly picnic, and went home at last in a high state of satisfaction.

There was nothing very particular about Hardy; he was a negative sort of fellow, but he was different from any young man that Betty had ever seen, and she thought it was a pity Bob was not like his friend.

The wedding day was peerless, and the old parsonage where Betty lived was noisy and cheery with the wedding bustle. Plump Mother Browne, between smiles and tears, was bringing out her great white loaves of bride-cake; the parson was in the cellar, unearthing certain cobwebbed bottles of currant wine, golden with age, which Grandmother Browne had long since set apart and labeled, "For Betty's wedding."

Suddenly Parson Browne appeared with cobwebs on his hair and an open telegram in his hand. "Your great-great-uncle Eben is dying," he announced. "I must go at once; I can catch the nine-thirty express."

"And the wedding?" gasped Mrs. Browne.

"You'll have to get Brother Gilman."

"I never," said Betty firmly, "will be married by anybody but father. We'll wait till you come back; it will make no difference."

"Why, no," said Bob, "no difference at all. Betty and I are always here. We can be married any time we happen to want to."

So it seemed, after all, there was to be no wedding that day. The bride-cake was put away, and the four young people stood on the shady piazza looking at each other blankly. Mr. Hardy seated himself on the railing and rolled a cigarette.

He was a bappy fellow, in that he was never at a loss what to do next.

"What shall we do now?" asked Betty. "We ought to do something."

"Yes; it is flat to do nothing when we expected to be married," said Bob.

"I will tell you," cried Betty; "let us take the big wagon, and go to Bald Mountain. Mother will give us lunch, and we can have a picnic."

"Betty thinks a picnic is a cure for every ill on earth," declared Bob.

"Bob is certain that I am horribly disappointed not to be married," she retorted; and the two went off to consult Mrs. Browne.

"Who would ever imagine those two people to be in love with each other?" asked Emily Ashton in despair.

Hardy shook the blaze from a match and dropped it over the railing.

"Nobody would," he replied; "they are not."

They went to Bald Mountain, and they had a charming day, but that night, when Betty brushed her hair she thought again that it was a pity Bob was so unlike his friend. Father would be back next day, and she would be married to Bob, of course, but if—

Betty put out her light, and opened her blinds. Across the street, on the piazza of Bob's home, (would it be hers to-morrow?) somebody was walking and smoking. Hardy, of course. Bob was sound asleep. Bob had no romance.

"Ah, me—if only—"

Betty closed her blinds and crept into bed.

All the same it was Bob who paced the piazza and smoked in the dark.

"It is a confounded pity," he said; but he did not say what was a pity.

Well, Parson Browne would be back next day, and they would be married, and Betty was an uncommonly nice girl—but—

He threw away his cigar end, and went in to bed.

Parson Browne did not come back next day, nor next, nor in fact three weeks went by, and poor old Eben still lingered, "dying daily," and would not let his leave his side for half an hour.

Both Mrs. Ashton and Hardy declared it was absurd to stay, and still they stayed from day to day. They passed the time in riding and driving and rowing, in tennis and music, and all manner of joyous devices, and yet they were not joyous. Something had gone wrong somehow. The leaves had fallen, the mountains far away were capped with snow; it was November; the very sunlight was a hollow glare; the world was out of joint completely. One afternoon Bob found Betty alone in the old-fashioned parlor before a little wood fire. She had not been crying, of course. What should Betty have to cry for? And yet her lashes were wet.

As he came in she looked up and then looked down, and sighed. She had thought it might be Hardy, who had come in to lounge awhile before the fire, and tease her, and scold her, and laugh at her, and through it all to make her strangely happy, as was his indolent custom in those days. Of course Betty was not in love with Hardy; she was only out of love with Bob, and so she sighed and looked into the fire.

"Where's Emily?" asked Bob.

Betty gave a little start. "Emily has gone to Salisbury Mills with mother and Jack, to buy herself some new widows' caps."

"Oh," said Bob, "I should have thought she might be leaving off those things by this time; he's been dead three years."

"Four years," Betty corrected; "but she says she never will leave the caps off. I think they are becoming to Emily."

Bob made no reply, and fell to studying the fire gloomily. "I wish I knew what to say to Betty, confound it all!" he was thinking.

"Dear me, dear me," thought Betty, "how shall I ever tell him in this world!"

Women speak first, as a general thing.

"Bob," said Betty, timidly.

"Well?" said Bob, still staring at the fire.

"You know I am very fond of you, Bobby."

"Yes, of course," he said; but he thought, "Now, hang it, why need she make everything so much harder by becoming affectionate all of a sudden. Poor little Betty, how badly she'll feel when I tell her. Yet it is kinder to her to be honest."

"Yes, Bobby, I am very fond of you; but lately, do you know, dear, I have come to feel that I only love you—as a brother."

"What!" said Bob, looking up suddenly.

"Oh, I know it is wrong," cried Betty, "and I know how bad you'll feel, Bob dear, but I can't help it. I can never marry you in the world. I do not love you in that way a bit."

Bob crossed to Betty with a single stride, and dropped into a chair beside her.

"Why, Betty," he exclaimed, "that is exactly what I have been wanting to say to you, only I didn't know how the deuce to say it. I thought you'd feel so badly."

"Bob Howard," said Betty, suddenly erect and vivacious, "you thought that I'd feel badly?"

"Why, yes; I thought you loved me."

"I never really loved you for one minute in that way."

"Then you perjured yourself."

"Well, so did you."

"It was a long time ago, though."

"It is very well, Bob Howard," said Mistress Betty, with blazing cheeks, "that we found out our mistake before it was too late. How utterly absurd it would have been for me to have promised to obey you."

"Quite as ridiculous," returned Bob, with spirit, "as for me to promise to worship you. Why will your father cling to his grandfather's clumsy old English service?"

Both laughed, though more with vexation than mirth.

"You see," said Betty, "I never could forget, Bob, if I lived a thousand years, what a perfectly horrid boy you used to be."

"And I should always be thinking," Bob rejoined, "what a little tom-boy of a girl you used to be, forever tagging."

"Bob Howard, I never, never tagged."

"Forever tagging," persisted Bob, doggedly.

"You put a toad in my desk at the red school-house once."

"Yes, because you told who broke the meeting-house window."

"I should think you might have forgotten that in the course of years."

"It strikes me we are getting decidedly childish, Betty; can't we talk this matter over like a pair of rational beings?"

"It isn't a rational matter, Bob."

"At least we can agree to disagree."

"And I can give you back your ring."

"Can't you wear it as a friend?"

"No; friends do not give rings."

She took off the ring, and handed it to him.

"Throw it into the fire," he commanded, without touching it.

"If we are to act like rational beings, Bob, you must put it in your pocket. It would be theatrical to throw it into the fire."

"Very well," he said; "give it to me."

She obeyed him, and they sat for some time without speaking; then Betty broke out:

"How ridiculous it would have been for us to be married!"

"Perfectly ridiculous!"

"And of all things in the world, Bob, I hate to appear ridiculous."

And that evening both Betty and Bob were exceedingly merry. Betty played cribbage with Hardy, and Emily and Bob sang duets at the other end of the room. By and by Hardy and Betty popped corn over the glowing coals, and Bob and Emily went out to walk on the piazza.

The sun rose twice, and set twice, and rose again, and Parson Browne came home.

Mrs. Browne once more unwrapped her bride-cakes, and unlocked her best damask, and her great-grand-mother's wine-glasses, with twisted stems, and once more the parsonage was alive with cheerful preparations for the wedding. For Betty and Bob had been too cowardly to tell anybody of the change in their relations. It was such an awkward and uncomfortable sort of thing to do. They had quite given themselves up to enjoying the companionship of Mrs. Ashton and Hardy. They did not, however, enjoy themselves or their friends so amazingly. Could it be that the zest was gone because the fruit was no longer forbidden?

They were so happy and so cheerful that one night Betty fairly cried herself to sleep for very joy, and Bob, across the street, walked the piazza till nearly midnight, smoking and thinking what a relief it was to be his own man once more, and free to choose for himself.

But Parson Browne had come, and who would break the joyful news to him? Betty sent Rudolf across the street, to request Bob to meet her in the parlor for a moment.

She peeped into the glass, and smoothed her pretty chestnut hair. She untied the blue ribbon at her throat, and put on a cherry one instead. Bob said she was a little guy in blue, and though Bob was her lover no longer, yet she need not make herself a fright in Bob's eyes because Mr. Hardy liked blue. She ran down stairs, and stopped with a start inside the parlor door, for she saw Bob standing, back to her, staring out of the window, with his hands in his pockets.

"You came very quickly," said Betty; "Rudolf has hardly been gone two minutes."

"I did not see Rudolf," said Bob. "I did not know you sent for me. I came of my own accord."

"Oh," said Betty, and went and sat down by the fire. She folded her pretty, ringless hands, and for a moment contemplated the back of Bob's great tweed coat as if she was considering the fit of it.

"You sent for me, then," said he, still looking into the orchard. "What do you want?"

"Why—er—nothing," said Betty. "You came of your own accord to see me; what did you want?"

"Nothing," echoed Bob, crisply.

"Why, Bob, you must have come for something."

"And you, of course, did not send for me for nothing!"

"How absurd we are. Tell me your errand first."

"Place aux dames," said Bob, with alarming politeness.

"You are certainly in a very bad temper to-day."

"Persons who wear colored glasses say all the world is blue."

Mistress Betty flushed, but she shut her teeth tightly. She had not sent for Bob to quarrel with him. Bob left the window, and began promenading up and down the room.

"I hope you enjoy your freedom, Bob," said Betty.

"Immensely," he replied. "I hope you enjoy yours."

"I never was so happy in my life," she declared energetically. "It is such a relief."

Bob stopped in his promenade.

"Is it?" he asked.

"Yes; of course it is—a great relief."

He came up to the other side of the fire.

"I say, Betty," he demanded, "has anybody told your father yet?"

"I have not," said Betty.

"Why?"

"Well, I thought it was your place."

"Certainly not. It is the lady's privilege always to announce a broken engagement."

"It is a pleasure I will gladly forego."

"You can not forego it. Your father must be told. You know we can not go in this way any longer, Betty. It is ridiculous."

Betty agreed that it was ridiculous, so ridiculous that somehow her lashes were wet with amusement.

"I don't know what the deuce they will say about it," said Bob, his hands still in his pockets. "It is certainly very awkward for us both."

Betty made no reply. The fire scorched her face, and she was obliged to spread a Japanese fan that lay near by to screen herself. Her right foot peeped out from under her gown, and it occurred to Bob that Betty certainly did possess the trimmest little foot in Christendom.

"They were both busy thinking for a long time."

"Do you know what came into my head this morning, Betty—something that I haven't thought of for years?"

"No, Bob, how should I?"

"I was thinking of the time I fell and hurt myself in Barker's mill, and you ran the whole way to the village for the doctor."

"It was just as well I tagged that time, Bobby."

"You never tagged. I was a brute the other day."

Betty glanced at Bob over the top of her fan, and it occurred to her that, after all, his stalwart young figure was handsomer than the languid length of Hardy's.

"You always used to help me in my algebra. I was always a stupid little goose in mathematics. I must have tried your patience many times; I was so dull."

"I never thought you dull."

Another silence, Betty peeping at Bob, between the sticks of her hand-screen; Bob staring at the crimson Fusi-yama, on a ground of blue and drab, on Betty's fan.

"Betty!" said Bob, rather explosively.

"Yes, Bob."

"Doesn't it strike you as rather ridiculous, at this late day, to tell your father that we do not—do not love each other?"

"I don't know, Bob."

Bob left his side of the fire, and crossing, sat down beside Betty on the tiny sofa.

"Put down the fan," he said.

But she wouldn't; she even turned her head away from him.

He took her hand, the left hand, where his ring had been.

"You needn't obey me, you know, Betty, if you didn't want to."

"And it would be very silly, Bob, for you to worship me, I'm sure."

He had possession of both her hands by this time, and the fan was nowhere.

"I'll tell you what it is, Betty," he said, "it has simply come to this, that the next step must be worship, for the last two days have taught me that I can not love you any better if I try a lifetime."

Betty considered awhile.

"I'll tell father, Bobby, if you want me to," she said, with amazing humility, "that we've agreed to break off—"

"Look here," said Bob, "we are going to let this matter drop now, you know, and by this time to-morrow—"

Betty skillfully eluded his embrace.

"By this time to-morrow, my dear, you will have lost your individuality; you'll be Betty Howard's husband!"—Elleanor Putnam in Boston Courier.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

The appointment of Judge Underwood to the Tariff Commission calls to mind an incident of his early years. Some one asked his father, then a Federal Judge in Georgia, what his son's politics were. "I don't know," was the nonchalant reply; "I haven't seen the boy since breakfast."

When Dan Rice left New Orleans a couple of years ago, says the Picayune, he wrote back to the hotel-keeper, saying: "I left my overcoat at your house. Send it by express to Cincinnati." Daniel had been dreaming. The hotel man wrote back: "You left nothing here but an unpaid board-bill. What shall I do with that?" The great humorist of the ring has not yet answered the last question.

Some officers of a British ship were dining with a mandarin at Canton, China, some time ago. One of the guests wishing for a second helping of a savory stew, which he thought was some kind of duck, and not knowing the word in Chinese, held his plate to the host, saying, with smiling approval, "Quack, quack, quack." His countenance fell when the host, pointing to the dish, responded, "Bow, wow, wow."

A down-town ten-year-old daughter went into her home yesterday afternoon, and her mother on seeing her cried: "Why, what in the world are you doing with that doll, your great big child?" "Oh, it's all right, mamma; a lady gave it to me and said I could keep it," returned the innocent girl, as she handed into the arms of her surprised and then enraged mother a three-days-old infant.—Kingston Freeman.

"How is the soil of Kansas?" asked one of the group, as the traveler paused. "Richest in the world, sir," was the reply. "I know a New York State man who went to Kansas seven years ago with only fifteen dollars in cash, and he is now worth twenty thousand dollars." "Whew! What did he raise principally?" "I believe it was a check, sir; but they couldn't exactly prove it on him."—Wall Street News.

Inquiring, a month ago, the price of small plates of strawberries which he saw on a buffet at a swell Paris restaurant, a visitor was told a "franc." When the bill came, the strawberries were charged ten francs. "They are a franc apiece," explained the waiter. The visitor rose to leave with a grin. "You have forgotten the waiter, sir," said that functionary. "Forgotten you! Why, I have left you a strawberry, equivalent to a franc," and the indignant visitor brushed brusquely out.

On the day of Mademoiselle Rothschild's marriage at the synagogue in the Rue de la Victoire, Paris, a man with a wooden leg planted himself at a neighboring corner, with the idea that such a position on such an occasion would prove a source of considerable emolument. A few moments later a man with two wooden legs stationed himself on the opposite side of the street. Thereupon the first corner, after an inspection of his gifted rival, departed in melancholy disappointment.

While Longfellow was a professor at Bowdoin College he once called up a student who was utterly unprepared to recite. A fellow-student endeavored to help the delinquent youth by prompting him in a whisper, which, however, was so loud as to be heard all through the room. The professor did not interrupt, but when the student stopped of his own accord, remarked quietly: "Your recitation reminds me of a Spanish theatre, where the prompter is more important than the actor."

An eminent violinist, at a certain concert given in honor of Berlioz, having played the "Réverie et Caprice" of that composer with much applause, said immediately afterward to Mendelssohn, who was near him: "I am glad I have got through it; I never had such a task in my life; I have not the remotest idea what I have been playing, or what the piece can be about." At the same moment Berlioz was exclaiming: "Never have I heard an artist who has so completely caught my meaning, and so wonderfully interpreted it."

A rather seedy-looking customer enters a bathing establishment, where the employees view him with alarm and apprehension, make him wait an unconscionably long time, put him on half-rations of soap, and serve him with damp towels. His patient merit takes all their spurs uncomplainingly, and when he departs he gives the attendant half a crown. Stupefaction and regret of the employees, who when next the seedy customer appears neglect all the other bathers to anticipate his every want. On going out he graciously tips them with two coppers. Renewed surprise and stupefaction of the attendants. "Gentlemen," says the seedy customer, blandly, "the two coppers are for your services yesterday. The half-crown I gave you then was for what you have done to day."—New York World.

The Duchess of Chevreuse, of the time of Napoleon I., was immensely wealthy, and like the other aristocrats of her day declined to appear at the usurper's court. The emperor, who had made up his mind that the representatives of the old nobility should grace it, dropped a hint one evening to one of the friends of the family of Luynes that unless the duchess appeared at the next reception at the Tuilleries he would allow the decision of the courts in the Concini case (to which the Luynes owed much of their immense fortune) to be revised. After this there was nothing for the duchess but to make her appearance, and accordingly she was present at the next reception. She had suffered from attack of small-pox, which had left its traces on her face. "Ah, it is you, madame?" said Napoleon, with his brutal frankness; "but I say, you're all pock-pitted!" "I know it, sire," replied the duchess, with a howl, "but a Frenchman would not have reminded me of it!" The duchess's retort was in the same style—though neater—as that of the lady who, when one evening the emperor called her up, and remarked loudly: "Are you as fond of men as ever?" replied, as she turned on her heel and walked off, "Yes, sire, so long as they have good manners!"—Le Figaro.

THE LATEST VERSE.

The Bells of San Blas.

What say the bells of San Blas
To the ships that southward pass
From the harbor of Mazatlan?
To them it is nothing more
Than the sound of surf on the shore—
Nothing more to master or man.
But to me, a dreamer of dreams,
To whom what is and what seems
Are often one and the same—
The Bells of San Blas to me
Have a strange, wild melody,
And are something more than a name.

* * * * *
"Oh, bring us back once more
The vanished days of yore,
When the world with faith was filled;
Bring back the fervid zeal,
The hearts of fire and steel,
The hands that believe and build."
O Bells of San Blas, in vain
Ye call back the past again;
The past is deaf to your prayer!
Out of the shadows of night
The world rolls into light;
It is daybreak everywhere.
—A portion of the posthumous poem of Henry W. Longfellow in the July Atlantic.

The Two Painters: An Art Fable.

In art some hold themselves content
If they but compass what they meant;
Others prefer, their purpose gained,
Still to find something unattained—
Something for which they vaguely grope
With no more aid than that of Hope.
Which are the wiser? Who shall say?
The prudent follower of Gay
Refrains to speak for either view,
But slips his fable 'twixt the two.
Once—'twas in good Queen Anne's time—
While yet in this heightened clime
The Genius of the Arts (now known
On mouldy pediments alone)
Protected all the men of mark,
Two painters met her in the park.
Whether she wore the robe of air
Portrayed by Verrio and Laguerre;
Or, like Belinda, trod this earth,
Equipped with hoop of monstrous girth,
And armed at every point for slaughter
With essences and orange-water,
I know not; but it seems that then,
After some talk of brush and pen—
Some chat of art both high and low,
Of Van's "goose-pie" and Kneller's "mot"—
The lady, as a goddess should,
Bade them ask of her what they would.
"Then, madam, my request," says Brisk,
Giving his Ramillies a whisk,
"Is that your Majesty will crown
My humble efforts with renown.
Let me, I beg it—thanks to you—
Be praised for everything I do,
Whether I paint a man of note,
Or only plan a petticoat."
"Nay," quoth the other, "I confess,"
(This one was plainer in his dress,
And even poorly clad,) "for me,
I scorn your popularity.
Why should I care to catch at once
The point of view of every dunce?
Let me do well, indeed, but find
The fancy first, the work behind;
Nor wholly touch the thing I wanted. . ."
The goddess both petitions granted.
Each, in his way, achieved success;
But one grew great. And which one? Guess.
—Austin Dobson in the Magazine of Art.

A Welcome—April 27, 1882.

The thrushes were singing between the showers,
Between the showers of an April day;
And they said, "There is noise in the tall old towers
Of marriage-bells, and of roundelay.
Oh, the world," each sang to his mate, "looks gay,
When it seems a garden that holds but two!
Green he the garden as meads in May,
And God give His sunshine all the year through.
"From the leaf and the blossom of other bowers
Came a princess through the salt sea spray;
But now she is ours!" they sang, "she is ours!
She has come with the spring, she has come to stay.
Soft blow the winds in her path at play!
Never be cloud on her reach of blue;
Fair he the fields where her feet shall stray,
And God give His sunshine all the year through."
Other thrushes and other flowers
Shall she miss from the springs of the future? Nay.
Not if the welcome of these first hours
Half the wish of our heart can say—
Not if the tribute our tongue can pay
Be half as loud as the homage is true—
Oh, hlest be the garden as Eden clay,
And God give His sunshine all the year through.

L'ENVOI.

Prince, be sure of the hearts that pray,
While summer is breaking for her and for you—
Blossoms make lovely each step of your way,
And God give His sunshine all the year through.
—May Probyn in Macmillan's Magazine.

Ode.

I once loved to battle with life's stormy waves,
That bear men, through trouble and triumph, to graves;
But now the bold vigor of youth is no more,
I yearn for the meadows and streamlets of yore.
I see in them beauties that for me have slept,
Till the silver grey locks 'mid the sable have crept;
And now, like a flood, the sweet memories flow
Of the days of my childhood—summers ago
Each blossoming flow'et and towering tree
Some fond recollection embodies for me.
Where the fragrance of roses floats sweet on the air,
And the blossoms the impress of innocence bear,
'Tis there my thought fly, like the bird to its nest,
Where its little ones lovingly nestle at rest.
From the turmoil of cities I lovingly look
To the thyme-scented banks of some murmuring brook,
Far, far from this Babel of Mammon-rapt souls
(Where the Juggernaut car of gaunt misery rolls)
To a valley where violets lurk in the shade
Of the wide-spreading branches of some sylvan glade.
—London Life.

TO HOUSEKEEPERS.

If you wish to use goods of full weight and absolute purity, see your grocer supplies you with

KINGSFORD'S
OSWEGO
STARCH.
ROYAL BAKING POWDER.

WALTER BAKER & CO.'S
CHOCOLATE.

ARBUCKLE'S
ARIOSA
COFFEE

WM. T. COLEMAN & CO.
AGENTS
121 and 123 Market Street,
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

BUSINESS CARDS.

GEORGE MORROW.

GEORGE MORROW & CO.

(Established 1854.)

Commission Merchants

DEALERS IN HAY AND GRAIN.

SHIPPING ORDERS A SPECIALTY. CONSIGNMENTS SOLICITED.

39 Clay Street,

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

PACIFIC ROLLING MILL CO.

San Francisco, Cal., Manufacturers of

RAILROAD AND MERCHANT IRON

Car and Locomotive Axles and Frames, and Hammered Iron of every description. Rolled Beams, Angle, Channel, and T Iron, Bridge, and Machine Bolts, Lag Screws, Nuts, Washers, etc. Steamboat Shafts, Cranks, Pistons, Connecting Rods, etc., etc. Highest price paid for Scrap Iron.

OFFICE, 202 MARKET STREET.

IRA P. RANKIN.

A. P. BRAYTON

PACIFIC IRON WORKS

RANKIN, BRAYTON & CO.,

127 to 132 First Street, San Francisco.

Mining Machinery of all kinds, Sugar Mills, Engines—both Marine and Stationary, Boilers, etc., etc.

THE AMERICAN SUGAR REFINERY

SAN FRANCISCO,

MANUFACTURERS OF ALL

Classes of Refined Sugars, including Loaf Sugar for export.

C. ADOLPHE LOW, President.

Office—208 California Street.

CHARLES R. ALLEN

Wholesale and Retail Dealer in COAL or Office by Telephone 308.

Agent Pittsburg Coal Mining Company.

118 and 120 Beale Street, S. F.

PAYOT, UPHAM & CO

STATIONERS, BOOKSELLERS,

Commercial Printers,

and Blank Book Manufacturers

204 Sansome Street, near Pine.

C. ADOLPHE LOW & CO.

Commission Merchants,

SAN FRANCISCO.

OFFICE IN NEW YORK, 42 CEDAR Street

Liberal advances made on consignments.

S. & G. GUMP,

581 and 583 Market Street, S. F.,

Manufacturers

Mirrors, Cornices, Hardwood Mantles, Picture Frames, and Eric-a-Brac.

IMPORTERS OF GOUPIL'S ENGRAVINGS, CHROMOS, PHOTOGRAPHS, ETC.

WILLIAMS, DIMOND & CO.

SHIPPING AND

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Union Building, Junction Market and Pine Streets, San Francisco.

AGENTS FOR PACIFIC MAIL S. S.

Co.; Pacific Steam Navigation Co.; The Cunard Royal Mail S. S. Co.; The Hawaiian Line; The China Traders' Insurance Co. Limited; The Marine Insurance Co. of London; The Baldwin Locomotive Works; The Glasgow Iron Co.; Nich. Ashton & Son's Salt

CALIFORNIA SUGAR REFINERY.

OFFICE, 325 Market St.

WORKS, Eighth and Brannan Sts.

C. SPRECKELS, President,

J. D. SPRECKELS, Vice-President,

A. B. SPRECKELS, Secretary.

S. P. COLLINS & CO.

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL

dealers Old London Tock Brandies, Port Wines, Sherries, and all choice brands Champagne, Apple Jack, Pisco, Arrack, Cordials, Liqueurs, etc. 322 MONTGOMERY, and 511 CALIFORNIA STREETS, S. F.

JOHN TAYLOR & CO.

118 and 120 Market Street, and 15 and 17 California Street.

ASSAYERS' MATERIALS, MINE

Mill Supplies; also Druggists Glassware

THOMAS PRICE,

CHEMICAL LABORATORY

OFFICE BULLION ROOMS, AND

524 Sacramento Street, 822

The didactic Charles Reade, writing once of Anna Oldfield of the silver voice, said: "Oldfield was the woman (there is always one) who used the tones of nature upon the stage in that day. She ranted at times like her neighbors, but she never ranted out of tune like them. Her declamation was nature alias art-thundering; theirs was artifice-raving. Her treatment of words was as follows: She mastered them in the tone of household speech; she then gradually built up these simple tones into a gorgeous edifice of music and meaning; but though dilated, heightened, and embellished, they never lost their original truth." When the sweet-voiced English stranger came upon the stage, half-frightened and half-confident, the other night, in the placid beginning of that maelstrom of incident, "Caryswold," this passage occurred to me, and I looked it up, for the lady's household speech was a thing of music. Hard upon this paragraph came another: "Let the stage-voice and the dramatic voice, the artificial and the artistic, the hasty and the legitimate, the false and the true, be kept apart upon separate stages, and there is no security that the public will not, as far as hands go, applaud the monotonous lie more than the melodious truth. But set the lie and the truth side by side upon fair terms, and the public becomes a critic." I wish Mr. Charles Reade could have been there to bear when the new actress began to chatter to her husband in the drama with that pleasant little coo with which fond wives tickle the ears of their mates. What with the pretty stage settings of the morning room and the refinement of the chirping wife, Mr. Hugh Hylton seemed a singularly inappropriate ornament for the hearthstone of an English manor, even to look upon. But when he spoke, ye gods! what a splutter of clipped consonants and badly snubbed vowels! while he simply sat upon our grammatical equilibrium, and crushed it to insignificance. It is rather staggering to present a public with this sort of hero—a public accustomed to its English novel, with hero, heroine, and all concerned cut upon the regulation type. I read somewhere the other day of some well-known English novelist who reels off her stories quite comfortably while she sits in her carriage on her way to the drawing-room. The longer the blockade, the longer her chapter. Does not all the world know just what sort of gentry we shall meet in this indefatigable creature's hooks? "Caryswold" itself might be one of them, and even though the hero be a villain, he should be a gentleman in the English acceptance of the word. Fastidious readers blackball anything less than an Oxford man nowadays. The common world may be introduced below stairs or upon the turf, but while all the interesting people in fiction live in halls, and granges, and abbays, and one thing or other, the fair-haired gentlemen of England, and of books and plays, must be matched. Here is Elinor Hylton in the person of Miss Ward, a tall, slender, graceful woman, with straight-marked brows, a blonde, abundant chevelure, and a certain refinement of style typical of a race of fair young women on the sea-girt island. She has done all her English duties, married and buried a country gentleman, who lives in beautiful Caryswold, and not in plain, matter-of-fact number six hundred and ninety or four hundred and something. As a rich widow, with a young son whose handsome fortune she holds in trust, she is a welcome guest in the stately homes of England, preserves in which aristocratic game naturally abounds. She is won by a handsome, specious villain, whom she yet loves, and for this handsome specious villain the stage-manager gives her a McCloskey. Fancy a McCloskey browsing among the stately homes of England! But the new actress rose triumphant above the stage-manager's indiscretion. "Caryswold" is advertised as her own play. Perhaps it is, for everything but these two parts, husband and wife, is thrown very much in the shade. As for poor Elinor, her experience between the morning when she enters, fresh-hearted and voluble, after a gallop across country, embraces such a very storm of misfortune that there is really not very much room for the little troubles of any one else to slip in. Things are so delightfully prompt in the drama. Ordinarily when a man wants to put his wife in an insane asylum, he is deterred by the amount of bother involved. Men do not like bother. But in "Caryswold" the physician's certificate is signed and the straight-jacket men waiting below almost before the villain has matured his plot. This incarceration of sane women is a favorite subject with the dramatists, but their heroines usually come out of the experience as they went in. The screams and yells of the wretched, the hopeless struggle against bars and bolts, the contact with diseased wits, does not infect them as it does poor old Lear. They rise superior to all this sort of thing, and are ready for the fifth act at any moment. But poor Elinor Hylton, by the time the second act closes in wreaths of fire and pillars of smoke—a thrilling fire scene, truly—after a struggle almost to the death with her amiable husband; after coming unexpectedly upon her baby in the next room, and finding that her lord had given the child his soothing-syrup, made up of morphine; after finding herself in a burning building, with every door of escape locked, Elinor was at last a little "off." I do not think that the state of her mind concerned any of us so much as the manner of her escape. The curtain falls upon her, sinking into the calmness of despair, and the writhing flames coming, to say the least, unpleasantly near. How does she get out? People sunken into the calmness of despair lose their activity, and though she were a tight-rope walker there is no chance for her. "I decline to see the rest of the play," cries Amigo, "till I know what loophole was left her. So far as I can see she must have been caught by a big wind and blown up through the roof." But the stage-manager forbore to explain, and there she was as right as a trivet, in body at least, in the next act, which fortunately introduced us to some new people. The first hatch must have been pretty well worn out by this time. Here were all old friends in a pretty group, Bradley in his jolly old sea-dog humor, and Grismer in a beard and white gaiters, and Phoebe Davies in a quaint, pretty costume and an absurdly small part, and Miss Constance Murielle as a vivacious ingénue, when in upon them walks McCloskey Hylton, and makes downright love to Lillian, is, in fact, her betrothed. "My dear," she says, prettily, in that quiet way in which women make their most preposterous propositions. "My dear, if we are going to take our bridal trip in a yacht upon the Mediterranean I have a friend whom I should like, of all others, to take with us, a poor crazed woman who wanders about in rags, and in whom I have taken an unusual interest." O beautiful elastic drama, so abundant in possibilities, so utterly irrefutable in anything, for your dramatist, if you attempt to refute, will only smile pityingly upon you, and say "truth is stranger than fiction." No one ever tries to gainsay a well-established saying or a proverb, and yet what a jolly lark this, a bridal couple taking a bowling lunatic upon a yachting excursion to the blue Mediterranean. "Certainly, my dear," says McCloskey Hylton, and promptly proceeds to embrace her rapturously before the whole family, as stage lovers always do, when hark! a cry, and enter the cindered wife, her poor wits astray. Quite an Ophelia scene this, with the poor creature fantastically trimmed in flowers, and singing snatches of song, and played with thorough understanding and considerable power. "Nevertheless," says Amigo, even while he joined heartily in the plaudits which followed her stormily awakened reason, "nevertheless these English actresses of this particular type always do mince a little when it comes to the strong parts. Something in their soft measured treble strikes me as dramatic weakness." "Out upon you for a vandal," say I; "would you have a British matron, even in a play, roar out stormy passion like a Phèdre or a Dehonorah? This is an emotional drama; this is not a tragedy." "Oh," cries Amigo, ruefully, and explained that the close of the second act had struck him as having, at least, approached the confines of tragedy. "For all that," he said, "I like your Miss Ada Ward very well, and I find myself being affected daily more and more by this English wave, which is sweeping over the land." "But this is not an English wave at all," I cry; "this is simply a sensational play of questionable merit, for although its interest is really quite intense, it is the fault of every single scene and dialogue in it that it is protracted a shade too far, being thoroughly well played in all parts but one, by a very good company and a very good star. True, the star is English, but she is not a part of the English wave." "And pray, what would you call the English wave?" asks Amigo, "for you imply that there is one." "Oh yes, all the world knows that Lester Wallack is importing young English actors by the batch. Indeed the papers read as if they came twelve on a card, and were sent by express marked C. O. D. They drift this way now and then. We have had Montague, and Coghlan, and Tearle, and Eyre, and Harry Lee. Confess now, that if Lee, for example, could have taken the place of Colton, we should have had a more harmonious ensemble, and 'Caryswold' would have seemed a vastly better play." And Amigo did confess, and why not? If the specialists come to us now, as they do every day, with an Irishman in an Irish part, a Dutchman in a Dutch part, and a Jew in a Jewish part, why may we not have a gentleman villain in a villain part in a play cast in the upper stratum? Your lily-handed, courtly villains, like Grandcourt and a dozen others, are the sort of gentry we want. This Colton is really only half a bad actor according to his lights, but his lights are not the white, brilliant flash of drawing-rooms, but the yellow, murky glare of low life in the slums; of the undiscovered region which is the home of sensational melodrama. People sitting in high places do wrong, but they do it daintily, as they eat asparagus or tap their egg-shells. In short, what we need upon the stage is gilt-edged villainy, a fine hindering for a very bad article. And where are we to find it? All the handsome young men want winning parts, and decline to put themselves at odds with an audience. But how an actress will jump at a female villain part. Oddly enough, there is not a had woman in all "Caryswold." Ah, yes! I had forgotten Jory, the nurse; but she repents at the eleventh hour and sets all straight, so that although she does some pretty stobbing things, it is a mere veneer of badness. "Caryswold" is quite smoothly written, with an outburst of genuine eloquence, and an offsetting bit of weakness here and there as well. "Oh, heavens!" cries the persecuted Elinor every time she gets into a fresh box, and strangely enough, while "Oh, heaven" is a solemn invocation, "Oh, heavens!" is a vulgarity. Women say it testily when they prick their fingers with a cambric needle, or break a fractious button off their glove, but when they solemnly adjure, there is but one heaven to appeal to. Yet, for all, "Caryswold" is a strong and interesting play, and Miss Ada Ward a stronger and more interesting actress than has paced the Baldwin boards this long and many a day. BETSY B.

On the recent Saturday night that Mrs. Langtry appeared in her farewell benefit in the Theatre Royal, Edinburgh, there was present an audience of two thousand persons. At the end, the lady responded to the prolonged applause by the following speech:

I should like so much to tell you before I leave Edinburgh how grateful I am for the kind way in which you have received me—really so much more than I deserved or expected; because, of course, I am quite a novice, and all the great talent comes here from all parts of the world. I have only been on the stage a very short time—since January nineteenth, so that this makes my ninth week. Now, it is impossible to learn to act in that short time, any more than to paint a picture. I am as much surprised to find myself standing here before you as you must be to see me. I have a great deal to learn; but I shall work very, very hard, in the hope that the next time I come here I may really merit your approval. I shall remember my first visit to Edinburgh with the greatest pleasure; and, indeed, I ought to feel quite at home here, for I am half Scotch. My mother is a Scotchwoman, and was born in this town. I am very proud of it. I can only repeat my thanks, and hope that it may not be long before I come back to this beautiful Edinburgh and "bonnie Scotland."

She was the subject of an ovation the next day, at her hotel, where over a thousand people assembled. The delicate artfulness of this farewell speech will place Mrs. Langtry in an exalted position among the clever impromptu speech-makers. We use the word "impromptu" because the Scotch papers claim that merit for the speech; but to have composed extemporaneously an address containing such graceful insinuation and charming flattery, Mrs. Langtry must be gifted with forensic ability that is only equaled by her reputedly supreme self-possession.

Henry Irving is under engagement to come to America a year from next fall, and in the mean time we shall be treated, says the Sun, no doubt, to a great deal of information about his greatness as an actor, and his popularity in England. Whatever may be the estimate of Irving's quality, there can be no doubt of his success; and he has not achieved it by advertising dodges. He went on the stage at eighteen, and for ten years played in traveling companies, at first very badly. Toward the latter part of that period he began to show improvement, doing best in comic characters. His first London opportunity was as Digby Grant, in "Two Roses," and his first bit in a serious part was as Mathias in "The Bells." He soon became manager of the Lyceum Theatre, and in that position, backed by a while by capital advanced by Lady Burdette-Coutts, was able to give himself every possible advantage in the way of able support and fine scenery. His conduct in private life, too, has been such as to win the countenance of cultivated people, and it is fashionable in London to admire him.

"That the summer season is upon us in New York," says the Boston Gazette's correspondent, writing from that locality, "is proved more by last Tuesday's Herald than by the state of the thermometer. There was not a single line of amusements in the body of the paper—not even the head-line occurred. The Herald notices every sort of performance given in the city, and out of it, for that matter, so the absence of the amusement column showed that there was nothing to chronicle. Monday night is the 'first night,' so Tuesday morning's paper is a record of hirings, and I have never before, except perhaps in July, seen the record blank."

At Haverly's California Theatre next week J. K. Emmet will continue in "Fritz in Ireland." Mr. Frohman will resume the management of the Baldwin Theatre on Monday week. Between to-morrow and that date Jay Rial's "Uncle Tom's Cabin" company will hold the boards. The Bush Street Theatre is empty, although Emerson is negotiating for its lease. At the Standard, Mitchell's Surprise Party will present on Monday night a musical comedy, "My Brudder-in-law."

The auditorium of the New York Madison Square Theatre is nightly made ten degrees cooler than the air outside, so as to enable the management to keep the house open all summer. Nearly ten tons of ice a day are used in the process.

THE DIAMONDS OF THE STARS.

Fortunes which Actresses Flash Before the Public.

There are probably few New Yorkers, remarks a writer in the New York News, who do not recall the magnificent jewels worn by Kate Munroe in "Olivette" and other parts at the Casino last season. They aggregated in value something like a year's salary of the President of the United States. That busy on dit, which is ever winging its way from ear to ear, asserted that the most superb of the collection dated its presentation to the wearer from no less a personage than the heir apparent to the English throne. Another recent vocal star among us, who was credited with deriving her gems from a royal source, was Madame Ambre, who made such a failure as a member of Colonel Mapleson's aviary, and ended by running off to Paris with the tenor of her own troupe, leaving her manager and the tenor's wife to console the company whom her French leave had involved in the throes of dissolution. Previous to her coming here Madame Ambre had occupied relations which were by no means equivocal with the old King of Holland, and her departure from Europe was ascribed to the pressure brought to bear on her by her royal protector's connections. She owned a collection of jewels valued at two hundred thousand dollars, and among them were undoubtedly some of the jewels which had once adorned the Dutch crown. A specially magnificent feature of her collection was a floral necklace of diamonds, which cost alone over fifty thousand dollars. Many of these gems were left behind by Madame Ambre, in the hands of capitalists, who had advanced money to her for the prosecution of her disastrous independent season. Like that superb ruby which Lola Montez was once so fond of wearing in her abundant hair, and which is now part of the princely collection of Mrs. J. B. Haggin, the finest gems of this latter-day beauty now aid in adorning the society leaders in America.

Aimée had an abounding adoration for diamonds, and put every dollar she could save into them, except the quarter of a million francs she spent upon her Paris bourse. Her collection at one time was worth, with allowance for exaggeration, at least two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. She bought and was presented with jewels wherever she went. Some of her finest and most valuable gems were the fruits of her Brazilian tour.

Anna Louise Cary is said to own the largest and most perfect emerald in the world. It belonged to Queen Isabella, and was bought at the sale of that erratic Spaniard's jewels in Paris two years ago. It weighs twenty-three carats, and is set in a broad band of Roman gold, studded with twenty-four large diamonds. The value of the emerald alone is set at fifty thousand dollars.

From singer to circus-rider is a long descent, but it is worth making in this instance. The famous bareback rider of Paris, Madame Elise, now dead, who was a reputed daughter of the Emperor of Austria, became famous for riding in a costume in which diamonds took the place of spangles on her tarlatan skirt, and with an arched tiara of these blazing stones in her dusky hair. We have no stars in the equestrian circle here to equal her, but the collections of Madame Dockrell and other hippic artists range in value from ten dollars to fifty thousand dollars. The three largest diamonds sold at Tiffany's last year were to circus-riders and managers. Madame Selina Dolaro is the possessor of a fine collection of diamonds. The pearl of them is a necklace which encircles her throat in every part she plays with the white splendor of a serpent of electric flame. Madame Janauschek has become the owner of probably the finest collection of gems of any actress in America. Her diamonds are simply imperial in their magnificence. Among them are four which were presented to her by the Czar Nicholas of Russia and the Queen of Bavaria, and which are worth about twelve thousand dollars apiece. She owns a wonderfully beautiful set of turquoise, in which the stones number five thousand, and a set of carbuncles presented to her by a Turkish ambassador who saw her play in Venice, and which are priceless by reason of their fine quality and the uniqueness of their shapes and settings. Fanny Davenport, Clara Morris, and the other prominent actresses of our stage, all own fine and more or less valuable collections of gems.

Although actresses buy diamonds for ornament, there is always a prudential sentiment associated with the investment, too. The irregularity of their professional fortunes renders them alive to the value of an investment whose cost they can get back on an emergency. There is many a "star" who scintillates about the country during the season, whose diamonds are a better friend to her than her talent before her tour is over. Even when this emergency does not arise, diamonds are looked upon as a convenient investment. They are easy to carry, and do not deteriorate in value. "They don't eat anything" is a favorite remark in regard to them by their owners—a statement many a hotel-keeper who entertains the ambulant theatre at contract rates would doubtless like to make in application to the owners themselves.

On the third of July Ristori will play Lady Macbeth in English at the Drury Lane.

CCXXXV.—Sunday, July 2.—Bill of Fare for Six Persons.

French Vegetable Soup.
Fried Halibut, Broiled Chicken.
Potato Salad, Fried Egg Plant, Corn.
Roast Lamb, Mint Sauce.
Lettuce, French Dressing.
Raspberry Cream, Lady Fingers, Apples, Cherries, Figs, Peaches, Pears, and Apricots.

RASPBERRY CREAM.—Dissolve three-quarters of an ounce of the best isinglass, and five ounces of loaf-sugar in three-quarters of a pint of new milk, by boiling it slowly for ten minutes; strain it into a basin, and add a pint of rich cream, with the juice of three-quarters of a pint of fresh raspberries, which have been cooked with three ounces of sugar for a quarter of an hour. Strain into the mixture, and turn rapidly with an egg-beater until it begins to thicken. Dip a mould in cold water, put in the cream, and place on ice till firmly set. Turn out carefully.

We have received from F. W. Helmick, of Cincinnati, Ohio, a piece of sheet-music entitled the "Verdict March." This production is garnished with the portraits of Corkhill and Porter, the attorneys who prosecuted Giteau, Blank et al., the jury who tried him, and Cox the judge who condemned him to death. The person who wrote the "march" is one Eugene L. Blake. While there can be no question as to the necessity of hanging Giteau, there is much as to the expediency of doing it to music. We were at first surprised at the extreme vulgarity of this business, but when we reflect that it came from Cincinnati (which is in Ohio) our surprise is unwarranted.

—THIS TIME IT IS MRS. SUE S. FRACKELTON, "a native, and to the manner born," who achieves, in behalf of the Western American, a victory over foreign artists as well as those of the æsthetic East. For some years the lady, almost entirely self-taught, has devoted herself to ceramic art, especially delighting in the reproduction upon China of our beautiful California sea-mosses. Some of the lady's work in this line is of exquisite beauty; as delicate in its tracery as a spider's web, and as rich in its coloring as an Italian sun-set. At the opening of the new State Exposition Building of Wisconsin, at Milwaukee, Mrs. F. exhibited a China hanquet set of six hundred and fifty pieces, the work of many weary months, decorated and fired by her own hand; the subjects all from American nature, animate and inanimate. The work was so rapturously applauded by the press, that she was encouraged to place it in competition with the best ceramic work of New York and Cincinnati at the great Atlanta exposition of last year. It carried off all the honors—the gold medal, the silver cup, and the artists' award—each by a unanimous verdict of the appropriate jury. Last fall, at the International Exposition, held at Orizaba, Mexico, the lady achieved a like complete triumph, receiving, for the same set, the gold medal of the first class, in competition with the work of the best foreign artists in ceramics. Declining the most tempting offers of a place at the head of the National School of Ceramic Decoration in Mexico, Mrs. F. retains her studio in Milwaukee, and has opened there an art school, the attendance upon which shows that there is a field for every woman who can and will do worthy work.

Oscar Wilde ran across a lynching at Bonfouca, La. A negro assailant of a white woman had been taken out of jail by a mob, and Oscar saw the hanging from a car window. The negro was a preacher, and his wild, eloquent appeals for mercy moved the æsthetic traveler greatly, but did not affect the lynchers, who quickly suspended him from a railroad bridge.

—MESSRS. ARPAD HARASZTHY & CO. ARE the acknowledged makers of the best California champagne. Their famous "Eclipse" brand, dry and extra dry, is noted on this coast and in many of the fashionable Eastern resorts as being far superior to any of the adulterated champagnes which are sold in this country under foreign brands.

"We see that Congressman Aldrich wants the Government to spend one hundred thousand dollars in dredging the Calumet River. Please stop this nonsense at once."—Many Bullfrogs.

A Missouri judge has decided that a husband is responsible for what his wife says. If this ruling is sustained, there will not be over a dozen married men in Missouri by the end of the shooting season. —Chicago Tribune.

—THE PRESIDENT, SUPREME COURT JUDGES, and Members of Congress use German Corn Remover. 25c.

The inauguration of the St. Gothard tunnel nearly led to a squabble. Italy was offended because Switzerland sent her only fifteen tickets of invitation; but when she learned that her neighbor, Germany, had not received more, her anger was appeased.

—CORNS CAUSE MORE SUFFERING THAN NEURALGIA. German Corn Remover easily cures them. 25c. Druggists.

A woman at Columbus, Ohio, ran to a fire with her baby in its carriage, and met not the slightest accident, while three drays were upset and two wagons demolished around her.—Detroit Free Press.

—ASK YOUR DRUGGIST FOR REDDING'S RUSSIA salve. Keep it in house in case of accidents. 25 cts.

Giteau will spend the summer in Gehena. He has already secured rooms at the Hot Springs House, overlooking the lake.—Peck's Sun.

—THOUSANDS OF LADIES CHERISH GRATEFUL remembrances of the help derived from the use of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

The last time George IV. appeared in London he drove gray cobs with red morocco harness.

—AMONG THE MANY DESIRABLE RESULTS OF pure blood are an elastic step, buoyant spirits, and clear complexion. The possessor of healthy blood has his faculties at command, and enjoys a clear and quick perception, which is impossible when the blood is heavy and sluggish with impurities. Ayer's Sarsaparilla is the best blood purifier and vitalizer known.

It is all humbug, says the Texas Sittings, about tramps being lazy and not willing to exert themselves. One of them, near Marshall, chased a farmer a mile and a half with a club.

JNO. LEVY & CO.

MANUFACTURING JEWELERS,

Importers of DIAMONDS and other PRECIOUS STONES,
WATCHES, CLOCKS, and SILVERWARE,

118 SUTTER STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.

(Of the late Firm of BRAVERMAN & LEVY.)

HOUSEKEEPERS!

DO NOT SACRIFICE YOUR GOODS AT AUCTION, but STORE THEM with H. WINDEL & CO., NO. 310 STOCKTON STREET. Furniture, Pianos, Household Goods, Paintings, Trunks, etc., well taken care of. We have three large, airy, brick buildings, and no rent to pay, and can store goods very moderate. Money advanced on goods at one per cent. per month. We guarantee against damage and moths, and can give references dating back 20 years.

A CELEBRATED JAPANESE ARTIST and TWO ART EMBROIDERERS have been secured for Ichi Ban, 22 and 24 Geary Street, and can be seen daily, dressed in their native costume.

Portraits and Decorations made to order. Dresses, Handkerchiefs, etc., embroidered with simple or elaborate designs. All executed quickly and cheaply. We cordially invite the public to call and see these artists at work. ICHI BAN, 22 and 24 GEARY STREET.

The Argonaut is printed with Shattuck & Fletcher's Ink.

"Why did Joh wish that his enemy had written a book? Because the revengeful old foil master knew that the proof-reader would drive him mad."—Burdette. How Burdette must have ground his teeth when he saw the above. The intelligent compositor and the plodding proof-reader got in their work all the same. For "foil" read "boil."

—LADY READERS OF THE ARGONAUT WILL REMEMBER that the place to buy colognes, perfume, toilet soaps, brushes, sponges, cosmetics, etc., is at the elegant and well-stocked store of James G. Steele & Co., Chemists and Apothecaries, 635 Market Street, Palace Hotel, San Francisco.

A Children's Home, on the corner of Sansome and Pacific streets, was opened and dedicated on last Saturday evening. It is intended as a place of instruction for children in household duties, lessons, and religious themes, and is connected with the Young Women's Christian Association.

DR. C. T. DEANE HAS REMOVED HIS OFFICE TO 131 Post Street, between Kearny and Dupont, over Samuel's. Hours, 9.30 to 10 A. M.; 1 to 3.30 P. M.

Thomas Hardy's new novel is "Two on a Tower." If he refers to a newly-married couple, his spelling is erroneous.—Marathon Independent.

—MR. A. J. KELLEHER DESIRES TO INFORM HIS pupils that he will resume tuition on July 10th. Apply at Gray's music store, 117 Post, or at his residence, 2324 Clay Street.

Billy Emerson's greatest hope for years was to be obliged to explain to every inquiring scientist that he was not a brother of Ralph Waldo Emerson, for which both were thankful.

—MORSE HAS THE FINEST GALLERY IN THE world, 826 Market Street, (Phelan Block).

It is all very well for health journals to tell people who are restless, and unable to sleep at night, to place the head of their bed toward the north; but it does no good unless you take the baby to the other end of the house, and place his head toward the south.

—MR. LOUIS LISSER ARRIVES FROM NEW YORK on or about July 8th, and will resume the duties of his profession on July 10th.

—DR. E. O. COCHRANE, DENTIST, 850 MARKET cor. Stockton (over drug store.) Office hours, 9 to 5.

—Go to Bradley & Rulofson's, 429 Montgomery.

A LADY, FORMERLY PUPIL OF PROF. DE FILIPPE, desires a few more pupils in Spanish and French; teaches by the same method. Address M. L., box 81, Oakland, Cal.

NORTH PACIFIC COAST R. R.
FOURTH OF JULY HOLIDAYS

EXCURSION TICKETS

Will be sold on

July 1st, 2d, 3d, and 4th,

Good to Return, until Wednesday, July 5th,

From San Quentin Ferry, Market Street.

Fares for the Round Trip: Olema, $2.50; Tomales, $3.50; Howards and Duncan Mills, $4.

Tuesday, July 4th,

A SPECIAL EXCURSION TRAIN will leave San Francisco from San Quentin at 7.10 A. M. for OLEMA, TOMALES, HOWARDS, DUNCAN MILLS, and WAY STATIONS. Returning, will arrive in San Francisco at 7.30 P. M.

Tickets Good for this Day and Train Only.

Fairfax, $1; Olema, $2; Tomales, Howards, and Duncan Mills, $3.

DAVID NYE, Gen. Supt. F. B. LATHAM, Gen. Pass. & Ticket Agt.

J. C. MERRILL & CO.,
Shipping and Commission Merchants

204 and 206 California Street,

SAN FRANCISCO.

The Regular Dispatch line of Packets to Honolulu, H. I.

WM. G. ELLIOTT,
GENERAL INSURANCE AGENT,
Removed to 410 California Street,
San Francisco, Cal.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—THE CALIFORNIA SAVINGS AND LOAN SOCIETY, Northwest corner Powell and Eddy Streets. The Board of Directors have declared a dividend to Depositors at the rate of four and thirty-two one-hundredths (4 32-100) per cent. per annum on Term Deposits, and three and sixty one-hundredths (3 61-100) per cent. per annum on Ordinary Deposits, free from Federal Tax, for the half year ending June 30, 1882, payable on and after Monday, July 10, 1882.
VERNON CAMPBELL, Secretary

THE "DRESS REFORM" CORSET.
Specialty for Stout Figures, by mail, $3.00. Send waist, hip, and bust measure. Also, Shoulder Braces, Union Under Flannels, Ladies' and Children's Comfort Waists, Bustles, Hose Supporters, etc.
Send for Circular. The only Depot for these Goods.

Mrs. M. H. OBER & CO.
Boston
Dress Reform,
326 Sutter St.,
SAN FRANCISCO.

An Elegant Corset to Order for $4.

AMERICAN

BUNTING FLAGS!

A FULL ASSORTMENT of United States Regulation Sizes on hand, made of the celebrated

"STANDARD"

BUNTING. Private House Flags and Signals made to order. Bunting for sale. Send to us for prices.

G. M. JOSSELYN & CO.,
38 and 40 Market Street, S. F.

PEBBLE SPECTACLES!

MULLER'S OPTICAL DEPOT
135 Montgomery St., nr. Bush,
Opposite Occidental Hotel.
Specialty Thirty-two Years.

COMPOUND ASTIGMATIC LENSES
Mounted to Order. Two Hours Notice.
The most complicated cases of defective vision thoroughly diagnosed, free of charge.

DO NOT SACRIFICE YOUR FURNITURE, PIANOS, and HOUSEHOLD GOODS, at auction sales, while you are boarding or out of the city, but

STORE THEM,

As well as your Trunks and Paintings, with

J. H. MOTT & CO.,
647 Market St.,

Nucleus Block. Second Floor.
Large, airy brick building, with elevator. MONEY LOANED on valuable goods. Terms moderate.

BUTTERICK'S

Patterns—Summer Styles.

SEND STAMP FOR CATALOGUE.
AGENCY, 124 Post Street, San Francisco.

COMPOUND OXYGEN.
NEW TREATMENT BY INHALATION for Consumption, Asthma, Bronchitis, Dyspepsia, Catarrh, Headache, Debility, Rheumatism, Neuritis, and all Chronic and Nervous Disorders. Prepared by DR. STARKEY & PALEN, Philadelphia, Pa. Package contains all directions, and is easily sent by express, ready for USE AT HOME. H. E. MATHEWS, Forwarding Agent, 606 Montgomery street, San Francisco, Cal. Send for Free Pamphlet.

G. N. WEST'S WEST'S NEW ELECTRIC BELT.—G. N. West's Electro-Medical Belts always have excelled all other electrical appliances. They have taken the premiums at all State Fairs. This new Belt excels every other that he has invented. Cures all diseases without medicine. Price, from $5.00 to $20.00. Warranted ten years. Patronized by the representative men and leading ladies of this and other States. Address or call on C. N. WEST, 652 Market Street, San Francisco.

TABER, HARKER & Co.,
IMPORTERS AND WHOLESALE
GROCERS, 108 and 110 California St., San Francisco

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—THE GERMAN SAVINGS AND LOAN SOCIETY. For the half year ending June 30, 1882, the Board of Directors of the GERMAN SAVINGS AND LOAN SOCIETY has declared a dividend on Term Deposits at the rate of a 32-100 per cent. per annum, and on ordinary deposits at the rate of a 24-100 per cent. per annum, free from Federal Tax, payable on and after the 10th day of July, 1882.
GEORGE LEE

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

A Medieval Bachelor.

"Trewly some men there be
That lyve always in great horreure,
And sayth it goth by destinye—
To hang or wed—both hath one houre;
And whether it be! I am well sure
Hanging is better of the twaine—
Sooner done and shorter paine."

A Piscatorial Poem.

Miss Polly Wog she had dab beau
Who, on her father's skate,
Would perch himself, and wouldn't go
Until leech night was late.
Once when the moon did shiner light,
And halibut was still,
She mermaid, "I must say 'Cod-night,'
You muskallonge, dear Will."

"I'm mullet-tench-ion," sighed the beau,
"Unto the words you drop;
But, oh, why mussel lover go
Just when he's come to pop?"
"Come minnow, come," at once she cried,
"This plaice is bleak to stay."
"Whale, if the dog-fish sure is tied,"
He said, "my sole, I may."

Now Polly's father had-dock club
With most ferocious pikes,
On porpoise for to whale this hub
Bass hard dare lightning strikes.
"Don't make an oyster wake your ma—
Her herring's good, you know;
And don't chub breathe, or else your pa
Eel kill me," said the beau.

As he approach-ed the dory stoppe
As if he smelt a rat;
Then pa from out the shad-ows popped,
And fetched him there ray bat.
It was a bloater cuttle love
Quite short. The shark was great,
And sent him flying like cod dove
To flounder by the gate.

Ex-salmon him did doctors ten,
And could no sucker give,
But, when they had dolphin-ished, then
He knew hake couldn't live.
'Twas sardine deed for one so young
Turbot-tle there with death,
And hear his sturgeon sadness sung
While gasping for some breath.

Make clam-entations, lovers all,
But carp not at the fate
Of one who, when he made hake call,
Ventured into the gate.

—Detroit Free Press.

Egyptian Strategy.

In Egypt by the ancient Nile
Did France and England sit and smile,
When warned against the craft and guile
Of Cairo's subtle soldiery.

The gobbled up the customs dues,
Administered the revenues,
And gave the ministers their cues,
Exulting in their mastery.

But France and England stretched their eyes,
And glared about in great surprise,
When Egypt dropped her thin disguise,
And owned the sway of Arabi.

They bade their ships and sailors come;
But Egypt, neither deaf nor dumb,
Just snapped her fingers and her thumb
At all the solemn foolery.

Said France and England: "Wicked men,
If you will not submit, why, then
We drop the sword, and seize the pen,
To pay you for your treachery."

Then, in the early summer's heats,
In spite of all their guns and fleets,
A rain of blood in Cairo's streets
Defied their silly strategy.

So France and England both withdrew,
And ceased to farm the revenue,
Or give the poor Khedive his aid.
"Farewell, dear foes!" said Arabi.

—N. Y. Sun.

Pyrotechnic Seven Ages of Man.

All the world's a Fourth of July,
And all the men and women are but fireworks.
They have their fizzes and explosions,
And one man in his time has many stars.
At first the infant, with firecracker,
That burns the house and frightens all the women.
Then comes the pistol, when the boyish fiend
Shoots out the jackstones, marbles, junk, and nails;
Dislodges fingers; puts out people's eyes,
And maims for life a great part of his friends.
Then comes the lover, with his pulling crackers,
His mild torpedoes for the frightened girls;
And thus he plays his part.
Then comes the justice, with his pouch and gun,
Who tramps afield to shoot one little bird.
And then the soldier, with his rifled cannon,
His howitzer, petard, and bomb;
His Remington and Enfield, shot and shell,
And all the dread accoutrements of war.
And last of all, that ends this pyrotechnic history,
Comes second childhood's exhibition—
Its Roman candles, floods of colored light;
Its pin-wheels scattering fiery spray;
Its Bengal lights emitting fiery sheen,
Yet dim and shadowy in his fading sight.
Then disappears he in the realms of space,
Like some great rocket gone up to the sky
With dazzling train of many-colored fire,
His mind, his heart, his thoughts, his soul, are gone;
His body useless as a rocket-stick.

—New York Liar.

Sasperiter'n Cream.

Every little rural drug-store has a soda-water fountain,
Which simply raises ructions with a fellow's hank account.

He meets his girl at twilight, when he's coming home from biz,
And so sweetly ask her if she'd like to hear it.

—Puck.

Yours for Health
Lydia E. Pinkham

LYDIA E. PINKHAM'S VEGETABLE COMPOUND.

Is a Positive Cure

For all those Painful Complaints and Weaknesses
so common to our best female population.

A Medicine for Women. Invented by a Woman.
Prepared by a Woman.

The Greatest Medical Discovery Since the Dawn of History.

It revives the drooping spirits, invigorates and harmonizes the organic functions, gives elasticity and firmness to the step, restores the natural lustre to the eye, and plants on the pale cheek of woman the fresh roses of life's spring and early summer time.

Physicians Use It and Prescribe It Freely. It removes faintness, flatulency, destroys all craving for stimulant, and relieves weakness of the stomach.

That feeling of bearing down, causing pain, weight
and backache, is always permanently cured by its use.
For the cure of Kidney complaints of either sex
this Compound is unsurpassed.

LYDIA E. PINKHAM'S BLOOD PURIFIER
will eradicate every vestige of Humors from the Blood, and give tone and strength to the system, of man, woman or child. Insist on having it.

Both the Compound and Blood Purifier are prepared at 233 and 235 Western Avenue, Lynn, Mass. Price of either, $1. Six bottles for $5. Sent by mail in the form of pills, or of lozenges, on receipt of price, $1 per box for either. Mrs. Pinkham freely answers all letters of inquiry. Enclose 3c. stamp. Send for pamphlet.

No family should be without LYDIA E. PINKHAM'S
LIVER PILLS. They cure constipation, biliousness,
and torpidity of the liver. 25 cents per box.

Sold by all Druggists. (1)

AYER'S SARSAPARILLA, For Purifying the Blood.

This compound of the vegetable alteratives, Sarsapari-la, Dock, Stillingia, and Mandrake, with the Iodides of Potash and Iron, makes a most effective cure of complaints affecting the blood.
It purifies the blood, purges out the lurking humors in the system that undermine health and settle into troublesome disorders. Eruptions on the skin are the appearance at the surface of humors that should be expelled from the blood. Internal derangements of these same humors to some internal organ or organs, whose action they derange, and whose substance they disease and destroy. AYER'S SARSAPARILLA expels these humors from the blood. When they are gone, the disorders they produce disappear, such as Ulcerations of the Liver, Stomach, Kidneys, Lungs, Eruptions and Eruptive diseases of the Skin, Rose or Erysipelas, Pimples, Pustules,
Blotches, Boils, Tumors, Tetter
and Salt Rheum, Scald Head,
Ringworm, Ulcers and Sores, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Pain
in the Bones, Side and Head,
Female Weakness, Sterility,
Dropsy, Dyspepsia, Emaciation, and General Debility. With their departure health returns.

PREPARED BY

DR. J. C. AYER & Co., Lowell, Mass.

PRACTICAL AND ANALYTICAL CHEMISTS.

Sold by all Druggists and Dealers in Medicines.

Apollinaris

"THE QUEEN OF TABLE WATERS."

British Medical Journal.

"Apollinaris Water is an article which is produced by Nature and is not the handiwork of man; it is a Natural, and not an artificial Water."
U.S. Treasury, 28 Jan., 1882.

ANNUAL SALE, 10 MILLIONS.

Of Grocers, Druggists, & Min. Wat. Dealers.

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

FOR SALE BY

RUHL BROTHERS

522 Montgomery Street,

SAN FRANCISCO.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free
Address STINSON & Co., Portland, Me.

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free.
Address H. HALLETT & Co., Portland, Maine.

RUHL BROTHERS

AGENTS FOR THE PACIFIC COAST

522 Montgomery Street,

SAN FRANCISCO.

EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS.

ZEITSKA INSTITUTE

922 Post Street.

FRENCH, GERMAN AND ENGLISH

Day and Boarding School for young ladies and children. KINDERGARTEN.

The twentieth year of this Institute will commence July 24, 1882. MADAME B. ZEITSKA, Principal.

CALIFORNIA

MILITARY ACADEMY, AT OAKLAND, CAL.

The Nineteenth Year will begin Monday, July
17, 1882.

REV. DAVID MCCLURE, Ph. D., Principal.

HOPKINS ACADEMY, OAKLAND, CAL.

Rev. H. E. Jewett, Principal.

This institution, heretofore known as Golden Gate Academy, will open TUESDAY A. M., JULY 18, 1882. The Building and Grounds are undergoing extensive improvements. Classical, Literary, and English courses. Telegraphy taught. Boys and young men received. Send for prospectus to H. E. Jewett, Principal.

ASSESSMENTS AND DIVIDENDS.

CALIFORNIA MINING COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 10th day of June, 1882, an assessment (No. 4) of Ten Cents per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary at the office of the Company, 299 Montgomery Street, Room 23, Nevada
Block, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid
on the (thirteenth) day of July, 1882, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on Wednesday, the 16th day of August, 1882, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

C. P. GORDON, Secretary.

Office—Room 23, Nevada Block, No. 299 Montgomery

Street, San Francisco, California.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—SAN FRAN-

CISCO SAVINGS UNION, 532 California Street, corner Webb. For the half year ending with June 30, 1882, a dividend has been declared at the rate of four and thirty-two one-hundredths (4 32-100 %) per cent per annum on Term Deposits, and three and sixty one-hundredths (3 60-100 %) per annum on Ordinary Deposits, free of Federal Tax, payable on and after Wednesday, 12th July, 1882.

LOVELL WHITE, Cashier.

EXTRA QUALITY

RUBBER HOSE, BELTING AND PACKING.

CRACK-PROOF BOOTS.

GOODYEAR RUBBER CO.

R. H. PEASE JR., S. M. RUNYON, Agents,

577 and 579 Market Street, S. F.
$72 A WEEK. $12 a day at home easily made. Costly outfit free. Address TRUE & Co., Augusta, Maine.

LEGAL NOTICES.

SHERIFF'S SALE.

D. HARNEY, Plaintiff,
vs. THOMAS G. McLERAN,
et als., Defendants.

Superior Court.

No. 6399.

Late 23d District Court.

Order of Sale and Decree

of Lien.

UNDER AND BY VIRTUE OF AN

Order of Sale and Decree of Lien issued out of the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco,
State of California, on the nineteenth day of May, A. D.
1882, in the above entitled action, wherein D. Harney, the above-named plaintiff, obtained a judgment and decree of court, entitled Harney vs. Corcoran, et al., and wherein William Hollis, defendants, on the second day of April, A. D.
1879, which said judgment and decree was, on the tenth day of June, A. D. 1879, recorded in Judgment Book D., of said Twenty-third District Court, at page ninety-two;
and whereas, on December 22, 1879, a stipulation was filed herein to abide the final result in case No. 6374, of said court, entitled Harney vs. Corcoran, et al., and whereas the remittitur from the Supreme Court, in said last-named case, was on May 15, 1882, filed in said Superior Court, affirming the judgment and order therein appealed from, as appears to us of record, I am commanded to sell all that certain lot, piece, or parcel of land, situate, lying, and being in the city and county of San Francisco, State of California, and bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the north line of Fourteenth Street, distant west three hundred and ninety-one and one-half feet from the northwest corner of Fourteenth and Valencia streets, and running thence east on the north of Fourteenth Street one hundred and fifty-five and one-half feet; thence at right angles north seventy feet; thence at right angles west one hundred and forty-eight feet; thence south to a straight line, seventy feet three inches to the point of beginning.

Public notice is hereby given that on MONDAY, THE TENTH DAY OF JULY, A. D. 1882, at twelve o'clock, noon, of that day, in front of the Old City Hall, in the city and county of San Francisco, I will, in obedience to said order of sale and decree of foreclosure, sell the above-described property, or so much thereof as may be necessary to raise sufficient to satisfy said judgment, with interest and costs, etc., to the highest and best bidder for gold coin of the United States.

San Francisco, June 17, 1882.

JOHN SEDGWICK, Sheriff.

J. M. Wood, Attorney for Plaintiff.

June 17 and 24, July 1 and 8.

SHERIFF'S SALE.

D. HARNEY, Plaintiff,
vs. WILLIAM CORCORAN,
et als., Defendants.

Superior Court.

Department No. 3.

No. 6375.

Late 23d District Court.

Order of Sale and Decree

of Lien and Sale.

UNDER AND BY VIRTUE OF AN

Order of Sale and Decree of Lien and Sale, issued out of the Superior Court, Department No. 3, of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on the 17th day of May, A. D. 1882, in the above entitled action, wherein D. Harney, the above-named plaintiff, obtained a Judgment and Decree of Lien and Sale against Thomas
Kelly, George B. Knowles, A. Himmelmann, John B.
Lewis, A. W. Hanna, J. P. Dameron, Aug. Hemme,
John Tucker, William Klump, M. Kedon, John Brickett,
B. O. Devore, M. Kelly, S. F. Sinclair, T. G. McLeran, J. Agnew, J. Dunne, E. Hogan, John Henry,
M. Hayes, J. Olwell, George Clark, L. B. Williams,
Charles Main, B. Kelsey, W. Bosworth, and G. K. Porter, defendants, on the 17th day of April, A. D. 1879, which said Judgment and Decree was, on the 7th day of June, A. D. 1879, recorded in Judgment Book C, of said
23d District Court, at page 71, I am commanded to sell all that certain lot, piece, or parcel of land, situate, lying, and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the east line of Valencia Street, distant 120 feet from the northeast corner of Valencia and Kiddley Streets, and running thence north on the east line of Valencia Street 25 feet; thence at right angles east 80 feet; thence at right angles south 25 feet; thence at right angles
west 80 feet, to the point of beginning.

Public notice is hereby given that on Monday, the 17th
day of July, A. D. 1882, at 12 o'clock, noon, of that day, in front of the Old City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, I will, in obedience to said order of sale and decree of lien and sale, sell the above-described property, or so much thereof as may be necessary to raise sufficient to satisfy said judgment, with interest and costs, etc., to the highest and best bidder, for gold coin of the United States.

San Francisco, June 24, 1882.

JOHN SEDGWICK, Sheriff.

J. M. Wood, Attorney for Plaintiff.

June 24, July 1, 8, 15.

SHERIFF'S SALE.

D. HARNEY, Plaintiff,
vs. J. CALLAGHAN, et als.,
Defendants.

Superior Court.

Department No. 3.

No. 6030.

Late 23d District Court.

Order of Sale and Decree

of Lien and Sale.

UNDER AND BY VIRTUE OF AN

Order of Sale and Decree of Lien and Sale, issued out of the Superior Court, Department No. 3, of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on the 27th day of May, A. D. 1882, in the above entitled action, wherein D. Harney, the above-named plaintiff, obtained a Judgment and Decree of Lien and Sale against George K.
Porter, T. G. McLeran, Jeremiah Callaghan, Daniel Callaghan, B. F. Hilliard, Solon Pattee, W. Crane Jr., W.
B. Holcomb, R. McKean, P. McAtee, E. R. Thomson, and D. Jordan, defendants, on the 4th day of February,
A. D. 1879, which said Judgment and Decree was, on the 13th day of February A. D. 1879, recorded in Judgment
Book B, of said 23d District Court, at page 764, I am commanded to sell all that certain lot, piece, or parcel of land, situate, lying, and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the northwesterly line of Mission Street, distant 39 feet 5 inches north from the intersection of the east line of West Mission Street with the northwesterly line of Mission Street, and running thence northerly on the northwesterly line of Mission Street 27 feet and 10 inches; thence at right angles west to the east line of West Mission Street; thence south on the last-mentioned line 27 1/2 feet; thence east in a straight line to the point of beginning.

Public notice is hereby given that on Monday, the 17th
day of July, A. D. 1882, at 12 o'clock, noon, of that day, in front of the Old City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, I will, in obedience to said order of sale and decree of lien and sale, sell the above-described property, or so much thereof as may be necessary to raise sufficient to satisfy said judgment, with interest and costs, etc., to the highest and best bidder for gold coin of the United States.

San Francisco, June 24, 1882.

JOHN SEDGWICK, Sheriff.

J. M. Wood, Attorney for Plaintiff.

June 24, July 1, 8, 15.

SAMUEL P. MIDDLETON, AUCTIONEER

JOHN MIDDLETON & SON,

Stock, Real Estate, and General

AUCTIONEERS,

116 Montgomery Street,

Occidental Hotel Block, SAN FRANCISCO.

R.H. McDonald, President.
Pacific Bank
 ESTABLISHED 1863
 Capital $1,000,000
 Surplus 460,759.
 San Francisco, Cal., Jan. 1st, 1892.
 We take pleasure in presenting this our Semi-Annual Statement.

RESOURCES.

Bank Premises.....	$150,000 00
Other Real Estate.....	5,225 35
United States Bonds.....	626,977 35
Loans on Real Estate.....	134,868 00
Loans on bonds, gas, water and bank stock.....	132,198 35
Loans on other securities.....	577,413 96
Loans on personal security.....	1,106,004 27
Due from banks and bankers.....	392,457 61
Money on hand.....	398,609 34
LIABILITIES.	$3,523,844 23
Capital paid up.....	$1,000,000 00
Surplus.....	460,759 13
Due Depositors.....	1,888,655 07
Due Banks and Bankers.....	174,370 53
Dividends unpaid.....	59 50
	$3,523,844 23

R. H. McDonald, President.

NEW ENGLAND BAKING POWDER

NO Alum
Flour
Starch
Ammonia
Phosphates
Tartaric Acid

Cream Tartar and Bi-Carb. Soda

NOTHING ELSE
Newton Bros. & Co.
 SAN FRANCISCO

NATURAL CHAMPAGNE
 DRY AND EXTRA DRY

When ordering wine, don't call for "California Champagne" merely, but state the brand, "EXTRA DRY," or the brand.

Arpad Haraszthy & Co.
 530 WASHINGTON ST. S.F. CAL.

N. B.—Examine the cork.

LOUIS BRAVERMAN & CO.

(Successors to BRAVERMAN & LEVY.)

Manufacturers of FINE JEWELRY, and Importers of WATCHES, DIAMONDS, and other PRECIOUS STONES, STERLING SILVERWARE, and FRENCH CLOCKS.

Keep the best assortment and sell at LOWER PRICES than any house in this city.

119 MONTGOMERY STREET.

The Most Perfect Thing for Ease and Comfort Ever Devised.

The Self-Adjusting Hammock Chair.

THE HAMMOCK CHAIR adjusts itself to any desired position, from sitting to reclining, or vice versa, without effort, requiring no fastenings to hold it in place. The seat is of strong canvas or tapestry, which conforms to and supports the whole body, thus affording entire relaxation and ease, and absolute freedom from cramped position. To the lovers of comfort or the tired professional and business man, mechanic, or invalid, the enjoyment and perfect rest afforded makes this CHAIR worth more than it costs every week. They are adapted to the House, Office, Garden, Picnic, and Camping Parties, or wherever solid comfort is desired. They are durable and light, weighing eleven pounds, and occupying only four inches in thickness when folded. Price, $4.50, $5.00, and $8.00. Shipped free of expense to your nearest railroad or steamboat station on the Pacific Coast, on receipt of price. Liberal discount to agents.

O. J. LINCOLN,
Sole Manufacturer, Santa Cruz, Cal.

HENRY F. MILLER

PIANOS, OF BOSTON,

Are pronounced the BEST by the leading artists of the present time, and are used by them in public and private.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES mailed to any address.

WOODWORTH, SCHELL & CO.,

Sole Agents, 105 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

FIREMAN'S FUND

INSURANCE COMPANY
OF CALIFORNIA.

CAPITAL, $750,000
 ASSETS, DECEMBER 31, 1881, $1,240,000

D. J. STAPLES, President.
 ALPHEUS BULL, Vice-President.

WILLIAM J. DUTTON, Secretary.
 E. W. CARPENTER, Asst. Secretary.

AGENTS IN ALL PRINCIPAL LOCALITIES.

E. DETRICK & CO.

FLAGS! FLAGS!

TENTS, HAMMOCKS, CAMP COTS, CHAIRS,
STOOLS, AND CAMPERS' OUTFITS.

Tents let by the Week or Month. AMERICAN FLAGS, BUNTING.

5, 7 AND 9 CALIFORNIA, AND 108, 110 AND 112 MARKET STS.

C. P. SHEFFIELD. N. W. SPAULDING. J. PATTERSON

17 and 19 FREMONT ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

ROEDERER CHAMPAGNE.

NOTICE—THE TRADE AND THE PUBLIC are informed that we receive the Genuine LOUIS ROEDERER CARTE BLANCHE CHAMPAGNE direct from Mr. Louis Roederer, Reims, over his signature and Consular invoice. Each case is marked upon the side, "Macondray & Co., San Francisco," and each bottle bears the label, "Macondray & Co., Sole Agents for the Pacific Coast."

MACONDRA & CO.,
Sole Agents for the Pacific Coast.

PRICE REDUCED

FOR

SEATTLE COAL

ALL DEALERS KEEP IT.

MAIN OFFICE:
210 BATTERY STREET,
San Francisco.

DEPOTS:
Beale Street Wharf, San Francisco.
Foster's Wharf - Oakland.

J. W. EVANS,
29 Post Street, San Francisco.

ALASKA

COMMERCIAL CO.

No. 310 SANSOME STREET,

WHOLESALE DEALER IN FURS.

Department No. 9—Probate.
IN THE SUPERIOR COURT
In and for the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

In the matter of the Estate of }
WILLIAM W. JOHNSTON, }
Deceased,

NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN, THAT Monday, the seventeenth day of July, A. D. 1882, at ten o'clock A. M. of said day, and the Court Room of said Court, at the New City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, have been appointed as the time and place for proving the will of said William W. Johnston, deceased, and for hearing the application of Charles G. Johnston for the issuance to him of Letters Testamentary. Dated July 22, A. D. 1882.

By D. H. SCHINDLER, Deputy Clerk.
H. F. CRANE, Attorney for Petitioner.

J. M. LITCHFIELD & CO.

MERCHANT TAILORS,

And Dealers in Gents' Furnishing Goods,
415 MONTGOMERY STREET,
Bet. California and Sacramento San Francisco

ALLEN, MCGARY & CO.,
IMPORTERS AND WHOLESALE
Liquor Dealers. 322-324 FRONT STREET
SAN FRANCISCO

MERRY, FAULL & CO.
PROVISION PACKERS,
Importers and Dealers in Meat Product of all Descriptions.
125 & 127 CALIFORNIA STREET, SAN FRANCISCO

ART-PAINTED, PLAIN and GLAZED

TILES

For Decorations.
W. W. MONTAGUE & CO.
110 to 118 Battery Street.

CRUSHED INDIAN.

A NEW AND DELICIOUS PREPARATION
FROM CORN, FOR BREAKFAST. IT COOKS THOROUGHLY IN A FEW MINUTES.

TRY IT.
For Sale by all GROCERS.

The Argonaut.

VOL. XI. NO. 2.

SAN FRANCISCO, JULY 8, 1882.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

THE DIAMOND LENS.

An Extraordinary Story of the Wonders of the World of Microcosm.

From a very early period of my life the entire bent of my inclinations had been toward microscopic investigations. When I was not more than ten years old, a distant relative of our family, hoping to astonish my inexperience, constructed a simple microscope for me, by drilling in a disk of copper a small hole, in which a drop of pure water was sustained by capillary attraction. This very primitive apparatus, magnifying some fifty diameters, presented, it is true, only indistinct and imperfect forms, but still sufficiently wonderful to work me up to a preternatural state of excitement.

Seeing me so interested in this rude instrument, my cousin explained to me all that he knew about the principles of the microscope, related to me a few of the wonders which had been accomplished through its agency, and ended by promising to send me one regularly constructed immediately on his return to the city.

Meanwhile I was not idle. Every transparent substance that bore the slightest resemblance to a lens I eagerly seized upon, and employed in vain attempts to realize that instrument, the theory of whose construction I as yet only vaguely comprehended.

At last the promised instrument came. It was of that order known as Field's simple microscope, and had cost perhaps fifteen dollars. As far as educational purposes went, a better apparatus could not have been selected. Accompanying it was a small treatise on the microscope—its history, uses, and discoveries. I comprehended then for the first time the "Arabian Nights' Entertainments." The dull veil of ordinary existence that hung across the world seemed suddenly to roll away, and to lay bare a land of enchantments. I felt toward my companions as the seer might feel toward the ordinary masses of men. I held conversations with nature in a tongue which they could not understand. I was in daily communication with living wonders, such as they never imagined in their wildest visions. I penetrated beyond the external portal of things, and roamed through the sanctuaries. Where they beheld only a drop of rain slowly rolling down the window-glass, I saw a universe of beings animated with all the passions common to physical life, and convulsing their minute sphere with struggles as fierce and protracted as those of men. In the common spots of mold, which my mother—good housekeeper that she was—fiercely scooped away from her jam pots, there abode for me, under the name of mildew, enchanted gardens, filled with dells and avenues of the densest foliage and most astonishing verdure, while from the fantastic boughs of these microscopic forests hung strange fruits glittering with green, and silver, and gold.

Of course, like every novice, I fancied myself a discoverer. I was ignorant at the time of the thousands of acute intellects engaged in the same pursuit as myself, and with the advantage of instruments a thousand times more powerful than mine. The names of Leeuwenhoek, Williamson, Spencer, Ehrenberg, Schultz, Dujardin, Schact, and Schleiden were then entirely unknown to me, or if known, I was ignorant of their patient and wonderful researches. In every fresh specimen of cryptogamia which I placed beneath my instrument I believed that I discovered wonders of which the world was as yet ignorant. I remember well the thrill of delight and admiration that shot through me the first time that I discovered the common wheel animacule (Rotifera vulgaris) expanding and contracting its flexible spokes, and seemingly rotating through the water. Alas! as I grew older, and obtained some works treating of my favorite study, I found that I was only on the threshold of a science to the investigation of which some of the greatest men of the age were devoting their lives and intellects.

As I grew up, my parents, who saw but little likelihood of anything practical resulting from the examination of bits of moss and drops of water through a brass tube and a piece of glass, were anxious that I should choose a profession. It was their desire that I should enter the counting-house of my uncle, Ethan Blake, a prosperous merchant, who carried on business in New York. This suggestion I decisively comated. I had no taste for trade; I should only make a failure; in short, I refused to become a merchant.

But it was necessary for me to select some pursuit. My parents were staid New England people, who insisted on the necessity of labor; and therefore, although, thanks to the bequest of my poor Aunt Agatha, I should, on coming of age, inherit a small fortune, sufficient to place me above want, it was decided that, instead of waiting for this, I should act the nobler part, and employ the intervening years in rendering myself independent.

After much cogitation I complied with the wishes of my family, and selected a profession. I determined to study medicine at a New York college. This disposition of my future suited me. A removal from my relatives would enable me to dispose of my time as I pleased without fear of detection. As long as I paid my college fees, I might shirk attending the lectures if I chose.

My first step, of course, was to find suitable apartments. These I obtained after a couple of days' search—a very pretty second floor, unfurnished, containing sitting-room, bed-room, and a smaller apartment which I intended to fit up as a laboratory. I furnished my lodgings simply, but rather elegantly, and then devoted all my energies to the adornment of the temple of my worship. I visited Pike, the celebrated optician, and passed in review his splendid collection of microscopes—Field's compound, Hingham's, Spencer's, Nacher's binocular, (that founded on the principles of the stereoscope,) and at length fixed upon that form known as Spencer's Trunnion Microscope, as combining the greatest number of improvements with an almost perfect freedom from tremor. Along with this I purchased every possible accessory—draw-tubes, micrometers, camera-lucida, lever-stage, achromatic condensers, white cloud illuminators, prisms, parabolic condensers, polarizing apparatus, forceps, aquatic boxes, fishing-tubes, with a host of other articles, all of which would have been useful in the hands of an experienced microscopist, but, as I afterward discovered, were not of the slightest present value to me. It takes years of practice to know how to use a complicated microscope. The optician looked suspiciously at me as I made the wholesale purchases. He evidently was uncertain whether to set me down as some scientific celebrity or a madman. I think he inclined to the latter belief. I suppose I was mad. Every great genius is mad upon the subject in which he is greatest. The unsuccessful madman is disgraced and called a lunatic.

For a long time half my apparatus lay inactively on the shelves of my laboratory, which was now most amply furnished with every possible contrivance for facilitating my investigations. The fact was, that I did not know how to use some of my scientific implements—never having been taught microscopies—and those whose use I understood, theoretically speaking were of little avail, until by practice I could attain the necessary delicacy of handling. Still, such was the fury of my ambition, such the untiring perseverance of my experiments, that, difficult of credit as it may be, in the course of one year I became theoretically and practically an accomplished microscopist.

During this period of my labors, in which I submitted specimens of every substance that came under my observation to the action of my lenses, I became a discoverer—in a small way, it is true, for I was very young, but still a discoverer. It was I who destroyed Ehrenberg's theory that the volvox globator was an animal, and proved that his "monads" with stomachs and eyes were merely phases of the formation of a vegetable cell, and were, when they reached their mature state, incapable of the act of conjugation, or any true generative act, without which no organism rising to any stage of life higher than vegetable is said to be complete. It was I who resolved the singular problem of rotation in the cells and hairs of plants into ciliary attraction, in spite of the assertions of Mr. Wenham and others, that my explanation was the result of an optical illusion.

But notwithstanding these discoveries, laboriously and painfully made as they were, I felt dissatisfied. At every step I found myself stopped by the imperfections of my instruments. Like all active microscopists, I gave my imagination full play. Indeed, it is a common complaint against many such, that they supply the defects of their instruments with the creations of their brains. I imagined depth beyond depth in nature which the limited power of my lenses prohibited me from exploring. I lay awake at night constructing imaginary microscopes of immeasurable power, with which I seemed to pierce through all the envelopes of matter down to its original atom. How I cursed those imperfect mediums which necessity, through ignorance compelled me to use. How I longed to discover the secret of some perfect lens, whose magnifying power should be limited only by the resolvability of the object, and which at the same time should be free from spherical and chromatic aberrations, in short, from all the obstacles over which the poor microscopist finds himself continually stumbling. I felt convinced that the simple microscope, composed of a single lens of such vast yet perfect power, was possible of construction. To attempt to bring the compound microscope up to such a pitch would have been commencing at the wrong end; this latter being simply a partially successful endeavor to remedy those very defects of the simple instrument, which, if conquered, would leave nothing to be desired.

It was in this mood of mind that I became a constructive microscopist. After another year passed in this new pursuit, experimenting on every imaginable substance—glass, gems, flints, crystals, artificial crystals formed of the alloy of various vitreous metals—in short, having constructed as many varieties of lenses as Argus had eyes, I found myself precisely where I started, with nothing gained save an extensive knowledge of glass-making. I was almost dead with despair. My parents were surprised at my apparent want of progress in my medical studies, (I had not attended one lecture since my arrival in the city,) and the expenses of my mad pursuit had been so great as to embarrass me very seriously.

I was in this frame of mind one day, experimenting in my laboratory on a small diamond—that stone, from its great refracting power, having always occupied my attention more than any other—when a young Frenchman, who lived on the floor above me, and who was in the habit of occasionally visiting me, entered the room.

I think that Jules Simon was a Jew. He had many traits of the Hebrew character—a love of jewelry, of dress, and of good living. There was something mysterious about him. He always had something to sell, and yet went into excellent society. When I say sell, I should perhaps have said peddle; for his operations were generally confined to the disposal of single articles—a picture, for instance, or a rare carving in ivory, or a pair of dueling pistols, or the dress of a Mexican caballero. When I was first furnishing my rooms he paid me a visit, which ended in my purchasing an antique silver lamp, which he assured me was a Cellini—it was handsome enough even for that—and some other knick-knacks for my sitting-room. Why Simon should pursue this petty trade I never could imagine. He apparently had plenty of money.

On the present occasion, Simon entered my room in a state of considerable excitement.

"Ah! mon ami!" he cried, before I could even offer him the ordinary salutation, "it has occurred to me to be the witness of the most astonishing things in the world. I promenade myself to the house of Madame—how does the little animal—le renard—name himself in the Latin?"

"Vulpes," I answered.

"Ah! yes—Vulpes. I promenade myself to the house of Madame Vulpes."

"The spirit medium?"

"Yes, the great medium. Great heavens! what a woman!

I write on a slip of paper many of questions concerning affairs the most secret—affairs that conceal themselves in the abysses of my heart the most profound; and behold! by example! what occurs? This devil of a woman makes me replies the most truthful to all of them. She talks to me of things that I do not love to talk of to myself. What am I to think? I am fixed to the earth!"

"Am I to understand you, M. Simon, that this Mrs. Vulpes replies to questions secretly written by you, which questions related to events known only to yourself?"

"Ah! more than that, more than that," he answered, with an air of some alarm. "She related to me things—but," he added, after a pause, and suddenly changing his manner, "why occupy ourselves with these follies? It was all the biology, without doubt. It goes without saying that it has not my credence. But why are we here, mon ami? It has occurred to me to discover the most beautiful thing as you can imagine—a vase with green lizards on it, composed by the great Bernard Palissy. It is in my apartment; let us mount. I go to show it to you."

I followed Simon mechanically; but my thoughts were far from Palissy and his enameled ware, although I, like him, was seeking in the dark a great discovery. This casual mention of the spiritualist, Madame Vulpes, set me on a new track. What if this spiritualism should be really a great fact? What if, through communication with more subtle organisms than my own, I could reach at a single bound the goal, which perhaps a life of agonizing mental toil would never enable me to attain?

While purchasing the Palissy vase from my friend Simon, I was mentally arranging a visit to Madame Vulpes.

* * * * *

Two evenings after this, thanks to an arrangement by letter, and the promise of an ample fee, I found Madame Vulpes awaiting me at her residence, alone. She was a coarse-featured woman, with keen and rather cruel dark eyes, and an exceedingly sensual expression about her mouth and under jaw. She received me in perfect silence, in an apartment on the ground floor, very sparsely furnished. In the centre of the room, close to where Mrs. Vulpes sat, there was a common round mahogany table. If I had come for the purpose of sweeping her chimney, the woman could not have looked more indifferent to my appearance. There was no attempt to inspire the visitor with awe. Everything bore a simple and practical aspect. This intercourse with the spiritual world was evidently as familiar an occupation with Mrs. Vulpes as eating her dinner or riding in an omnibus.

"You come for a communication, Mr. Linley?" said the medium, in a dry, business-like tone of voice.

"By appointment—yes."

"What sort of communication do you want?—a written one?"

"Yes; I wish for a written one."

"From any particular spirit?"

"Yes."

"Have you ever known this spirit on this earth?"

"Never. He died long before I was born. I wish merely to obtain from him some information which he ought to be able to give better than any other."

"Will you seat yourself at the table, Mr. Linley," said the medium, "and place your hands upon it?"

I obeyed, Mrs. Vulpes being seated opposite to me, with her hands on the table. We remained thus for about a minute and a half, when a violent succession of raps came on the table, on the back of my chair, on the floor immediately under my feet, and even on the window-panes. Mrs. Vulpes smiled composedly.

"They are very strong to-night," she remarked. "You are fortunate." She then continued: "Will the spirits communicate with this gentleman?"

Vigorous affirmative.

"Will the particular spirit he desires to speak with communicate?"

A very confused rapping followed this question.

"I know what they mean," said Mrs. Vulpes, "herself to me; 'they wish you to write down!'" the particular spirit you desire to converse with. Is that so?" she added, speaking to her invisible guests.

That it was so was evident from the numerous affirmative responses. While this was going on, I tore a slip from my pocket-book, and scribbled a name under the table.

"Will this spirit communicate in writing with this gentleman?" asked the medium once more.

After a moment's pause, her band seemed to be seized with a violent tremor, shaking so forcibly that the table vibrated. She said that a spirit had seized her hand, and would write. I handed her some sheets of paper that were on the table, and a pencil. The latter she held loosely in her hand, which presently began to move over the paper with a singular and seemingly involuntary motion. After a few moments had elapsed, she handed me the paper, on which I found written, in a large, uncultivated hand, the words: "He is not here, but has been sent for." A pause of a minute or so now ensued, during which Mrs. Vulpes remained perfectly silent, but the raps continued at regular intervals. When the short period I mentioned had elapsed, the hand of the medium was again seized with its convulsive tremor, and she wrote, under this strange influence, a few words on the paper, which she handed to me. They were as follows:

"I am here. Question me. * LEEUWENHOEK."

I was astounded. The name was identical with that I had written beneath the table, and carefully kept concealed. Neither was it at all probable that an uncultivated woman like Mrs. Vulpes should know even the name of the great father of microscopy. It may have been biology; but this theory was soon doomed to be destroyed. I wrote on my slip—still concealing it from Mrs. Vulpes—a series of questions, which, to avoid tediousness, I shall place with the responses, in the order in which they occurred:

I.—Can the microscope be brought to perfection?

SPIRIT.—Yes.

I.—Am I destined to accomplish this great task?

SPIRIT.—You are.

I.—I wish to know how to proceed to attain this end. For the love which you bear to science, help me!

SPIRIT.—A diamond of one hundred and forty carats, submitted to electro-magnetic currents for a long period, will experience a rearrangement of its atoms inter se, and from that stone you will form the universal lens.

I.—Will great discoveries result from the use of such a lens?

SPIRIT.—So great that all that has gone before is as nothing.

I.—But the refractive power of the diamond is so immense that the image will be formed within the lens. How is that difficulty to be surmounted?

SPIRIT.—Pierce the lens through its axis, and the difficulty is obviated. The image will be formed in the pierced space, which will itself serve as a tube to look through. Now I am called. Farewell.

I can not at all describe the effect that these extraordinary communications had upon me. I felt completely bewildered. No biological theory could account for the discovery of the lens. The medium might, by means of biological rapport with my mind, have gone so far as to read my questions, and reply to them coherently. But biology could not enable her to discover that magnetic currents would so alter the crystals of the diamond as to remedy its previous defects, and admit of its being polished into a perfect lens. Some such theory may have passed through my head, it is true; but if so, I had forgotten it. In my excited condition of mind there was no course left but to become a convert, and it was in a state of the most painful nervous exaltation that I left the medium's house that evening. She accompanied me to the door, hoping that I was satisfied. The raps followed us as we went through the hall, sounding on the balusters, the flooring, and even the lintels of the door. I hastily expressed my satisfaction, and escaped hurriedly into the cool night air. I walked home with but one thought possessing me—how to obtain a diamond of the immense size required. My entire means multiplied a hundred times over would have been inadequate to its purchase. Besides, such stones are rare, and become historical. I could find such only in the regalia of Eastern or European monarchs.

* * * * *

There was a light in Simon's room as I entered my house. A vague impulse urged me to visit him. As I opened the door of his sitting-room unannounced, he was bending, with his back toward me, over a carcel lamp, apparently engaged in minutely examining some object which he held in his hands. As I entered, he started suddenly, thrust his hand into his breast pocket, and turned to me with a face crimson with confusion.

"What!" I cried, "poring over the miniature of some fair lady? Well, don't blush so much; I won't ask to see it."

Simon laughed, awkwardly enough, but made none of the negative protestations usual on such occasions. He asked me to take a seat.

"Simon," said I, "I have just come from Madame Vulpes."

This time Simon turned as white as a sheet, and seemed stupefied, as if a sudden electric shock had smitten him. He babbled some incoherent words, and went hastily to a small closet, where he usually kept his liquors. Although astonished at his emotion, I was too preoccupied with my own idea to pay much attention to anything else.

"You say truly when you call Madame Vulpes a devil of a woman," I continued. "Simon, she told me wonderful things to-night, or, rather, was the means of telling me wonderful things. Ah! if I could only get a diamond that weighed one hundred and forty carats!"

Scarcely had the sigh with which I uttered this desire died upon my lips, when Simon, with the aspect of a wild beast, glared at me savagely, and, rushing to the mantel-piece, where some foreign weapons hung on the wall, caught up a Malay creese, and brandished it furiously before him.

"No!" he cried in French, into which he always broke when excited. "No! you shall not have it! You are perfidious! You have consulted with that demon, and desire my treasure! But I will die first!"

"Not make me fear!" I uttered in a loud voice trembling with excitement, astonished me. I saw at a glance that I had accidentally trodden upon the edges of Simon's secret, whatever it was. It was necessary to reassure him.

"My dear Simon," I said, "I am entirely at a loss to know what you mean. I went to Madame Vulpes to consult with her on a scientific problem, to the solution of which I discovered that a diamond of the size I just mentioned was necessary. You were never alluded to during the evening, nor, as far as I was concerned, even thought of. What can be the meaning of this outburst? If you happen to have a set of valuable diamonds in your possession, you need fear nothing from me. The diamond which I require you could not possess; or, if you did possess it, you would not be living here."

Something in my tone must have completely reassured him; for his expression immediately changed to a sort of constrained merriment, combined, however, with a certain suspicious attention to my movements. He laughed, and said that I must bear with him; that he was at certain moments subject to a species of vertigo, which betrayed itself in incoherent speeches, and that the attacks passed off as rapidly as they came. He put his weapon aside while making this explanation, and endeavored, with some success, to assume a more cheerful air.

All this did not impose on me in the least. I was too much accustomed to analytical labors to be baffled by so flimsy a veil. I determined to probe the mystery to the bottom.

"Simon," I said, gayly, "let us forget all this over a bottle of Burgundy. I have a case of Lausseure's Clos Vougeot down stairs, fragrant with the odors and ruddy with the sunlight of the Côte d'Or. Let us have up a couple of bottles. What say you?"

"With all my heart," answered Simon, smilingly.

I produced the wine, and we seated ourselves to drink. It was of a famous vintage, that of 1848, a year when war and wine thrived together, and its pure but powerful juice seemed to impart renewed vitality to the system. By the time we had half finished the second bottle, Simon's head, which I knew was a weak one, had begun to yield, while I remained calm as ever, only that every draught seemed to send a flush of vigor through my limbs. Simon's utterance became more and more indistinct. He took to singing French chansons of a not very moral tendency. I rose suddenly from the table just at the conclusion of one of those incoherent verses, and, fixing my eyes on him with a quiet smile, said: "Simon, I have deceived you. I learned your secret this evening. You may as well be frank with me. Mrs. Vulpes, or, rather, one of her spirits, told me all."

He started with horror. His intoxication seemed for the moment to fade away, and he made a movement toward the weapon that he had a short time before laid down. I stopped him with my hand.

"Monster!" he cried, passionately, "I am ruined! What shall I do? You shall never have it! I swear by my mother!"

"I don't want it," I said; "rest secure, but be frank with me. Tell me all about it."

The drunkenness began to return. He protested with maudlin earnestness that I was entirely mistaken, that I was intoxicated; then asked me to swear eternal secrecy, and promised to disclose the mystery to me. I pledged myself, of course, to all. With an uneasy look in his eyes, and hands unsteady with drink and nervousness, he drew a small case from his breast, and opened it. Heavens! How the mild lamp-light was shivered into a thousand prismatic arrows, as it fell upon a vast rose-diamond that glittered in the case! I was no judge of diamonds, but I saw at a glance that this was a gem of rare size and purity. I looked at Simon with wonder, and—must I confess it?—with envy. How could he have obtained this treasure? In reply to my questions, I could just gather from his drunken statements (of which, I fancy, half the incoherence was affected) that he had been superintending a gang of slaves engaged in diamond-washing in Brazil; that he had seen one of them secrete a diamond, but, instead of informing his employers, had quietly watched the negro until he saw him bury his treasure; that he had dug it up, and fled with it, but that as yet he was afraid to attempt to dispose of it publicly, so valuable a gem being almost certain to attract too much attention to its owner's antecedents, and he had not been able to discover any of those obscure channels by which such matters are conveyed away safely. He added that, in accordance with oriental practice, he had named his diamond with the fanciful title of "The Eye of Morning."

While Simon was relating this to me I regarded the great diamond attentively. Never had I beheld anything so beautiful. All the glories of light ever imagined or described seemed to pulsate in its crystalline chambers. Its weight, as I learned from Simon, was exactly one hundred and forty carats. Here was an amazing coincidence. The hand of destiny seemed in it. On the very evening when the spirit of Leeuwenhoek communicates to me the great secret of the microscope, the priceless means which he directs me to employ start up within my easy reach! I determined, with the most perfect deliberation, to possess myself of Simon's diamond.

I sat opposite to him while he nodded over his glass, and calmly revolved the whole affair. I did not for an instant contemplate so foolish an act as a common theft, which would of course be discovered, or at least necessitate flight and concealment, all of which must interfere with my scientific plans. There was but one step to be taken—to kill Simon. After all, what was the life of a little peddling Jew in comparison with the interests of science? Human beings are taken every day from the condemned prisons to be experimented on by surgeons. This man Simon was by his own confession a criminal, a robber, and I believed on my soul a murderer. He deserved death quite as much as any felon condemned by the laws; why should I not, like government, contrive that his punishment should contribute to the progress of human knowledge?

The means for accomplishing everything I desired lay within my reach. There stood upon the mantel-piece a bottle half-full of French laudanum. Simon was so occupied with his diamond, which I had just restored to him, that it was an affair of no difficulty to drug his glass. In a quarter of an hour he was in a profound sleep.

I now opened his waistcoat, took the diamond from the inner pocket in which he had placed it, and removed him to the bed, on which I laid him so that his feet hung down over the edge. I had possessed myself of the Malay creese, which I held in my right hand, while with the other I discovered as accurately as I could by pulsation the exact locality of the heart. It was essential that all the aspects of his death should lead to the surmise of self-murder. I calculated the exact angle at which it was probable that the weapon, if leveled by Simon's own hand, would enter his breast; then with one powerful blow I thrust it up to the hilt in the very spot which I desired to penetrate. A convulsive thrill ran through Simon's limbs. I heard a smothered sound issue from his throat, precisely like the bursting of a large air-bubble, sent up by a diver, when it reaches the surface of the water; he turned half-round on his side, and, as if to assist my plans more effectually, his right hand, moved by some mere spasmodic impulse, clasped the handle of the creese, which it remained holding with extraordinary muscular tenacity. Beyond this there was no apparent struggle. The laudanum, I presume, paralyzed the usual nervous action. He must have died instantly.

There was yet something to be done. To make it certain that all suspicion of the act should be diverted from any inhabitant of the house to Simon himself, it was necessary that the door should be found in the morning locked on the inside. How to do this, and afterward escape myself? Not by the window; that was a physical impossibility. Besides, I was determined that the windows also should be found bolted. The solution was simple enough. I descended softly to my own room for a peculiar instrument which I had used for holding small slippery substances, such as minute spheres of glass, etc. This instrument was nothing more than a long, slender hand-vice, with a very powerful grip, and a considerable leverage, which last was accidentally owing to the shape of the handle. Nothing was simpler than, when the key was in the lock, to seize the end of its stem in this vise, through the keyhole, from the outside, and so lock the door. Previously, however, to doing this, I turned a number of papers on Simon's hearth. Suicides almost always burn papers before they destroy themselves. I also emptied some more laudanum in Simon's glass—having first removed from it all traces of wine—cleaned the other wine-glass, and brought the bottles away with me. If traces of two persons drinking had been found in the room, the question naturally would have arisen, Who was the second? Besides, the wine-bottles might have been identified as belonging to me. The laudanum I poured out to account for its presence in the stomach, in case of a post-mortem examination. The theory naturally would be that he first intended to poison himself, but, after swallowing a little of the drug, was either disgusted with its taste, or changed his mind from other motives, and chose the dagger. These arrangements made, I walked out, leaving the gas burning, locked the door with my vise, and went to bed.

Simon's death was not discovered till nearly three in the afternoon. The servant, astonished at seeing the gas burning—the light streaming on the dark landing from under the door—gave the alarm. The door was hurst open, and the neighborhood was in a fever of excitement.

There was an inquest; but no clew to his death beyond that of suicide could be obtained. Curiously enough, he had made several speeches to his friends the preceding week that seemed to point to self-destruction. One gentleman swore that Simon had said in his presence that he "was tired of life." His landlord affirmed that Simon, when paying his last month's rent, remarked that he "should not pay him rent much longer." All the other evidence corresponded—the door locked inside, the position of the corpse, the burnt papers. As I anticipated, no one knew of the possession of the diamond by Simon, so that no motive was suggested for his murder. The jury, after a prolonged examination, brought in the usual verdict, and the neighborhood once more settled down into its accustomed quiet.

* * * * *

The three months succeeding Simon's catastrophe I devoted night and day to my diamond lens. I had constructed a vast galvanic battery, composed of nearly two thousand pairs of plates—a higher power I dared not use, lest the diamond should be calcined. By means of this enormous engine I was enabled to send a powerful current of electricity continually through my great diamond, which it seemed to me gained in lustre every day. At the expiration of a month I commenced the grinding and polishing of the lens—a work of intense toil and exquisite delicacy. The great density of the stone, and the care required to be taken with the curvatures of the surfaces of the lens, rendered the labor the severest and most harassing that I had yet undergone.

At last the eventful moment came; the lens was completed. I stood trembling on the threshold of new worlds. I had the realization of Alexander's famous wish before me. The lens lay on the table, ready to be placed upon its platform. My hand fairly shook as I enveloped a drop of water with a thin coating of oil of turpentine, preparatory to its examination, a process necessary in order to prevent the rapid evaporation of the water. I now placed the drop on a thin slip of glass under the lens, and throwing upon it, by the combined aid of a prism and a mirror, a powerful stream of light, I approached my eye to the minute hole drilled through the axis of the lens. For an instant I saw nothing save what seemed to be an illuminated chaos, a vast luminous abyss. A pure white light, cloudless and serene, and seemingly limitless as space itself, was my first impression. Gently, and with the greatest care, I depressed the lens a few hair's-breadths. The wondrous illumination still continued, but as the lens approached the object a scene of indescribable beauty was unfolded to my view.

I seemed to gaze upon a vast space, the limits of which extended far beyond my vision. An atmosphere of magical luminousness permeated the entire field of view. I was amazed to see no trace of animalculous life. Not a living thing, apparently, inhabited that dazzling expanse. I comprehended instantly that, by the wondrous power of my lens, I had penetrated beyond the grosser particles of aqueous matter, beyond the realms of infusoria and protozoa, down to the original gaseous globule, into whose luminous interior I was gazing, as into an almost boundless dome filled with a supernatural radiance.

It was, however, no brilliant void into which I looked. On every side I beheld beautiful inorganic forms of unknown texture, and colored with the most enchanting hues. These forms presented the appearance of what might be called, for want of a more specific definition, foliated clouds of the highest rarity; that is, they undulated and broke into vegetable formations, and were tinged with splendors compared with which the gilding of our autumn woodlands is as dross compared with gold. Far away into the illimitable distance stretched long avenues of these gaseous forests, dimly transparent, and painted with prismatic hues of unimaginable brilliancy. The pendant branches waved along the fluid glades until every vista seemed to break through half-lucent ranks of many-colored drooping silken pennons. What seemed to be either fruits or flowers, pied with a thousand hues, lustrous, and ever-varying, bubbled from the crowns of this fairy foliage. No hills, no lakes, no rivers, no forms, animate or inanimate, were to be seen, save those vast aërial copes that floated serenely in the luminous stillness, with leaves, and fruits, and flowers, gleaming with unknown fires, unrealizable by mere imagination.

While I was speculating on the singular arrangements of the internal economy of nature with which she so frequently splinters into atoms our most compact theories, I thought I beheld a form moving slowly through the glades of one of the prismatic forests. I looked more attentively, and found that I was not mistaken. Words can not depict the anxiety with which I awaited the nearer approach of this mysterious object. Was it merely some inanimate substance, held in suspense in the attenuated atmosphere of the globe? or was it an animal endowed with vitality and motion? It approached, flitting behind the gauzy, colored veils of cloud-foliage, for seconds dimly revealed, then vanishing. At last the violet pennons that trailed nearest to me vibrated; they were gently pushed aside, and the form floated out into the broad light.

It was a female human shape. When I say human, I mean it possessed the outlines of humanity; but there the analogy ends. Its adorable beauty lifted it illimitable heights beyond the loveliest daughter of Adam.

I can not, I dare not, attempt to inventory the charms of this divine revelation of perfect beauty. Those eyes of mystic violet, dewy and serene, evade my words. Her long, lustrous hair, following her glorious head in a golden wake, like the track sown in the heavens by a falling star, seems to quench my most hurning phrases with its splendors.

She swept out from between the rainbow-curtains of the cloud-trees into the broad sea of light that lay beyond. Her motions were those of some graceful naiad, cleaving, by a mere effort of her will, the clear, unruddied waters that fill the chambers of the sea. She floated forth with the serene grace of a frail bubble ascending through the still atmosphere of a June day. The perfect roundness of her limbs formed suave and enchanting curves. What cared I if I had waded to the portal of this wonder through another's blood? I would have given my own to enjoy one such moment of intoxication and delight.

Breathless with gazing on this lovely wonder, and forgetful for an instant of everything save her presence, I withdrew my eye from the microscope eagerly—alas! As my gaze fell on the thin slide that lay beneath my instrument, the bright light from mirror and from prism sparkled on a colorless drop of water. There, in that tiny bead of dew, this beautiful being was forever imprisoned. The planet Neptune was not more distant from me than she. I hastened once more to apply my eye to the microscope.

Gracilia (let me now call her by that name which I subsequently bestowed on her) had changed her position. She had again approached the wondrous forest, and was gazing upwards. The suppleness of her motions sent a thrill of delight through my frame; my heart beat madly as she turned her beautiful eyes in the direction of the spot in which I stood. What would I not have given to have had the power to precipitate myself into that luminous ocean, and float with her through those groves of purple and gold! While I was thus breathlessly following her every movement, she suddenly started, seemed to listen for a moment, and then cleaving the brilliant ether in which she was floating, like a flash of light pierced through the opaline forest, and disappeared.

Instantly a series of the most singular sensations attacked me. It seemed as if I had suddenly gone blind. The luminous sphere was still before me, but my daylight had vanished. The agony of my sensations as I arrived at this conclusion startled me. I tried to reject the conviction that my reason forced upon me. I battled against the fatal conclusion, but in vain. It was so. I had no escape from it. I loved an animalcule!

It is true that, thanks to the marvelous power of my microscope, she appeared of human proportions. Instead of presenting the revolting aspect of the coarser creatures, that live, and struggle, and die in the more easily resolvable portions of the water-drop, she was fair, and delicate, and of surpassing beauty. But of what account was all that? Every time that my eye was withdrawn from the instrument, it fell on a miserable drop of water, within which, I must be content to know, dwelt all that could make my life lovely.

Could she but see me once! Could I for one moment pierce the mystical walls that so inexorably rose to separate us, and whisper all that filled my soul, I might consent to be satisfied for the rest of my life with the knowledge of her remote sympathy.

But it could not be. No invention of which human intellect was capable could break down the barriers that nature had erected. I might feast my soul upon her wondrous beauty, yet she must always remain ignorant of the adoring eyes that day and night gazed upon her, and, even when closed, beheld her in dreams. With a bitter cry of anguish I fled from the room, and, flinging myself on my bed, sobbed myself to sleep like a child.

I rose the next morning almost at daybreak, and rushed to my microscope. I trembled as I sought the luminous world in miniature that contained my all. Gracilia was there. I had left the gas-lamp, surrounded by its moderators, burning when I went to bed the night before. I found the sylph bathing, as it were, with an expression of pleasure animating her features, in the brilliant light which surrounded her. She tossed her lustrous golden hair over her shoulders with innocent coquetry. She lay at full length in the transparent medium, in which she supported herself with ease, and gambolled with the enchanting grace that the nymph Salmacis might have exhibited when she sought to conquer the modest Hermaphroditus. I tried an experiment to satisfy myself if her powers of reflection were developed. I lessened the lamp-light considerably. By the dim light that remained I could see an expression of pain flit across her face. She looked upward suddenly, and her brows contracted. I flooded the stage of the microscope again with a full stream of light, and her whole expression changed. She sprang forward like some substance deprived of weight. Her eyes sparkled and her lips moved. Ah! if science had only the means of conducting and reduplicating sounds, as it does the rays of light, what carols of happiness would then have entered my ears! what jubilant hymns to Adonais would have thrilled the illumined air!

How long this worship of my strange divinity went on thus I scarcely know. I lost all note of time. All day, from early dawn and far into the night, I was to be found peering through that wonderful lens. I saw no one, went nowhere, and scarce allowed myself sufficient time for meals. My whole life was absorbed in contemplation as rapt as that of any of the Romish saints. Every hour that I gazed upon the divine form strengthened my passion—a passion that was always overshadowed by the maddening conviction that, although I could gaze on her at will, she never, never could behold me.

At length I grew so pale and emaciated, from want of rest and continual brooding over my insane love and its cruel conditions, that I determined to make some effort to wean myself from it. "Come," I said, "this is at best but a fantasy. Your imagination has bestowed on Gracilia charms which in reality she does not possess. Seclusion from female society has produced this morbid condition of mind. Compare her with the beautiful women of your own world, and this false enchantment will vanish."

I looked over the newspapers by chance. There I beheld the advertisement of a celebrated danseuse who appeared nightly at Niblo's. The Signorina Caradolce had the reputation of being the most beautiful as well as the most graceful woman on the stage. I instantly dressed, and went to the theatre.

The curtain drew up. The usual semi-circle of fairies in white muslin were standing on the right toe around the enameled flower-hank of green canvas on which the belated prince was sleeping. Suddenly a flute is heard. The fairies start. The trees open, the fairies all stand on the left toe, and the queen enters. It was the signorina. She bounded forward amid thunders of applause, and lighting on one foot, remained poised in the air. Heavens! was this the great enchantress that had drawn monarchs at her chariot-wheels? Those heavy, muscular limbs, those thick ankles, those cavernous eyes, that stereotyped smile, those crudely-painted cheeks! Where were the vermeil blooms, the liquid, expressive eyes, the harmonious limbs of Gracilia?

The signorina danced. What gross, discordant movements! The play of her limbs was all false and artificial. Her bounds were painful athletic efforts; her poses were angular, and distressed the eye. I could bear it no longer; with an exclamation of disgust that drew every eye upon me, I rose from my seat in the very middle of the signorina's pas de fascination, and abruptly quitted the house.

I hastened home to feast my eyes once more on the lovely form of my sylph. I felt that henceforth to combat this passion would be impossible. I applied my eye to the lens. Gracilia was there—but what could have happened? Some terrible change seemed to have taken place during my absence. Some secret grief seemed to cloud the lovely features of her I gazed upon. Her face had grown thin and haggard; her limbs trailed heavily; the wondrous lustre of her golden hair had faded. She was ill!—ill, and I could not assist her! I believe at that moment I would have gladly forfeited all claims to my human birthright if I could only have been dwarfed to the size of an animalcule, and permitted to console her from whom fate had forever divided me.

I racked my brain for the solution of this mystery. What was it that afflicted the sylph? She seemed to suffer intense pain. Her features contracted, and she even writhed as if with some internal agony. The wondrous forests appeared also to have lost half their beauty. Their hues were dim, and in some places faded away altogether. I watched her with a breaking heart, and she seemed absolutely to wither away under my very eye. Suddenly I remembered that I had not looked at the water-drop for several days. In fact, I hated to see it; for it reminded me of the natural barrier between Gracilia and myself. I hurriedly looked down on the stage of the microscope. The slide was still there—but, great heavens! the water-drop had vanished! The awful truth hurt upon me; it had evaporated, until it had become so minute as to be invisible to the naked eye; I had been gazing on its last atom, the one that contained Gracilia—and she was dying!

I rushed again to the front of the lens, and looked through. Alas! the last agony had seized her. The rainbow-hued forests had all melted away, and Gracilia lay struggling feebly in what seemed to be a spot of dim light. Ah! the sight was horrible; the limbs once so round and lovely shriveling up into nothing; the eyes—those eyes that shone like heaven—being quenched into black dust; the lustrous golden hair now lank and discolored. The last throes came. I beheld that final struggle of the blackening form—and I fainted.

When I awoke out of a trance of many hours, I found myself lying amid the wreck of my instrument, myself as shattered in mind and body as it. I crawled feebly to my bed, from which I did not rise for months.

They say now that I am mad; but they are mistaken. I am poor, for I have neither the heart nor the will to work; all my money is spent, and I live on charity. Young men's associations that love a joke invite me to lecture on optics before them, for which they pay me, and laugh at me while I lecture. "Linley, the mad microscopist," is the name I go by. I suppose I talk incoherently while I lecture. Who could talk sense when his brain is haunted by such ghastly memories, while ever and anon among the shapes of death I behold the radiant form of my lost Gracilia!—From the Works of Fitz-James O'Brien.

LOST FOR LOVE.

By Joseph Medill, the Chicago "Tribune" Novelist.

CHAPTER I.—FROM A RACE THAT KILLS.

"So, Constance has given him the shake?"

"Yes."

"Tis well the Lady Gertrude hath not heard of this, else were it better for Reginald that the broad demesne o'er which he rules so haughtily held lightly in its grass-covered hosom his pallid corse. The proud, vindictive spirit of the Mulcaheys will not brook an insult, and, by my halidom, 'twere well for the young lord of Tompkinsville that he wear a steel corselet o'er his perjured heart this night, ere the steel-shod hoofs of his palfrey are heard crossing the draw-bridge that leads to the Castle Mahoney. Mark you this, Wilfred, 'tis not a light offense that one, e'en though he be rich, and young, and handsome, step in between a Mulcahey and the one he loves."

CHAPTER II.—FOR A YEAR AND A DAY.

It was Miriam McCarthy, eighth Duchess of Connemara, who spoke these words, and Wilfred O'Brien gazed at her with a sad earnestness as she leaned gracefully over the back-yard fence, her sunny countenance flecked here and there by a dash of soap-suds, whose delicate whiteness brought out in bold relief the vivid colors of her roseate complexion. Wilfred was a pale, intellectual youth, and prided himself on his ancestry. Once he had said to the Jones boy, "I am the descendant of a noble race. The blood of three kings flows in my veins." But the Jones boy had only laughed in his coarse, brutal way, and replied that some day a man would come along with a flush, and capture the three kings. Wilfred had brooded over this and other evidences of the barbarism that was continually outcropping in the lives of the poor, plebeian Americans whom he was compelled sometimes to meet, and his naturally sunny disposition had become so soured that he would often put down the hood and mutter strange oaths to himself, taking no heed of aught that was passing in the busy world around him, until a chunk of plaster from the hand of the head bricklayer flew merrily in his direction, and he hastened to relieve the Duke of Galway, who should have been two places below him on the ladder. He loved Miriam McCarthy with a wild, passionate, soul-melting love that, like the mighty glacier of the Alps, bore on its outward surface no indication of the tremendous force within. Two years ago she had first seen him as he walked with his proud, County Antrim stride along the streets amid the blare of trumpets, the rattle of drums, and the graceful and fiery prancing of the temporarily-off-duty omnibus horses as the United Sons of Hibernia swept with stately grace past her ancestral home on the avenue. "I do not care," she said, softly, to herself, blushing as she spoke, "if he has got his grandfather's plug hat on; to me he is all that is noble, and manly, and pure, and good."

Two weeks later they had plighted their troth, and were now looking forward with all the rosy hopefulness of youth to the halcyon days when they would be forever bound together by the holy tie of matrimony, and a dimpled babe coo merrily forth its dulcet cries when the colic came like a thief in the night, and the paregoric bottle had vanished into the deep mystery of the Hereafter.

CHAPTER III.—THE RIVAL'S REWARD.

"Are you going to the wake this evening?"

It was thus that Pizarro McGinness, the young Earl of Ballyhooley, spoke to Miriam McCarthy two hours after the above conversation had taken place.

"Who's the corpse?" asked Miriam, a bright smile illumining her features at the thought of the unexpected society event which had come to her.

"Cecil Clancarty," replied Pizarro.

Miriam's heart beat a great thro. "So then," she thought, "this proud beauty who won my brother's love two summers ago, only to cast it aside when the picnic season was over as carelessly as papa slings his dinner-pail into the corner when he returns in the gloaming from the horse-railway barns, is dead. She did not care, when my golden-haired Rupert came home full as a tick, and carefully placed his boots on the étage before retiring. The poor boy's heart was breaking for love of her, but she laughed his suit to scorn; and now she has died amid all her follies, and sins, and six-button kid gloves." Then, mastering the emotion which had momentarily almost overcome her, Miriam turned to Pizarro and asked: "What happened to her?"

"Aneurism of the heart, I believe," was the reply.

"You don't say so!" exclaimed Miriam. "I always said she would kill herself some day, the way she powdered and painted."

"Well," said the young man, a trifle impatiently, "will you be there to-night?"

"Yes, I'll come."

"And may I escort you home?"

"I will see you later on that point," was the witty response; and with a light, merry ha-ha-villain-I-scorn-your-proffered-suit laugh on her lips, Miriam sprang lightly from the asb-barrel on which she was seated, and began to shoo the geese out of the front yard.

CHAPTER IV.—EVEN TO DEATH.

"I can not allow you to go home with me, Mr. McGinness," said Miriam, as she left the wake.

"Why not?"

"Because my betrothed, Mr. O'Brien, has told me that you are lacking in the savoir vivre which every truly cultured gentleman should possess; in other words, that you are a 'far-down.'"

"If I had him here," hissed the young man through his clenched teeth, "methinks my wealth of box-toed boot would toy with his custom-made pants awhile."

"Would it, indeed?" said a voice from the steps of a neighboring sour-mash emporium. "Then defend yourself as best you may."

Each man spat on his hands, and sailed in. As they rolled around on the side-walk, Miriam shrank in terror to the side of the building. The men fought as only those nerved by desperation can fight. Suddenly they disappeared from view, a dull thud being the only clew to their whereabouts. One glance, and the girl saw all.

They had fallen through a coal-hole.

SOCIETY.

Notes and Gossip.

Mr. and Mrs. Horace Davis, who have been at the Calaveras Big Trees since the middle of June, will leave for home next week. Hon. Leland Stanford returned from New York on Monday last. Mrs. Captain Goodall, accompanied by Mrs. Major Hayden McLellan, of Los Angeles, is spending a few weeks at Pacific Grove. Captain and Mrs. Newland and their three daughters, of Oakland, are at Lake Tahoe. Mrs. Theodore Tracy, accompanied by her youngest son, is visiting friends at Portland, Oregon. Mrs. E. L. G. Steele, of Oakland, is at the Calaveras Big Trees. Mrs. Jennie Burnett is visiting her mother in Sacramento. Mr. and Mrs. E. S. Pillsbury and daughter, who lately spent a week or two at the Calaveras Grove, have been at the Yosemite for the past eight or ten days. Mrs. Alice Driggs is visiting in Sacramento. Mr. and Mrs. E. O. F. Hastings, who have been spending the past two weeks at the Yosemite and at the Mariposa and Calaveras groves, returned home a day or two ago. Mrs. E. B. Crocker and Miss Amy, her daughter, after a year's sojourn abroad, are back again home at Sacramento. Mr. and Mrs. Charles Crocker, Miss Hattie Crocker, and William H. Crocker, sail from New York for Liverpool to-day. Miss Minnie Peterson, of Sacramento, who has been visiting in the East, returned home a few days ago. Miss Mamie Wiseman, of Sacramento, is at Santa Cruz. Mr. and Mrs. Peter Decker and Miss Decker, of Marysville, are in New York. Mrs. J. H. Carroll and the Misses Carroll, of Sacramento, are at Monterey; in a day or two they will go to Howell Mountain to stay until August. Robert Potts, of the navy, and family, arrived here from the East a few days ago. Mrs. F. A. McDougal and daughter, of Los Angeles, are at the Lick, where they will remain for a month. Mrs. G. L. Curtis, of Oakland, is visiting friends in Sacramento. Mr. and Mrs. Thomas R. Bard, of Ventura, are at Tahoe. Mrs. A. F. Grant, of Healdsburg, is at the Grand. Mrs. N. Greene Curtis, of Sacramento, has returned from her Eastern trip. Miss Hattie Rice and Miss Barrows are at Mount Shasta. Miss Susie Russell, of Sacramento, has been visiting Miss Sue Wilkins, of Colusa. Mr. and Mrs. Charles N. Shaw, of the Palace, are contemplating a trip to Monterey. Miss Sadie Jones and Mrs. Nellie Warner, of Sacramento, are at Santa Cruz. Mr. and Mrs. John Taylor and daughters are at the McCloud River. Mrs. S. D. Hovey has been spending a few days at Santa Monica. Hon. B. B. Redding, W. E. Brown, President Reid, of the University, Governor Perkins, ex-Governor Booth, Albert Gallatin, Dr. Stebbins, and Rev. Mr. Barrows, who have been at the McCloud River, fishing, are expected to return to-day. C. F. Fargo and the Misses Fargo are at Santa Monica. Mrs. J. P. Carothers and Miss Carothers, of Oakland, returned from the East on Sunday last. C. L. Bowman, C. Blockinger, and H. Knox, U. S. N., were at the Baldwin on Sunday last. W. R. Ahern, U. S. A., was at the Palace on Sunday and Monday last. Mr. and Mrs. S. W. Holladay and daughter have returned to New York from Washington and Baltimore. Mr. and Mrs. Samuel M. Wilson, who are now in New York, will leave for home in a week or two. Miss Mabel Durkin is at Santa Cruz. Mr. and Mrs. J. F. Sloan, who were married in San Leandro on the twenty-third ult., and subsequently enjoyed their honeymoon at Monterey, have returned and taken up their residence in this city. Rev. Dr. Platt is contemplating an Eastern and Southern trip, and a return with Mrs. Platt, who has been visiting in the East several months, early in October next. Mrs. Pay-Director Schenck entertained a number of the officers of the Iroquois, at dinner on Thursday last; an evening before Mrs. Schenck gave a "Southern tea" to a number of ladies and gentlemen. Mr. and Mrs. Doyle are at Santa Cruz. Mrs. Joseph Austin is at the Geysers. Mr. and Mrs. James Phelan are at Santa Cruz. Mrs. Senator Fair and family have returned from the Geysers. Mrs. Edward Martin is visiting her brother, Hon. John G. Downey, at Los Angeles. Miss Minnie Mizner, of Benicia, who has been in the Eastern States on a visit since last autumn, will leave for home on or about the first of August. Mr. and Mrs. Peter Donahue and Miss Donahue have returned from the Geysers. Mr. Joseph Donahue and his party of ten, who left here for the Yosemite and Big Trees on the twenty-sixth ultimo, have returned. Miss Ella Bovee is sojourning at Santa Cruz. Mrs. Judge E. D. Wheeler is at Etna Springs. Mr. J. P. Hoge and family have been spending some time at Etna Springs. Mrs. Colonel Withington has returned from San Mateo, where she had been visiting the Misses Corbett. Mrs. and Miss Daingerfield are at Etna Springs. Bishop and Mrs. Kip will be guests of Mr. and Mrs. William Booth during their brief sojourn in Alameda. Mrs. Lissak is ruralizing in Sonoma County. Rev. S. G. Lines, who lately resigned the pastorate of St. Luke's Episcopal Church, was very pleasantly entertained by Mr. and Mrs. C. W. Whitney, at their residence, corner of Octavia Street and Pacific Avenue, on Thursday evening last. Lieutenant Mason, U. S. N., who left here with his wife about eight months ago for Annapolis, Maryland, is now in Washington on special duty. General Rufus Saxton, U. S. A., and Mrs. Saxton arrived here from the East a few days ago. Miss Mary Meares has returned from her short trip to the southern part of the State. Mrs. Matthew Crooks and her two daughters, the Misses Calla and Ida Crooks, who have been spending some months in New York and elsewhere in the East, were present at the late graduation bop at West Point. Jerome B. Lincoln Jr. and George Hooker are in New York. Mr. and Mrs. Henry S. Crocker are at Coney Island for a few days. Miss Maggie Randolph spent the Fourth with Mrs. Lillie Coit, at Larkmead. Ormond Lissak, a son of A. H. Lissak, stood number eight in a class of thirty-eight at the last West Point graduating exercises. Rev. Doctor Scott and Mrs. Scott, after a month's recreation in the country, have returned to the city. Miss Crockett is visiting Mrs. Pay-Director Schenck. O. F. Giffin and family have been visiting the Geysers. Mrs. General Barnes has left the Palace and gone to housekeeping at No. 821 Sutter Street. Mrs. William M. Gwin, after the holiday rush is over, will go to Monterey with a number of ladies, and will return until the middle of August. After their arrival Mr. and Mrs. Charles Miller and daughters will go to Tahoe for a few weeks. Mrs. George Hearst, who has lately arrived from Europe, and who was not only present at the marriage of Sir Sidney Waterlow and Miss Maggie Hamilton, but who accompanied Miss Hamilton to the scene of the wedding as her friend, says that Mrs. Waterlow has thirty-six servants; and she thinks that it must make the genial, rollicking California girl smile sometimes as the platoons of lackeys in livery respond to her every summons with systematic bendings, and fling "your ladyship" at her a hundred times a day. If Mrs. W. was not really a Cinderella among the society girls of San Francisco, her foot has exactly fitted the magic slipper, and a golden one at that. Miss Mamie Grayson is at Glenwood. Miss Fannie Boruck is enjoying the pastoral scenes of Marin County. Mrs. B. B. Redding, after having been entertained by Mrs. C. P. Huntington in New York, returned to Boston a couple of weeks ago, and is recreating "away down in Maine" at present. Miss Hattie Appell is not yet surfeited with Santa Cruz. Mrs. William B. Brown and the Misses Brown entertained a number of their friends at their summer place at St. Helena, on the evening of the Fourth; what with fireworks and the flashing eyes of pretty girls, the display of pyrotechnics was a beautiful and an animated one. On Saturday last Mr. Allen Knight, of the London and San Francisco Bank, and Miss Lillie Miller, of Oakland, were joined in marriage at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. A. P. Redding, and shortly after the ceremony left for Kellogg, where their honeymoon is to be enjoyed. Mr. and Mrs. D. O. Mills, accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. Whitelaw Reid, arrived here from New York a few days ago. D. O. Mills Jr. and his beautiful wife, after their return from Europe, and a short visit to Newport, will leave for the Pacific Coast, and join the family group at Milbrae, in about two months or less. Miss Belle Garvey is at Santa Cruz. Mr. and Mrs. A. P. Redding celebrated the Fourth at Kellogg's; also, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Cook. Mr. and Mrs. John Cheny and the two Misses Cheny spent the Fourth at Santa Cruz. Major George W. Reed and Miss Lillie L. Bonte will be married at Berkeley, on Thursday, August 3d. Lieutenant C. P. Howell, U. S. N., left for the East a few days ago. Colonel and Mrs. Smedburg have returned from Santa Cruz. Miss Nannie Crane, of Oakland, who was considered one of the prettiest of the pretty girls at Monterey last summer, is at Santa Cruz. The genial Paymaster McDaniel, of the Wachusett, who has been at the Palace for three or four weeks, has returned to his vessel at Sitka. Mrs. A. A. Van Voorhies and her daughter, Miss Katie Van Voorhies, of Sacramento, have been spending a few weeks at the seashore near Santa Cruz. Commander Coffin, U. S. N., has been visiting his family, who are spending the summer at Soda Bay. Mr. and Mrs. Selfridge have returned from their country jaunt. Downey Harvey came up from Los Angeles a few days ago, on pleasure and business combined. Mrs. C. T. Hopkins, of Oakland, has returned from Monterey. Miss Hutchinson has returned from the Yosemite. Mr. Bliss Paxon, of this city, and Miss Bessie Emerson, of Healdsburg, will be married at the summer residence of Mrs. John Paxon, near Healdsburg, on the twenty-sixth. The marriage of William Moser Jr., of New York, and Miss Minnie Fox, of this city, will take place in a few days. Mrs. Lieutenant Greeley, wife of the Arctic explorer now taking meteorological observations in Franklin Bay, has been visiting friends in this city, and went to Soda Bay on Wednesday last to stay until September. George Graff, of the Ranger, has been at the Baldwin most of the week. B. T. Walling and G. H. Stafford, U. S. N., are at the Occidental. F. Palfrey, U. S. A., arrived here from the East on Tuesday last. Mr. and Mrs. D. M. Delmas have gone to Europe, to remain away until October. Miss Susie Geller, of Los Angeles, is visiting a married sister in this city. Mrs. Captain Forney, who has been residing in Oakland for nearly two years, has moved to San Francisco. D. O. Lewis, U. S. N., and Mrs. Lewis are at the Galindo Hotel, Oakland. Mrs. H. B. Francis is at Pescadero. Miss Jennie Clark is at the Big Trees. Mr. and Mrs. George S. Evans are at Santa Cruz. Miss Huhbell and Miss Marston, of San Diego, are visiting this city. Miss Alice White, of Oakland, is visiting in Sacramento. Miss May Stanley, of Sacramento, is visiting friends in Monterey County. Mrs. Peterson, of Sacramento, is visiting friends in this city. Mr. and Mrs. A. K. Chase, of Oakland, have returned from Etna Springs. Mrs. James Robinson, of Redwood, has been in the city during the week. Mr. and Mrs. E. A. Davenport, Mr. Redding, Frank Comins, Leon Smith, and W. Hoehn have returned from Weber Lake with a splendid catch. Mr. and Mrs. A. P. Redding, Mr. and Mrs. Al. Knight, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Cook, Henry Reddington, and James Baker have returned from Howell Mountain. Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Wilcutt have returned from the Yosemite. Mrs. Congressman Page has already taken up her residence at the Grand Union, Saratoga. Mr. and Mrs. Charles Crocker and family spent the Fourth at Long Branch, and during the day Mr. C. telegraphed to his friends at the Del Monte that he was with them in spirit. Mr. and Mrs. Willard V. Huntington and party of friends have gone to the Geysers to spend a few days. Mr. and Mrs. D. O. Mills and Mr. and Mrs. Whitelaw Reid contemplate a visit to Monterey. Mr. and Mrs. Callingham celebrated the Fourth in search of rural felicity in the vicinity of Hayward's. Mr. and Mrs. George R. Sanderson have returned from Southern California. J. W. Mackey, of the Bonanza trio, arrived here to-day. J. H. Boalt, wife and daughter, and Mr. and Mrs. Osborn are summering at Lake Tahoe. Mr. and Mrs. Towne, Mr. and Mrs. Shaw, Captain and Mrs. Moore, Henry and Mrs. Wetherbee, and a number of young society ladies held a forest party in the Alameda Cañon on July fourth. General Stoneman came up from his orange groves yesterday, and is at the Palace. Captain and Mrs. J. T. Wright, of Oakland, who have been in the Eastern cities for the past five or six months, returned home on Thursday last, and will soon go to Monterey. General Kautz, of Angel Island, has been in the city for a few days. J. H. Glennon, U. S. N., is at the Occidental. Miss Fannie Houghton, who was one of the reigning spirits at Monterey last Fourth, and who left here for the East a few weeks ago, is summering in the White Mountains.

It has now been discovered that Billy Patterson was struck by lightning.

VANITY FAIR.

At a recent royal levée in London, gentlemen wearing ruffles of old lace—which, it seems, are a violation of the sumptuary laws of the court of Queen Victoria—were conducted by an official to a side-room where the obnoxious decorations were cut from their wrists before they were permitted to appear in the presence of royalty.

Mrs. Langtry says that she will not return to London till she has made fifty thousand dollars. She seems luxurious in her traveling, as a "special" is provided for her and her maid, at a cost of five hundred dollars. American ladies will be anxious to know where the Jersey Lily gets her clothes. Mrs. Mason, the modiste in Burlington Street, has the honor of supplying all her theatrical costumes.

A well-known New York lady the other day gave a very elegant German, which was attended by over one hundred guests. She had prepared a number of little satin caskets holding artistic filigree bracelets for the ladies in the cotillon, but when the fair dancers received their gifts the caskets were found to be empty. Some thief had made a clean sweep of their contents. The misadventure must have been a most vexatious one, especially to the hostess.

A most momentous question has been stirring the world of fashion in Paris. It is, in what colors a young widow, who remarries after two years' widowhood, should present herself at the altar? After due consideration, the oracle invoked has answered, and young widows in the above circumstance will please note that they can wear neither blue, nor pink, nor, in short, any showy color but lilac or pearl-gray, or some other neutral tint.

One of the principal objects of interest at the approaching coronation of the Czar will be the carriage of the Czarina, which is the same that was presented by Frederick the Great to the Empress Elizabeth. It is a sort of double throne upon wheels, and is hung, not upon springs, but upon huge bands of velvet. Within, it is upholstered with red velvet, and has a large mirror in front, facing the occupant, framed with white satin. The coachman's seat accommodates four persons. It is drawn by eight horses of purest white, wearing harnesses of crimson velvet encrusted with gold and precious stones. The cost of refurbishing up the twenty-three vehicles of which the cortege is to consist has amounted to two hundred and thirty thousand rubles, or one hundred and seventy-two thousand five hundred dollars.

The height of the season, says a London correspondent, has not brought the usual amount of balls and parties, but still, wherever there is a gathering, the same parade of simplicity appears. Petticoats, if plain, are of the heaviest silk, dresses, if of cheap material, are trimmed with lace at five guineas a yard, or embroidery which is priceless. The whole costume is so craftily designed, and in its deceptive plainness it absorbs so many yards of stuff, that it requires the utmost skill of the dressmaker and unlimited pin-money in the wearer. Diamonds and precious stones abjure the regal traditions of tiaras, coronets, necklaces, and stars, to hide their intrinsic value in the shape of flies, spiders, beetles, lizards, and all shapes of transient and unlasting frivolity. Aestheticism is being laughed out, and is dying in a shroud of its own making—a long, shapeless monk's robe, confined at the waist, wherever that portion of the figure is supposed to be, by a sash; the whole tint a moldy, vault-like, worm-eaten green, savoring of decay.

A lady writing from London says: "All the beauties were present at Lord Carrington's ball, and an American girl, Miss Chamberlain, who is going out in London with her countrywoman, Mrs. Paget, (née Stevens), is having a good time, being much admired, and invited everywhere. She is always remarkably well dressed. Americans generally are, for they do not hesitate to send over to Worth for their clothes. Though I am bound to say that our London dress-makers often turn out costumes which would stand competition with any Paris creation, and many of them charge as high as any one in Paris. A court dress this year, without the lace, was sent home accompanied by a nice little bill of two hundred and seventy pounds—not bad for one frock. We are getting very proud of our British dress fabrics, and, under the auspices of Lady Bective, great impetus has been given in the home manufacture market, and the demand for English silks, satins, and all woolen materials is steadily on the increase. The Queen herself is patronizing English alpacas."

"The gilded youth of the day," says Labouchere in the London Truth, "wear exceedingly tight trousers, well-defined waists, slightly suggestive of corsets, bats with curved brims, very tall collars, very light ties, and a white flower placed very near their estimable chins. Their hoots taper at the toes to points so sharp as to defy nature and encourage chiropodists. Ladies who adopt the straight skirt with no trimming, save a rather aggressive ruffle at the edge, should remember that this style of dress displays to advantage or otherwise the 'action' of the limbs. I had no idea until recently how many of my fair countrywomen are knock-kneed. And, ah me! how very few of them walk well. Will no professor arise and teach them that graceful, gliding motion that to some women comes by nature? He could show them how to avoid walking as though with each step the entire weight of the body was transferred from one foot to the other; and be might impress upon his pupils that it is much less fatiguing to walk well than to lounge and lurch along as some of our best-born maidens do. Some other philanthropic person might establish classes for the propagation of the ornamental art of holding a parasol properly. He might point out that it is unnecessary to prop up the right elbow with the left hand when the parasol is held open, or, when shut, to carry it as if it were a baby. It must not be held too high up the handle, for in this case the points threaten the eyes of passers. And, again, it should not be held too near the end, for this has an awkward aspect, causing the parasol to totter and wobble uneasily, after the fashion of the crinoline."

EDITORIAL NOTES.

Patrick Hennessy, the Irish person removed by the commissioners from Golden Gate Park, communicates to the Chronicle his grievances in reference thereto, and the editor of the Chronicle, in an editorial note, states that the gentleman who succeeds Mr. Hennessy is a brother-in-law of Mr. Frank M. Pixley, one of the commissioners. Mr. Pixley has no living brother-in-law, or brother, or other male relative in California, save his brother's children, the oldest of whom is not yet fifteen years of age.

A war between England and Egypt is a conflict between civilization and semi-barbarism, in which the sympathies of all Christian nations will be enlisted on the side of Great Britain. There will be a nearly unanimous public opinion in the United States of America favoring the triumph of English arms; and if there is a want of sympathy upon the part of any class of American citizens, it will be entirely discreditable to them, and will serve to emphasize the feeling which order-loving citizens already feel toward them. A war of Englishmen against Egyptians or Arabs can have but one result. English arms will in the end be victorious. Intelligence must triumph over brute force. British valor, modern science, arms of precision, unlimited military resources, and national pride can not be conquered by anything that Egypt and her allied barbarians can bring against them. The conflict may be bloody, and even desperate, but it will be short and decisive. A war between Great Britain and Egypt will unite and consolidate all parties in England. Any faction in the English Parliament that will, in the interest of home politics, endeavor to embarrass the operations of her armies, pending the struggle, will lose the respect and moral support of all honorable men.

The older residents of the State will remember John F. McCauley, as occupying a very prominent position in public life, and taking an active part in political affairs. He was once connected with General James Estell in the management of the State Prison at San Quentin. Mr. McCauley is now a retired and wealthy citizen of San Joaquin County. At the recent Democratic State Convention in San José he came into prominent notice by his active opposition to ex-Chief Justice Wallace for member of Congress at large. In the most public manner, and everywhere on the street and in the public frequented places, he charged him with corruption on the bench, and, with particularity of detail, asserted that he—McCauley—had paid Lloyd Tevis the sum of five thousand dollars for Judge Wallace, with his privacy, in consideration of a certain decision to be thereafter rendered in his—McCauley's—favor. If there is nothing in this accusation more than the spleen of an angry politician, it is an unworthy exhibition of party passion for which Mr. McCauley ought not to be held excusable, and at which Messrs. Wallace and Tevis have a right to be justly indignant. If it be true, these gentlemen ought not to escape a just popular indignation. If it be true that Tevis received the money and did not divide it with the judge, the act is still open to criticism. In any event, this matter has gone so far that there ought to be a willingness on the part of Messrs. Wallace and Tevis to have an opportunity of giving it their indignant denial, and of stamping it out as a vile slander against two gentlemen whose reputations have been hitherto regarded as unassailable, and whose characters have been hitherto above reproach.

On Saturday, the second of July, Superintendent Henry L. Dodge, of the San Francisco Branch Mint, transferred to the new superintendent, Hon. E. F. Burton, over thirty-one million dollars, and his authority in connection with the establishment. It is unnecessary to state that in the final settlement made with the United States Government officials, every account, to the last dollar of expenditure, was found to be in satisfactory condition. Mr. Dodge brought business principles into the management of mint affairs. He brought order out of disorder, saved expenses, and turned the mint over to his successor with the reputation at Washington of having made the best administration of any superintendent ever in the mint service. In this instance an important branch of the public service has been conducted upon the principles of true civil service reform. Mr. Dodge has illustrated that business methods, perfect integrity, and thorough efficiency may be introduced into Government business without injury to the party or scandal to the administration. His employees, having been called into the disbursing-room to take leave of him, and to be introduced to the new superintendent, Mr. Dodge made a few appropriate remarks upon introducing Mr. Burton, to which the latter gentleman made a fitting response. Rev. Mr. Buckbee then stepped to the front, and in a neat speech presented, in the name of the officers and employees, the retiring superintendent with an elegant and costly punch-bowl of beaten silver with gold ladle, and a superb watch, chain, and locket. The affair was not one of those cut-and-dried exhibitions witnessed on similar occasions, but was an expression of the kind feelings that existed between the employees and their official head after so many years of intercourse. In the evening, by Mr. Dodge's request, nearly all of the employees paid their respects to him at his rooms at the Palace, and tested the capacity of the punch-bowl. Mr. Burton will be compelled to nerve himself to a determined resistance against the pressure of applicants for mint positions, and it will be well for politicians to remember that this is not a change of party administration, and that it is not a case of removing a Democrat to give place to a Republican. Few changes ought to be made, and few can be made with profit either to the public service or the Republican party. We so earnestly desire our friend, the Hon. Ned Burton, to make a success of his administration of mint affairs, that we wish he could be relieved from the pressure of place-hunters, and, like the late superintendent, be permitted to remember that he is engaged in the manufacture of money, and not in running the Republican machine.

Talmage says that nine out of ten business men do not scruple to lie for a sixpence. The lying sixpence is better than the slow shilling.

OLD FAVORITES.

Her Treasures.

I keep them in the old, old box
That Willie gave me years ago,
The time we parted on the rocks;
His ship lay swinging to and fro,
At waiting in the lower bay.
I thought my heart would break that day!

The picture with the pensive eyes
Is Willie's? No, dear, that's young Blake,
Who took the West Point highest prize;
He went half crazy for my sake.
Here are a lot of rhymes he wrote,
And here's a hutton off his coat.

Is this his ring? My dearest May,
I never took a ring from him!
This was a gift from Howard Clay.
Just see, the pearls are getting dim.
They say that pearls are tears—what stuff!
The setting looks a little rough.

He was as handsome as a prince—
And jealous! But he went to Rome
Last fall. He's never written since.
I used to visit at his home—

A lovely place beyond Fort Lee—
His mother thought the world of me!

Oh no! I sent his letters back.
These came to me from Washington.

But look, what a tremendous pack!
He always wrote me three for one.
I know I used to treat him ill—
Poor Jack! he fell at Chancellorsville.

The vignettes—all that lot—are scalps
I took in London, Naples, Nice,
At Paris, and among the Alps;
Those foreign lovers act like geese.

But, dear, they are such handsome men.
We go to France next year again.

This is the doctor's signet ring.
These faded flowers? Oh, let me see:
Why, what a very curious thing!
Who could have sent these flowers to me?
Ah! now I have it—Count de Twirl!
He married that fat Crosbie girl.

His hair was red. You need not look
So sadly at that raven tress.
You know the head that look forsook;
You know, but you could never guess!
Nor would I tell you for the world
About whose brow that ringlet curled.

Why won't I tell? Well, partly, child,
Because you like the man yourself;
But most because—don't get so wild!
I have not laid him on the shelf—
He's not a bygone. In a year
I'll tell you all about him, dear.

—Mary Ainge De Vere.

Telemachus Versus Mentor.

Don't mind me, I beg you, old fellow; I'll do very well here alone;
You must not be kept from your "German" because I've dropped in like a stone;
Leave all ceremony behind you, leave all thought of aught but yourself,
And leave, if you like, the Madeira, and a dozen cigars on the shelf.
As for me, you will say to our hostess—well, I scarcely need give you a cue.

Chant my praise! All will list to Apollo, though Mercury pipe to a few;
Say just what you please, my dear boy; there's more eloquence lies in youth's rash
Outspoken heart-impulse than ever growled under this grizzling moustache.

Go, don the dress-coat of our tyrant—youth's panoplied armor for fight—
And tie the white neckcloth that rumples, like pleasure, and lasts but a night,
And pray the Nine Gods to avert you what time the Three Sisters shall frown.

And you'll lose your high-comedy figure, and sit more at ease in your gown.
He's off! There's his foot on the staircase. By Jove, what a bound!

Really now
Did I ever leap like this springald, with Love's chaplet green on my brow?

Was I such an ass? No, I fancy. Indeed I remember quite plain:
A gravity mixed with my transports, a cheerfulness softened my pain.
He's gone! There's the slam of his cab-door, there's the clatter of hoofs and the wheels,
And while he the light toe is tripping, in this arm-chair I'll tilt up my heels.

He's gone, and for what? For a tremor from a waist like a teetotum spun;
For a rosebud that's crumpled by many before it is gathered by one.

Is there naught in the halo of youth but the glow of a passionate race—
Midst the cheers and applause of a crowd—to the goal of a beautiful face?

A race that is not to the swift, a prize that no merits enforce,
But is won by some faineant youth who shall simply walk over the course?

Poor boy! Shall I shock his conceit? When he talks of her cheek's loveliness,
Shall I say 'twas the air of the room, and was due to carbonic excess?
That when walking she drooped on his breast, and the veins of her eyelids grew dim.

'Twas oxygen's absence she felt, but never the presence of him?
Shall I tell him First Love is a fraud, a weakling that's strangled in birth,

Recalled with perfunctory tears, but lost in unsanctified mirth?
Or shall I go hid him believe in all womankind's charm, and forget
In the light ringing laugh of the world the rattlesnake's gay castanet?

Shall I tear out a leaf from my heart—from that book that forever is shut
On the past? Shall I speak of my first love—Augusta—my Lalage? But I forget. Was it really Augusta? No. 'Twas Lucy! No. Mary!

No. Di!
Never mind; they were all first, and faithless, and yet—I've forgotten just why.

No, no. Let him dream on and ever. Alas! he will waken too soon;
And it doesn't look well for October to always be preaching at June.
Poor boy! all his fond foolish trophies pinned yonder—a bow, from her hair,

A few billets-doux invitations, and—what's this? My name! I declare.
Humph! "You'll come, for I've got you a prize—with beauty and money no end;
You know her, I think; 'twas on dit she once was engaged to your friend;

But she says that's all over." Ah, is it? Sweet Ethel! Incomparable maid?

Or what if the thing were a trick?—this letter so freely displayed.
My opportune presence! No! nonsense! Will nobody answer the bell?
Call a cah! Half-past ten! Not too late yet. Oh, Ethel! Why don't you go? Well?

"Master said you would wait—" Hang your master! "Have I ever a message to send?"
Yes, tell him I've gone to the German to dance with the friend of his friend.

—Bret Harte.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Gustave Doré is sketching and painting scenes among the Alps.

The times are evidently brightening for royal claimants, once the most impecunious of men, for the Count de Chambord has just sent the Pope a largesse of ten thousand francs.

Arabi Pasha appears to divide his worship between Mars and Venus; for a few weeks ago, in the midst of his troubles with the Khedive, he added to his household a third wife, the daughter of one Mustapha Pasha, and a lady of rank and fortune.

The senior diplomat in the United States service, by consecutive years of duty at one post, is the Hon. George P. Marsh, minister to Italy, who was commissioned March 20, 1861, and has held the office ever since. He has never, it is said, even applied for a temporary leave of absence.

President Grévy of France has been invested with the Order of the Golden Fleece by the King of Spain, his neck being adorned by the same collar worn by the late Czar Alexander II. This Order is one of the most distinguished in all Europe, having been founded in 1429 by Philippe III., Duke of Burgundy.

When Queen Margherita of Italy visited the Roman Academy this summer the artists presented to her were all in evening dress, and wore their decorations. Mr. Randolph Rogers, the American sculptor, was the only exception. He had neither ribbon nor medal, but wore a couple of marguerites in his button-hole, with which silent homage her majesty was much pleased.

Mr. Fox, whose family have for generations acted as Consuls for the United States at Falmouth, England, comes of a most consular family. The firm of which he is a member were a few years ago, and probably are to-day, Consuls for the United States, Chile, and Turkey, and Vice-Consuls for Austria, Brazil, Bremen, Denmark, Greece, Guatemala, Hamburg, Lubeck, Mexico, Oldenburg, Peru, Bolivia, and Tuscany.

A letter written by Cavour was sold at a sale of autographs the other day for a large sum, in consequence of its containing some very unfavorable criticisms on the manners and customs of members of the French Jockey Club. It was somewhat ungrateful of Cavour to leave so bitter a censure on the club, considering that when he was an honorary member, during the congress of 1856, he won twenty thousand pounds sterling at whist there.

Mr. Lambart, of Beau Parc, Ireland, one of whose daughters is maid of honor to Queen Victoria, has had nine daughters, of whom eight survive. Lord Alfred Paget, Clerk Marshal to the Queen, has eight daughters, all unmarried. There is a prevalent feeling in England to-day that Protestant nannies must soon come into vogue. The Queen, meanwhile, shows her sympathy as best she can toward these quiversful, but maids of honor rarely marry.

The Marquis of Conyngham, who died lately, was grandson of the old marchioness, whose career was one of the scandals of the regency, and who is so often alluded to in Greville's memoirs. He married a daughter of a former Lord Harrington by Miss Foote, a beautiful actress. The regent's chère amie the marchioness was daughter of a self-made millionaire. She had a great fortune, and her only brother left about a million sterling to her second son, who was made Lord Lonsborough.

The Duke of Richmond, who a few years since, to the disgust of Lord Huntley, representative of the direct male line of the Gordons, tacked the title of Gordon to that of Richmond, is also Duke of Aubigny, a title conferred with an estate of that name by Louis XIV. upon a notorious woman whom Charles II. created Duchess of Portsmouth. This title made the Dukes of Richmond peers of France, and they continued long after to hold seats in the French Parliament as such. The number of such peers was very limited, although the number of nobles was very large.

President Grévy, who comes from a family belonging to the lowest grade of French society, has not the personal bearing of a great ruler. He is short, dapper, and undignified, and has little magnetism or enthusiasm in his disposition. The secret of his success lies in his coolness and courage, his habit of working while his rivals are talking, and his clean, honest record. His wife was, some years before he married her, employed by him as a cook and laundress. She has never yet been "recognized by society"—that is, by the "society of nobility"—in Paris.

A Roman correspondent of Figaro relates a singular story, to the effect that the lady who is now known as the Countess Lambertini was, when only fifteen years old, frequently visited at the house of her mother, Madame Marconi, by Ricciotti Garibaldi. He became enamored of her, and wished to marry her, but Madame Marconi interfered, gave him his congé, and the intimacy was broken off. But the whirligig of time presents few more remarkable incongruities than the mere possibility of the marriage of a son of Garibaldi to the reputed daughter of Cardinal Antonelli, Secretary of State to Pius IX.

It is not generally known, even abroad, that the Countess of Charlemont, just deceased, who was a daughter of Sir William Summerville, for many years Chief Secretary for Ireland, and afterward created Lord Athlumney, was a convert to Judaism. Judaism has taken hold of many minds in England of late years. Lord Amberley, Earl Russell's eldest son, came to the conclusion before his death, and published it, that the New Testament was entirely apocryphal. Again, we find George Eliot making the exaltation of the Jewish race the key-note of her last great work of fiction. Lady Charlemont was quite consistent in her adherence to her adopted creed. She went to the Bayswater synagogue while she was in London. In Belfast she attended the Belfast synagogue. Her charities were Jewish, and her spiritual adviser was Chief Rabbi Adlar. She is now the whole Jewish community.

NEW YORK NABOBS.

Our Correspondent Details the Latest Gossip in New Amsterdam.

Everybody is going into the country. There is one sensation with which to end the season. A mysterious Marquis de Leuville, who arrived last year from England, is reported engaged to Mrs. Frank Leslie, the widow of the publisher. She was once considered a beauty, and is said to possess the handsomest foot in New York. Her property is estimated at three-quarters of a million. The marquis is a fat man, about forty years of age, with a straggling black beard, is slightly bald, wears Williams's shoes, high French heels, four or five rings, and full-dress vests constantly. He talks with an affected accent, which is partially English and partially French, and haunts Delmonico's and the Brunswick. He has not succeeded in getting into the best society; but was taken up rapturously when he arrived by the crowd of suspicious Bohemians belonging to the Pot-Luck Club. He was at all their entertainments, and at the end of the winter season gave a reception. He was assisted by Lady Duffus Hardy, whose title and antecedents are quite as shady as those of the marquis. After the marquis had been here some time, English visitors who saw him stopped, stared, and insisted that he was no marquis at all, but Jack Wilson, a would-be aristocratic son-in-law of Madame Tussaud, the famous wax-works exhibitor of London. The marquis frequently overheard these things, but stared at the Englishmen with blank unconsciousness, and pursued the even tenor of his way. Mrs. Leslie has never succeeded in getting into the best society in New York, but moved in the same sphere that the marquis gained entrance to. His engagement to her would seem to show that he did not marry Madame Tussaud's daughter; but the mystery of his antecedents is as great as ever. He has been refused by several of the clubs. His last experience at the Lotus Club dinner in May was talked of for some time. When he sat down to dinner, he spoke with so pronounced a foreign accent that his companions had difficulty in understanding him; but as dinner progressed he grew more and more intelligible, until, at dessert, he talked very plain English, and at coffee dropped into the pronounced aphorisms of the London cockney. After that he was not invited to the Lotus.

Mrs. Leslie usually goes to her country-place in Saratoga late in April or early in May, but has remained in the city this year in preference. Her place on Saratoga Lake is one of the sights of that watering-place. The barn is far more beautiful than the house, and the entire property is malarial. Frank Leslie spent a great deal of money on the place before his death, and kept eight or nine horses, steam and sailing-yachts, and made an incipient attempt at farming. When he died the property was in litigation so long that it ran down, and adjacent property-holders built fences between the road and the house on strips of land owned by them, which not only spoiled the view from the windows inland, but hid the house from people driving on the road. The grounds went to ruin. When Mrs. Leslie gained her suit, she seemed to have lost all interest in her property, but continued to go to Saratoga as formerly. The business of the old publisher was in a most disastrous condition. It was on the point of failure, when Mr. I. W. England took hold of it, and brought it up on a paying basis. Then he turned the property over to Mrs. Leslie. Instead of putting it in charge of some good business man, she insisted upon running the business herself. Every morning she drove down to the house in her brougham at half-past nine o'clock, went to her office, preceded by a footman who took her wraps and arranged her chairs, and went to work. She has succeeded in muddling the business up so completely that if the late Frank Leslie could see it he would rise from his grave in anguish. Of late she has lost interest in the affairs of the house, which has probably helped to run it down, and devoted herself more to the understratum of society, where she met the marquis.

The most annoying thing about the marquis is that he pays his bills. He lives quietly in rooms—in Sixteenth Street, I think—and breakfasts at the Riccadona, mornings at ten o'clock. From that time on he devotes himself to walking on Fifth Avenue, and calling on friends. He has probably left more of his visiting cards, with an immense and gaudy coronet over his name, in New York, than any nobleman, alleged or otherwise, who ever visited this country. At the Charity Ball last season he approached several ladies and asked for dances without introduction. He was quietly huffed in every case. Then he went to the manager's office, where there was a supper for newspaper men, and presented his card at the door, with the statement that he was New York correspondent for the London World. Walter Fanning, the resident correspondent of the London World, was within at the time. They took the card to him, and he said he had never heard of the gentleman before. This did not deter the marquis from entering, however, and enjoying a hearty supper. Later he introduced himself to several people, and was seen in a box with Mrs. John Bigelow, wife of ex-Secretary of State Bigelow, during the rest of the evening. He accompanied her to her carriage, and announced in a loud voice with a charming accent that he would call on her on the following day at five. Mrs. Bigelow made no response. However, the marquis called, as promised, the next day and found her out. This does not prevent him from greeting her affably whenever they meet, which is often, as Mrs. Bigelow is quite as much of a rounder in a social way as the marquis himself, and is to be found at every gathering, private, public, or otherwise, which she has time to attend.

She is, indeed, one of the social sights of the city. She has two hall dresses. One is green and the other is purple, both cut as low as possible, and fashioned after the style of many years ago, when Mrs. Bigelow's husband was United States Minister to Paris. Many amusing stories are told about her. She has an utter disregard for the social proprieties of life. Frenchmen never come over here without telling of the night when the emperor, wishing to show a compliment to America, sent the use of his private box at the opera to America's minister. The compliment was graceful and distinguished. Mrs. Bigelow did not feel well, she felt like going out, but she hated to see the box, so she sent her maids and the footman to see the opera. The effect of this can be imagined on a French audience. Servants of an American minister in the emperor's box! Every glass in the house was leveled at them, but they sat there until after the first act, when Mr. Bigelow, having heard of it, rushed frantically in and ejected them all, and sat down himself, looking very much embarrassed. Mrs. Bigelow herself tells the story, and considers it rather in the light of a joke. So do most other Americans. There is another story about Mrs. Bigelow which I do not believe. It is that while dancing with Mr. Victor Drummond of the British Legation, at Newport, she stopped for a moment at the supper-room, excused herself, took some crackers from the table, and continued her waltz with that gentleman, eating crackers at the same time. This is almost too much to believe, even of Mrs. Bigelow. Despite her peculiarities, she is one of the most popular society leaders in New York, and is particularly popular with young people. The party of young society men and girls that she took to the West Point hop Friday consisted of the best people in the city.

Mr. Bigelow lives two doors from Samuel J. Tilden, in Gramercy Park. He is a quiet old gentleman, with a fondness for trees and flowers. He and Mr. Tilden are together almost constantly when the latter is in the city. Mr. Tilden's new house is not yet finished. Mr. Tilden comes down every morning about ten o'clock from his country seat at Greystone, near Yonkers, to watch the builders. As soon as he arrives, he sends his card in to Mr. Bigelow, who issues from his house immediately afterward, and shakes hands gravely with Mr. Tilden, after which the two old men stand and stare fixedly at the house for half an hour at a time, never interchanging a word. I have seen them do this day after day for months, as my windows are opposite Mr. Tilden's new house. After standing about for some time, Mr. Tilden gravely invites Mr. Bigelow to enter, and they totter down the scaffolding to the basement, preceded by their obsequious secretaries, Messrs. Smith and Aymar, and wander through to the kitchen, which is the first apartment finished in the new house. Two easy chairs are arranged here, into which the two statesmen sink, and gravely discuss the new house. The architects bring their plans and suggestions to them, and, after submitting them, and gravely noting all the alterations that Mr. Tilden and Mr. Bigelow suggest, retire, and continue the work without the slightest regard to the changes. Mr. Bigelow looks upon his wife's vagaries as being comical in the extreme, and enjoys nothing better than retelling her various escapades, except when she is too conspicuous, when he promptly puts on his hat and goes home. It is a peculiar thing that there are no more well-bred and popular young men in New York than Mrs. Bigelow's sons. She must be nearly seventy years old, and looks about sixty, except when in full dress, when she looks eighty.

There is nothing new in the row in the Raquet Club. Messrs. José Aymar, Thomas Bach, and William S. Alley, of the Stock Exchange, who were arrested by Captain Williams's officers and held all night in jail, have not entered an action against the police, as they threatened to do. This has been a red letter year in clubs. When I made a recapitulation of the club rows in New York, in a letter or two ago, I did not think that I would have another one to add so soon to the list. The last is, by all odds, the most remarkable. It is difficult to understand on what principle the club men acted. Their servant was accused of theft. An officer, in the strict line of his duty, entered the club-house and arrested the servant, whereupon three members of the fastidious Raquet Club at once locked the officer in, and swore he could not take their servant from them. The officer threw up the window, and called for assistance. In a few minutes eighteen policemen came trotting round the corner at double-quick, burst in the doors, rescued their brother officer and his prisoner, and lugged off the three high-toned members of the club, and locked them up. All night long the station-house was besieged by excited club men, trying to get the release of their fellow-members, but Captain Williams refused even to allow them to be seen. Next morning they were lugged up in the dirty police-court, and fined by a police justice (a butcher by profession) ten dollars apiece, and discharged. They threatened vengeance, but have not sought it. Captain Williams has the sympathy of most of the citizens of New York, and so far seems to have the upper hand. It is difficult to see what the club men can do. Superintendent of Police Walling declared that the officer was fully justified in making the arrest in the manner that he did, and in condemning the action of the club men in resisting the officer, claims that they deserve no better treatment than any other class of citizens, which is strictly true. The club men make no coherent defense, but confine themselves to vituperative abuse of the police officials.

This row has been unfortunate for the Raquet Club. Vague rumors and wild stories have been whispered around for some time concerning the amusements of the gentlemen who compose the club. For instance, the story about Jerry Murphy and Tommy Kelly, who were seen to enter there one evening at nine o'clock, accompanied by Harry Hill, the well-known prize-fight referee, and to emerge some four hours afterward in a decidedly suspicious condition—in fact, one of the pugilists was borne to his carriage. Immediately afterward members of the club rushed forth into the street, very much excited, and talked loudly in the cafés and restaurants during the rest of the night, of a certain "mill" that had taken place that evening. Neither the pugilists nor referee would say anything about it; but it seems to be universally conceded that a prize-fight did take place in the Raquet Club that night; in fact, Captain Williams, in defending his conduct in breaking in their doors, alluded to this, and mentioned other practices that he claimed justified him in making the arrests.

NEW YORK, June 29, 1882.

General O. O. Howard, despite his austere reputation, heartily enjoys dancing, and improved his opportunities during the recent gayeties at West Point. An officer who was with him in the Indian country says that he has seen General Howard in an Indian village join in a dance with the squaws with all the zest of a young man.

Shakespeare at the picnic—"A man may smile and smile, and be a villain!"—Hawkeye.

LITERARY NOTES.

Several months ago Robert Ingersoll was interviewed by a reporter of an Eastern journal on the subject of Talmage's attacks upon him. These "interviews" are now republished in book form, together with a "catechism" which the eminent infidel has prepared as a sort of commentary on Presbyterianism in general. Published and for sale by C. P. Farrell, Washington, D. C.

S. A. Drake's "Heart of the White Mountains" appears in a new and revised edition. Many of the sketches in this volume first appeared in Harper's Monthly, and were subsequently issued in a large and complete form, with rich binding. Realizing that the volume was frequently used as a sort of guide-book, the publishers publish it in a cheaper and more convenient form. It will now, however, probably be purchased as much for the library as for the tourist's purposes, by reason of its excellent illustrations. Published by Harper & Bros., New York; for sale by Bancroft; price, $3.

The second number of the "Literary Life Series," edited by William Shepard, is "Pen Pictures of Modern Authors." It is a rather curious medley of much that is excellent. The editor has procured a large number of interviews with English and American authors which have appeared in various newspapers and periodicals during the last two decades, and now reprints them with connecting comments. Some of the sketches have been written by such writers as G. W. Curtis, Justin McCarthy, and others of equal note; but many are merely the descriptions of newspaper correspondents, and are consequently either flippantly "gossipy," or else totally inadequate. Published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York; for sale by Billings, Harbourn & Co.; price, $1.25.

Announcements: Osborne H. Olbroyd, of Springfield, Ill., is reported to be the possessor of the most complete and valuable collection extant of the private and public souvenirs of Abraham Lincoln. It is this gentleman who has compiled the Lincoln Memorial Album, which is shortly to be published—a volume containing papers by Garfield, Whittey, and many other noted Americans.—M. D. Conway has prepared, under the title "Travels in South Kensington," a volume of notes on decorative art and architecture in England. The Harpers will publish the work, which is to be illustrated.—Count von Beust is intending to add himself to the list of garrulous diplomatic veterans. He will devote himself, on his retirement from political life, to preparing his memoirs for publication.—A new monthly magazine, which is heralded as the best of its class, and one which is to cast all others into the shade, is to appear in England in the autumn. Longman & Co. are to be the publishers, and Professor Tyndall, Mr. Huxley, and Mr. James Payn are among the contributors already secured.—Another novel of Björnsterne Björnson's, "The Bridal March," will be published this month, with four illustrations.—Mrs. Ole Bull is writing a life of her husband, which Houghton, Mifflin & Co. will publish in the autumn.—D. Lothrop & Co. are preparing a subscription edition of Paul H. Hayne's complete works. The Southern poet is both ill and impoverished.—The Comte de Paris has nearly completed the third volume of his "History of the Civil War in America," which will probably be published before the close of the present year. Miss A. Mary F. Robinson, the young English poet, is writing for Harper an article on Dante-Gabriel Rossetti. It will contain numerous authentic biographical facts, and two portraits—one of the painter-poet and one of his sister.

Doctor George Beard, of New York, who last year published a work of great interest on "American Nervousness," has just written a little volume in which he discusses "The Psychology of the Salem Witchcraft Excitement" of 1692, and its practical application to our own time in the matter of executing insane murderers. As may easily be guessed, he mainly treats of Guitau's case. It may perhaps be remembered that Doctor Beard and Miss Chevallier, (Secretary of the National Insane Society, who, by the way, was once in an asylum herself for assault to murder while temporarily insane,) a few weeks ago made vigorous intercession with President Arthur, for the life of the late murderer. The author in this book states his reasons in full for his advocacy of Guitau's plea of insanity. In the case of the Salem witchcraft, the convictions of the English judges were, according to Doctor Beard's views, the result of an entire ignorance of nervous diseases; in the case of Guitau it was ignorance of insanity. He then goes on to compare the evidence of the insanity of Maclean, the Queen's assassin, and that of Guitau, and seeks to show that the evidence by which the English jury acquitted the former in five minutes, was "not one-thousandth part as much evidence of insanity as in the case of Guitau." He then arraigns this country for its savage display of revenge, designating the Americans as fifty millions of despotic czars, and characterizing in bitter terms the cowardice which prevented many journals from acknowledging Guitau's insanity. There is no doubt that Doctor Beard does the people and the press an injustice in his severe strictures. There were many individuals throughout the Union who regarded Guitau as insane, and newspaper readers will recall the numerous and frequent articles in which the daily papers referred to that "miserable, half-crazed creature." Indeed the press dispatches, after the trial, referred to his outbreaks and vagaries as something not feigned, but natural. But one and all, with very few exceptions, thought, and still think, that it was a kind of insanity that is much better exterminated, and put where it can accomplish no further outrages on humanity and civilization. "Half-crazed creatures" must have an example before them that will deter them from any endeavor to imperil the affairs of a nation, and strong measures are a necessity where the safety of the guide of a great people is in question. Published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York; for sale by Billings, Harbourn & Co.

The following quotation from James Parton's recent "Life of Voltaire," volume I, page 567, will show the source of Owen Meredith's well-known poem, "The Portrait." In fact, the exclamation, "One nail drives out another" is made use of in a verse of the poem: "From the merriment of the supper-table Voltaire, the husband, (the Marquis du Châtelet), and all the guests, upon hearing the awful and unexpected tidings, ran to the chamber. The consternation was such as we should imagine. To sobs and exclamations of grief and horror a mournful silence succeeded. M. du Châtelet was led out, the other guests went away; and finally the two men who had most reason for emotion remained alone by the side of the bed, speechless and overwhelmed. Voltaire staggered out of the room like a man stunned and bewildered, and made his way, he knew not how, to the great door of the châtelet, at the head of the outside steps. At the bottom of those steps he fell headlong, close to a sentry box, and remained on the ground insensible. His servant, who had followed him, seeing him fall, ran down the steps and attempted to lift him up. He recognized St. Lambert, and said to him sobbing, as Longchamps reports: 'Ah, my friend, it is you who have killed her for me. Then suddenly coming to himself, as if from a deep sleep, he cried, in a tone of mingled despair and reproach: 'Oh, my God, sir, what could have induced you to get her into that condition?' St. Lambert said nothing, and Voltaire was led away to his room. Among the crowd of distracted persons who had rushed into the chamber on the first alarm was Madame de Bufflers. As she was going out, half an hour later, she took Longchamps (Voltaire's secretary) aside, and told him to see if the deceased had upon her finger a corneal locket-ring; and if she had, to take it off, and keep it until further orders. He obeyed, and the next day gave the ring to Madame de Bufflers, who picked out of the locket, with a pin, a portrait of St. Lambert, and then gave back the ring to Longchamps for the same ring, which, he said, contained his own portrait. The secretary informed him that his portrait was not in the ring at the time of madame's death. 'Ah!' exclaimed Voltaire, 'how do you know that?' Longchamps related what had passed. 'Oh, heavens!' cried Voltaire, rising to his feet and clapping his hands. 'Such are women! I took Richelieu out of the ring; St. Lambert expelled me. That is in the order of nature—one nail drives out another. So go the things of this world!'

WHAT THEY THINK OF HER.

Pro.

Confucius : Woman is the masterpiece.
Herder : Woman is the crown of creation.
Voltaire : Women teach us repose, civility, and dignity.
John Quincy Adams : All that I am my mother made me.
Lessing : Nature meant to make woman its masterpiece.
Lamartine : There is a woman at the beginning of all great things.

Whittier : If woman lost us Eden, such as she alone restores it.

E. S. Barret : Woman is last at the cross and earliest at the grave.

Richter : No man can either live piously or die righteous without a wife.

N. P. Willis : The sweetest thing in life is the unclouded welcome of a wife.

Voltaire : All the reasonings of men are not worth one sentiment of women.

Beecher : Women are a new race, re-created since the world received Christianity.

Leopold Schefer : But one thing on earth is better than the wife—that is the mother.

Shakespeare : For where is any author in the world teaches such beauty as a woman's eyes?

Michelot : Woman is the Sunday of man ; not his repose only, but his joy, the salt of his life.

Margaret Fuller Ossoli : Woman is born for love, and it is impossible to turn her from seeking it.

Louis Desnoyers : A woman may be ugly, ill-shaped, wicked, ignorant, silly, and stupid, but hardly ever ridiculous.

Lord Langdale : If the whole world were put into one scale, and my mother into the other, the world would kick the beam.

Malherbe : There are only two beautiful things in the world, women and roses ; and only two sweet things, women and melons.

Bulwer-Lytton : O woman, in ordinary cases so mere a mortal, how in the great and rare events of life dost thou swell into the angel!

Saville : Women have more strength in their looks than we have in our laws, and more power by their tears than we have by our arguments.

Emerson : A beautiful woman is a practical poet ; taming her savage mate, planting tenderness, hope, and eloquence in all whom she approaches.

Anna Cora Mowatt : Misfortune sprinkles ashes on the head of the man, but falls like dew on the head of the woman, and brings forth germs of strength of which she herself had no conscious possession.

Thackeray : Almost all women will give a sympathizing hearing to men who are in love. Be they ever so old, they grow young again in that conversation, and renew their own early time. Men are not quite so generous.

Samuel Smiles : The women of the poorer classes make sacrifices, and run risks, and bear privations, and exercise patience and kindness to a degree that the world never knows of, and would scarcely believe even if it did know.

Contra.

Franklin : He that takes a wife takes care.

La Fontaine : Foxes are all tail, and women all tongue.

Boucault : I wish that Adam had died with all his ribs in his body.

Victor Hugo : Women detest the serpent through a professional jealousy.

Eugène Sue : There is something still worse to be dreaded than a Jesuit, and that is a Jesuitess.

Fielding : In the forming of female friendships, beauty seldom recommends one woman to another.

Socrates : Trust not a woman when she weeps, for it is her nature to weep when she wants her will.

Mary Wollstonecraft : As a sex women are habitually indolent, and everything tends to make them so.

Rochebrune : It is easier for a woman to defend her virtue against men than her reputation against women.

Ben Jonson : A woman, the more curious she is about her face, is commonly the more careless about her house.

Southey : There are three things a wise man will not trust : the wind, the sunshine of an April day, and woman's plighted faith.

Swift : The love of flattery in most men proceeds from the mean opinion they have of themselves ; in women, from the contrary.

Lady Montagu : It goes far toward reconciling me to being a woman when I reflect that I am thus in no danger of marrying one.

Swift : The reason why so few marriages are happy is because young ladies spend their time in making nets, not in making cages.

Alphonse Karr : A woman who writes commits two sins : she increases the number of hooks, and decreases the number of women.

Douglas Jerrold : What women would do if they could not cry, nobody knows ! What poor defenseless creatures they would be !

Charles Buxton : Juliet was a fool to kill herself, for in three months she'd have married again, and been glad to be quit of Romeo.

Chesterfield : Women are much more alike than men ; they have, in truth, but two passions, vanity and love ; these are their universal characteristics.

Bishop Signori : Do not allow your daughter to be taught letters by a man, though he be a St. Paul or St. Francis of Assisi. The saints are in heaven !

De Maistre : It is not the mediocrity of women's education which makes their weakness ; it is their weakness which necessarily causes their mediocrity.

Réfit de la Bretonne : The life of a woman is a long dissimulation. Candor, beauty, freshness, virginity, modesty—a woman has each of these but once. When lost, she must simulate them the rest of her life.

E. Lynn Lynton : There is scarcely a woman who does not think herself a minor St. Peter, with the keys of heaven and hell at her girdle ; and the more conscientious she is, the narrower the door she unlocks, and the smaller the number of those that are allowed to enter.

AMBAGIOUS VERSE.

We've Always Been Provided For.

" Good wife, what are you singing for ? You know we've lost the hay, And what we'll do with horse and kye is more than I can say ; While like as not, with storm and rain, we'll lose both corn and wheat : She looked up with a pleasant face, and answered low and sweet : ' There is a Heart, there is a Hand, we feel, but cannot see ; We've always been provided for, and we shall always be.' "

He turned around with a sudden gloom. She said : " Love be at rest You cut the grass, worked soon and late, you did your very best. That was your work ; you've naught at all to do with wind and rain, And do not doubt but you will reap rich fields of golden grain ; For there's a Heart, and there's a Hand, we feel, but can not see ; We've always been provided for, and we shall always be.' "

" That's like a woman's reasoning—we must, because we must." She softly said : " I reason not ; I only work and trust ; The harvest may redeem the day—keep heart while'er betide ; When one door shuts, I've always seen another open wide ; There is a Heart, there is a Hand, we feel, but can not see ; We've always been provided for, and we shall always be.' "

He kissed the calm and trustful face ; gone was his restless pain. She heard him with a cheerful step go whistling down the lane, And went about her household tasks full of a glad content, Singing to time her busy hands as to and fro she went : " There is a Heart, there is a Hand, we feel, but can not see ; We've always been provided for, and we shall always be.' "

Days come and go—'twas Christmas tide, and the great fire burned clear. The farmer said : " Dear wife, it's been a good and happy year ; The fruit was gain, the surplus corn has bought the hay, you know." She lifted then a smiling face, and said : " I told you so ! For there's a Heart, and there's a Hand, we feel, but can not see ; We've always been provided for, and we shall always be.' " —Anon.

Christian Roth's Story.

[Stuttgart, May, 1882.]

I've called, Mr. Consul, this morning to ask, if you please, your advice.

On a matter that gives me great worry—" Let's hear it (wants money, I know)."

Here's my citizen paper—" (All right)"—I was born in the Schwarzwälder Kreis, At Schramberg, and went to America forty-five years ago.

Yes, I'm near seventy now, and you see that my step is unsteady—Plenty of trouble, I tell you—I settled in North Illinois, And there, ever since, I've been working and saving up, so that already I've got a nice farm, Mr. Consul, that goes by-and-by to my boy.

How many children ? There's four—three boys and a girl. We've had seven ;

But when the war came along, my William and Carl marched away. Both of them fell on the field, and last winter the good Lord in heaven Called home our dear little Minnie—she's twelve years old to-day.

Yes, the old woman is living. She's there with the boys on the place, And our Lina keeps house for them all. Next spring she'll be just twenty-four.

She's the handsomest girl in the county ; there's sunshine all over her face ;

I can hear even now her sweet voice as she told me farewell at the door. Why I left ? Well, perhaps, Mr. Consul, 'twere better the truth weren't told.

But no matter—it wasn't my fault. My old woman and I had a fight. She is sick and can't work any more, and she's idle. We're both getting old ;

So she's cross, and will have it that I'm always wrong, and that she's always right.

It hasn't been always that way. In the days when we worked for our bread,

And hadn't a dollar laid by in the bank, she and I were all good And happy together ; but since we began to be getting ahead She has tried to be boss over me, and I didn't intend that she should.

And when our poor dear Minnie died, I had hoped that the fight would die, too ;

But no ! it lived on just the same, and one day, about four weeks ago, The old woman sent out for a lawyer, and then, for the first time, I knew

That she wanted to separate from me—from me, who have borne with her so.

And the boys they all tried to make peace ; she would listen to naught that they said,

But my Lina stood up by my side—though she spoke not, 'twas easy to see,

As she put her sweet arms round my neck, and rested her beautiful head

On my breast, that her dear heart was full of the tenderest pity for me.

And I said : " My Christina, we've labored and struggled together till now ;

Our children are grown, and you want us to separate, now we are old ; No lawyer can part us, Christina, no lawyer can sever our vow, But I'll leave you and go forth alone on my way through the rain and the cold."

Then my poor Lina cried, and she bade me reflect, and the boys they said " Stay ! "

And I paused for a moment and I looked at Christina—she said not a word.

One word would have kept me. But no, it came not, and I hurried away,

And my Lina's sweet voice " Oh, dear father, come back," was the last that I heard.

And so I have wandered back here to the scenes of my childhood and youth ;

Have stood by the grave of my father and mother—have seen the old home

On the hillside at Schramberg—and yet Mr. Consul, to tell you the truth,

I find that I can not be happy while far from the loved ones I roam.

For my sweet Lina's words, " Oh, dear father, come back," always ring in my ears,

And I'm going this day ; but for fear there should come on the journey some ill,

There's no telling, you know, what might happen, perchance, to a man of my years,

I have come, Mr. Consul, this morning to ask you to draw up my will.

And I want you to make my old woman entitled to all that I've got In case of my death. After all I can trust her to do what is fair

By the children in case she survives me. Just say that I, Christian Roth— " What !

Is your name Christian Roth ? Here's a letter addressed to you here in my care."

A letter ! My Lina's handwriting, and postmarked at Scott, Illinois ! Here, quick, let me read it : " Dear father, my mother implores you to come.

She tenderly asks your forgiveness ; and now, she and I and the boys Are lovingly waiting your coming, and eager to welcome you home." —George L. Catlin.

COUCHES AND COVERLIDS.

Modern Fashions and Tendencies in the Matter of Beds and Bedding.

Within this century, says the New York Times, the fashion in beds has undergone a complete revolution. The four-poster gave way to a less cumbersome construction known as the Elizabethan bed, which, having only two upright posts at the head and none at the feet, left the greater portion of the bed exposed. Enlarged ideas of the necessity of cleanliness next induced the adoption of white curtains, and bed furniture changed in character. The patch-work quilt of the industrious period of Queen Anne's reign was replaced by the dimity and magella counterpanes of our own time. These, however, in the general sweep of the modern revival are again falling into disfavor, and in the fashionable home to-day the white quilt is superseded by a piece of decorative work, or at least by decorative material. Pillow-shams are essentially American. The pillow-case, with its rich lace trimming and embroidery, is sufficient in English and French bed-rooms ; it was reserved for the American housewife to provide an extra adornment in the shape of movable shams, their name being the most honest thing about them. These also, are retiring before enlightenment. " Shams " are not to be tolerated in the face of devotion to art, the soul of which, our latest seer has informed us, is " reality," so that in a few more years pillow-shams, with their mottoes, and embroidery, and lace, will perhaps be sought for in museums. When we come to a consideration of the latest fashions in bedsteads and their belongings, we find much that is an evident move in the right direction. Foremost among modern innovations is the spring mattress. The old unwieldy, upholstered spring, which originated in France and about which there was so much amusing discussion when it first found its way into English homes, and then to the States, is likely to be entirely displaced by the sensible, cleanly spring frame of American manufacture. This, whether of slats or of spiral springs, has everything to recommend it ; it is clean, can be washed, and is open to a current of air, and so entirely free from all the objections to the old spring mattress. It can not be too highly recommended either for single or double beds. Small spring frames of the kind are now provided for the little cot beds which are so very prettily made for children in wrought iron and brass. The introduction of the brass bedstead into modern homes is, perhaps, the greatest revolution that has been attempted. A few years ago these bedsteads were entirely unknown in America. Now one house alone exhibits twenty different styles, and there is little doubt that they will meet with increasing favor. They are so very handsome in appearance, are so light, and so easily moved from one side of the room to the other, and, above all, they are so free from all impurities, as no dust collects upon them, that probably in time they will entirely supersede those of wood. It has taken time to prove that they do not lead to increase of work in the need of constant polish, but a wash has recently been invented which renders the metal impervious to the influence of moisture, and so does away with the principal objection to their universal adoption. It is unnecessary to speak of the marvels of decoration and carving which are introduced into the modern bedstead by the fashionable decorator. Unlimited command of money can secure any amount of it, but it is not altogether to be deplored that very few persons after all are in this blissful position. Beds, like other matters, are often the better for being simple, and the house-keeper who sighs with envy for the ebony bedstead inlaid with ivory or silver may be comforted by the reflection that a handsome brass bedstead that fulfills the intention of its construction, is more appropriate in homes where dollars are not counted by thousands than the magnificence of carving and silver would be. A curious novelty was announced the other day in connection with some new houses which are being erected in New York with all the modern improvements. It must be a strange brain that originated the idea of beds supplied with pipes for steam heat instead of slats, so that the tenants of these domiciles can warm their bedsteads at will. How much the comfort of the bed depends upon its ventilation few people stop to consider. Yet every one knows how important it is for health to keep the atmosphere of a room pure and free for exhalation. The bed in which so many hours are passed receives the emanations given off more freely from the body in sleep than at any other time, and both bedstead and mattresses should be of such a nature that they can be constantly cleansed and exposed to the fresh air. Iron bedsteads have a good deal to recommend them, but they are not nearly so handsome as those of brass, while those made of cane or rattan, while they are cool and pleasant looking in summer, have not the cozy and comfortable appearance of a well-made, substantial brass bedstead. There is no limit to the variety that the latest fashion allows to coverlids. Beds in handsome houses are covered with quilts of exquisite rose-color, a pale-blue, or cream-colored satin embroidered in silver thread, while others again have centres of satin and deep borderings of plush. Expense is the only limit to the expression of individual taste in this direction. It is impossible, in considering beds, to avoid some notice of the many now popular as folding ones, which take the guise of different articles of furniture, and only play the part of beds at night. There is absolutely one thing only to be urged in their favor, and that is the necessity of their adoption in cases where room is so precious that a bed-room is impossible, and yet even in these cases it is generally a clear sacrifice of health to appearance to adopt them. Under the most favorable conditions they are objectionable, and where conditions are so little favorable that space is the main reason for their use, they are less so than ever. A close, shut-up bedstead in a close, pent-up room suggests a multiplicity of objections which it is useless to attempt to cope with. If people must have shut-up bedsteads, let them, at least, be of a nature to admit of ventilation, and not a mass of upholstered material, which is the receptacle of dust and every possible impurity. Of the two evils—a room with a bed in it, or a bed turned into a table, a bureau, or a washstand—we should say choose the least, and prefer the possibility of cleanliness and freshness with an acknowledged bed to the certainty of stuff and impurity in a shut-up bedstead.

PUBLISHERS' NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Subscription, $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance—postage prepaid. City subscribers served by carriers at $4.50 per year, or 10 cents per week. Sample copies free. Single copies, 10 cents.
 Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as new addresses.
 The American News Company, New York, and branches, are Agents for the Eastern trade. The Argonaut can be ordered from any News Dealer in the United States or Europe.
 Persons mailing single copies of the Argonaut must affix a two-cent stamp.
 News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders from the trade should be addressed.
 No traveling canvassers employed. Order by mail, or through your local News Dealer.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."
 A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

ENTERED AT THE SAN FRANCISCO POSTOFFICE AS SECOND CLASS MATTER.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PIXLEY - - - - - Editor.

SATURDAY, JULY 8, 1882.

CONTENTS:

Page.	Page.
EDITORIALS:	OLD FAVORITES..... 5
The Anniversary of our Nation's Independence—The Times and the Country in Which we Live—The Combination of Individuals in Cooperative Trade-Union—The Bless of Humanity Pouring in upon us from Foreign Lands—Our own Glorious State and its Prospects—The Triumph of the Spring Valley Water Company—J. K. McCauley's attack on Vice and Texas..... 8-9	INDIVIDUALITIES..... 5
THE DIAMOND LENS..... 1-3	NEW YORK NABOBS..... 6
SOCIETY NOTES AND GOSSIP..... 4	LITERARY NOTES..... 6
VANITY FAIR..... 4	WHAT THEY THINK OF HER..... 7
	AMBIGUOUS VERSE..... 7
	COUCHES AND COVERLIDS..... 7
	THE LARKS OF LONDON..... 10
	STORYETTES..... 10
	THE ALLIGED HUMORISTS..... 11
	FESTIVITIES OF THE FOURTH:
	"Tristan" at Monterey..... 12
	"Tom-all-Alone" at the Geysers..... 12
	"Stella" at Santa Cruz..... 13
	"Agamemnon" at San José..... 13-15
	THE TUNEFUL LIAR..... 14

On the Fourth of July just past were gathered together the citizens of all our different States, parts of a national union only recently rent by civil war. It was a good day for the men of the North and those of the South to forget the causes that produced the war, the passions that stirred to arms, the bloody history of that dark day of our nation's life, and to remember only that the war is ended, the day has passed, and that in celebrating the birthday of our nation's liberty we are citizens of the same united commonwealth, gathered together under the starry splendor of the same flag that was unfurled by our heroic sires when they flung it to the breeze in challenge of their right to become a free and independent commonwealth, and to take their rightful stand among the self-governing nations of the world. There were gathered together, too, members of different political parties, just entering upon a State campaign which is destined to be both active and earnest, and if there is any day in the year when partisan resentments and party feelings are to be forgotten that day is the Fourth of July. Avoiding, therefore, all unpleasant reference to politics, religion, and such national questions as we may hold different opinions upon, let us review those topics which, as Americans, we hold in common sympathy and as citizens of the same country—some by birth and some by adoption.

Let us congratulate ourselves on the age in which we live, the country in which we are all proud to be dwellers, and the State in which our destinies are cast. We can favorably contrast this our nineteenth century era with any that have gone before—with the ages of stone, and iron, and bronze. This age of ours is a golden one—golden, not with reference to its metallic wealth, but golden in the sense that it is an age of civilization and of law; of intelligence and progress; an age of personal liberty, in which conscience is free, and property respected; an age whose institutions are based upon the recognition of natural rights, and the reciprocal obligations which men and women owe to each other; an age which, while it encourages the ambition of honorable men, and permits the accumulation of vast wealth, yet recognizes the restraints of society, and imposes limitations upon the exercise of power attending exalted position and the possession of great riches; an age of constitutional government—one in which imperial and ulated codes and common laws; an age in which there is no existing civilized community in which the will of the people is not a potent factor, and in which the tendency toward an equal enjoyment of political power by all the people is a growing sentiment, and fast approaching universal recognition and practical realization. The growth of our institutions has been so easy, so natural, and so healthy, that we look with alarm upon the efforts of other communities to obtain for themselves the privileges which we have inherited without a struggle from our honored and wise forefathers. We see the nihilist struggle going on against the Romanoff dynasty; we hear of assassinations, secret conspiracies, and what seems to us most revolting crimes. While we may not excuse crime, justify conspiracy, or palliate political murders, we must not misunderstand the struggle that is going on in Russia. It is a rude and barbarous revolt of a rude and barbarous people against insufferable wrongs otherwise irremediable. It is the desperate venture of a desperate people to escape a prison of utter despair. It is the effort of slaves to wrench themselves from their manacles, though in the effort they die. Rude, barbarous, and desperate as this effort may seem to us, it is, after all, but a struggle for liberty and for constitutional law. Give to the nihilists in Russia the privileges and the protection we enjoy under our constitutional form of government, and the Czar might be safely crowned at his capital, and safely sleep under the jeweled hauberk of his imperial diadem. Who shall say that we enjoy privileges to which we are not entitled, and who shall say that the Russian serf or citizen is not entitled to equal liberties with us? Socialism in Germany, communism in France, agrarianism in Ireland, and labor strikes all over the world, are evidences of a popular unrest that is chafing against the tyranny of kings, the entrenched power of dynasties, the abuse of traditional customs, the wrongs and encroachments of governmental authority.

The time is coming when everywhere the lowly are to be lifted up, the ignorant are to be better informed, and human rights are to be more fully recognized. The two extremes of society are to be brought nearer upon a common level, privileged classes are to come down, and it will be the fault of the intelligent, wealthy, and favored few if they await the time when they shall be dragged down in violence rather than to hasten the period when by their aid the lower class shall be lifted up to a position where all may repose in safety. It will be the fault and the misfortune of the rich and wealthy few, if by their greed and their exactions they permit the contest between capital and labor to be carried to extremes; for as sure as God lives there is a coming adjustment of the inequalities of social life, such a striking of balances as will not permit one class to live in idleness and luxurious ease, while the other, and larger, and stronger class starves, and struggles, and toils in poverty, destitution, and crime. Of all the nations and all the peoples where this contest will come last, and where it ought not to come at all, is in this country of ours. In the United States there is and there can be no evil that may not be remedied by law. There can be no oppressive political power, no abuse of governmental authority, no combination of individuals or corporations, no illegal accumulation of wealth that can not be restrained and regulated by the people themselves in a legitimate, peaceful, and legal way. In a country where the people make the laws there can be no excuse for any other attempt at reforms or for the remedy of wrongs than through the law. In a country where every male citizen of the age of twenty-one years is clothed with the elective privilege, is eligible to executive, judicial, and legislative office, has the right to hear arms, has access for his children to public schools, has unrestricted freedom of conscience and unrestrained personal liberty within the law, there is no excuse for any act of illegal resistance to legal authority, because the people have in their own hands the power to make, interpret, and enforce the laws. From the people come the legislators, the judges, and the executive officers. There is no conceivable wrong that can not be remedied by the people themselves. Resistance to Chinese invasion; the destruction of valley lands, navigable streams, and harbors by hydraulic mining; exactions by corporations as to fares and freights on railroads, gas and water charges; monopoly of lands; excessive taxation through corrupt rings; evils resulting from combinations of financial syndicates; ecclesiastical interference with our system of non-sectarian education; the dangerous growth of colossal fortunes—all these things and all kindred wrongs can find their corrections, remedies, and preventions through the law, and by the processes of the courts. Vigilance committees, Lynch-law tribunals, squatter riots, popular excitements, Mussel Slough and sand-lot uprisings, are inexcusable crimes within the jurisdiction of a government like ours, and however they may be excused or palliated as the acts of good citizens, compelled by seeming necessities to have recourse to extraordinary measures for the prevention of wrongs or the vindication of rights, they are not to be defended upon any principle, and they are not the acts of good and wise citizens. At the bottom of all such movements there is some criminal mind agitating and setting the law at defiance for some selfish and dishonest purpose.

Labor strikes, properly conducted, are defensible upon the highest principles of morals. It is the prerogative of any citizen, or association of citizens, to strike for higher wages and to refuse to work until all their legal demands are complied with. Labor strikes, which through terrorism prevent any other class who are rightfully entitled to labor from going to work for the employers whom the strikers have left, are illegal combinations as cowardly as they are criminal, and if capital was not—as it always is—selfish, cowardly, and conscienceless, it would never yield to criminal demands made in the interest of workingmen. Trade unions, organized for the encouragement of labor and for its protection from the aggressions of capital, are as ancient as the trade guilds out of which came the ancient and honorable order of speculative Masonry, and they are honorable, and to be encouraged if honorably conducted. But the trade union which will by illegal acts prevent a boy from learning a trade, and will, in order to preserve the labor rights of present members, deprive the rising generation from acquiring an occupation and becoming skilled laborers in any pursuit their tastes or opportunities may incline them to, is a cowardly monstrosity having its foundation in ignorance and its growth in haste and criminal selfishness.

While all the world is enjoying the triumphs of steam and electricity, gas and iron, the railways, the commerce, the industry, the appliances, and the conveniences of this age of marvelous progress, and while art, science, literature, and learning are everywhere making giant strides, and everywhere contributing to the elevation and happiness of the human family, we may rejoice that we are keeping fully abreast with the advancement of the age. And may we not here indulge in the selfish hope that for us and our children we may preserve this splendid inheritance without being in haste to divide it with the over-thronged hordes of China and India from across the Pacific, or the redundant populations from over the Atlantic? God has planted in the breast of all his children a love for home, family, and kin. He has imparted to all the instinct of a selfish desire to keep the home free from the encroachment of the stranger; to preserve hearth, and wife, and little ones who come to bless the marriage relation, from contact with the intruder. As we would not divide our acres, however broad, with the tramp that passes our gate, nor share our house, though spacious, with those who are not akin to us, nor divide our substance, though ample, with the idler who wants, or make our domiciles the asylum for all who suffer, are we not permitted to extend this instinct of self-preservation to our country, and not be over anxious to invite to its enjoyment the unworthy or the unfortunate of other lands? Assuredly we may not desire to so extend the invitation of foreign immigration as to admit to our shores the criminals, paupers, and idlers of other countries. We may not blame an ancestry of generous Argonauts if they threw wide open the doors to indiscriminate hospitality; remembering their conditions and the conditions of the country, we may accredit them with a wise prudence in advertising America as the home of the oppressed, the asylum of the persecuted, the sanctuary and city of refuge of all who would seek a home in America, and share the toils and dangers of its subjugation from the savage, and its reclamation from forest and prairie. Then none came, none could come, but the strong, the young, the prudent, and the enterprising. Then came the resolute and virtuous; earnest men for the enjoyment of religious freedom; proud men for the indulgence of personal liberty; able men to escape political persecution; ambitious men to build up fortunes in a new world, and all toilers in the fields of intellectual and physical development. But now, with a population of fifty millions, is it not time to consult reason and prudence somewhat? Is it not time to think of closing the flood-gates of an indiscriminate immigration? We have reason to believe that more than one of the governments of the European world are sending to us their paupers, and that some are sending to us their criminals. Whenever this fact shall be demonstrated it will become the duty of our government to arrest this class of people, and to declare, with an emphasis that will command attention, that the United States is not to be made a penal colony, or lazaretto, or hospital for crime, pauperism, or disease. The time has already come when it is the apparent duty of Congress to amend our immigration laws so that this evil shall be arrested.

It is in the same line of argument that there should be a prompt reformation of our naturalization laws to the end that ignorance, bigotry, and crime should be prevented from having political voice or influence in the making or execution of our laws. The elective privilege is the dearest prerogative of a free people. Upon its proper exercise rests the safety of the republic, and while we recognize the difficulty of taking this privilege from any who are now clothed with it, there can be no question that it is a duty most imperative and immediate that we should withhold it from any further extension. This is native Americanism, but it is that generous Americanism that would permit all the better class of foreigners to come to our country, and would preserve the political control of the government to those who are born upon its soil. Thus, and thus only, can we preserve inviolate the splendid institutions that we have received as an inheritance from our ancestry: thus only can we transmit this inheritance unimpaired to our posterity; thus only can we demonstrate to the coming ages that intelligent men are capable of self-government. A government, republican in form, can, in the very nature of things, be only maintained by an intelligent and prosperous people. Intelligence secures prosperity. Let us therefore be willing to take a new departure in those things that are essential to the preservation of American liberty. Let us restrict foreign immigration to the intelligent, law-abiding, and self-supporting. Let us withhold the right of the elective franchise from all foreigners as a matter of right, and only confer it upon the deserving as a matter of favor, to be granted by legislative act to the exceptionally deserving individual. Let us educate all our children at the public expense in the rudimentary elements of an English education, and thus remove the question of intellectual fitness from the field of discussion by making all our citizens intelligent. Let us keep our public institutions free from all ecclesiastical interference. Let there be no union of church and state, to the end that both may be free. Let no laws of primogeniture or entail ever grow up in our land, so that there may be no dangerous accumulations of property; for what may be acquired under the operation of equal laws will be distributed by operation of natural laws.

Passing out from under the shadow of these more serious reflections, let us consider ourselves and our California home. There are grander monuments of art and more costly architectural structures in foreign lands; there are temples, cathedrals, and palaces, evidencing wealth, magnificence, and power. But everywhere grim-visaged, hollow-eyed poverty haunts the traveler. It is one of the penalties of foreign travel that one is never beyond the outstretched palm that begs for charity; that one is never beyond the sight of distress and poverty that he can not alleviate. In the great cities of the old world one does not escape, day or night, the observation of scenes that wound the feelings and arouse the sensibilities. We do not now speak of the oppressions of political power; the ever-present military display, of forts, and guns, and frowning authority, that are necessary to keep in subjection classes that would be driven by poverty to revolution and crime, if they were not repressed by the fear of the military arm—we speak of the swarming mass of destitute, hopeless poor. Contrasting this with the ease and plenty, the overflowing abundance that in this State is within the reach of every man, woman, and child who is in health, and willing to labor, one feels upon his return from abroad like kneeling down upon the green sod and furrowed earth, and thanking the good God that his destiny is cast in this happy land; that by birth or adoption he is an American citizen. With these scenes in memory, and reflecting that our land is not broad enough to receive all the poor of God's earth, we are not one of those who are anxious to throw open our country to the evils of a redundant population. There is not a farmer who sits upon his vine-covered veranda, and, looking over his fields, thinks them too broad of acreage for himself and children. We think the valleys of this State are not too broad nor the hillsides too wide to furnish the grains and fruits, the wine and wool that our children will need in the coming future. If we persevere, this inheritance for them is a princely one, for nowhere else in all God's world is there a land so delectable as this; a climate so genial, and a soil so rich; a land so literally flowing with milk and honey; where the fields so bend with the ripening grain, with fruits so plenty and flowers so rich; hillsides with their clustering grapes; mountains covered with flocks of snowy fleece and herds of lowing kine; a State within whose broad borders there is not one honest beggar in health, and wherein no man, woman, or child need go supperless to bed. When we hear of violent uprisings in other lands; lands rent with social feuds; people standing in awe of vast armies for whose support their labor is taxed, let us contemplate our own peaceful homes where plenty reigns, and Peace, the blue-eyed goddess, smiles upon us; a country whose only political danger lies in the fact that our revenues so exceed our necessary expenses of government that our otherwise honest politicians are tempted to steal. Let us contrast this, our State, with our Eastern homes; their shivering winters, where it demands the courage of an Arctic voyager to go from the hearth to the wood-pile of a winter's day; their summer heats and sun-strokes; their terrible cyclones that tear up forests and villages, scattering death in their dreadful march of ruin; their destructive storms of thunder and lightning; their epidemic and contagious diseases, and their mad dogs—let us contrast these with our mild winters, with their genial rains; our soft summers, with their generous breezes which fan us of nights; our absence of lightning-strokes, of epidemics, and the fact that we have no sun-strokes, and that dogs never run mad. A land of peace, of plenty, of safety, and of beauty; of splendid mountain scenery; great hills reaching to eternal snows, clad in grand old primeval forests; chasms into which great rivers leap; hills hiding vast wealth of gold and silver; little hills, on whose sunny slopes vineyards and orchards thrive, where villages and hamlets cluster, and where school-houses and churches nestle. Great, rich, broad valleys, through which broad, deep rivers run, bearing commerce on their bosoms, bordered by vast farms, and bristling with towns; great bays where commerce thrives, and great cities send up the hum of their industries; wharves at which great ships unhurden themselves of Oriental bales, to become big-bellied with grain, and fruit, and wine for foreign lands. Looking out of a summer's eve across the bright waters of our beautiful bay, watching through our Golden Gate the glorious sunset painting with gorgeous colors our western sky, our hill-tops gilded with the expiring glory of departing day, we need not feel that there is less of beauty because it does not linger on ruined castles, or frowning battlements, or monuments of past or present power. In this land of peace, plenty, safety, and beauty; under a government that gives liberty and individual freedom under the law; that guarantees freedom of religious opinion and its exercise; that provides education for all, and clothes all adult males with equal political power; that keeps no standing army to oppress; that has no ruling class, no dynasty to inherit kingly authority; that has no laws binding church to state; no laws of primogeniture or entail to tie up landed property; no cold winters, nor hot summers, nor cyclones, nor epidemics, nor lightning-strokes, nor sun-strokes, nor mad dogs—there seems to be no reason why the people should not be content.

We are apt to make life altogether too serious. If we should wake up in the next world and find there was none, we should have occasion to reproach ourselves for many neglected opportunities for a good time lost. We are too ambitious to get rich. And if there is another and a hotter world than this, those of our restless, over-reaching, toiling rich men, who find themselves where their gold is melting and water is scarce, may regret that they did not make better use of their money in a country where it was current, and at a time when it was at par. It was the evident intention of the Creator to make the life of His creatures an enjoyable and pleasant one. To birds, and beasts, and fishes He gave the air, and earth, and water for their enjoyment; to them He gave hut one care—that of procuring food for themselves and for their young—and the young are not too long permitted to depend upon the parents' care. To man He gave dominion over the earth; and, through art and science, skill, labor, and industry, he is to subject it to his use. That use is for the advancement of his pleasure, for healthful, rational enjoyment. The man or woman who does not make that use of life is as unnatural and ungrateful, as wicked and absurd as the well-fed bird who sits in the sun and will not sing. And the parent who does not delight in seeing children enjoy themselves is as unnatural as the austere sheep who sulks and frowns when lambskins sport upon the meadow in the sunlight. There is more sunshine than shadow, if we only look for it; there are more gay than grave things; there is more of music, and melody, and joy, and gladness in the natural universe than there is of sad and solemn sound and gloomy sight. The bright and glorious orb around which our earth revolves has only here and there a dark spot upon its shining surface; the moon is always half in light, and reflects more of sunshine than shadow; the stars are ever bright, and when hidden by the darkness of intervening clouds, these are silver-lined. There are Books in the running brooks;

Sermons in stones, and good in everything.

There is music in the rustling wind, the babbling stream, the insects' breathing hum, the song of birds, and the whirr of cities; solemn anthems sung in forest leaves, and sublimest melody from the ocean's wave. There are grand paintings by the Master hung upon the arching vault as the sunset lingers on our western sky; scenes upon our hills as they change from emerald green to russet brown; more gorgeous landscapes in our valleys than Claude Lorraine could paint; more beauties in the heart of mountains than the glowing pencil of artist can catch and transfer to canvas. This is a jolly world of ours if we would make it so. It is a glorious life spread out for our enjoyment for the three-score years and ten of our allotment, if with happy hearts and cheerful minds we would make it so. Too many of us, ambitious for power, eager to grow rich, annoyed by small vexations, make life a constant battle from the cradle to the grave.

The recent decision by the Supreme Court of the question of free water sets at rest a long vexed controversy—a controversy in which all the equities were on the side of the Spring Valley Water Company, but which the Bulletin and Call, with great ingenuity and pertinacity, have dragged into municipal politics, and with great insincerity have colored with passion and misrepresentation. It has been apparent to every intelligent and honest man who knows anything about the rules that govern business affairs, that the Spring Valley Company could not afford to supply San Francisco with water unless it was paid for it a remunerative price; unless the company could earn fair interest above expenses on the capital invested, it would be wronged, and its stockholders would have been unjustly and dishonorably dealt with. Admitting that the revenues of the company must be sufficient to pay current running expenses, necessary improvements, and proper dividends, then it is manifest that somebody must pay for all the water consumed. It is equally apparent that just exactly to the extent that the municipal government should be relieved from paying for the water used in parks, on streets, in sewers, and for extinguishing fires, and for public buildings, just to that extent the burden would be placed on the private consumer. It came to this, that all the water used by the public, and in the interest of the public, for protection against fires and for the convenience and protection of property, was charged to private consumers, and was to them a grievous burden. The Bulletin and Call, having constituted themselves the especial organs of free water, claimed that Spring Valley was, under an old franchise, compelled to supply water to everybody except the private consumer for nothing. Under pretense of being the people's free-water advocate, they practically relieved the great property-owners, the non-improving lot-owners, the speculators in real estate, non-residents, and the owners of merchandise and personal property from paying any water-tax, and devolved the whole load upon individual consumers. In the meantime these journals encouraged the sinking of artesian wells, which come into direct competition with the company, without being compelled to contribute anything for protection against fire, or for the adornment, comfort, or health of the city. This whole water business has been an outrage, costly and vexatious. The cost has fallen upon water-consumers, the vexation upon the water company's managers and stockholders. The Supreme Court has, in a decision too long for us to review or analyze, determined that under the provisions of the new constitution the city shall not have free water, but must pay for it; that the new constitution, in taking from the company any voice in fixing the rates of water, relieved it thereby from the duty of supplying water to the city for any purpose free of charge. Those non-resident speculators in real estate, those who carry great stocks of merchandise, those who drive their carriages in the park and enjoy its splendid drives, and appreciate the blessings of flushed sewers, and all at somebody else's expense, may be selfish and mean enough to regret this decision, but every business man, property-owner, and tax-payer who has intelligence enough to know what is right, and honesty enough to admit it, will congratulate the some eighteen thousand water consumers on their emancipation from an unjust, unequal, and illegal municipal burden. We congratulate the water company on what we hope is a final triumph over personal malignity and demagogism. We congratulate the manufacturers who use water, the men who keep stables, the men and women who are householders and have bath-tubs, those who sprinkle their lawns, wash their children's faces, and drink water, that they do not have to bear all the burdens of protecting a great city from fire, disease, dirt, and discomfort, by the use of water. The decision, as we understand it, is that the Board of Supervisors is compelled to fix the rates of compensation to be collected for the use of all water supplied to the city and county of San Francisco, as well as to the inhabitants, and it is also decided that the company is not obliged to furnish water for any municipal use whatever free of charge. The practical result of this decision ought to be, and doubtless will be, first to remove the water question from politics. It will no longer be necessary to run party primaries, party conventions, and demand pledges from candidates to the Board of Supervisors and to the Legislature on the question of water rates. It will be the duty of the board at proper times, as required by law, to fix a tariff of water rates upon business principles, giving fair remuneration to the company for the water used. As our city increases in population, and as manufacturing industries multiply, the supplying of water will become more easy and more economical, and in time ought to be brought to something like the prices of Eastern and European cities. The Spring Valley Company will have an abundant and never-exhaustible supply of the best and purest water when they shall add the Calaveras scheme to their present system. It is distributed in quantities to our highest points, and there is no reason, when the works are ultimately completed, that we should not have a perfect system, and at the minimum of expense to the city and to private consumers.

The class of Republicans who have occupations other than political, do not desire an early State Convention. Give us a short campaign, and we will make it hot and decisive. The Democracy are now shelling the woods, while the Republicans are in their rifle-pits along the skirmish line, with their sharpshooters doing effective service. We hope the State Central Committee will not heat the tattoo for roll-call sooner than the thirtieth of August. Then let the order go out for an advance along the whole line. We are prepared to do our duty, unless we have unworthy candidates upon us, in which event we will BOLT.

THE LARKS O' LONDON.

Manners of the Native and Imported English Aristocracy.

Thus far, we have got pretty well beyond the middle of the London season of 1882. So far as the help of the aristocracy is concerned, it has been a painfully tame one. The balls have been, with few exceptions, "chalk balls," as the slang of the day designates second-rate entertainments of the sort. It's true we had a royal wedding as a kind of fillip; but its effect was but for a day, and its grandeur quickly died out, and went honeymooning with Prince Leopold and his young bride, and the balls and parties promised the happy pair when they get tired of hilling and cooing down at Claremont, have got to take place.

In the meantime, instead of grand affairs, such as the Duke of Northumberland used to give at his town residence, Northumberland House, before its site, facing Trafalgar Square, was wanted for the Grand Hotel; the Duke of Westminster, at Grosvenor House, before he became a widower; and the Duke of Devonshire, at Devonshire House, ere the Dublin assassins plunged the family into mourning, the gist of entertaining is done by rich parvenus like the Brassys, Sassoons, Bonsors, and Carterwoods—people who a few years ago no one even so much as heard of, but who now, thanks to the patronage and free-and-easy happy-go-lucky social tastes of the Prince of Wales, are among the most prominent of hall-givers this season, their entertainments, however, smacking more of ostentatious display and vulgar expenditure of money than the attendance of blue blood. It is an unquestionable fact that the people who used to keep up the season in its greatness and dignity have certainly drawn in, and not alone in the giving of entertainments, but in other respects is this observable. Footmen are so rarely seen standing behind carriages now that when a well-appointed carriage (such as one knows, from well-groomed horses and smartly liveried servants, must belong to the stables of a great house) passes through the streets, people turn round and stare after it. Once upon a time the servants' houquets were features at a drawing-room. Now they are small and not too choice. In many instances they are altogether omitted. Liveries have a second-best sort of look, and there is a decided falling off in harness. The explanation of much of it lies in the fact that in the present time people go to court who in the early days of Queen Victoria's reign would only have looked in at the gate of Buckingham Palace, and for which fact, in a great measure, is the Prince of Wales to blame.

On the Queen's "retirement from public life," (as her seclusion is called,) upon the death of the Prince Consort, twenty years ago, the Prince of Wales was forced to the front as the active head of the court, and he has since continued to wield unhampered the social sceptre. Sometime his august mamma pulls herself together, and puts on the brakes, as she did about the professional beauties, ladies against whose appearance at court she has unrelentingly set her face. But as a general thing Albert Edward does pretty much as he likes about the place. His fitness, however, for the position of head of the English court even his friends can not support. Beginning with his false marriage in Ireland to an innocent and confiding girl, when he was quartered at the Currough Camp with the Grenadier Guards, away back in '62, and following his career through the Lady Mordaunt episode, to his pranks with every married beauty who has an indifferent husband, his record is scarcely clean enough to expect encouragement at his hands of a state of moral excellence around about him. As a consequence, instead of his court and followers being composed of the highest, purest, and best in the kingdom, he is surrounded by a mixed assemblage, whose chief recommendation to his favor consists in their ability to amuse him. "The Prince's set" are well known in England for a rapid, flashy, horsey, slangy lot, and while his station as heir apparent to the throne makes it a nominal honor to be considered one of them, the really best people shrink from the association. I am sorry to say I don't think the Princess exerts herself as much in the shape of a check upon him as she might, and rather goes in for the same style of thing herself in a quiet way. I heard the other day something about her that will show somewhat the kind of person she is. There is a young man belonging to the suite of one of the princes, Lord somebody or other's son, I forget the name, who is afflicted with a very bad heart complaint, so bad in fact that his physicians warn him that any physical exertion, dancing in particular, may cause his instant death. Well, you know the court etiquette is that the Princess of Wales asks her partners to dance; no one can ask her. She knows quite well the precarious condition of the young man, yet she never sees him at a ball, where he goes to quietly stand and look on, but she goes up and asks him to dance. He can't refuse, of course, and away he has to go at the risk of his life. She thinks it good fun, and "a lark."

There has been quite a flight of Americans from the colony in London for visits home, the Mandevilles, Randolph-Churchills, and Pagets, among the number. I suppose you know that Mrs. Paget's mother, Mrs. Paran Stevens, does better in New York, a good way, than in London. You see the Pagets belong to the "Prince of Wales's set," and though it is looked down upon by the heavy swells, and consists chiefly of people who are not shocked at a small divergence from the paths of propriety now and then, it is yet composed of persons who know how to speak and dress properly, and conduct themselves, when on their good behavior, with propriety and good breeding. Therefore, a woman of Mrs. Stevens's calibre, who thinks nothing of wearing a dozen or two gigantic lockets strung round her neck at a ball, and calls ladies "us feminines," is not exactly the sort of person to make her daughter comfortable in princely society. I heard a good story of Mrs. Stevens the other day. It was before Captain Paget, with his Angleseyan blood and empty pockets, captured the American heiress to so many hotels, and when the young Duke of Montrose was the parti in demand. They were at a pigeon-match at Hurlingham, given by the officers of the Fifth Lancers, of which dashing regiment the young duke was a gay lieutenant—that is to say, Mrs. Stevens, Miss Minnie, and the duke. Now it is a sort of ballucination with many Americans who have been to Paris, and there picked up a smattering of the language, that no one away from that famous capital either speaks or understands French but themselves. Mrs. Paran Stevens possesses this delusion. She had been so intently watching the shooting that she had not observed that Miss Minnie had wandered away around the grounds with a plain young "Mr.," when she should have been interestedly counting the birds that fell to the gun of his grace. Making chase with as much agility as her velvets and lockets and her sixty odd years would permit, she hore down with ruffled front upon the hapless girl. What she said was said in French, easier of liberal and general translation than literal repetition, the gist of it being a good rating for thus neglecting her chances with the duke, coupled with peremptory orders to return and appease him by compliments on his shooting. Turning, they found that the duke had joined them unobserved—an unintended, but none the less painfully conscious listener to the tirade. Of course his good breeding enabled him to conceal from the mother the smile that showed the daughter he had heard all. But he did not say much, except that he had come to wish them good-bye, having an engagement in town. And that was the last of the Duke of Montrose, so far as the Stevens were concerned. People wondered, of course, and all sorts of reasons, ill-natured and otherwise, were given for the sudden breach but the right one, among them that the duke's mamma (now the wife of Crawford, the great racing man) had made inquiries in America concerning the Stevens's condition, both social and financial, in their native land, which she did not consider as turning out sufficiently satisfactory to allow her sanction to the bestowal of her son's strawberry-leaved coronet in the Stevens's direction. It was rather hard lines upon poor Minnie, who is as nice a girl as you would wish to see; "free from affectation, and a lady au fond," as I heard an officer in the Blues say about her at a ball one night. Of course there are lots of things laid at her door that she never says, among them that when Captain Paget proposed to her at Cannes, where they were staying at the time, she replied: "Do you mean biz or spangles?"

I do not begin to know how long the Mandevilles will stay—probably as long as it takes the Duke of Manchester to float his land scheme. I hardly think Lord Mandeville is a success, socially or otherwise, in London, though his wife certainly is. Sir John Lister-Kaye, who married the other sister, is back in London again. Lord Randolph Churchill has also returned. Lord Randolph is looked upon now as a political failure. Do you know that before he met Miss Jerome, of New York, and made her Lady Randolph, he proposed for an heiress, the daughter of a brewer living near Oxford, and was refused. He had an easier game with your republican seekers after titles, and made old Jerome settle the Union League Club in New York on his daughter before he'd put the ring on her finger. I was told not very long ago by a friend who made the passage with the young couple from New York, when they came over to England just after their marriage, that the way Lord Randolph treated and neglected his young bride was disgraceful. However, things seem to get on all right now.

One doesn't hear or see so much of the Thornburg-Croppers this season. Mrs. Cropper is the lady whom certain representatives of the American press delight in styling "Lady Cropper." Why or wherefore no one on this side, where titles are not picked up in the street, has the faintest idea. I have no doubt it must annoy her tremendously, and that she gets pretty well chaffed about it there can be no question. One or two of our society papers here—and London is flooded with such literature at present—tried rather hard to elevate Mrs. Cropper into a professional beauty, but I don't think she ever quite achieved that questionable distinction. Her husband's father, old Mr. Cropper, had a very pretty villa down near Penshurst, in Kent—that garden county of England. The place was called Swaylands, and this is probably where Mrs. Thornburg got her idea of "Narrowlands" as a name for her California ranch. Well, when old Cropper died, Swaylands was put up at auction in the mart at Tokenhouse Yard in 1878, and sold for twenty thousand pounds sterling. I don't know where the Cropper seat is now.

By the Duke of Grafton's death another comparatively poor man finds himself elevated to a dukedom, with fine estates and a large rent-roll. Lord Augustus Fitzroy, the late duke's brother, who now succeeds to the title, was a plain colonel in the army, and content to receive the small emoluments that flow from the position of equerry to the Queen. There is one unfortunate circumstance connected with his succession, however. His eldest son, who now becomes the Earl of Euston, did, while he was simple Mr. Fitzroy, an officer in the Rifle Brigade, so silly a thing as to go and marry a young woman of the lowest character, who distinguished herself at their first meeting in a London public house (as we call our drinking saloons) by throwing a tumbler at his head. The marriage took place some years ago, and there is a said to be a thriving family as the fruit of it. The shady woman's appearance among the nobility as a full-fledged countess is therefore not hailed with the delightful enthusiasm an event of the sort would otherwise be supposed to create. Particularly trying is it, as it is said the young Earl of Shrewsbury has just transformed his chère amie, the divorced Mrs. Mundy, into a countess also. There are people who say we must not judge the aristocracy at large by the acts of the few. Perhaps not. But the noble black list seems decidedly on the increase, all the same. And more's the pity.

LONDON, June 21, 1882.

Miss Lizzie Sargent, daughter of the newly appointed Minister at the Court of Potsdam, is going to study medicine at the University of Heidelberg, while her papa attends to his diplomatic duties in Berlin. The lecture-room and the exposition of gray-haired professors have more charms for this strong-minded young lady than the gilded salons of the Embassy, and the insipid compliments of budding diplomats.

A Texas man of sixty-two who lately took a second wife is now cutting six new front teeth. He's grandpa and baby combined.—Free Press.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

A little girl was promised by her grandmother her gold watch when she should die. The child appreciated the delicacy of the situation, but after some hints the grandmother was prevailed upon to show her the watch. "I wonder," said the little one to her mother, as they were leaving the grandmother's house, "if I shall get the watch in time to wear it at the funeral."—Cincinnati Gazette.

Samuel Randall says he doesn't want to be Governor of Pennsylvania. A beautiful girl looked out of her window one day, and saw her rude brother out on the sidewalk, walking about on his hands with his feet dangling up in the air. "Tom," she said, reprovingly, "don't, Tom; I wouldn't do that, Tom—indeed I wouldn't." "Wouldn't?" replied the rude boy, looking up and speaking with marked and malicious emphasis, "Wouldn't? By Jocks, you couldn't!"—Hawkeye.

An Illinois girl lately called at a coroner's office, and addressing the solitary occupant of the apartment, said: "Be you the coroner?" "I guess you'd think so if you ever see an undertaker shake hands with me," blandly answered the official. "You ain't going anywheres for a day or two, he you?" "Not that I know of." "Well, I'm glad to hear it," continued the maiden, with an air of much encouragement. "Johnnie Bowles has been keepin' company with me since Christmas, but I hear that he's going to take another girl to the circus to-night, and if he does, I'll swaller pisen."

As the majority of the Highland clergy belong to the strictest sect of the Calvinists, Professor Blackie admits that their teaching tends to make the people too grave and austere; and one of his stories illustrates very well the extraordinary strictness with which "the Sawbath" is still observed. A young man going to church one Sunday with an old gentleman in Syke ventured to remark, after they had walked some miles in silence, that it was "a beautiful day." "Yes, indeed, young man," answered his companion; "it is a very beautiful day; but is this a day to be talking about days?"

Peter Cooper and his air-cushion, says the American Queen, have furnished a subject over and over again. They figured in a new and amusing rôle of late. It seems the old gentleman was placidly sitting on his cushion riding up town in a horse-car one morning. A large and fashionably dressed lady came in suddenly and sat down beside him. As she did so a hissing sound was heard. Mr. Cooper seemed to be sinking down into nothingness, and the lady fled, shrieking, from the car. A pin concealed somewhere in her dress had punctured the air-cushion.

Ballentine tells a story of Sir Charles Wetherell, that he escaped from the fury of the Bristol mob in a clean shirt and a pair of braces. Now, Sir Charles, in a momentary fit of weakness, might have been induced to put on a clean shirt, but nobody could ever have persuaded him into braces. He was a most effective and violent speaker in the House of Commons, and owing to his exertions there was usually a wide gap in his habiliments. The Speaker said the only lucid interval he had was between his waistcoat and breeches. Some lawyers went one morning to his chambers for a consultation. They were ushered into a room, and after waiting a considerable time they rang the bell for the servant, and on his appearance asked when Sir Charles would be ready? "Oh, I think it will be very soon," was the answer, "for he has just put his razor in his teapot."

Jesse Collins had the reputation of being the biggest liar in seven counties, and was never known to come out behind. One hot day Bill Hawkins sat on the shady side of his barn. After dinner he saw Jesse riding in great haste toward town. Bill hailed him and went to the gate. Jesse asked what he wanted. "Stop and tell us a big lie," said Bill. "No time for lying now," said Jesse; "your Uncle Sol died suddenly an hour ago, and I am going for the corner and a coffin." And on he went. Bill ran to the house and told his wife. She gathered up the children. He hitched the horse to the wagon, loaded in his family, and posted off, four miles through heat and dust, to Uncle Sol's. On arriving, he found the family and two neighbors in the large kitchen, Uncle Sol buried to the eyes in half a big watermelon. The surprise was mutual, and explanations followed. "Well," said Bill, "I asked Jesse for a big lie, and not only got it, but was fool enough to believe it. I wouldn't believe him again if I knew he was dying."

A few days ago Mrs. Paymaster Tucker, née Logan, was in the members' gallery, viewing the Senate proceedings, while directly in front of her sat two ladies, one evidently a Washingtonian, and the other a stranger. The native was taking unusual pains to make herself agreeable, and as Mrs. Tucker was about to sit down, said to her friend: "There, you see that large man sitting in the centre of the chamber, with the jet black hair and large moustache?" "Yes," "Well, that is General Logan, of Illinois. It isn't generally known, but he is half Indian." At this point Mrs. Tucker could contain herself no longer. So gently tapping the lady on the shoulder, she said: "Excuse me, madam, but you are mistaken when you say that Senator Logan is half Indian." "Well, I guess I ought to know," warmly responded the stranger; "I have lived in Washington all my life, and the fact of his Indian blood has never been questioned before." "I think I ought to know something about the matter, too," quietly answered Mrs. Tucker. "I am General Logan's daughter." As Dundreary says, "The conversation is ended," and with a let-go-of-my-hair-look at Mrs. Tucker, the stranger and her companion flounced out of the gallery.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

In a Dairy.

"Excuse me," he said to the girl in the army-blue dress with the lavender bows; "I would not for the world interrupt you or disturb your gracious equanimity; but I feel it incumbent on me to remark that although your hair is undoubtedly of that rich, warm, golden hue, with tender auburn shades in it that poets have loved to sing and painters have made a specialty of limning, yet that is not bringing me that cold oatmeal and milk, and a glass of cream, and two Graham rolls that I asked you for about half an hour ago."

"No," he said, "you are entirely mistaken. I do not mean to insult you. Homage to beauty is never an insult. It is one of the purest outpourings of the natural heart; and if I call your attention to the fact that you have a shell-like ear, which even the perfect diamond pendant from the mines of Golconda would but mar, it is only that I may the better incline that beautiful organ to listen to my plaintive moan for one cold oatmeal and milk, one glass of cream, and two Graham rolls."

"I was just thinking," he said, "that those eyes of yours, in their blue and crystalline depths, hold something of the mysterious secret of the sea, and that if I had time I would hire a seat for the day, and a telescope, and bask in their pure translucency until my soul melted away in a cerulean bliss. But at present I have leisure only to call your attention to the fact that the hot wheaten-grits and strawberry short-cake with which you have furnished me can not readily be regarded in the light of one cold oatmeal and milk, a glass of cream, and two Graham rolls."

"Do you know," he said, "that you have a mole on your chin which most effectively sets off the pure alabaster of our complexion, and may be called an ornament to the basement of your face? The famous Madame de Pompadour had a mole like that, only not so well situated. Its beauty was frequently remarked on in the court of Louis the Fourteenth. And yet I will wager all I have of the red, red gold that if Madame de Pompadour had taken the contract to furnish me with my modest midday meal, she wouldn't have kept me waiting three-quarters of an hour, and then brought me a piece of pie and a cup of tea for one cold oatmeal and milk, a glass of cream, and two Graham rolls."

"Your voice is most wondrous sweet," he said; "it is not like most women's voices which I hear—the limp, languid, lily voices which the Metropolitan Telephone Company posts at New, Spring, Pearl, and its other street-stations; but those ancient damocles are kinder to me than you, cruel beauty. And when I shout: 'Why on earth can't you connect 786 Law with 41,144 Twenty-first Street?' they answer, blandly: 'We ain't got no such number.' Now, why can't you say—even be ungrammatical, to ease my suspense—say: 'We ain't got no cold oatmeal and milk, one glass of cream, and two Graham rolls.'"

"No," he said to the cashier, as he paid his check on his way out of the dairy, "I admire beauty—no one admires beauty more than I do; but if you think that beautiful young ladies who are too proud to serve the casual customer are either an attraction to a dairy or a substitute for a square meal, you are mistaken. Beauty is a wonderful thing. It has led some of the world's greatest heroes in flowery fetters; but it isn't one cold oatmeal, a glass of cream, and two Graham rolls. Good P. M.!"

And he lit out.—Puck.

Variegated Dogs.

"How do you and your pa get along now?" asked a store-keeper of the bad boy, as he leaned against the counter instead of sitting down on a stool, while he bought a bottle of liniment.

"Oh, I don't know. He don't seem to appreciate me. What he ought to have is a deaf and dumb boy, with only one leg and both arms broke. Then he could enjoy a quiet life. But I am too gay for pa, and you needn't be surprised if you never see me again. I talk of going off with a circus. Since I played the variegated dogs on pa there seems to have been a coldness in the family, and I sleep on the roof."

"Variegated dogs," said the store-keeper, "what kind of a game is that? You have not played another Daisy trick on your pa, have you?"

"Oh, no, it was nothing of that kind. You know pa thinks he is smart. He thinks because he is forty-eight years old that he knows it all; but it don't seem to me as though a man of his age, that had sense, would let a tailor palm off on him a pair of pants so tight that he would have to use a button-hook to button them; but they can catch him on everything, just as though he was a kid smoking cigarettes. Well, you know pa drinks some. That night the new club opened he came home pretty fruitful, and next morning his head ached so he said he would buy me a dog if I would go down town and get a bottle of polly nurious water for him. You know that dye house on Grand Avenue where they have got the four white spitz dogs? When I went after the penurious water I noticed that they had been coloring their dogs with the dye stuff, and I put up a job with the dye man's little boy to help me play it on pa. They had one dog dyed pink, another blue, another red, and another green, and I told the boy I would treat him to ice cream if he would let one out at a time, when I came down with pa, and call him in and let another out, and when we started to go away to let them all out. What I wanted to do was to paralyze pa, and make him think he had got 'em, got dogs the worst way. So about ten o'clock, when his head got cleared off, and his stomach got settled, he changed ends with his cuffs, and we came down town, and I told him I knew where he could get a splendid white spitz dog for me for five dollars, and if he would get it I would never do anything disrespectful again, and would just set up nights to please him, and help him up stairs, and get seltzer for him. So we went by the dye house, and just as I told him I didn't want anything but a white dog, the door opened and the pink dog came out and barked at us, and I said, 'That's him,' and the boy called him back. Pa looked as though he had the colic, and his eyes stuck out, and he said, 'Hemmy, that is a pink dog,' and I said, 'No; it is a white dog, pa,' and just then the green dog came out, and I asked pa if it wasn't a pretty white dog, and pa be turned pale, and said: 'Hell, boy, that's a green dog. What's got into the dogs?' I told him he must be color-blind, and was feeling in my pocket for a strap to tie the dog, and telling him he must be careful of his health, or he would see something worse than green dogs, when the green dog went in, and the blue dog came rushing out, and barked at pa. Well, pa leaned against a tree-box, and his eyes stuck out like stops on an organ, and the sweat was all over his face in drops as big as kernels of hominy. I think a boy ought to do everything he can to make it pleasant for his pa, don't you? And yet some parents don't realize what a comfort a boy is. The blue dog was called in; and just as pa wiped the perspiration off his forehead, and rubbed his eyes, and put on his specs, the red-maroon dog came out. Pa acted as if he was tired, and sat down on a horse-block. Dogs do make some people tired, don't they? He took hold of my hand, and his hand trembled just as though he was putting a gun-wad in the collection-plate at church, and he said: "My child, tell me truly, is that a red dog?" A fellow has got to lie a little if he is going to have any fun with his pa, and I told him it was a white dog, and I could get it for five dollars. He straightened up just as the dog went in the house, and said: "Well, I'm dem'd"; and then the boy let all the dogs out, and sicked them on a cat, which ran up a shade-tree, right near pa, and they rushed all around us, the blue dog going between his legs, and the green dog trying to climb the tree, and the pink dog barking, and the red dog standing on his hind feet. Pa was weak as a cat, and told me to go right home with him, and be would buy me a bicycle. He asked me how many dogs there were, and what was the color of them. I spoke I did awful wrong; but I told him there was only one dog, and a cat, and the dog was white. Well, sir, pa acted just as he did the night Hancock was beat, and he had to have the doctor to give him something to quiet him, (the time he wanted me to go right town, and buy a hundred rat-traps, but the doctor said never mind, I needn't go.) I took him home, and ma soaked his feet, and gave him some ginger tea, and while I was gone after the doctor he asked ma if she ever saw a green dog. That was what made all the trouble. If ma had kept her mouth shut I would have been all right, but she up and told him that they had a green dog, and a blue dog, and all colors of spitz dogs down at the dyers. They dyed them just for an advertisement, and for him to be quiet, and he would feel better when he got over it. Pa was all right when I got back and told him the doctor had gone to Wauwatosha, and I had left an order on his slate. Pa said he would leave an order on my slate. He took a harness-tug, and used it for breeching on me. I don't think a boy's pa ought to wear out a harness on his son, do you? He said he would learn me to play rainbow dogs on him. He said I was a liar, and he expected to see me wind up in Congress. Say, is Congress anything like Waupun or Sing Sing? No, I can't stay, thank you, I must go down to the office and tell pa I have reformed, and freeze him out of a circus ticket. He is a good enough man, only he don't appreciate a boy that has got all the modern improvements. Pa and ma are going to enter me in the Sunday-school. I guess I'll take first money, don't you?"

And the bad boy went out with a visible limp, and a look of genius cramped for want of opportunity.—Puck's Sun.

Advice to a Young Man.

My son, when you hear a man growling and scolding because Moody gets two hundred dollars a week for preaching Christianity, you will perceive that he never worries a minute because Ingersoll gets two hundred dollars a night for preaching atheism. You will observe that the man who is unutterably shocked because Francis Murphy's paid one hundred and fifty dollars a week for temperance work, seems to think it is all right when the barkeeper takes in twice as much money in a single day. The laborer is worthy of his hire, my boy, and he is just as worthy of it in the pulpit as he is upon the stump. Is the man who is honestly trying to save your immortal soul worth less than the man who is only trying his level best to go to Congress? Isn't Moody doing as good work as Ingersoll? Isn't John B. Gough as much the friend of humanity as the bartender? Do you want to get all the good in the world for nothing, so that you may be able to pay a high price for the bad? Remember, my boy, the good things in the world are always the cheapest. Spring-water costs less than corn whisky. A box of cigars will buy two or three Bibles; a gallon of old brandy costs more than a barrel of flour; a "full hand" at poker often costs a man more in twenty minutes than his church subscription amounts to in three years. A State election costs more than a revival of religion. You can sleep in church every Sunday morning for nothing, if you are mean enough to dead-beat your lodging in that way; but a nap in a Pullman car costs you two dollars every time. Fifty cents for the circus, and a penny for the little ones to put into the missionary box; one dollar for the theatre, and a pair of old trousers, frayed at the ends, baggy as to the knees, and utterly bursted as to the dome, for the Michigan sufferers. The dancing lady who tries to wear the skirt of her dress under her arms and the waist around her knees, and kicks her slipper clear over the orchestra chairs every night, gets six hundred dollars a week, and the city missionary gets five hundred dollars a year. The horse-race scoops in two thousand dollars the first day, and the church fair lasts a week, works twenty-five or thirty of the best women in America nearly to death, and comes out forty dollars in debt. Why, my boy, if you ever find yourself sneering or scoffing at once in a while you hear of a preacher getting a living, or even a luxurious salary, or a temperance worker making money, go out in the dark, and feel ashamed of yourself. Precious little does religion and charity cost the world, my boy; and when the money it does get is flung into its face, like a bone to a dog, the donor is not benefited by the gift, and the receiver is not, and certainly should not, be grateful. It is insulted.—R. F. Burdette

The Bishop of Peterborough, England, met at dinner the other day a rich, benevolent, but somewhat brainless millionaire, who boasted that he gave away two thousand pounds to the poor regularly every year. He said: "I think it's right, you know; a sort of duty in my position. I can't say what becomes of it, but it's given away in charity, that's all I know, and that's all I care about two thousand pounds every year." "What!" said the bishop, "do you really mean to say you pay away two thousand pounds to the poor every year as a religious duty?" "I assure you, my lord, that is so," replied the wealthy man, with careless complacency. "Well," said the witty bishop, "that's the largest insurance against fire I ever heard of!"

TO HOUSEKEEPERS.

If you wish to use goods of full weight and absolute purity, see your grocer supplies you with

KINGSFORD'S
OSWEGO
STARCH.

ROYAL BAKING
POWDER.

WALTER BAKER & CO.'S
CHOCOLATE.

SMITH
BROTHERS'
PACKAGE
BORAX

WM. T. COLEMAN & CO.

AGENTS

121 and 123 Market Street,

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

BUSINESS CARDS.

GEORGE MORROW.

GEORGE MORROW & CO.

(Established 1854.)

Commission Merchants

....AND....

DEALERS IN HAY AND GRAIN.

SHIPPING ORDERS A SPECIALTY. CONSIGNMENTS SOLICITED.

39 Clay Street,

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

PACIFIC ROLLING MILL CO.

San Francisco, Cal., Manufacturers of

Railroad and Merchant Iron

Car and Locomotive Axles and Frames, and Hammered Iron of every description. Rolled Beams, Angle, Channel, and T Iron, Bridge, and Machine Bolts, Lag Screws, Nuts, Washers, etc. Steamboat Shafts, Cranks, Pistons, Connecting Rods, etc. Highest price paid for Scrap Iron.

OFFICE, 202 MARKET STREET.

IRA F. RANKIN.

A. F. BRAYTON

PACIFIC IRON WORKS

RANKIN, BRAYTON & CO.,

127 to 132 First Street, San Francisco.

Mining Machinery of all kinds, Sugar Mills, Engines—both Marine and Stationary, Boilers, etc., etc.

THE
AMERICAN SUGAR REFINERY
SAN FRANCISCO,

MANUFACTURERS OF ALL
Classes of Refined Sugars, including Loaf Sugar for export.

C. ADOLPHE LOW, President.

Office—208 California Street.

CHARLES R. ALLEN

Wholesale and Retail Dealer in
COAL or Office by Telephone 308.
Agent Pittsburg Coal Mining Company.

118 and 120 Beale Street, S. F.

PAYOT, UPHAM & CO

STATIONERS, BOOKSELLERS,

Commercial Printers.

and Blank Book Manufacturers

204 Sansome Street, near Pine.

C. ADOLPHE LOW & CO.

Commission Merchants,

SAN FRANCISCO.

OFFICE IN NEW YORK, 42 CEDAR Street

Liberal advances made on consignments.

S. & G. GUMP,

581 and 583 Market Street, S. F.

Manufacturers

Mirrors, Cornices, Hardwood Mantles, Picture Frames, and Etc-a-Brac.

IMPORTERS OF GOULP'S ENGRAVINGS, CHROMOS, PHOTOGRAPHS, ETC.

WILLIAMS, DIMOND & CO.

SHIPPING AND

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Union Building, Junction Market and Pine Streets, San Francisco.

AGENTS FOR PACIFIC MAIL S. S.

Co.; Pacific Steam Navigation Co.; The Cunard Royal Mail S. S. Co.; The Hawaiian Line; The China Traders' Insurance Co., Limited; The Marine Insurance Co. of London; The Baldwin Locomotive Works; The Glasgow Iron Co.; Nich. Ashton & Son's Salt

CALIFORNIA SUGAR REFINERY.

OFFICE, 325 Market St. WORKS, Eighth and Brannan Sts.

C. SPRECKELS, President,

J. D. SPRECKELS, Vice-President,

A. B. SPRECKELS, Secretary.

S. P. COLLINS & CO.

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL

dealers Old London Dock Brandies, Port Wines, Sherries, and all choice brands Champagne, Apple Jack, Pisco, Arrack, Cordials, Liqueurs, etc. 329 MONTGOMERY, and 511 CALIFORNIA STREETS, S. F.

JOHN TAYLOR & CO.

118 and 120 Market Street, and 15 and 17 California Street.

ASSAYERS' MATERIALS, MINE Mill Supplies; also Druggists Glassware

THOMAS PRICE,

CHEMICAL LABORATORY, ASSAY

OFFICE, BULLION ROOMS, AND ONE

524 Sacramento Street, San Fran

FESTIVITIES OF THE FOURTH.

LETTERS FROM MONTEREY, THE GEYSERS,
SANTA CRUZ, AND SAN JOSE.HOW THE FUGITIVE SAN FRANCISCO-CANS AMUSED THEMSELVES.Monterey—The Fair Swimmers—The Ball—The Geysers—Fun and Fireworks—Nature's Pyrotechnics—A Masqued Ball—Santa Cruz—The Beach—The Hops
—The Camp at San José.

"TRISTRAM" AT MONTEREY.

Fourth of July has come and gone, and with the day came that vast crowd from San Francisco who have made the Hotel del Monte their Mecca during the annual independence advent of our country cousins into the metropolis, and who are only too glad to get rid of the small boy and his toy pistol, and his other multiplicity of ferocious means of patriotic turmoil and display. Beside, there is a growing tendency on the part of society people to make this place the ne plus ultra of Occidental shrines; and if it did not compete an ideal summer hotel scene during the last holiday, with its glare of lights, its flash of jewels, the rush and rustle of soft fabrics, and the merry hum and laughter of throngs of enjoyable people, then I am mistaken. And there was never a prettier day. The sun shone with more than its accustomed brilliancy, and there was a mellow haze in the atmosphere that was only vexed by chance zephyrs from a placid sea. It was a day, too, opportune to that multitude of permanent summer patrons to enliven their daily routine, and to participate in the pomp and circumstance of that dazzling phalanx whose "sound of revelry by night" is not at all limited to nocturnal hours, and who came here to enjoy that golden mean, in which the bustle and care of the metropolis and the dead stagnation of the country have no conspicuous part; but where contentment and comfort, good-will and wholesome food surround a person, and where a renewed lease of life is given in a link well welded and long drawn out. And when one tires of swimming, boating, bowling, dancing, billiards, and cobbles; and when a drive to the Mission or to Cypress Grove has lost its flavor; and when there is no further zest in the "walk homeward in the gloaming," we may return to the city with the satisfaction that we have inhaled some little share of the ozone of life, and have thrown some physic to the dogs, at least.

Companies F and G, who encamped on the hotel grounds, and who treated us to dress-parades and other entertainments during the two past Fourth's, were not with us this year; but in their stead the cadets of a San Francisco educational institution went through their drills and parades in front of the veranda, mornings and evenings, for several days, and stationed their fine band at the pavilion during the bathing hours, so that the monotonous of the wild waves were ever and anon drowned in the harmony of notes from the music on shore.

The beach is the place, after all; and the same girls who are seen gliding through the picturesque figures of the German, receiving and bestowing favors with a bidden, coquettish meaning, go down regularly to the beach to attend the natorial matinees that are held from half-past ten o'clock until twelve, and to enjoy the other exhilarating pastime of plunging, and screeching, and pulling, and swimming, and floating in the surf, or of sitting in the sand and poking fun at all who dare appear publicly in Neptune's attire. The vista of delight which a gaily-thronged beach opens to the beholder is a physical and anatomical study as well as an ethnological review, as all nationalities, all sects, all social strata, all sizes, and all shades meet harmoniously in one lavatory, just as a collection of unhappy animals meet happily together in the same cage of the menagerie—indeed it might be termed a terrestrial glimpse of that innumerable caravan of Bryant's "Thanatopsis."

We have escaped accidents this year, and nothing has occurred to mar the pleasure of the guests; but there have been several incidents which have added interest. The following notice was posted on the bulletin board on the morning of the 3d:

"The remains of Padre Junipera Serra and three others will be disinterred to-day, at the old Carmel Mission, at three p. m. sharp. The St. Patrick Cadets and the Third Regiment band will be in attendance, and the guests of the Hotel del Monte are cordially invited to be present."

We all went over, of course, and the incident proved very interesting. Before the digging began Father Cassanova explained that the floor of the ruin had been covered for many years with the debris of the fallen roof. Last January this was removed, and in the pavement three stone slabs, covering three burial vaults, were discovered. The records of the mission were searched, and it was found that these vaults held the remains of Padre Junipera Serra and three others. It had always been supposed that those of Junipera Serra had been carried to Spain, but here was evidence to the contrary. One of the vaults was opened, and the records verified, but the others were left for the public examination of Monday. The records said that there were two coffins in one vault, containing Padres Lopez and Junipera Serra, and that the latter was beneath the former. This proved to be true in fact, and no doubt remains in the minds of the priests that the relics recovered, and parts of which were generally and generously distributed, are those of the founder of the mission.

The Carmel ruin is the finest in this country, and one of the most picturesque in the world, being built of stone after the Moorish pattern, and the best of it is still well preserved. The group which gathered there on Monday was varied and picturesque, and when the ceremonies were over, and the go-as-you-please procession filed out of the inclosure, it was made up of six-in-hands, four-in-hands, teams with liveried attendants, and teams without, buggies, phaetons, bay-wagons, and carts; also swells of both sexes in fashionable riding-dresses, mounted on thoroughbreds, grangers on crosses, vaqueros on mustangs, and Indians on mules, while there followed on foot, in clouds of dust, a motley crowd of Mexican and Indian mothers with gangs of barefooted children.

The warm baths this year are more popular than ever before. The senseless objection to the tanks seems to have given way to the desire for comfort, and there are none who do not enjoy them. The lady pupils of this season are very apt, and "Boss Charley," the teacher, speaks very highly of their efforts. Mrs. Breckinridge, Miss Hull, Miss Nettie Tubbs, Miss Tallant, the Taylor and Miller girls, showing special progress. Others are beginning to develop fins, and will soon go alone. Miss Anna Head, Miss May Friedlander, and her niece, Miss Bessie Bowie, are only prevented by maternal restraint from swimming to Santa Cruz every day, and venture far out where they are allowed. Of those who steal down quietly at unknown times, and practice by themselves I can not speak; but wet tresses and tales. At the bowling alley there is little cessation of the rumble of the high balls. Mrs. Fletcher has made the most remarkable progress for a beginner, and counts with the best. Mrs. Wright, Mrs. Rutherford, Mrs. J. W. Brown, Miss Head, Miss Friedlander, Miss Tubbs, and Miss Hull lead the old players, and vanquish nearly all the gentlemen whom they meet in the game. Ten-pins is too simple for these skilled ones now, and they affect the more scientific games of "cocked hat," and nine-pins. I do not suppose you are much interested in the gentlemen, still I will explain that Charles Walcott Brooks, is the cyclopaedia. Judge Hoffman, Mr. Boyd, Captain Hooker, Mr. Hull, and George Crocker furnish the dignity and gravity. The Tubbs family furnish an example of pleasant enjoyment of the family circle which is charming. Austin Tubbs, Carey Friedlander, and Will Brown are crazy on shooting, and are trying to turn the lake into a lead mine in their frantic efforts to learn to shoot as well as one of the ladies. Dick Hammond is constantly in demand, and is master of every situation; but then that is to be expected—because he stays here all the time, and never misses an opportunity. Early after sunset on the Fourth fireworks were hurled in front of the hotel, which were quite as extensive and nearly as expensive as the display furnished by the Fourth of July Committee for those who remained in the city. Besides the general display furnished by the hotel, there were private bursts of patriotic enthusiasm which ended in smoke, notably the wholesale cracker racket on the croquet ground by J. W. Brown, and George Hearst's contribution to his son Will's fun, and that of his youthful friends—an incident which gave manager Schonewald more anxiety than all the rest of the celebration. The scene on the hotel grounds was peculiarly picturesque about half-past eight o'clock. Trees were lit up with blue-lights, rockets shot up at intervals, bombs thundered, pinwheels sizzled, the band played, and ladies and gentlemen, dressed for the ball, stood about in groups out of doors, and expressed their admiration of the scene and of each other.

Dancing began at half-past nine, and the ball-room was not only filled, but there were more dancers than opportunities. The toilets worn by the ladies were superb, although where there were so many pretty costumes it is difficult to make any special selection. Still the most striking ones were worn by the following ladies:

Mrs. Charles McLaughlin, Mrs. Lloyd Tevis, Mrs. J. W. Brown, Mrs. Doctor Whitney, Mrs. Rutherford, Miss George Kilburn, Misses Adelle and Lila Jones, Mrs. Trowbridge, Mrs. W. S. Keyes, Miss Bessie Sedgwick, Miss Lillie Hastings, Mrs. Breckinridge, Mrs. Horace Fletcher, Miss Nellie Jolliff, Mrs. Colonel Savage, Mrs. Fisher Ames, Mrs. Charles Miller, Mrs. Tubbs, Miss Nettie Tubbs, Mrs. W. T. Coleman, Mrs. George Hearst, Mrs. Reddington, Mrs. J. B. Wright, Mrs. Talbot, Mrs. Gray, Mrs. E. F. Arey, Miss Hull, Miss Stearns, the Misses Taylor, the Misses Miller, Mrs. Moody, Mrs. Head and daughter, and others.

There were about a hundred people here from the East and from interior places in California, and about three hundred from San Francisco, among whom were noticed the following:

Mrs. James Phelan, Miss M. Phelan, H. W. Woodward, V. Spaulding Jr., Mrs. V. Spaulding, C. L. Capp, J. W. Quick, H. Tevis, W. Jones, L. S. Montague, W. J. Casey, J. W. Maillard, F. J. Sullivan and wife, J. J. Brice and wife, Mrs. J. Tallant, J. W. A. Gilmore, Miss G. Gilmore, Mr. C. O. Hooker, George L. Duval, A. S. Tubbs, Mrs. R. Beck, J. E. Brown, Mrs. T. Trow, M. R. Collins, Mrs. Colonel Savage, Miss J. L. Meyer, R. C. Hooker and wife, A. H. Rutherford and wife, F. C. Friedlander, Lloyd Tevis and wife, Mrs. L. Breckinridge, Mrs. J. B. Wright, C. J. Willey, F. D. Willey, E. E. W. Miller, H. B. McDowell, George H. Roe, Truxton Beale, M. H. Power and wife, Miss Power, Mrs. T. Trow, Mrs. E. F. Arey, Mrs. Downing, Miss E. Goodall, H. Cordes and wife, Miss K. Kennedy, J. W. Stanford, J. Stanley, A. Jenks, Mrs. W. T. Coleman, Miss Bacon, Mr. and Mrs. Charles McLaughlin, G. Hearst and wife, James Phelan, George D. Korts, O. C. Pratt, W. F. Reddington, M. H. Fielding and wife, W. B. Fielding, Mrs. S. L. Meyer, D. McKee, C. Nutting Jr., W. C. Murphy, M. R. Roberts Jr., D. C. Reddington and wife, W. S. Beaves, J. M. Stafford, W. R. Sherwood, M. E. Garcia and wife, W. H. Taylor, H. Carolan, John Lee, J. S. Cameron, C. W. Whitney and wife, Miss Whitney, C. H. McMurrie and wife, C. W. R. Ford, George Crocker, J. Leroy Nickel, J. D. Gray, R. H. Pease Jr., D. Murphy, C. Frolich Jr., Mrs. E. Hopkins, Miss J. Hopkins, F. R. Webster, Miss N. R. Craven, Miss E. P. Brown, Mr. and Mrs. A. L. Tubbs, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Miller, W. B. Tubbs, A. C. Tubbs, Mr. and Mrs. Fisher Ames, Mr. and Mrs. Moody, F. F. Whittier and wife, Miss J. Whittier, Colonel and Mrs. Fletcher, George E. Gray, Miss A. S. Gray, P. Morgan, J. T. Haviland, W. T. Coleman and wife, J. D. Whitney and wife, W. S. Keyes and wife, Miss L. Hastings, Miss Bessie Sedgwick, W. R. Hearst, H. Wheeler, Judge O. Hoffman, James T. Boyd, S. H. Cowell, J. N. S. Williams, James Hetrick, George V. Gray, Edward Curtis, H. J. Crocker, W. K. Ball, J. Cotta, and others.

TRISTRAM.

"AGAMEMNON" AT SAN JOSE.

It was just on the verge of Sunday morning when the First Regiment reached this city. I think that we would have all been pretty sleepy, if it had not been for the bustle and crowding manifested on the train. For although the S. P. R. had provided a splendid train, it was not sufficient to comfortably accommodate all hands. There was a decided ovation at the depot. All of our Garden City friends had turned out to meet us, and although we saw none of the feminine element until next morning, I think a majority of San José's population must have been present.

We were quickly in line, and ready to foot it to Agricultural Park, where Camp Sheehan is situated. Company B, Fifth Infantry, under Captain Adell, headed by their band and followed by a host of "cits" and gamins, acted as escort, and we made things rather lively as we marched through the town. The camp had already been constructed, and long rows of tents invited the wearied warriors to repose. But if any of us cherished ideas of immediate repose, they were quickly dispelled; for the friendly citizens crowded in, and for the next two hours it was a scene of lively confusion.

The camp has been divided very systematically into sections. A wide street—Main Avenue—runs through the middle. Parallel with this street, and ranged on either side, are eight other and smaller avenues. These divisions mark the quarters of the different companies, beginning with Company H, Captain Bush, on the extreme south, and Company C, under Captain Templeton on the northern boundary. Colonel Dickinson's headquarters are at the head of Main Avenue, and in a position to command the entire camp. The tents are all comfortably furnished, and at night each hangs out a brilliant Japanese lantern.

The next morning, as soon as possible, all of us who were not on duty started off, each armed with a gaudy Chinese fan and sun-umbrella, on a sortie. We divided into small squads, and prepared to capture feminine San José.

The girls in the town are sui generis. They do not display the frank and demonstrative self-possession of the Sacramento maidens, nor yet do they preserve the dignified decorum of their San Francisco sisters. But they possess a fascinating half-coyness, half-coquetry which is very damaging to the heart of a San Francisco warrior. I say that this is their characteristic as noted by an outsider; but I must confess that their demeanor toward the home humanity is not equally gracious—at least it was not during our stay. We were treated by the young ladies somewhat as public guests, and it was edifying to witness the ease and rapidity with which we made ourselves acquainted and at home. Three pretty maids came slowly driving by in a phaeton before we were two streets from the camp. A violent desire immediately arose in the breasts of three of our number to learn the localities of certain objects of interest in the city. Here was an opportunity not to be lost. Three volunteers, with alacrity and raised caps, walked up to the passing vehicle. The blushing charioteers pulled on the reins with one accord, and their steed stood still. Were the young ladies about to visit the camp? Well—ah—yes—not exactly—they did not know that they had thought of going in, but were just going to—drive round. Oh, well, they might just as well inspect the whole thing while they were about it; and here were willing guides. And thus it was that our little company lost three of its gallant members. Further on, where several of us were discussing the situation with another galaxy, there chanced to pass a pair of San José youths, evidently friends of the charming fair ones whom we were just then interviewing. The two "cits" greeted the girls with effusive cordiality. A Siberian plain in winter would not give one an adequate idea of the concentrated polar frost that permeated the bow with which the intrusive San Joséans were dismissed. We inwardly chuckled over their discomfort.

Every morning a routine of drill and dress-parade is observed, after which one and all spend the time in social enjoyment. On the Fourth we had a torch-light procession, which was very brilliant, followed by a crowded reception, and then dancing was the order. Again on Wednesday there was another reception, followed by dancing, which was even more enjoyable than the first, owing to the fact that there were more room on our dancing-stand. Every one down here says that there never was as gentlemanly a body of men in San José, and all parties are equally delighted.

July 6, 1882.

"TOM" AT THE GEYSERS.

People who leave town to escape the noisy demonstrations of patriots on the Fourth of July must look for a lodge in some vast wilderness. The watering place is fast becoming more patriotic than in the city itself. At the Geysers, stage load after stage load has been rolling in for the past four days, and we have even been awakened several times after midnight by bands of people who had come over the grade from Cloverdale by the light of the moon. Notwithstanding the recent improvements, and the enlargement of the premises, there is not room for many who apply, and it is a puzzle to discover where many of those are stowed away who have come. I discovered one of their resources last night myself, when moved at a late hour to try the great luxury of the place, the steam bath. It is not easy to find this popular pavilion unoccupied. People are saying to each other at all reasonable and unreasonable hours of the day and night, "Let's go take a steam." But after the celebration was over—for the guests determined to celebrate the Fourth on the third, as many were leaving on the afternoon of the national holiday—I wound my way down the romantic path which leads to the cañon to take a solitary steam. All the little world at the Geysers had gone to rest, and stillness ought to have brooded over the scene. But it did not. From out the open doors of the steam-house came a chorus familiar to the dwellers in cities and hotels—the resounding, all-pervading snore. Mine host had put the overflow of the last stage to sleep on the Turkish couches, where we take a quiet nap after a prolonged steam. I took a cigar instead, and retraced my useless steps.

On the night of the second, or rather the morning, we were awakened by such a thunder-bolt as is not usual in California. The great bolts launched up the cañon woke every one in the house, and terrified the ladies. The lightning did some damage. We heard it crashing among the timber on the hillside, and it rendered the Geyser telephone useless on the busiest day of the year. It also alarmed some of the guests for the fate of the fireworks. They had collected quite a valuable lot of them together by subscription—some two or three hundred dollars' worth—and while they were willing to spend the Fourth on the third, they were not willing to have the fireworks go off prematurely. We heard them prowling around for some time, and by the time we had all turned over and composed ourselves for a fresh nap, some enthusiasts began setting off bombs.

Beside the immense number of transient guests, who have come only for the Fourth, there are many families here either spending the summer or several weeks of it. Among them are Mr. Peter Donahue and family, Mr. and Mrs. O. F. Griffin, Mrs. Con Sullivan and family, Mr. and Mrs. Con O'Connor and family, quite a delegation from the Board of Brokers, including Walter Turnbull, H. P. Wakefield, James Hawkins, Charles Kenney, H. H. Noble, Joseph Marks, and their respective families. Also

Mr. and Mrs. Tom Grant, Mrs. Joseph Austin, Frank Locan and family, Sam Mayer, Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Rose, and many more. These people all seem to be having a merry time of it, and have a programme which they carry out scrupulously each day. Every one manages to have breakfast by nine, and then sit in groups upon the broad verandas and gossip peacefully till half-past ten, when they all adjourn to the steam baths. The ladies come straggling up from the baths with all the freshness of their summer finery gone, their wet locks hanging in the sun to dry. Lunch at one, followed by more gossip on the veranda; the stage at three or thereabouts, and when they see who has come there is a wild shout from every one, and ho! for the swimming-baths. There are more expert lady swimmers at the Geysers than at any of the seaside resorts, the smooth water inviting to greater confidence than the breakers. After the swim, dinner, and after dinner there is usually an amateur concert in the parlor. The programme was little broken on the third, the day of the celebration, until after dinner. During the day some of the more enterprising of the guests had set up the frames for the fireworks on the hill opposite the hotel, and at night they went over, and set them off. The guests congregated upon the lawn, and cheered the amateur fireworkers heartily. After the close of the pyrotechnic display, there was a sudden scattering from the verandas, which was explained half an hour later, when the ladies all appeared in pink dominoes and black masks, and adjourned to the dining-room, where a champagne punch was served. The dance was a brief one, as it was a pretty warm night for a masquerade, and the attractions of the supper, which had been laid in the parlor, were more potent. The parlor itself eventually became transformed into a hall-room, and the last I saw of the dancers they had adjourned to the yard, where a bonfire had been kindled, and, joining hands, they danced around to the tune of all the minstrel melodies. All the fire-crackers that remained in the house were thrown upon the fire, and there was not so much as a torpedo left to disturb the peace of Fourth of July morning. The day passed uneventfully, except for the gathering on the lawn of the guests to be photographed—a form of entertainment which seems to be exceedingly popular, as there are photographs innumerable extant of many successive groups of Geyser tourists. The tourist proper, who rushes pell-mell up the cañon by way of Cloverdale one day, goes through the Geysers, and is off by the Calistoga route the next, is a familiar phantom; but the hotel is no longer exclusively the resting-place of the tourist, it has become a popular resort for many who find the mountain air a necessary change from the sea. On the afternoon of the Fourth two stages full of people, consisting almost entirely of the heads of families who had left their wives and children for a longer stay, were rushing off to reach San Francisco by business hours next morning. A reaction after the merry-making was inevitable; but every one seemed to be devoutly grateful that the Fourth was over. So am I, for now most of the men are gone, and I am alone.

July 5, 1882.

TOM-ALL-ALONE.

"STELLA" AT SANTA CRUZ.

It is difficult for any one who has visited Santa Cruz frequently to avoid feeling vexed at the sluggishness of its inhabitants. I have been there many times—the first as long as ten years ago—and I fail to detect any improvements. There are the same tumble-down bath-houses, the same difficulty for us to make our way from them to the beach, the same impertinent loungers commenting freely upon us as we pass, the same dusty roads, (except the Felton road), the same overcrowded hotels and poor fare, the same lumbering busses plying to the beach, and—I was going to say the same ramshackle cars, but they are only four or five years old. One would think, though, they were a hundred. What changes there are in Santa Cruz are not for the better. There are more of the children of Israel there; there are more brazen women there, whose conduct is such that a modest girl is continually annoyed by young men leering at her with silly smiles; there is more carousing, and sometimes not of a decorous kind; there are greater crowds.

But that is all. En revanche, the sky is as beautiful, the bay as blue; the woodland drives are as lovely as ever; the surf-bathing as delightful. In point of natural advantages there is no place in California that can compare with Santa Cruz; it is far and away beyond Monterey—there is absolutely no comparison. In point of artificial advantages, however, Santa Cruz is far behind the other. I can not help wishing that I were a man, and a rich one at that—I should be tempted to exploit Santa Cruz, and make it what it ought to be—one of the prettiest watering-places in the world. And I should begin by barring the doors of my caravansary to loose women, and I—well, it seems ill-natured, and I won't say it, but I think it all the same.

There has been what the reporters call "a round of gayeties" during the past four or five days. The presence of the soldiers at Camp Dimond has had a good deal to do with it. On Saturday before the Fourth two bops were given to the battalion—one at Pope's, the other at the Ocean House. The warriors were conspicuous by their absence at the latter place. I am told—why I do not know. I was not there myself. At Pope's it was crowded, and unpleasantly warm; dancing was difficult. I left in disgust when I saw the appearance of a certain person upon the arm of another whom I had previously supposed to be a gentleman. Why do young men think that when they are away from the city they can associate publicly with characters whom in the city they do not dare to recognize? They are wrong. They will find that some of their respectable lady friends will not dare to recognize them.

On Sunday there was a clam-bake at Camp Felton which was largely attended by guests from Santa Cruz. To those who like clams and green corn it was doubtless pleasant. I like neither. Nor do I like the attentions of young gentlemen who have been drinking too much wine—of which beverage there seemed to be a plenitude at the camp, such as it was. So I did not enjoy the clam-bake.

On Monday evening the troops at Camp Dimond gave a dress-parade, which was followed by gymnastic exercises, fencing, etc., and that by a "hall." This latter took place upon a platform in the centre of the camp. I did not take part in the "ball." The camp was very handsomely illuminated with Chinese and Japanese lanterns, and at the corners of the camp four bonfires blazed. The scene was a very pretty one indeed.

On Fourth of July night there was a hop given at the Ocean House, either by or to the battalion, which was really a pleasant affair. The hall-room and the dining-room were both filled, and objectionable characters were kept out by an ingenious yet effective arrangement on the part of the sentries. The two rooms giving ample space, the unpleasant crowding of previous affairs was avoided.

After all, I don't think I enjoyed anything at Santa Cruz but the bathing. That was delicious. It is the fashion to go to the ocean beach in the morning, and to the river in the afternoon. The scene is always an animated one. By the way, it seems to me as though the bathing-dresses at Santa Cruz were growing scantier every year. They are diminishing at both ends. I am no prude, but I should certainly object to wearing a sleeveless, tight-fitting dress, cut very low, with tight culotte reaching only half-way to the knee, and stockings suggestively short, reaching to the swell of the calf. As I said, I am no prude, but I would not wear such a dress around the beach and in the water among a lot of men whom I do not know, and who are much more profuse in offering to handle me than they need be. Some of them are perfectly odious.

I am afraid I have been writing a rather cross letter. But since I am in that vein I am going to relieve my mind about the narrow-gauge road. There can be no comparison between the two roads as regards scenery. The narrow-gauge runs through wild and picturesque mountains, and the broad-gauge through flat and uninteresting plains; the narrow-gauge is direct; the broad-gauge is round-about and tiresome. But the latter consults the comfort of its patrons, while the former carefully provides for their discomfort. The idea of running but one parlor car in a train of thirteen or fourteen! There are probably a hundred people willing and desirous to pay for such accommodations, and thus avoid the company and the odors of the populace. But they can not secure such accommodations. Why, I do not know. Can it be possible that the company have only one parlor car? If so, they ought to get up a subscription and buy another. But what is worse, they have not even ordinary accommodations for their passengers. On one train I was on there were about sixty or seventy people standing. Think of standing for a four hours' ride! After a weary passage through the entire train, my escort succeeded in finding a seat for me. Presently along came a lame woman. Not a man around me moved. I impulsively jumped up and gave her mine, which the poor creature accepted thankfully. And then I had the pleasure of hearing the bores around me sneer at my "putting on airs," and so forth. Oh, I could have boxed their ears.

No, I shall never ride on the narrow-gauge again. I am superstitious, and I fear that this road is fated to disaster. From its very beginning it has been unfortunate. Heaven knows how many laborers were killed in those gloomy tunnels through the mountains, by caves, blasts, and oil explosions. And then, almost after it began running, came that dreadful accident two years ago, at which so many people were killed and maimed. Perhaps I am superstitious, but I fear a terrible accident on that road some day. I shall never ride over it again. STELLA.

July 5, 1882.

CCXXXVI.—Sunday, July 9.—Bill of Fare for Six Persons.

Asparagus Soup.
Baked Rockfish. Stewed Pigeons.
Mashed Potatoes. Lima Beans. Baked Bell Peppers.
Roast Veal. Currant Jelly.
Vegetable Salad.
Frozen Peaches and Cream. Apples, Pears, Peaches, Apricots, Plums, Nectarines, and Figs.

Stewen Pigeons.—Knead together three ounces of butter, four dessertspoonsful of dried fine crumbs of bread, a grain of cayenne, a third of a teaspoonful of salt, the same of pepper, a teaspoonful of chopped parsley, a little grated nutmeg, and one small onion, finely chopped. Have three pigeons, stuff, and fry them until slightly browned in an ounce of butter, dredge in a tablespoonful of flour, stir until well mixed, then add half a pint of stock, a tablespoonful of mushroom ketchup, a teaspoonful of soy, a teaspoonful of vinegar, a saltspoonful of anchovy sauce, and two table-spoonsful of port wine. Put in the pigeons, and simmer gently for half an hour. Serve very hot.

"Fritz in Ireland" ends at Haverly's California Theatre this evening. Next Monday night will begin a season of Haverly's Mastodon Minstrels. At Emerson's Standard Theatre "My Brudder-in-Law" will continue to hold the boards. "Uncle Tom's Cabin" is finished at the Baldwin Theatre this evening, and next Monday night Miss Ward, the English actress, supported by the Baldwin company, will open in a new play entitled "American Born."

—THE HANLON-LEES TROUPE, WHICH IS TO open at the Baldwin Theatre on the seventeenth instant, in "Le Voyage en Suisse," have, during the past year, been making a successful tour through the Union. The stage-carpenter and scenic artist of the Baldwin are now very busy making preparations for this combination of drama, comedy, and pantomime. The plot is full of amusement and absurdity.

Henry Heyman has returned to the city, after spending his summer vacation at Lake Tahoe. He resumes his instruction on the violin as before. Address, 206 Ellis Street.

AMONG ALL OUR HOTELS

The Occidental enjoys an enviable reputation for the superiority of its table. Visitors from the East notice it and speak in terms of highest praise. Mr. Wertheimer, mine host, who is a man of good judgement, and a good caterer, does not hesitate to tell the reason of the excellence of the bread and pastry. He says it is simply owing to the New England Baking Powder, which he has now been using for over a year. He finds it not only peerless in quality, but also the most economical.

—A LADY, FORMERLY PUPIL OF PROF. DE FILIPPE, desires a few more pupils in Spanish and French; teaches by the same method. Address M. L., box 81, Oakland, Cal.

We learn from an exchange that a Welshman's oath is "Ymw llyng wgwll." This is too awfully awfully awful, and it looks like a fish-worm.—Der-rick.

—REDDING'S RUSSIA SALVE HAS PROVED ITS efficiency by a test of 75 years constant use. Try it.

—BEFORE STARTING OFF FOR THE SUMMER GET a bottle of German Corn Remover. It will pay you. 25c.

Girls, like opportunities, are all the more to you after being embraced.—Yonkers Statesman.

—COMELY! ATTRACTIVE! WINNING!—THESE expressive words are often and properly applied to the fair ladies of our favored land who keep their hair abundant, and natural in color and lustre by the timely use of Ayer's Hair Vigor. The Vigor is safe and agreeable, and its effects are very lasting, making it the most economical, and at the same time the most beneficial and elegant of toilet preparations.

At Lord Macaulay's funeral a person unknown deliberately walked up and spat on the coffin at the conclusion of the service.

—WHY IS MRS. LYDIA E. PINKHAM'S VEGETABLE Compound like the Mississippi River in a spring freshet? Because the immense volume of this healing river moves with such momentum that it sweeps away all obstacles, and is literally flooding the country.

—IF YOU COME HOME LATE BRING YOUR WIFE A bottle of German Corn Remover. Result: happiness.

—LADY READERS OF THE ARGONAUT WILL remember that the place to buy cologne, perfume, toilet soaps, brushes, sponges, cosmetics, etc., is at the elegant and well-stocked store of James G. Steele & Co., Chemists and Apothecaries, 635 Market Street, Palace Hotel, San Francisco.

DR. C. T. DEANE HAS REMOVED HIS OFFICE TO 131 Post Street, between Kearny and Dupont, over Samuel's. Hours, 9.30 to 10 A. M.; 1 to 3.30 P. M.

A cable dispatch that "a mine was discovered in a street in Moscow, Russia," was headed by an innocent journalistic head-writer as "a bonanza in Moscow."—Burlington Hawkeye.

—MR. A. J. KELLEHER DESIRES TO INFORM HIS pupils that he will resume tuition on July 10th. Apply at Gray's music store, 117 Post, or at his residence, 2324 Clay Street.

—MORSE HAS THE FINEST GALLERY IN THE world, 826 Market Street, (Phelan Block).

—MR. LOUIS LISSE ARRIVES FROM NEW YORK on or about July 8th, and will resume the duties of his profession on July 10th.

—DR. E. O. COCHRANE, DENTIST, 850 MARKET cor. Stockton (over drug store.) Office hours, 9 to 5.

—GO TO Bradley & Rulison's, 429 Montgomery.

Bret Harte's New Serial, "Flip."

A Story of California Life.

Next week the "Argonaut" will begin the publication of this serial. It is to appear simultaneously in four papers. The "Allgemeine Zeitung" has purchased the right for the continent, the Glasgow "Herald" for Great Britain, and the New York "Sun" for America. By arrangement with the "Sun" publishers, who own the American copyright, the "Argonaut" has also purchased from Mr. Bret Harte the right to publish the story. These are the only two American journals in which it will appear.

BALDWIN THEATRE.

THE HANLONS

Monday.....July 17th

In their laughable Parisian Absurdity, entitled

"LE VOYAGE EN SUISSE."

The Boston Herald says: "These gentlemen allow trunk-lids to fall on their necks; tumble from the roof of a stage-coach; fall through ceilings, and go through hosts of similar experiences with a rapidity, clearness, and precision that is simply marvelous."

FILIPPE'S ACADEMY OF LANGUAGES
235 KEARNY ST. S.F.

SOUTHWEST CORNER OF BUSH.
PROF. DE FILIPPE continues to give personal instruction in Spanish and French, by his easy, practical method, saving months of study. Classes and private lessons. Apply from 3 to 5 or 7 to 8 P. M.

JNO. LEVY & CO.

MANUFACTURING JEWELERS,

Importers of DIAMONDS and other PRECIOUS STONES,
WATCHES, CLOCKS, and SILVERWARE,

118 SUTTER STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.

(Of the late Firm of BRAVERMAN & LEVY.)

HOUSEKEEPERS!

DO NOT SACRIFICE YOUR GOODS AT AUCTION, but STORE THEM with H. WINDEL & CO., NO. 310 STOCKTON STREET. Furniture, Pianos, Household Goods, Paintings, Trunks, etc., well taken care of. We have three large, airy, brick buildings, and no rent to pay, and can store goods very moderate. Money advanced on goods at one per cent. per month. We guarantee against damage and moths, and can give references dating back 20 years.

ACCELRATED JAPANESE ARTIST and TWO ART EMBROIDERERS have been secured for Ichi Ban, 22 and 24 Geary Street, and can be seen daily, dressed in their native costume.

Portraits and Decorations made to order. Dresses, Handkerchiefs, etc., embroidered with simple or elaborate designs. All executed quickly and cheaply. We cordially invite the public to call and see these artists at work. ICHI BAN, 22 and 24 GEARY STREET.

The Argonaut is printed with Shattuck & Fletcher's Ink.

AMERICAN

BUNTING FLAGS!

A FULL ASSORTMENT of United States Regulation Sizes on hand, made of the celebrated

"STANDARD"

BUNTING. Private House Flags and Signals made to order. Bunting for sale. Send to us for prices.

G. M. JOSSELYN & CO.,

38 and 40 Market Street, S. F.

DO NOT SACRIFICE YOUR FURNITURE, PIANOS, and HOUSEHOLD GOODS, at auction sales, while you are boarding or out of the city, but

STORE THEM,

As well as your Trunks and Paintings, with

J. H. MOTT & CO.,

641 Market St.,

Nucleus Block, Second Floor. Large, airy brick building, with elevator. MONEY LOANED on valuable goods. Terms moderate.

FOREST HOUSE, ALMA,
Fifteen Miles from San Jose, in the Santa Cruz Mountains.

BEAUTIFUL AND HEALTHY LOCATION, finest climate in the State, with no fogs. House refurbished and improved. Fine new tents and bath-room. First class board at prices you can afford to pay. Take Narrow-Gauge from Alameda. Two hours ride through the garden of California.

SCADMON & KINKAD, Prop's.

TABER, HARKER & Co.,
IMPORTERS AND WHOLESALE GROCERS, 108 and 110 California St., San Francisco

THE "DRESS REFORM" CORSET.

Specialty for Stout Figures, by mail, $3.00. Send waist, hip, and bust measure. Also, Shoulder Braces, Union Under Flannels, Ladies' and Children's Comfort Waists, Bustles, Hose Supporters, etc.

Send for Circular. The only Depot for these Goods.
Mrs. M. H. OBER & CO.
Boston
Dress Reform,
326
Sutter St.,
SAN FRANCISCO.

An Elegant Corset to Order for $4.

COMPOUND OXYGEN.

NEW TREATMENT BY INHALATION, for Consumption, Asthma, Bronchitis, Dyspepsia, Catarrh, Headache, Debility, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, and all Chronic and Nervous Disorders. Prepared by DR. STARKEY & PALEN, Philadelphia, Pa. Package contains all directions, and is easily sent by express, ready for USE AT HOME. H. E. MATHEWS, Forwarding Agent, 606 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal. Send for Free Pamphlets.

WEST'S NEW ELECTRIC BELT.—C. N. West's Electro-Medical Belts always have excelled all other electrical appliances. They have taken the premiums at all State Fairs. This new Belt excels every other that he has invented. Cures all diseases without medicine. Price, from $5 to $20.00. Warranted ten years. Patronized by the sensitive men and leading ladies of this and other States. Address or call on C. N. WEST, 652 Market Street, San Francisco.

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

Muse-Sick.

We met by chants, the usual way,
One Sunday in the choir;
I liked hymn for his tenor voice,
Which none could help admire;
Sue Frano tried to thwart my love;
She acted very bass,
And meanly told him he were wise
My image to efface.
But I was mirrored on his heart,
Indelible and pure;
He said he ne'er could duet,
Solo, I've got him sure.

—A Musical Liar.

The Lightest Thing.

Pray what is lighter than a feather?
Dust, my friend, in dryest weather.
What's lighter than the dust, I pray?
The wind that wafts it far away.
Pray what is lighter than the wind?
The lightness of a woman's mind.
And what is lighter than the last?
Nay, now, my friend, you have me fast!

—Robert B. Thomas.

Her Letter.

Oh, the envelope is square;
On its fold
Is her monogram bizarre,
Stamped in gold.
From across the wide Atlantic
Come these hieroglyphs gigantic;
T'bis brings something real romantic,
So I'm told.
She is sweeter than the pink,
Full in bloom,
That she puts into her ink
To perfume
Each gay curve and line gymnastic,
Though she sometimes seems sarcastic;
Just to please her taste fantastic,
I presume.
She's a tender Tuscan now,
Getting tanned,
With the sunshine on her brow,
But her hand—
See, it takes the pen a minute!
Folds the note, (a kiss within it!)
Oh, that I might hope to win it
On demand.

—Vale News.

All der Times.

Der world id vos grow older,
All der times;
Mineself I don't got younger,
All der times;
Mine wife she vos got truer,
But mine children der got fewer,
Und mine old pants don't got newer,
All der times!
Der sun id vos grow older,
All der times;
Mine heardt, id vos grow older,
All der times;
I no more cares for dancing,
Or eyes mit schweetness glancing,
For lofe is less entrancing,
All der times!
Ah! how sad to look before me,
All der times;
Und sadder still beind me,
All der times;
Vhen der blossoms all are faded,
Und mine gray hair don't vos praided,
For mine paid head got more shaded,
All der times!

—At anta Constitution.

"So Lonely."

There is something in the good man's face
It is very rare to see—
On his brow is throned a certain grace
That tells us he is free.
Why these smiles and all this smirking
Where once there was a frown?
Oh, what strange influence is working?
Ah, his wife is out of town.
He was ne'er disposed to cavil,
And when he bade her travel,
To the sea-shore for her health,
She said, "Won't you be lonely?"
Then he mournfully looked down—
"I shall miss you dearest only!"
And his wife went out of town.
Foolish women, pray take warning
From these lines so sadly true;
Though he writes you every morning,
And swears he pines for you,
He's a giddy, giddy masher,
And he's doing things up brown
In a friskier way and rasber
Since his wife is out of town.

—Eugene Field.

How He Made It.

One sweltering day in hot July
A beer saloon he wandered by;
And finding that he was not seen,
He entered at the swinging screen;
And to rebuke the drinking men,
Whom he observed around him then,
He ordered, as he knew he'd oughter,
A glass of pure, clear crystal water.
He set it down, "Ah, ha!" said he,
"Cold water is the drink for me!"
And so, to make it cold and nice,
He pounded in a little ice.
Healthful and good, sliced very thin,
He dropped a little lemon in;
And then he said: "Sweets to the sweet!"
And stirred some sugar in the treat.
To kind of brace the mixture up
He dashed some bitters in the cup;
Then just a lee-tle whisky—well,
Say twenty lines of "nonpareil;"
And while he stirred it with a spoon,
He sang, in gleeful tones, the tune:
"Water, cold water, pure and free—
Water is the drink for me!"
He raised his head; loud, loud he laughed,
And to the dregs the goblet quaffed.
"This is the New Amendment plan,"
Remarked the temperate Kansas man;
Then set his course, and held that day
Due West his calm, imperial way.

—Unknown Liar.

A NOTED BUT UNTITLED WOMAN.

[From the Boston Globe.]

Messrs. Editors:—

The above is a good likeness of Mrs. Lydia E. Pinkham, of Lynn, Mass., who above all other human beings may be truthfully called the "Dear Friend of Woman," as some of her correspondents love to call her. She is zealously devoted to her work, which is the outcome of a life-study, and is obliged to keep six lady assistants, to help her answer the large correspondence which daily pours in upon her, each bearing its special burden of suffering, or joy at release from it. Her Vegetable Compound is a medicine for good and not evil purposes. I have personally investigated it and am satisfied of the truth of this.

On account of its proven merits, it is recommended and prescribed by the best physicians in the country. One says: "It works like a charm and saves much pain. It will cure entirely the worst forms of female diseases."

It permeates every portion of the system, and gives new life and vigor. It removes faintness, natulency, destroys all craving for stimulants, and relieves weakness of the stomach. It cures Bloating, Headaches, Nervous Prostration, General Debility, Sleeplessness, Depression and Indigestion. That feeling of bearing down, causing pain, weight and backache, is always permanently cured by its use. It will at all times, and under all circumstances, act in harmony with the law that governs the female system.

It costs only $1. per bottle or six for $5., and is sold by druggists. Any advice required as to special cases, and the names of many who have been restored to perfect health by the use of the Vegetable Compound, can be obtained by addressing Mrs. P., with stamp for reply, at her home in Lynn, Mass.

For Kidney Complaint of either sex this compound is unsurpassed as an abundant testimonial show. "Mrs. Pinkham's Liver Pills," says one writer, "are the best in the world for the cure of Constipation, Biliousness and Torpidity of the Liver. Her Blood Purifier works wonders in its special line and bids fair to equal the Compound in its popularity. All must respect her as an Angel of Mercy whose sole ambition is to do good to others."

Philadelphia, Pa. (2) Mrs. A. M. D.

AYER'S HAIR VIGOR,

For Restoring Gray Hair to its Natural Vitality and Color.

Advancing years, sickness, care, disappointment, and hereditary predisposition, all turn the hair gray, and either of them incline it to shed prematurely. AYER'S HAIR VIGOR, by long and extensive use, has proven that it stops the falling of the hair immediately; often renews the growth, and always surely restores its color when faded or gray. It stimulates the nutritive organs to healthy activity, and preserves both the hair and its beauty. Thus brash, weak, or sickly hair becomes glossy, pliable, and strengthened; lost hair regrows with lively expression; falling hair is checked and established; thin hair thickens, and faded or gray hairs resume their original color. Its operation is sure and harmless. It cures dandruff, heals all humors, and keeps the scalp cool, clean, and soft—under which conditions, diseases of the scalp are impossible.

As a Dressing for Ladies' Hair, the VIGOR is praised for its grateful and agreeable perfume, and valued for the soft lustre and richness of tone it imparts.

PREPARED BY

DR. J. C. AYER & Co., Lowell, Mass.

PRACTICAL AND ANALYTICAL CHEMISTS.

Sold by all Druggists and Dealers in Medicines.

Department No. 9—Probate.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT
In and for the City and County of San Francisco,
State of California.

In the matter of the Estate of
WILLIAM W. JOHNSTON,
Deceased,

NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN, THAT
Monday, the seventeenth day of July, A. D. 1882, at ten o'clock A. M., of said day, and the Court Room of said Court, at Hall in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, have been appointed as the time and place for proving the will of said William W. Johnston, deceased, and for hearing the application of Charles G. Johnston for the issuance to him of Letters Testamentary. Dated June 22, A. D. 1882.

By D. H. SCHINDLER, Clerk.
H. F. CRANE, Attorney for Petitioner.

LOOK!

Best in the World. It Cures where all other remedies fail in 30 to 90 days by Dr. Pierce's Method. Astonishing results.
Hundreds of well-known citizens cured. "Pierce's Journal," with full information free. MAGNETIC ELASTIC TRUSS & BELT CO., 704 Sacramento St., cor. of Kearny, S. F. Cal.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free
Address STINSON & Co., Portland, Me

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free.
Address H. HALLETT & Co., Portland, Maine.

$72 A WEEK. $12 a day at home easily made. Costly
outfit free. Address TRUE & Co., Augusta, Maine.

EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS.

ZEITSKA INSTITUTE

922 Post Street.

FRENCH, GERMAN AND ENGLISH

Day and Boarding School for young ladies and children. KINDERGARTEN.

The twentieth year of this Institute will commence July 24, 1882. MADAME B. ZEITSKA, Principal.

CALIFORNIA

MILITARY ACADEMY,
AT OAKLAND, CAL.

The Nineteenth Year will begin Monday, July 17, 1882.

REV. DAVID MCCLURE, Ph. D., Principal.

HOPKINS ACADEMY,

OAKLAND, CAL.

Rev. H. E. Jewett, Principal.

This institution, heretofore known as Golden Gate Academy, will open TUESDAY, A. M., JULY 18, 1882. The Building and Grounds are undergoing extensive improvements. Classical, Literary, and English courses. Telegraphy taught. Boys and young men received. Send for prospectus to H. E. Jewett, Principal.

ASSESSMENTS AND DIVIDENDS.

CALIFORNIA MINING COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia, Nevada. Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 10th day of June, 1882, an assessment (No. 4) of Ten Cents per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, 309 Montgomery Street, Room 23, Nevada Block, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the (18th) eighteenth day of July, 1882, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on Wednesday, the 16th day of August, 1882, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

C. P. GORDON, Secretary.
Office—Room 23, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

DIVIDEND NOTICE—OFFICE OF

the Standard Consolidated Mining Company, San Francisco, July 1, 1882.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named Company, held this day, dividend No. 43, of Seventy-five cents per share was declared, payable on Wednesday, July 12, 1882, at the office in this city, or at the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company in New York. WM. WILLIS, Secretary.

Office—Room No. 29, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal.

DIVIDEND NOTICE—THE CALI-

FORNIA SAVINGS AND LOAN SOCIETY. Northwest corner Powell and Eddy Streets. The Board of Directors have declared a dividend to Depositors at the rate of four and thirty-two one-hundredths (4 32-100) per cent. per annum on Term Deposits, and three and sixty one-hundredths (3 60-100) per cent. per annum on Ordinary Deposits, free from Federal Tax, for the half year ending June 30, 1882, payable on and after Monday, July 10, 1882.

VERNON CAMPBELL, Secretary.

DIVIDEND NOTICE—THE GER-

MAN SAVINGS AND LOAN SOCIETY. For the half year ending June 30, 1882, the Board of Directors of the GERMAN SAVINGS AND LOAN SOCIETY has declared a dividend on Term Deposits at the rate of 4 32-100 per cent. per annum, and on ordinary deposits at the rate of 3 60-100 per cent. per annum, free from Federal Taxes, and payable on and after the 10th day of July, 1882. By order, GEORGE LEITE, Secretary.

DIVIDEND NOTICE—SAN FRAN-

CISCO SAVINGS UNION, 532 California Street, corner Webb. For the half year ending with June 30, 1882, a dividend has been declared at the rate of four and thirty-two one-hundredths (4 32-100) per cent. per annum on Term Deposits, and three and sixty one-hundredths (3 60-100) per cent. per annum on Ordinary Deposits, free of Federal Tax, payable on and after Wednesday, 12th July, 1882. LOVELL WHITE, Cashier.

EXTRA QUALITY

RUBBER HOSE,

BELTING AND PACKING.

CRACK-PROOF BOOTS.

GOODYEAR RUBBER CO.

R. H. PEASE JR., S. M. RUNYON, Agents,
577 and 579 Market Street, S. F.

J. M. LITCHFIELD & CO.

MERCHANT TAILORS,

And Dealers in Gents' Furnishing Goods,
415 MONTGOMERY STREET,

bet. California and Sacramento San Francisco

JACKSON & TRUMAN,
626 Sixth St. San Francisco,

MANUFACTURERS OF

Agricultural Implements,

Jackson's Self Feeders for Threshing

Machines, Horse Forks, Derricks,

Vineyard Harrows, Steam Dragg

Runs in the Fork Spools, repairs for all kinds of lighter winds, Farm Machinery, Hay, Hide, Hop

Entirely reliable and Wool Presses, Steam Engines, blow in storms. Threshing Machines, Wind Mills,

Jackson & Truman, 626 Sixth St. San Francisco.

San Francisco market rates.

Write for our New Catalogue.

LEGAL NOTICES.

SHERIFF'S SALE.

D. HARNEY, Plaintiff,
vs.
THOMAS G. McLERAN, et al., Defendants.

Superior Court.
No. 6392.
Late 23d District Court.
Order of Sale and Decree
of Lien.

UNDER AND BY VIRTUE OF AN

Order of Sale and Decree of Lien issued out of the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on the nineteenth day of May, A. D. 1882, in the above entitled action, wherein D. Harney, the above-named plaintiff, obtained a judgment and decree of lien against Thomas G. McLERAN, George K. Porter, and William Hollis, defendants, on the second day of April, A. D. 1879, which said judgment and decree was, on the tenth day of June, A. D. 1879, recorded in Judgment Book D., of said Twenty-third District Court, at page ninety-two; and whereas, on December 22, 1879, a stipulation was filed herein to abide the final result in case No. 6374, of said court, entitled Harney vs. Corcoran, et al., and whereas the remittitur from the Supreme Court, in said last-named case, was on May 15, 1882, filed in said Superior Court, affirming the judgment and order therein appealed from, as appears to us of record, I am commanded to sell all that certain lot, piece, or parcel of land, situate, lying, and being in the city and county of San Francisco, State of California, and bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the north line of Fourteenth Street, distant west three hundred and ninety-one and one-half feet from the northwest corner of Fourteenth and Valencia streets, and running thence east on the north of Fourteenth Street one hundred and fifty-five and one-half feet; thence at right angles north seventy feet; thence at right angles west one hundred and forty-eight feet; thence south in a straight line, seventy feet three inches to the point of beginning.

Public notice is hereby given that on MONDAY, THE TWENTH DAY OF JULY, A. D. 1882, at twelve o'clock, noon, of that day, in front of the Old City Hall, in the city and county of San Francisco, I will, in obedience to said order of sale and decree of foreclosure, sell the above-described property, or so much thereof as may be necessary to raise sufficient to satisfy said judgment, with interest and costs, etc., to the highest and best bidder for gold coin of the United States.

San Francisco, June 17, 1882.
JOHN SEDGWICK, Sheriff.
J. M. WOOD, Attorney for Plaintiff.
June 17 and 24, July 1 and 8.

SHERIFF'S SALE.

D. HARNEY, Plaintiff,
vs.
WILLIAM CORCORAN, et al., Defendants.

Superior Court.
Department No. 3.
No. 6375.
Late 23d District Court.
Order of Sale and Decree
of Lien and Sale.

UNDER AND BY VIRTUE OF AN

Order of Sale and Decree of Lien and Sale, issued out of the Superior Court, Department No. 3, of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on the 19th day of May, A. D. 1882, in the above-entitled action, wherein D. Harney, the above-named plaintiff, obtained a Judgment and Decree of Lien and Sale against Thomas Kelly, George B. Knowles, A. Himmelman, John B. Lewis, A. W. Hanna, J. B. Dameron, Aug. Hemme, John Tucker, William Klump, M. Keddon, John Brickell, B. O. Devoe, M. Kelly, D. Sweet, S. F. Sinclair, T. G. McLeran, J. Agnew, J. Dunne, E. Hogan, John Henry, M. Hayes, J. Olwell, George Clark, L. B. Williams, Charles Main, B. Kelsey, W. Bosworth, and G. K. Porter, defendants, on the 27th day of April, A. D. 1879, which said Judgment and Decree was, on the 7th day of June, A. D. 1879, recorded in Judgment Book C of said 23d District Court, at page 71, I am commanded to sell all that certain lot, piece, or parcel of land, situate, lying, and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the east line of Valencia Street, distant 130 feet north from the northeast corner of Valencia and Fifteenth Streets, and running thence north on the east line of Valencia Street 25 feet; thence at right angles east 80 feet; thence at right angles south 25 feet; thence at right angles west 80 feet, to the point of beginning.

Public notice is hereby given that on Monday, the 17th day of July, A. D. 1882, at 12 o'clock, noon, of that day, in front of the Old City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, I will, in obedience to said order of sale and decree of lien and sale, sell the above-described property, or so much thereof as may be necessary to raise sufficient to satisfy said judgment, with interest and costs, etc., to the highest and best bidder, for gold coin of the United States.

San Francisco, June 24, 1882.
JOHN SEDGWICK, Sheriff.
J. M. WOOD, Attorney for Plaintiff.
June 24, July 1, 8, 15.

SHERIFF'S SALE.

D. HARNEY, Plaintiff,
vs.
J. CALLAGHAN, et al., Defendants.

Superior Court.
Department No. 3.
No. 6390.
Late 23d District Court.
Order of Sale and Decree
of Lien and Sale.

UNDER AND BY VIRTUE OF AN

Order of Sale and Decree of Lien and Sale, issued out of the Superior Court, Department No. 3, of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on the 27th day of May, A. D. 1882, in the above-entitled action, wherein D. Harney, the above-named plaintiff, obtained a Judgment and Decree of Lien and Sale against George K. Porter, T. G. McLeran, Jeremiah Callaghan, Daniel Callaghan, B. F. Hilliard, Solon Pattee, W. W. Crane Jr., W. B. Holcomb, R. McKean, P. McAtee, E. R. Thomson, and D. Jordan, defendants, on the 4th day of February, A. D. 1879, which said Judgment and Decree was, on the 25th day of February A. D. 1879, recorded in Judgment Book B, of said 23d District Court, at page 764, I am commanded to sell all that certain lot, piece, or parcel of land, situate, lying, and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the northwesterly line of Mission Street, distant 39 feet 5 inches north from the intersection of the east line of West Mission Street with the northwesterly line of Mission Street, and running thence northerly on the northwesterly line of Mission Street, 27 feet; thence at right angles west to the east line of West Mission Street; thence south on the last-mentioned line 27 1/2 feet; thence east in a straight line to the point of beginning.

Public notice is hereby given that on Monday, the 17th day of July, A. D. 1882, at 12 o'clock, noon, of that day, in front of the Old City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, I will, in obedience to said order of sale and decree of lien and sale, sell the above-described property, or so much thereof as may be necessary to raise sufficient to satisfy said judgment, with interest and costs, etc., to the highest and best bidder for gold coin of the United States.

San Francisco, June 24, 1882.
JOHN SEDGWICK, Sheriff.
J. M. WOOD, Attorney for Plaintiff.
June 24, July 1, 8, 15.

SAUEL P. MIDDLETON, AUCTIONEER

JOHN MIDDLETON & SON,

Stock, Real Estate, and General

AUCTIONEERS,

116 Montgomery Street,

Occidental Hotel Block, SAN FRANCISCO.

San Francisco, Cal., Jan. 1st, 1882.
We take pleasure in presenting this our Semi-Annual Statement.

RESOURCES.

Bank Premises.....	$150,000 30
Other Real Estate.....	5,225 35
United States Bonds.....	626,977 35
Loans on Real Estate.....	134,868 00
Loans on bonds, gas, water and bank stock.....	132,198 35
Loans on other securities.....	577,443 96
Loans on personal security.....	1,106,004 27
Due from banks and bankers.....	392,457 61
Money on hand.....	398,669 34

LIABILITIES.

Capital paid up.....	$1,000,000 00
Surplus.....	460,759 13
Due Depositors.....	1,888,655 07
Due Banks and Bankers.....	174,370 38
Dividends unpaid.....	59 50
Total.....	$3,523,844 23

R. H. McDonald, President.

NEW ENGLAND BAKING POWDER

NO

Alum.
Flour
Starch
Ammonia
Phosphates
Tartaric Acid

Cream Tartar and Bi-Carb. Soda
NOTHING ELSE
Newton Bros. & Co.
SAN FRANCISCO

NATURAL CHAMPAGNE
DRY AND EXTRA DRY

When ordering wine, don't call for "California champagne" merely, but state the brand, "RECLUSE," Extra Dry, or the name on this label.

Arpad Haraszthy & Co.
530 WASHINGTON ST. S.F. CAL.

N. B.—Examine the cork.

LOUIS BRAVERMAN & CO.

(Successors to BRAVERMAN & LEVY.)

Manufacturers of FINE JEWELRY, and Importers of WATCHES, DIAMONDS, and other PRECIOUS STONES, STERLING SILVERWARE, and FRENCH CLOCKS.

Keep the best assortment and sell at LOWER PRICES than any house in this city.

119 MONTGOMERY STREET.

Apollinaris

"THE QUEEN OF TABLE WATERS."

British Medical Journal.

"Apollinaris Water is an article which is produced by Nature and is not the handiwork of man: it is a Natural and not an artificial Water."

U.S. Treasury, 28 January, 1882.

ANNUAL SALE, 10 MILLIONS!

Of all Grocers, Druggists, and Mineral Water Dealers.

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

FOR SALE BY RUHL BROTHERS,

522 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal.

HENRY F. MILLER

PIANOS, OF BOSTON,

Are pronounced the BEST by the leading artists of the present time, and are used by them in public and private.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES mailed to any address.

WOODWORTH, SCHELL & CO.,

Sole Agents, 105 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

FIREMAN'S FUND

INSURANCE COMPANY

OF CALIFORNIA.

CAPITAL,	$750,000
ASSETS, DECEMBER 31, 1881,	$1,240,000

D. J. STAPLES, President.

ALPHEUS BULL, Vice-President.

WILLIAM J. DUTTON, Secretary.

E. W. CARPENTER, Asst. Secretary.

AGENTS IN ALL PRINCIPAL LOCALITIES.

E. DETRICK & CO.

FLAGS! FLAGS!

TENTS, HAMMOCKS, CAMP COTS, CHAIRS, STOOLS, AND CAMPERS' OUTFITS.

Tents let by the Week or Month. AMERICAN FLAGS, BUNTING.

5, 7 AND 9 CALIFORNIA, AND 108, 110 AND 112 MARKET ST.

J. C. MERRILL & CO.,

Shipping and Commission Merchants

204 and 206 California Street,

SAN FRANCISCO.

The Regular Dispatch line of Packets to Honolulu, H. I.

ALLEN, MCGARY & CO.,

IMPORTERS AND WHOLESALE

Liquor Dealers. 322-324 FRONT STREET

SAN FRANCISCO

ALASKA

COMMERCIAL CO.

No. 310 SANSOME STREET,

WHOLESALE DEALER IN FURS.

PRICE REDUCED

FOR

SEATTLE COAL

ALL DEALERS KEEP IT.

MAIN OFFICE:

210 BATTERY STREET,

San Francisco.

DEPOTS:

Beale Street Wharf, San Francisco.
Foster's Wharf - Oakland.

J. W. EVANS,
29 Post Street, San Francisco.

ROEDERER CHAMPAGNE.

NOTICE—THE TRADE AND THE

Public are informed that we receive the Genuine LOUIS ROEDERER CARTE BLANCHE CHAMPAGNE direct from Mr. Louis Roederer, Reims, over his signature and Consular invoice. Each case is marked upon the side, "Macondray & Co., San Francisco," and each bottle bears the label, "Macondray & Co., Sole Agents for the Pacific Coast."

MACONDRA & CO.,
Sole Agents for the Pacific Coast.

C. P. SHEFFIELD, N. W. SPAULDING, J. PATTERSON

17 and 19 FREMONT ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

PEBBLE SPECTACLES!

MULLER'S OPTICAL DEPOT

135 Montgomery St., nr. Bush,

Opposite Occidental Hotel.

Specialty Thirty-two Years.

COMPOUND ASTIGMATIC LENSES

Mounted to Order. Two Hours Notice.

The most complicated cases of defective vision thoroughly diagnosed, free of charge.

ART-PAINTED, PLAIN and GLAZED

TILES

For Decorations.

W. W. MONTAGUE & CO.

110 to 118 Battery Street.

CRUSHED INDIAN.

A NEW AND DELICIOUS PREPARATION FROM CORN, FOR BREAKFAST. IT COOKS THOROUGHLY IN A FEW MINUTES.

TRY IT.

For Sale by all GROCERS.

The Argonaut.

VOL. XI. NO. 3.

SAN FRANCISCO, JULY 15, 1882.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

BRET HARTE'S NEW STORY.

"Flip"—A California Romance.

Copyright 1882, by the New York Sun Publishing Company. Reprinted in the "Argonaut" by purchase from the author and arrangement with the publishers.

PART I.—CHAPTER I.

Just where the red track of the Los Gatos streams on and upward like the sinuous trail of a fiery rocket, until it is extinguished in the blue shadows of the Coast Range, there is an embayed terrace near the summit, hedged by dwarf firs. At every bend of the heat-laden road the eye rested upon it wistfully; all along the flank of the mountain, which seemed to pant and quiver in the oven-like air, through rising dust, the slow creaking of dragging wheels, the monotonous cry of tired springs, and the muffled heat of plunging hoofs, it held out a promise of sheltered coolness and green silence beyond. Sunburned and anxious faces yearned toward it from the dizzy, swaying tops of stage-coaches, from lagging teams far below, from the blinding white canvas covers of "mountain schooners," and from scorching saddles that seemed to weigh down the scrambling, sweating animals beneath. But it would seem that the hope was vain, the promise illusive. When the terrace was reached it appeared not only to have caught and gathered all the heat of the valley below, but to have evolved a fire of its own from some hidden crater-like source unknown. Nevertheless, instead of prostrating and enervating man and beast, it was said to have induced the wildest exaltation. The heated air was filled and stifling with resinous exhalations. The delirious spices of halm, bay, spruce, juniper, yerba buena, wild syringa, and strange aromatic herbs as yet unclassified, distilled and evaporated in that mighty heat, and seemed to fire with a midsummer madness all who breathed their fumes. They stung, smarted, stimulated, intoxicated. It was said that the most jaded and foot-sore horses became furious and ungovernable under their influence; wearied teamsters and muleteers who had exhausted their profanity in the ascent drank fresh draughts of inspiration in this fiery air, extended their vocabulary, and created new and startling forms of oburgation. It is recorded that one bihulous driver exhausted its description and condensed its virtues in a single phrase—"Gin and ginger." This felicitous epithet, flung out in a generous comparison with his favorite drink, "rum and gum," clung to it ever.

Such was the current comment on this vale of spices. Like most human criticism, it was hasty and superficial. No one yet had been known to have penetrated deeply its mysterious recesses. It was still far below the summit and its wayside inn. It had escaped the intruding foot of hunter and prospector, and the inquisitive patrol of the County Surveyor had only skirted its boundary. It remained for Mr. Lance Harriott to complete its exploration. His reasons for so doing were simple. He had made the journey thither underneath the stage-coach, and clinging to its axle. He had chosen this hazardous mode of conveyance at night, as the coach crept by his place of concealment in the wayside brush, to elude the Sheriff of Monterey County and his posse, who were after him. He had not made himself known to his fellow-passengers; as they already knew him as a gambler, an outlaw, and a desperado, he deemed it unwise to present himself in his newer reputation of a man who had just slain a brother gambler in a quarrel, and for whom a reward was offered. He slipped from the axle as the stage-coach swirled past the brushing branches of fir, and for an instant lay unnoticed, a scarcely distinguishable mound of dust in the broken furrows of the road. Then, more like a beast than a man, he crept on his hands and knees into the steaming underbrush. Here he lay still until the clatter of harness and the sound of voices faded in the distance. Had he been followed it would have been difficult to detect in that inert mass of rags any semblance to a known form or figure. A hideous reddish mask of dust and clay obliterated his face; his hands were shapeless stumps exaggerated in his trailing sleeves; and when he rose, staggering like a drunken man, and plunged wildly into the recesses of the wood, a cloud of dust followed him, and pieces and patches of his frayed and rotten garments clung to the impeding branches. Twice he fell, but maddened and upheld by the smarting spices and stimulating aroma of the air, he kept on his course.

Gradually the heat became less oppressive. Once, when he stopped and leaned exhaustedly against a sapling, he fancied he saw the zephyr he could not yet feel in the glittering and trembling of leaves in the distance before him. Again the deep stillness was moved with a faint sighing rustle, and he knew he must be nearing the edge of the thicket. The spell of silence thus broken was followed by a fainter, more musical interruption—the glassy tinkle of water. A step further, his foot trembled on the verge of a slight ravine, still closely canopied by the interlacing boughs overhead. A tiny stream that he could have dammed with his hand yet lingered in this parched red gash in the hillside, and trickled into a deep, irregular, well-like cavity, that again overflowed and sent its slight surplus on. It had been the luxurious retreat of many a spotted trout; it was to be the bath of Lance Harriott. Without a moment's hesitation, without removing a single garment, he slipped cautiously into it, as if fearful of losing a single drop. His head disappeared from the level of the bank; the solitude was again unbroken. Only two objects remained upon the edge of the ravine—his revolver and tobacco-pouch.

A few minutes elapsed. A fearless blue-jay alighted on the bank, and made a prospecting peck at the tobacco-pouch. It yielded in favor of a gopher, who endeavored to draw it toward his hole, but in turn gave way to a red squirrel, whose attention was divided, however, between the pouch and the revolver, which he regarded with mischievous fascination. Then there was a splash, a grunt, a sudden dispersion of animated nature, and the head of Mr. Lance Harriott appeared above the bank. It was a startling transformation; not only that he had, by this wholesale process, washed himself and his light "drill" garments entirely clean, but that he had, apparently by the same operation, morally cleansed himself, and left every stain and ugly blot of his late misdeeds and reputation in his bath. His face, albeit scratched here and there, was rosy, round, shining with irrepressible good humor and youthful levity. His large blue eyes were infantine in their innocent surprise and thoughtlessness. Dripping yet with water, and panting, he rested his elbows lazily on the bank, and became instantly absorbed, with a boy's delight, in the movements of the gopher, who, after the first alarm, returned cautiously to abduct the tobacco pouch. If any familiar had failed to detect Lance Harriott in his hideous masquerade of dust, and grime, and tatters, still less would any passing stranger have recognized in the blonde faun the possible outcast and murderer. And when with a swirl of his spattering sleeve he drove back the gopher in a shower of spray, and leaped to the bank, he seemed to have accepted his felonious hiding-place as a mere picnicking bower.

A slight breeze was unmistakably permeating the wood from the west. Looking in that direction, Lance imagined that the shadow was less dark, and although the undergrowth was denser, he struck off carelessly toward it. As he went on, the wood became lighter and lighter; branches, and presently leaves, were painted against the vivid blue of the sky. He knew that he must be near the summit, stopped, felt for his revolver, and then lightly put the few remaining branches aside.

The full glare of the noonday sun at first blinded him. When he could see more clearly, he found himself on the open western slope of the mountain, which in the Coast Range was seldom wooded. The spiced thicket stretched between him and the summit, and again between him and the stage road, that plunges from the terrace like forked lightning into the valley below. He could command all the approaches without being seen. Not that this seemed to occupy his thoughts or cause him much anxiety. His first act was to disencumber himself of his tattered coat. He then filled and lighted his pipe, and stretched himself full-length on the open hill-side, as if to bleach in the fierce sun. While smoking he carelessly perused the fragment of a newspaper which had enveloped his tobacco, and being struck with some amusing paragraph, read it half aloud again to some imaginary auditor, emphasizing its humor with an hilarious slap upon his leg.

Possibly from the relaxation of fatigue and the bath, which had become a vapor one as he alternately rolled and dried himself in the baking grass, his eyes closed dreamily. He was awakened by the sound of voices. They were distant; they were vague; they approached no nearer. He rolled himself to the verge of the first precipitous grassy descent. There was another bank or plateau below him, and then a confused depth of olive shadows, pierced here and there by the spiked helmets of pines. There was no trace of habitation, yet the voices were those of some monotonous occupation, and Lance distinctly heard through them the click of crockery and the ring of some household utensil. It appeared to be the interjectional, half listless, half perfunctory domestic dialogue of an old man and a girl, of which the words were unintelligible. Their voices indicated the solitude of the mountain, but without sadness; they were mysterious without being awe-inspiring. They might have uttered the dreariest commonplaces, but in their vast isolation, they seemed musical and eloquent. Lance drew his first sigh—they had suggested dinner.

Careless as his nature was, he was too cautious to risk detection in broad daylight. He contented himself for the present with endeavoring to locate that particular part of the depths from which the voices seemed to rise. It was more difficult, however, to select some other way of penetrating it than by the stage road. "They're bound to have a fire or show a light when it's dark," he reasoned, and, satisfied with that reflection, lay down again. Presently he began to amuse himself by tossing some silver coins in the air. Then his attention was directed to a spur of the Coast Range which had been sharply silhouetted against the cloudless western sky. Something intensely white, something so small that it was scarcely larger than the silver coin in his hand, was appearing in a slight cleft of the range.

While he looked it gradually filled and obliterated the cleft. In another moment the whole serrated line of mountain had disappeared. The dense, dazzling white, encompassing host began to pour over and down every ravine and pass of the coast. Lance recognized the sea fog, and knew that scarcely twenty miles away lay the ocean—and safety! The drooping sun was now caught and hidden in its soft embraces. A sudden chill breathed over the mountain. He shivered, rose, and plunged again for very warmth into the spice-laden thicket. The heated halsamic air began to affect him like a powerful sedative; his hunger was forgotten in the languor of fatigue; he slumbered. When he awoke it was dark. He groped his way through the thicket. A few stars were shining directly above him, but beyond and below everything was lost in the soft, white, fleecy veil of fog. Whatever light or fire might have hetokened human habitation was hidden. To have pushed on blindly was madness; he could only wait for morning. It suited the outcast's lazy philosophy. He crept back again to his bed in the hollow, and slept. In that profound silence and shadow, shut out from human association and sympathy by the ghostly fog, what torturing visions conjured up by remorse and fear should have pursued him? What spirit passed before him, or slowly shaped itself out of the infinite blackness of the wood? None. As he slipped gently into that blackness he remembered, with a slight regret, some biscuits that were dropped from the coach by a careless luncheon-consuming passenger. That pang over, he slept as sweetly, as profoundly, as divinely, as a child.

CHAPTER II.

He awoke with the aroma of the woods still steeping his senses. His first instinct was that of all young animals; he seized a few of the young, tender, green leaves of the yerba buena vine that crept over his mossy pillow, and ate them, being rewarded by a half herry-like flavor that seemed to soothe the cravings of his appetite. The languor of sleep being still upon him, he lazily watched the quivering of a sunbeam that was caught in the canopying boughs above. Then he dozed again. Hovering between sleeping and waking, he became conscious of a slight movement among the dead leaves on the bank beside the hollow in which he lay. The movement appeared to be intelligent, and directed toward his revolver, which glittered on the bank. Amused at this evident return of his larcenous friend of the previous day, he lay perfectly still. The movement and rustle continued, but it now seemed long and undulating. Lance's eyes suddenly became set; he was intensely, keenly awake. It was not a snake, but the hand of a human arm half hidden in the moss, groping for the weapon. In that flash of perception he saw that it was small, hare, and deeply freckled. In an instant he grasped it firmly, and rose to his feet, dragging to his own level as he did so the struggling figure of a young girl.

"Leave me go," she said, more ashamed than frightened.

Lance looked at her. She was scarcely more than fifteen, slight and lithe, with a boyish flatness of breast and back. Her flushed face and bare throat were absolutely peppered with minute brown freckles, like grains of spent gunpowder. Her eyes, which were large and gray, presented the singular spectacle of being also freckled—at least they were shot through in pupil and cornea with tiny spots like powdered allspice. Her hair was even more remarkable in its tawny, deerskin color, full of lighter shades, and bleached to the faintest of blondes on the crown of her head, as if by the action of the sun. She had evidently outgrown her dress, which was made for a smaller child, and the too brief skirt disclosed a bare, freckled, and sandy desert of shapely limb, for which the darned stockings were equally too scant. Lance let his grasp slip from her thin wrist to her hand, and then, with a good-humored gesture, tossed it back to her.

She did not retreat, but continued looking at him in half-silly embarrassment.

"I ain't a bit frightened," she said. "I'm not going to run away—don't you fear."

"Glad to hear it," said Lance, with unmistakable satisfaction; "but why did you go for my revolver?"

She flushed again, and was silent. Presently she began to kick the earth at the roots of the tree, and said, as if confidentially to her foot:

"I wanted to get hold of it before you did."

"You did? and why?"

"Oh, you know why."

Every tooth in Lance's head showed that he did, perfectly. But he was discreetly silent.

"I didn't know what you were hiding there for," she went on, still addressing the tree, "and"—looking at him sideways under her white lashes—"I didn't see your face."

This subtle compliment was the first suggestion of her artful sex. It actually sent the blood into the careless rascal's face, and for a moment confused him. He coughed.

"So you thought you'd freeze on to that six-shooter of mine until you saw my hand?"

She nodded. Then she picked up a broken hazel branch, fitted it into the small of her back, threw her tanned bare arms over the ends of it, and expanded her chest and her biceps at the same moment. This simple action was supposed to convey an impression at once of ease and muscular force.

"Perhaps you'd like to take it now," said Lance, handing her the pistol.

"I've seen six-shooters before now," said the girl, the proffered weapon and its suggestion. "Dad and my brother had two derringers before he was big as me."

She stopped to observe in her companion the e-capacity of her family to bear arms. Lance only regarded her amusedly. Presently she again spoke abruptly:

"What made you eat that grass, just now?"

"Grass!" echoed Lance.

"Yes, there," pointing to the yerba buena.

Lance laughed. "I was hungry. Look," he said, tossing some silver into the air. "Do you think you could get me some breakfast for that, and have enough left to buy something for yourself?"

The girl eyed the money and the man with half-bashful curiosity.

"I reckon dad might give ye suthing if he had a mind ter, though ez a rule he's down on tramps ever since they run off his chickens. Ye might try."

"But I want you to try. You can bring it to me here."

The girl retreated a step, dropped her eyes, and with a smile that was a charming hesitation between bashfulness and impudence, said: "So you are hidin', are ye?"

"That's just it. Your head's level. I am," laughed Lance, unconcernedly.

"Yur ain't one o' the McCarty gang—are ye?"

Mr. Lance Harriott felt a momentary moral exaltation in declaring truthfully that he was not one of a notorious band of mountain free-booters known in the district under that name.

"Nor ye ain't one of them chicken-lifters that raided Henderson's ranch? We don't go much on that kind o' cattle yer."

"No," said Lance, cheerfully.

"Nor ye ain't that chap ez beat his wife to death at Santa Clara?"

Lance honestly scorned the imputation. Such conjugal ill-treatment as he had indulged in had not been physical, and had been with other men's wives.

There was a moment's further hesitation on the part of the girl. Then she said, shortly:

"Well, then, I reckon you kin come along with me."

"Where?" asked Lance.

"To the ranch," she replied, simply.

"Then you won't bring me anything to eat here?"

"What for? You kin get it down there." Lance hesitated. "I tell you it's all right," she continued. "I'll make it all right with dad."

"But suppose I reckon I'd rather stay here," persisted Lance, with a perfect consciousness, however, of affectation in his caution.

"Stay away then," said the girl, coolly; "only as dad permitted this yer woods—"

"Pre-empted," suggested Lance.

"Per-empted or prem-empted, as you like," continued the girl, scornfully, "ez be's got a holt on this yer woods, ye might ez well see him down thar ez here. For here he's like to come any minit. You can bet your life on that."

She must have read Lance's amusement in his eyes, for she again dropped her own with a frown of brusque embarrassment.

"Come along, then; I'm your man," said Lance, gayly, extending his hand.

She would not accept it, eyeing it, however, furtively, like a horse about to shy. "Hand me your pistol first," she said.

He handed it to her with an assumption of gayety. She received it on her part with unfeigned seriousness, and threw it over her shoulder like a gun. This combined action of the child and heroine, it is quite unnecessary to say, afforded Lance undiluted joy.

"You go first," she said.

Lance stepped promptly out, with a broad grin. "Looks kinder as if I was a pris'ner—don't it?" he suggested.

"Go on, and don't fool," she replied.

The two fared onward through the wood. For one moment he entertained the facetious idea of appearing to rush frantically away, "just to see what the girl would do," but abandoned it.

"It's an even thing if she wouldn't spot me the first pop," he reflected, admiringly.

When they had reached the open hillside Lance stopped inquiringly. "This way," she said, pointing toward the summit, and in quite an opposite direction to the valley where he had heard the voices, one of which he now recognized as hers. They skirted the thicket for a few moments, and then turned sharply into a trail which began to dip toward a ravine leading to the valley. "Why do you have to go all the way round?" he asked.

"We don't," the girl replied, with emphasis; "there's a shorter cut."

"Where?"

"That's tellin'," she answered, shortly.

"What's your name?" asked Lance, after a steep scramble and a drop into the ravine.

"Flip."

"What?"

"Flip."

"I mean your first name—your front name."

"Flip."

"Flip! Oh, sbort for Felipa."

"It ain't Flipper—it's Flip." And she relapsed into silence.

"You don't ask me mine," suggested Lance. She did not vouchsafe a reply.

"Then you don't want to know?"

"Maybe dad will. You can lie to him."

This direct answer apparently sustained the agreeable homicide for some moments. He moved onward, silently exuding admiration.

"Only," added Flip, with a sudden caution, "you'd better agree with me."

The trail here turned again abruptly, and reentered the cañon. Lance looked up, and noticed that they were almost directly beneath the bay thicket and the plateau that towered far above them. The trail here showed signs of clearing, and the way was marked by felled trees and stumps of pines.

"What does your father do here?" he finally asked. Flip remained silent, swinging the revolver. Lance repeated his question.

"Burns charcoal and makes diamonds," said Flip, looking down from the corners of her eyes.

"Makes diamonds?" echoed Lance.

Flip nodded her head.

"Many of 'em?" he continued, carelessly.

"Lots. But they're not big," she returned, with a sidelong glance.

"Oh, they're not big," said Lance, gravely.

They had by this time reached a small, staked enclosure, whence the sudden fluttering and cackle of poultry welcomed the return of the evident mistress of this sylvan retreat. It was scarcely imposing. Further on, a cooking stove under a tree, a saddle and bridle, a few household implements scattered about, indicated the "ranch." Like most pioneer clearings, it was simply a disorganized raid upon nature that had left behind a desolate battle-field strewn with waste and decay. The fallen trees, the crushed thicket, the splintered limbs, the rudely torn-up soil were made hideous by their grotesque juxtaposition with the wrecked fragments of civilization, in empty cans, broken bottles, hattered hats, soleless boots, frayed stockings, cast-off rags, and the crowning absurdity of the twisted wire skeleton of a hooped-skirt hanging from a branch. The wildest defile, the densest thicket, the most virgin solitude was less dreary and forlorn than this first footprint of man. The only redeeming feature of this prolonged bivouac was the cabin itself. Built of the half-cylindrical strips of pine bark, and thatched with the same material, it had a certain picturesque rusticity. But this was an accident of economy rather than taste, for which Flip apologized by saying that the bark of the pine was "no good" for charcoal.

"I reckon dad's in the woods," she added, pausing before the open door of the cabin. "O dad!" Her voice, clear and high, seemed to fill the whole long cañon, and echoed from the plateau above. The monotonous strokes of an ax were suddenly pretermitted, and somewhat from the depths of the close-set pines a voice answered her. There was a pause of a few moments, with some muttering, stumbling, and crackling in the underbrush, and then the sudden appearance of "dad."

Had Lance first met him in the thicket, he would have been puzzled to assign his race to Mongolian, Indian, or Ethiopian origin. Perfunctory but incomplete washings of his hands and face, after charcoal burning, had gradually ground into his skin a grayish slate-pencil pallor, grotesquely relieved at the edges where the washing had left off with a border of a darker color. He looked like an overworked Christy minstrel with the briefest intervals between his performances. There were black rims in the orbits of his eyes, as if he gazed feebly out of unglazed spectacles, which heightened his simian resemblance, already grotesquely exaggerated by what appeared to be repeated and spasmodic experiments in dyeing his gray hair. Without the slightest notice of Lance, he inflicted his protesting and querulous presence entirely on his daughter.

"Well! what's up now? Yer ye are, calling me from work an hour before noon. Dog my skin if I ever get fairly limbered up afore it's 'dad!' and 'O dad!'"

To Lance's intense satisfaction the girl received this harangue with an air of supreme indifference, and when "dad" had relapsed into an unintelligible, and as it seemed to Lance, a half-frightened muttering, she said coolly:

"Ye'd better drop that ax, and scoot round gettin' this stranger some breakfast, and some grub to take with him. He's one of them San Francisco sports out here trout-fishing in the branch. He's got adrift from his party, has lost his rod and fixin's, and had to camp out last night in the Gin and Ginger Woods."

"That's just it; it's allers suthin' like that," screamed the old man, dashing his fist on his leg in a feeble, impotent passion, but without looking at Lance. "Why in blazes don't he go up to that there blamed hotel on the summit? Why in thunder—" But here he caught his daughter's large freckled eyes full in his own. He blinked feebly, his voice fell into a tone of whining entreaty. "Now, look yer, Flip, it's playin' it rather low down on the old man, this yer runnin' in o' tramps, and deserted emigrants, and cast-ashore sailors, and forlorn widders, and ravin' lunatics on this yer ranch. I put it to you, mister," he said, abruptly turning to Lance for the first time, but as if he had already taken an active part in the conversation—"I put it as a gentleman to yourself, and a fair-minded sportin' man, if this is the square thing?"

Before Lance could reply Flip had already begun. "That's just it! D'ye reckon being a sportin' man, and an Ar feller, he's goin' to waltz down into that hotel, rigged out ez be is? D'ye reckon he's goin' to let his partners get the laugh onter him? Do ye reckon he's goin' to show his head outen this yer ranch till he can do it square? Not much! Go 'long, dad; you're talkin' silly."

The old man weakened. He feebly trailed his ax between his legs to a stump, and sat down, wiping his forehead with his sleeve, and imparting to it the appearance of a slate with a difficult sum partly rubbed out. He looked despairingly at Lance. "In course," he said, with a deep sigh, "you naturally ain't got any money. In course you left your pocket-book, containin' fifty dollars, under a stone, and can't find it. In course," he continued, as he observed Lance put his hand to his pocket, "you've only a blank check on Wells, Fargo & Co. for a hundred dollars, and you'd like me to give you the difference?"

Amused as Lance evidently was at this, his absolute admiration for Flip absorbed everything else. With his eyes still fixed upon the girl, he briefly assured the old man that he would pay for everything he wanted. He did this with a manner quite different from the careless, easy attitude he had assumed toward Flip; at least the quick-witted girl noticed it, and wondered if he was angry. It was quite true that ever since his eye had fallen upon another of his own sex its glance had been less frank and careless. Certain traits of possible impatience which might develop into man-slaying were coming to the fore. Yet a word or a gesture of Flip's was sufficient to change that manner, and when she had, with the fretful assistance of her father, prepared a somewhat sketchy and primitive repast, he questioned the old man about diamond-making. The eye of dad kindled.

"I want ter know how ye knew I was making diamonds," he asked, with a certain bashful pettishness not unlike his daughter's.

"Heard it in 'Frisco," replied Lance, with glib mendacity, glancing at the girl.

"I reckon they're gettin' sort of skeert down there—them jewelers," chuckled dad; "yet it's in water that there figures will have to come down. It's only a question of the price of charcoal. I suppose they didn't tell you bow I made the discovery?"

At any other time Lance would have stopped the old man's narrative by saying that he knew the story, but he wished to see how far Flip lent herself to her father's delusion.

"Ye see, one night about two years ago I had a pit o' charcoal burnin' out there, and tho' it had been a-smolderin', and a-smokin', and a-blazin' for nigh on a month, somehow it didn't charcoal worth a cent. And yet, dog my skin, but the heat o' that er pit was suthin' hidys and frightful; ye couldn't stand within a hundred yards of it, and they could feel it on the stage road three miles over yon—t'other side the mountain. There was nights when me and Flip had to take our blankets up the ravine and camp out all night, and the back of this yer hut shrivelled up like that bacon. It was about as nigh onto hell as any sample ye kin get here. Now, mebbe you think I built that air fire? Mebbe you'll allow the heat was just the nat'ral burnin' of that pit?"

"Certainly," said Lance, trying to see Flip's eyes, which were resolutely averted.

"Ther's whar you'd be lyin'! That yar heat kem out of the bowels of the yearth—kem up like out of a cimblyer or a blast, and kep up that yar fire. And when she cools down a month after, and I got to strip her, there was a hole in the yearth, and a spring o' bilin', scaldin' water pourin' out of it ez big as your waist. And right in the middle of it was this yer." He rose with the instinct of a skillful raconteur, and whisked from under his bunk a chamois leather bag, which he emptied on the table before them. It contained a small fragment of native rock crystal, half-fused upon a petrified bit of pine. It was so glaringly truthful, so really what it purported to be, that the most unscientific woodman or pioneer would have understood it at a glance. Lance raised his mirthful eyes to Flip. "It was cooled suddint—stunted by the water," said the girl eagerly. She stopped, and as abruptly turned away her eyes and her reddened face.

"That's it—that's just it," continued the old man. "Thar's Flip, thar, knows it; she ain't no fool!"

Lance did not speak, but turned a hard, unsympathizing look upon the old man, and rose almost roughly. The old man clutched his coat. "That's it, ye see. The carbon's just turning to di'mens. And stunted. And why? 'Cos the heat wasn't kep' up long enough. Mebbe yer think I stopped thar? That ain't me. Thar's a pit out yer in the woods ez hez been burnin' six months; it hain't, in course, got the advantages o' the old one, for it's nat'ral heat. But I'm keepin' that heat up. I've got a hole where I kin watch it every four hours. When the time comes I'm thar! Don't you see? That's me! Thar's David Fairley—that's the old man—you bet!"

"That's so," said Lance, curtly; "and now, Mr. Fairley, if you'll hand me over a coat or a jacket till I can get past these fogs on the Monterey road, I won't keep you from your diamond pit." He threw down a handful of silver on the table.

"There's a deerskin jacket yer," said the old man, "that one o' them vaqueros left for the price of a bottle of whisky."

"I reckon it wouldn't suit the stranger," said Flip, dubiously producing a much-worn, slashed, and braided vaquero's jacket. But it did suit Lance, who found it warm, and also had suddenly found a certain satisfaction in opposing Flip. When he had put it on, and nodded coldly to the old man and carelessly to Flip, he walked to the door.

"If you're going to take the Monterey road, I can show you a short cut to it," said Flip, with a certain kind of sly civility. The paternal Fairley groaned. "That's it; let the chickens and the ranch go to thunder as long as there's a stranger to trap round with; go on!"

Lance would have made some savage reply, but Flip interrupted. "You know yourself, dad, it's a blind trail, and as that ere constable that kem out here hunting French Pete couldn't find it, and had to go round by the cañon, like ez not the stranger would lose his way, and have to come back." This dangerous prospect silenced the old man, and Flip and Lance stepped into the road together. They walked on for some moments without speaking. Suddenly Lance turned upon his companion.

"You didn't swallow all that rot about the diamond, did you?" he asked, crossly.

Flip ran a little ahead, as if to avoid a reply.

"You don't mean to say that's the sort of hog-wash the old man serves out to you regularly?" continued Lance, becoming more slangy in his ill-temper.

"I don't know that it's any consarn o' yours what I think," replied Flip, hopping from boulder to boulder, as they crossed the bed of a dry water-course.

"And I suppose you've piloted round and dry-nussed every tramp and dead-beat you've met since you came here," continued Lance, with unmistakable ill-humor. "How many have you belped over this road?"

"It's a year since there was a Chinaman chased by some Irishmen from the crossing into the brush about yer, and he was too afeered to come out, and nigh most starved to death in thar. I had to drag him out, and start him on the mountain, for you couldn't get him back to the road. He was the last one but you."

"Do you reckon it the right thing for a girl like you to run about with trash of this kind, and mix herself up with all sorts of roughs and bad company?" said Lance.

Flip stopped short. "Look! if you're goin' to talk like dad, I'll go back."

The ridiculousness of such a resemblance struck him more keenly than a consciousness of his own ingratitude. He hastened to assure Flip that he was joking. When he had made his peace they fell into talk again, Lance becoming unselfish enough to inquire into one or two facts concerning her life which did not immediately affect him. Her mother had died on the plains when she was a baby, and her brother had run away from home at twelve years of age. She fully expected to see him again, and thought he might some time stray into the cañon. "That is why, then, you take so much stock in tramps," said Lance. "You expect to recognize him?"

"Well," replied Flip, gravely, "there is suthin' in that, and there's suthin' in this: some o' these chaps might run across brother, and do him a good turn for the sake of me."

"Like me, for instance?" suggested Lance.

"Like you. You'd do him a good turn, would you?"

"You bet!" said Lance, with a sudden emotion that quite startled him; "only don't you go throwing yourself around promiscuously." He was half-conscious of an irritating sense of jealousy, as he asked if any of her protégés had ever returned.

"No," said Flip, "no one ever did. It shows," she added, with sublime simplicity, "I had done 'em good, and they could get on alone. Don't it?"

"It does," responded Lance, grimly. "Have you any other friends that come?"

"Only the postmaster at the Crossing."

"The postmaster?"

"Yes; he's reckonin' to marry me next year if I'm big enough."

"And what do you reckon?" asked Lance, earnestly. Flip began a series of distortions with her shoulders, ran on ahead, picked up a few pebbles and threw them into the wood, glanced back at Lance with swimming, mottled eyes, that seemed a piquant incarnation of everything suggestive and tantalizing, and said: "That's telling."

They had by this time reached the spot where they were to separate. "Look," said Flip, pointing to a faint deflection of their path, which seemed, however, to lose itself in the underbrush a dozen yards away, "there's your trail. It gets plainer and broader the further you get on. But you must use your eyes here, and get to know it well afore you get into the fog. Good-bye."

"Good-bye," Lance took her hand, and drew her beside him. She was still redolent of the spices of the thicket, and to the young man's excited fancy seemed at that moment to personify the perfume and intoxication of her native woods. Half-laughingly, half-earnestly, he tried to kiss her; she struggled for some time strongly, but at the last moment yielded with a slight return and the exchange of a subtle fire that thrilled him, and left him standing confused and astounded as she ran away. He watched her little, nymph-like figure disappear in the chequered shadows of the wood, and then he turned briskly down the half-hidden trail. His eyesight was keen, he made good progress, and was soon well on his way toward the distant ridge.

But Flip's return had not been as rapid. When she reached the wood, she crept to its beetling verge, and, looking across the cañon, watched Lance's figure as it vanished and reappeared in the shadows and sinuosities of the ascent. When he reached the ridge the outlying fog crept across the summit, caught him in its embrace, and wrapped him from her gaze. Flip sighed, raised herself, put her alternate foot on a stump, and took a long pull at her too-brief stockings. When she had pulled down her skirt, and endeavored once more to renew the intimacy that had existed in previous years between the edge of her petticoat and the top of her stockings, she sighed again, and went home.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

When the Queen conferred the Order of the Garter upon the Earl of Beaconsfield, Sir Richard Wallace presented him with a magnificent diamond star of the Garter, originally belonging to the Marquis of Hertford, said to have been one of the finest ever made, on the understanding that it should be made an heirloom. From an omission in Lord Beaconsfield's will this was not done, and after his death the star was sold by his executors to a firm of goldsmiths and jewelers in the Haymarket. After having retained it for some months in the hope of disposing of it, but failing to do so, they have taken out all the diamonds—three hundred and ninety stones—and remounted them into single-stone and gem rings of different sizes, each inscribed with the word "Beaconsfield," and the memorials are now extensively advertised.

Fashionable English country life does not begin until August, Parliament generally adjourning the latter part of July. Lawn tennis has almost entirely crowded out croquet as the summer game. The latter became too "common." Archery, though, is still more in favor than tennis. Every county has its archery club, some two or three, and though there is practice at home, the show shooting is done at the club meetings, which are usually held once a fortnight while the fine weather lasts. Each club has its special costume. If the day is fair luncheon is set out on a long table à la fresco, and the archery ladies and gentlemen seated around it, with their liveried servants in waiting behind them, form pretty tableaux.

The Grand Jury in Chicago, the other day, refused to indict the members of a wholesale grocery firm for libel on complaint of General B. F. Butler. The firm extensively advertised a baking powder, and published a large number of pictorial posters, conspicuously displayed, representing General Butler as a baker preparing dough. A silver spoon projects from his pocket. This latter display is supposed to be the ground on which the indictment was asked.

A handy new garment for travel in sleeping-cars is a very thin but all-enveloping cloak, buttoning up from chin to toes. When ready to retire for the night the woman puts it on, and then undresses under it, safe from those prying eyes which abound in sleeping cars, and which curtains can not effectually shut out. She uses it for a night-gown, too, and in the morning dresses herself safely beneath its kindly folds.

The Bishop of Melbourne, Australia, has declined to grant the petition of some of the people of his diocese to direct prayer for rain. He says that material phenomena are under the control of laws which will not be changed or interrupted in answer to prayer, and that prayer should be a request for spiritual blessings only.

Twenty-three convicts of the State Prison at Frankfort, Ky., professed conversion under the revivalism of Barnes, and were taken to the river for baptism. The warden, though protesting that he did not doubt the sincerity of their repentance, escorted them with a strong guard armed with rifles.

Purloiners of umbrellas in clubs and other places of the kind may find some interest in the fact that a man has been recently sentenced, at the Middlesex Sessions, to eighteen months' hard labor for stealing an umbrella.

IN THE HARBOR.

Go for a sail this mornin'—This way, yer honor, please. Weather about? Lor' bless you! only a pleasant breeze. My boat's that there in the harbor, and the man aboard's my mate. Jump in, and I'll row you out, sir; that's her, the Crazy Kate.

Queer name for a boat, you fancy; well, so it is, may be, But Crazy Kate and her story's the talk o' the place, you see; And me and my pardner knowed her—knowed her all her life—We was both on us asked to the weddin' when she was made a wife.

Her as our boat's named arter was famous far and wide; For years in all winds and weathers she haunted the harbor side, With her great wild eyes a-starin' and a-strainin' across the waves, Waitin' for what can't happen till the dead come out o' their graves.

She was married to young Ned Garling, a big, brown fisher-lad; One week a bride, and the next one a sailor's widow—and mad. They were married one fearful winter, as widowed many a wife; He'd a smile for all the lasses; but she'd loved him all her life.

A rollickin', gay young fellow, we thought her too good for him; He'd been a bit wild and careless—but, married all taut and trim, We thought as he'd mend his manners when he won the village prize, And carried her off in triumph before many a rival's eyes.

But one week wed and they parted—he went with the fisher fleet—With the men who must brave the tempest that the women and bairns may eat;

It's a rough long life o' partin' is the life o' the fisher folk, And there's never a winter passes but some good wife's heart is broke.

We've a sayin' among us sea folk as few on us dies in bed. Walk through our little churchyard, and read the tale of our dead; It's mostly the bairns and the women as is restin' under the turf, For half o' the men sleep yonder under the rollin' surf.

The night Kate lost her husband was the night o' the fearful gale. She'd stood on the shore that mornin', and had watched the tiny sail As it faded away in the distance, bound for the coast of France, And the fierce wind bore it swiftly away from her anxious glance.

The boats that had sailed that mornin' with the fleet were half a score, And never a soul among 'em came back to the English shore. There was wringin' o' hands and moanin', and when they spoke o' the dead

For many a long day after the women's eyes were red.

Kate heard it as soon as any—the fate of her fisher lad—But her eyes were wild and tearless; she went slowly and surely mad. "He isn't drowned," she would murmur; "he will come again some day."

And her lips shaped the self-same story as the long years crept away.

Spring, and summer, and autumn, in the fiercest winter gale, Would Crazy Kate stand watchin' for the glint of a far-off sail; Stand by the hour together, and murmur her husband's name; For twenty years she watched there, for the boat that never came.

She counted the years as nothin'; the shock that had sent her mad Had left her love forever, a brave, young, handsome lad. She thought one day she should see him, just as he said good-bye When he leaped in his boat and vanished, where the waters touched the sky.

She was but a lass when it happened—the last time I saw her there, The first faint streaks o' silver had come in her jet-black hair; And then a miracle happened—her mad, weird words came right, For the fisher lad came ashore, sir, one wild and stormy night.

We were all of us watchin', waitin', for at dusk we heard a cry, A far-off cry, round the headland, and strained was every eye—Strained through the deepenin' darkness, and a boat was ready to man, When, all of a sudden, a woman down to the surf-line ran.

'Twas Crazy Kate. In a moment, before what she meant was known, The boat was out in the tempest—and she was in it alone. She was out of sight in a second—but over the sea came a sound, The voice of a woman cryin' that her long-lost love was found.

A miracle, sir; for the woman came back through the ragin' storm, And there in the boat beside her was lyin' a lifeless form. She leapt to the beach and staggered, cryin', "Speak to me, husband, Ned!"

And the light of our lifted lanterns flashed on the face o' the dead.

It was him as had sailed away, sir—a miracle sure it seemed. We looked at the lad, and knewed him, and fancied we must ha' dreamed—

It was twenty years since we'd seen him—since Kate, poor soul, went mad, But there in the boat that evenin' lay the same brown, handsome lad.

Gently we took her from him—for she moaned that he was dead—We carried him to a cottage, and we laid him on a bed; But Kate came pushin' her way through, and she clasped the lifeless clay.

And we hadn't the heart to hurt her, so we couldn't tear her away.

The news of the miracle traveled, and folks came far and near, And the women talked of spectres—it had given 'em quite a skeer; And the parson he came with the doctor down to the cottage quick—They thought as us sea-folks' fancy had played our eyes a trick.

But the parson, who'd known Kate's husband, as had married 'em in the church,

When he seed the dead lad's features he gave quite a sudden lurch, And his face was white as linen—for a moment it struck him dumb—I half expected he'd tell us as the Judgment Day was come.

The Judgment Day, when the ocean, they say, 'ull give up its dead; What else meant those unchanged features, though twenty years had sped?

* * * * *

That night, with her arms around him, the poor mad woman died, And here in our village churchyard we buried 'em side by side.

'Twas the shock, they said, as killed her—the shock o' seein' him dead. The story got in the papers, and far and near it spread; And some one half believed it—I know what you'd say, sir; wait—Wait till you hear the finish o' this story o' Crazy Kate.

It was all explained one mornin' as clear as the light o' day, And when we knowed we were happy to think as she'd passed away, As she died with her arms around him, her lips on the lips o' the dead—Believin' the face she looked on was the face o' the man she'd wed.

But the man she'd wed was a villain, and that she never knew—He hadn't been drowned in the tempest; he only of all the crew Was saved by a French ship cruising, and carried ashore, and there Was nursed to life by a woman—a French girl, young and fair.

He fell in love with the woman—this dare-devil, heartless Ned, And married her, thinkin' the other had given him up for dead. He was never the man—and we'd said so—for a lovin' lass like Kate; But he mightn't ha' done what he did, sir, if he'd known of her cruel fate.

'Twas his son by the foreign woman, his image in build and face, Whose lugger the storm had driven to his father's native place—'Twas his son who had come like a phantom out of the long ago; On the spot where Kate had suffered, God's hand struck Ned the blow.

We learned it all from the parson when Ned came under the waves In search of the son he worshiped—and he found two fresh-made graves.

Dang! what was that? Sit steady! Rowed right into you, mate? I forgot where I was for a moment—I was tellin' the gent about Kate.

—George R. Sims.

CHICAGO NOVELETTES.

By Joseph Medill, the "Tribune" Novelist.

"I should smile."

As Bertha Redingote spoke these words she lay coquetishly in a hammock that had been swung between two giant oaks that reared their tall heads aloft in the broad lawn, at the edge of which stood her father's stately mansion. A little foot, enmeshed in a silken stocking, whose delicate texture displayed to advantage the trim ankle within, peeped out from beneath a fleecy white dress, while the laughing eyes and fair forehead of the girl were surmounted by a coronal of sunnily-gold tresses of which any hair store might have been proud.

"So you like ice cream?" said Harold McIntyre, bending over the hammock, and looking tenderly into Bertha's blue eyes.

"I should smile," said the girl again, getting ready to put on her slipper and start.

"You are right," said Harold; "ice cream is a good thing. Perhaps some day next week I will buy you some."

The look of happy expectancy faded from the girl's face. "What time is it?" she asked.

"Ten minutes to six," replied Harold.

"Then," said Bertha, "if you start right away you will get home in time for supper."—From "Bluffing Back."

"I do not believe you."

Ethelbert McGuire winced as Myrtle Hathaway spoke these words—cruel, bitter words, that seemed to sear his very soul as he stood there in the gloaming, the time of silence and shadows. The swallows were twittering among the leaves in their noisy way, the ice-cream lairs were casting their baleful light across the broad thoroughfare.

"You can not mean it, Myrtle," the young man says, his voice choked with emotion. "You surely can not doubt my word—the word of one to whom you have plighted your troth, and in whose life your future is bound up."

"But I do mean it," replies the girl; "although, God knows, my life would be brighter, better, bappier were it not so. I have loved you with a strong, country-butter love that has become a part of my very existence. And it is when I have taught my heart to beat responsive to your every word, when I have come to believe in you with all the passionate trustfulness of a woman's nature, that you come to me, and here, on this beautiful June evening, when the heavens are panoplied with stars and the air is balmy with the perfume of roses, you say to me that you have never bet on a horse-race—you tell me this solemnly and earnestly, knowing that my heart will not let me judge harshly any action of yours. No, Ethelbert; I love you with a maddening, ninety-days-or-ten-per-cent-off-for-cash trust that is beyond compare, but I can not let you abuse that trust. I am but a girl—a sensitive, passionate, one-bustle-and-a-four-dollar-bang girl—but I am not a chump," and sticking her chewing-gum on the door-post, Myrtle turned to enter the parlor.

"But I swear it," exclaimed Ethelbert. "I swear to you that I would not bet four dollars against ten that Maud S. could beat three minutes."

"You would not?" asked the girl.

"No," was Ethelbert's reply. "I would not bet on anything."

"Then," said the girl, speaking slowly, and with grave tenderness, "you had better head for the gate. I can never place my happiness and chances for spring bonnets in the hands of a man who would let as sure a thing as that get away."—From "My Summer in Kenosha."

"Can you not answer me, Gwendolen?"

Up from the meadows the soft breezes of a perfect June evening were wafting the faint perfume of the cowslip and a dead horse, and as George W. Simpson and Gwendolen Mahaffy stood near the gate whose decrepit appearance told with more eloquence than could mere words of the deathless passion that enslaved their souls, both felt that a crisis in their lives had arrived. Secure in the consciousness of of his own merit—that sterling merit which always lies in a strong arm, clear brain, and large feet—and yet with a modest diffidence concerning his own worth, the young man stood there in the gloaming with a half reluctant cat-on-the-back-fence expression that lent an added beauty to his pure young face, and made more pleadingly tender the earnest, father-is-coming-up-the-front-steps look with which he regarded the beautiful girl who stood by his side. He had asked her to be his wife—to leave parents, sisters, brothers, and all the endearing influences of a happy, Christian home where two girls are kept, and go out with him into the wide world as a helpmeet and companion. He had told, in fervid sentences, of the great love he bore her—a love that would ever be the guiding-star of his life he said, cheering him when the black clouds of adversity and despair hung heavily in the horizon of his hopes, and without which his whole existence would be one arid, trackless waste, on which lay the white skeletons of Ambition and Hope—ghastly remnants of a life whose final wreck was all the more sad because of the happiness which it might have held had Love not flown away with mocking laugh when pleaded with so passionately.

[When it came to ornamental lying, with two rows of fluting up the back, George took first money.]

Gwendolen had stood in graceful poise as he spoke, one ear thrown slightly forward, and her right foot covering the door-mat, and now that he had finished, was looking down in maiden shyness. But no words came from her lips—those rosy-ripe portals that opened with such languid grace when there was pie in the house—and George began to fear that perhaps he had talked her to sleep. Presently, however, she drew quite close to him, put her hand in his, and resting her cheek upon his shoulder, said: "Yes, George, I will marry you."

"But when?" asked the young man, a horrible fear that his bluff was to be called chilling his very blood.

"I will marry you," repeated Gwendolen, "when a bicycle-rider is elected president."

Turning away to hide his emotion, George mumbled, in low, piratical tones: "Thank Heaven, I am safe."

"Grabbed at the Brink."

SOCIETY.

Notes and Gossip.

Mr. and Mrs. Irving M. Scott, who have been recreating in the sunny climate of Southern California during the past three or four weeks, have returned. Miss Anna Sullivan, of Virginia City, is visiting Miss M. Mannings, at Sacramento. General O. H. La Grange, who has been visiting this coast on business and pleasure combined, has returned to New York. Judge Wilson has been spending the week in Santa Cruz. Mr. J. W. Moore, of Oakland, is at Bartlett Springs. Among the guests at Santa Cruz the present week are Mayor Robinson, of Oakland, and Mrs. Robinson and the Misses Robinson. Mr. and Mrs. S. P. Middleton have returned from Napa Soda Springs. Mr. and Mrs. D. J. Staples and Miss Kittie Staples have returned from Etna Springs. Mr. and Mrs. George Turner have returned from Lake Tahoe. Mrs. Charles Reddington has returned from Southern California. J. J. Brice, U. S. N., is at Etna Springs. Mrs. J. W. Mastick, of Oakland, is at Cloverdale. Miss Ivy Wandesforde returned from Portland on Monday last. Mrs. Captain Kohl and Miss Kohl, of San Mateo, have been spending a few days in San Francisco. Mr. and Mrs. Mark Sibley Severance have been whiling away a week or two at Santa Monica, and at other pleasant places in Los Angeles County. Miss Hill, accompanied by her father, Thomas Hill, the artist, who went to the Yosemite in May last, will return to Oakland early next month. Mrs. Doctor Bird and Miss May Miller are at the Yosemite. Mrs. and Mrs. A. P. Williams are at Webber Lake. Mrs. Sam D. Mayer has sailed for Europe. Miss Lizzie Crocker has returned from Sacramento. Mrs. Judge Hyde and daughters are spending a few weeks at Santa Clara. Mrs. J. L. Requa, of Piedmont, is at Santa Monica. Mrs. S. D. Hovey, who has been dividing her time between Santa Monica and the Sierra Madre Villa for the past two months, has returned to the Palace. Sir Thomas Hesketh and party are at the Salmon River. Hon. B. B. Redding, W. E. Brown, and the Rev. Mr. Barrows have returned from McCloud River. J. G. Eastland and family are summering in Santa Clara County. Miss Bessie Sedgwick has returned from Monterey. Gordon Blanding and W. Tevis are at Scott Mountain. Frank Cummins and George Redding leave for the McCloud River to-day. Rev. Dr. Stebbins and family have returned from the McCloud River. Major and Mrs. Sanger have returned from Soda Bay. Miss Sutherland has returned from McCloud River. Miss Fannie Stegman is at the Yosemite. Judge and Mrs. Sanderson are at Paraiso Springs. Miss Mamie Sampson has gone East, to remain for eight or nine months. Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Applegate are at Lake Tahoe. Miss Hattie Sharp, of Carson, is visiting Mrs. R. C. Miller and her daughters. Mrs. A. H. Cunningham has returned from her visit to Mare Island. Miss Sallie Swearingen has returned from Lake County. Justice and Mrs. Field have returned from Belmont. Mrs. J. R. Watson, who has been visiting in this city, has returned to Sacramento. Mrs. Lillie Coit, who has been spending a few days with Miss Jennie Flood, at Menlo, returned to Larkmead on Wednesday last. Mr. and Mrs. Albert Jencks and Miss Nellie Trowbridge, who have been spending a few weeks at Monterey, have returned and gone to Tahoe. Mrs. Major E. B. Stonebill is at Lake Tahoe. Mrs. Senator Farley leaves Washington for home during the last week in July. General T. J. Wood, U. S. A., and Mrs. Wood and her two children, arrived here from the East on Wednesday last. A. K. P. Harmon and his bride, who left Oakland for the East some four or five weeks ago, are at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, New York. Miss Shirley, of Martinez, has been at the Lick most of the week. Chief-Engineer Fletcher, U. S. N., has been ruralizing in Napa County. Miss Hattie Rice returned from McCloud River on Saturday last. Mr. and Mrs. G. E. Dickson have returned from New York, and taken up their permanent residence at the Grand. Miss Hawley, of Oakland, is visiting in Sacramento. Miss Fannie Beach has returned from Duncan's Mills. Mrs. McNeal, of Sacramento, after spending a few days at the Grand during the early part of the week, has gone to Monterey for a short time. Mrs. James Crittenden will remain at Bartlett's Springs until August. Mr. and Mrs. Isadore Burns have returned from the country, and taken up their permanent residence at the Grand. Mrs. John H. Wise and her son, Henry E. Wise, have gone to Santa Cruz to stay a few weeks. Mrs. C. J. Hoyt, of Oakland, is at Highland Springs. Mrs. Doctor Harney has taken up her permanent residence at the Grand. Mrs. Colgate Baker has returned from the Yosemite. Mrs. Doctor Burgess has returned from Santa Cruz. Judge Waymire is spending a few weeks at San Rafael. H. L. Tatum and a party of four friends are doing the Yosemite. Mrs. Gilson and son have returned from the country, and taken up their residence at the Palace. D. E. Allison and family have taken up their permanent residence at the Palace. A. Halsey, accompanied by two ladies, is at the Yosemite. Mr. and Mrs. E. A. Brown are at the Big Trees. Earl Hopeton, of Scotland, is at the Palace. Judge Parker and a friend, and Mr. and Mrs. Taber and a party of three others, left here for the Yosemite Valley on Saturday last. Colonel and Mrs. Eyre and their two daughters contemplate a sojourn of a week or two at Monterey. Walter A. Hawley, Theodore S. Hawley, and Miss Jennie Hawley went to the Yosemite on Monday last. Mrs. T. H. Selby and daughter returned to San Francisco on Thursday last. J. W. Mackey says that he will remain on the Pacific Coast till next winter, and declares that he will take no hand in the coming political campaign in Nevada. W. Geary, U. S. A., arrived here from the East on Thursday last. The Count and Countess Telfener are at Wormley's Hotel, Washington. Mr. and Mrs. Ben Holladay Jr. are at Cobb's Island, but go to the Adirondacks early in August. Mr. and Mrs. John Russell Young were very handsomely entertained while in Japan. Mrs. Senator Jones, of Nevada, has gone to Seaciff, Long Island, to spend the summer. George Atkinson and family, of Oakland, have returned from Santa Cruz. Miss Belle McDonald, of Marysville, is visiting at Dr. Glenn's, in Oakland. Mrs. George Harrington, of Oakland, is visiting in Sacramento. E. E. Ames and family, of Sacramento, have gone to Monterey. C. T. Mills, of Oakland, has been spending a few days in Southern California. Miss Jennie Gallatin, Sacramento, who has been spending some time at Monterey, has returned home. Miss Mattie Clarke has returned from Santa Cruz. Major Charles A. Kenny has been whiling a short time at the Geysers. Mr. and Mrs. Frank Miller, of Sacramento, gave an elegant reception to about five hundred of their friends at their residence in that city on Monday evening last, in honor of the crystal anniversary of their wedding. Mrs. Edwards has returned from the Napa Soda Springs. Mr. and Mrs. C. H. Stevens, of Sacramento, have gone to Monterey, to stay a short time. Miss Kate Mitchell, of Sacramento, leaves for the East in a few weeks, to remain away a year. Mrs. C. S. Foltz has returned from Washington Territory and Oregon. Mrs. L. A. Sanderson and family have returned from Santa Cruz to their home, No. 1970 Washington Street. Mrs. D. E. Allison has returned to the city, and taken up her permanent residence at the Grand Hotel. Mr. Fred Queen, of Peoria, Ill., is visiting his brother at Duncan's Mills.

SAN FRANCISCO FASHIONS.

I found at one of our leading jewelry establishments yesterday some pretty novelties in jewelry and other bijouterie. The rope bracelet, which is still much in vogue, is somewhat changed, inasmuch as the coil now makes only one turn instead of several, as was formerly so very fashionable. There are also new designs in these bracelets, the most beautiful being of Roman gold alone, or mixed with platina, and instead of being finished with snakes' heads or the heads and claws of other reptiles, have no particular finish. They are flexible, and many are shown in polished faceted beads. I saw also some pretty hat-pins, with heads of hammered gold. Lace-pins are now made much shorter, although as beautiful and serviceable as ever. I learned, too, that there is a decided change in ladies' watch-chains. The long neck-chains are passing away, and short ones taking their place, the most elegant being not over eight inches in length. But the very latest in this line are the ribbon fobs for ladies. They are in appearance the same as the gentlemen wear, with the usual buckle and seal attached. The watch is slipped in the front of the waist, about four or five buttons down from the neck, and when the bodice is fastened it keeps the watch in position. Hoop earrings are gaining in favor, and as to precious stones, the sapphire and ruby will undoubtedly take the lead, especially the ruby, which is becoming scarce, and steadily rising in value. The craze recently for gentlemen's jewelry displays silver in everything in the ornamental line, such as locket, collar and cuff-buttons, studs, and chains, especially the double cable, or, to use the jeweler's term, the Dickens chain. These things are all shown in the hammered silver. A rather novel fashion which was started in New York last winter, but which reached here too late for the season, are pencils with chains, for gentlemen to use in the ball-room. The chain is hooked to the suspender, and hangs from there under the vest, and goes into the left pocket of the trousers. This innovation was hailed with satisfaction by the gentlemen in the East as being most convenient, since there is no danger of losing them or of their being borrowed by a neighbor. These chains are also of hammered silver. A new design for cane-heads is being shown. It consists of a crane's head and beak of silver, also hammered and slightly oxidized. Among other fashions the nursery has not been forgotten. A novelty in this department is the new porringer. The very latest style is a heavy, crude-looking bowl, representing a small stew-pan of pewter, with a spoon to correspond, when in reality they are of the finest silver, blocked out in an exceedingly rough manner. It is becoming quite the fashion to give these articles at christenings or birth-day parties; price being from thirty dollars upward. The new silver cups are oxidized in various natural colors. In design they show the Kate Greenaway and Walter Crane figures. These handsome articles are selling at from fifteen up to thirty-five and forty dollars. The new French traveling clocks are quite beautiful, and are becoming all the rage. A feature of these time-pieces is the ornamentation, the sides and dial being exquisite hand-painting, representing heads and figures of the fourteenth century. They are double repeaters, and so small and delicate that it is no inconvenience to carry one about when traveling. Although many new styles in writing materials are promised for the early fall, nothing of a novelty is shown at present, except new wedding envelopes. The change in these articles is the band of satin ribbon half an inch wide, which runs diagonally across the flap, and is of a delicate tint, either pearl, white, or cream-tinted. Some new dress goods have just been received by one of our leading importers. The fabric is pongee, and the designs are dots, a little larger than a ten-cent piece. One piece has blue dots on a white ground, another has white ground with red dots. These goods measure thirty inches, and sell at one dollar and fifty cents a yard. When made up in combination with some plain material, the effect will be exceedingly stylish. Some of the new cloak goods for fall and winter wear have already been received. Matelasse will doubtless take the lead. What I saw was of the most elegant description, very thick and heavy, showing designs in fruits, flowers, and large palm leaves. About six yards will be required for a cloak, and when lined with brilliant Roman striped silk, can not fail to be greatly admired. Of course other linings may be employed more subdued in color; but the Roman stripes are sure to take the lead, the stripes running lengthwise. De Peau satin is another new fabric just brought into the market. It resembles the surah satin, but is much softer, and has more body. It is selling at two dollars per yard. "Matinées" are as fashionable as ever; the most sought after are those made of satin foulard, and cut like a Japanese overdress, with loose square sleeves. They are generally worn over short, ruffled skirts. Pomegranate-red and porcelain-blue are the favorite colors for the gown, and the skirt of white surah. Then there is the casaque, resembling more a Jersey than any other garment. It is made of elastic cloth, fitting the form very trimly. It has a stand-up collar and reverse, like a gentleman's coat. The skirt is draped over the hips in much the fashion of a polonaise, and is made quite bunched at the back. The cuffs and pockets are generally made of black velvet or watered silk, and the sash at the back must correspond with the cuffs and pockets.

July 11, 1882.

HELENA.

THE SPHINX REDIVIVUS.

The events of the past few days are rapidly unraveling the Egyptian tangle. Notwithstanding the voluminous dispatches regarding it, a pen-picture of the Turkish view of the crisis will be interesting. The following is from the Constantinople correspondent of an Eastern paper: "Egypt has been for a long series of years a privileged province, ruled by an hereditary governor on an autonomous basis. The province pays an annual tribute to the Sultan; but that tribute was long ago set apart as interest on a loan of which the Sultan enjoyed the proceeds. The tribute, therefore, instead of being paid to the Turkish treasury, is paid to the Bank of England, and the finances are under the control of European officials. The present Turkish policy, for powerful reasons, aims at changes in the present state of the province of Egypt. First, it seeks to break up the European financial control in Egypt, in order again to find the mouth of the Egyptian money-bag; second, it contemplates the substitution of the direct rule of the Sultan in that country for the indirect and unsatisfactory arrangement of an hereditary governor who is allowed a large independence in consideration of a state tribute of which the Sultan never sees a cent. On the other hand, the Egyptian national party, (of which Arabi Bey is the leader,) restive under the burden of paying the enormous debt of the last Khedive, Ismail Pasha, desires, first, to break up the European control of the finances of the country in order to repudiate the debts of a tyrant; and second, to establish a free and independent Egyptian government by Egyptians and for Egyptians. England and France have undertaken to thwart the aims of both Turks and Egyptians by maintaining the joint control of the finances of the country, and by consolidating the power of the Khedive as a semi-independent tributary of the Sultan. Just now Turkish diplomacy has succeeded at every point. England and France are foiled. The Khedive is standing firm. Arabi Bey is the undaunted leader of a powerful faction at open war with the Khedive. Everything goes to show that unless Europe is ready to unite for war on Turkey, the Sultan's troops will have to be called in to pacify the ebullition in Egypt. Once in Egypt the Sultan's troops hope to be able to find means of staying there, Arabi Bey's national party, the Khedive, England, and France, to the contrary notwithstanding. The whole plan at this point turns on the inability of Europe to unite to coerce Turkey. The shrewd diplomatists of the Porte believe that they are safe in counting such a union of Europe out of the question. It seems very difficult to believe that instructions from Constantinople have repeatedly strengthened the hand of Arabi Bey in Egypt. Yet I have been assured again and again from the very best sources that such is the case. The official orders from the Porte go to the Khedive and sustain him in his position. The orders to Arabi Bey commonly go through the religious hierarchy, and insure the continued resistance of the national party to the will of the Khedive. Thus the situation that demands Turkish intervention and the intervention itself will be found to have issued from the same source. The diplomacy of the Turks is a tangled web, and unravelling of it is extremely difficult. The various phases of the conflict look like child's play—a boy's game with boys. But the game is terribly dangerous, and Europe may at any moment have the whole Eastern question again begging for solution. To so grave a crisis has grown the petty clamor of a few Egyptian officers about their promotions and their pay. The government in Constantinople is becoming very strict in its censorship of the press. No book can appear which has not first been read and approved by the officials of the Bureau of Public Instruction. These officials are as deeply buried in rejected manuscripts as the hardest-bearded editor of a great magazine. But the censorship extends over the sale of books and the use of them, and hardly a week passes without the seizure of books by the police because the censorship has changed its mind after authorizing a publication. The control extends to illustrations, and books are taken from the bands of school children if they contain pictures which the ingenuity of the police can transform into seditious suggestions. At an exhibition of oil paintings held here lately, two pictures were removed by the police as seditious. One of them was a hunting piece, and represented two eagles in conflict with a wounded lion. This picture was finally restored on the assurance of its owner that the scene was a bona-fide attempt to delineate nature, and had no reference to any nations who have adopted the eagle as an emblem in their arms. A Turkish editor was so luckless as to print a picture of the Bridge of Sighs at Venice, with an explanation of its history, and the tyranny of Venetian secret tribunals. Soon after his paper was suspended, and the editor found himself arrested, with the request that he would explain what he meant to insinuate by publishing a picture which referred to tyranny and secret tribunals. On his assuring his interlocutors that he did not refer to them, he was dismissed, with a warning never to do so again. "The Levant Herald, the oldest and only English newspaper in this city, has lately gone through a most curious experience. It carelessly admitted, in an article of a series on French influence in the East, a vain attempt at calculating the amount of the blood of Osman which runs in the veins of the imperial family of Turkey after four centuries of admixture with the mongrel blood which makes up every harem. It was instantly suppressed, without the form of a decree from the Bureau of the Press, by a very severe gentleman in the uniform of the palace. After a week or two it reappeared under the name of the Constantinople Messenger. Three days later a long decree from the Press Bureau formally suppressed the Messenger. The next week a French paper, the Temps de Constantinople, suddenly enlarged its form and announced that it would be served to the subscribers of the Levant Herald. At the same time it adopted the type and the advertisements of the Levant Herald. The next day the Temps de Constantinople was suppressed. The editor of the Levant Herald, nothing daunted by these two mishaps, addressed himself directly to the household of the Sultan, using such good arguments that in a week he was able to issue, by special authorization, a new paper, announced to take the place of the Levant Herald, and called the Eastern Express."

EDITORIAL NOTES.

General Stoneman says of himself that he "sprung from the people, was born among the lowly, and grew up a stalwart farmer lad in the wilds of Western New York." The writer, whose home was in Genesee County, Western New York, always looked upon Steuben, Cattaraugus, and Chautauqua as outlandish counties. The principal traffic of those counties was in hemlock bark for tanning. We used to call it "Cattaraugus Currency." It is reserved for the Democratic candidate to give away his birth-place by styling it "wilds." But then General Stoneman sprang from the people, and his parents were "lowly." As General and Mrs. Stoneman are no better born than their parents, how would they like their sons, when grown, to declare that they were "lowly," and apologize for their humble birth to a mob of Irish and American Democrats? Of course General Stoneman "sprang from the people." Where should he spring from?—an owl's nest or woodchuck's hole? Does not everybody spring from the people? The fact is, General Stoneman was well born, in one of the most highly cultivated parts of New York State, is thoroughly educated, being a graduate of West Point, and is in his feelings and associations what every gentleman ought to be, viz., an aristocrat, who prefers the association of cultivated and intelligent people to that of the ignorant and vulgar. But it is a part of the political education of the time for candidates to hog-wallow. If a man feels that he is a gentleman; if his parents were respectable; if he is not a filius nullius, and born on a dung-hill, he thinks he must apologize for it. Hence those vulgar expressions so freely used in biographies: "Born of poor but honest parents," "a self-made man"—as though poverty and honesty were so rarely found in combination that they must be apologized for; and the vain assumption that the self-made man was an improvement upon God's handiwork. When General Stoneman prates about the "dignity of labor and the nobility of the working man," he is flinging acorns to the pigs from an oak he has not climbed. The dignity of labor sounds wonderfully sarcastic to the nobleman of the shovel when it comes from a gentleman educated by the government, all his life in paid government employment, holding two offices, and now seeking for a third. Labor is the curse of disobedience, and the penalty for sin. It is the primal and eldest curse of man. No living man would work if he could be as well paid for doing nothing. There is no dignity in perspiration. Nobility never sweats. We work because we can not help it. We work for bread.

Inquiry has been made of us as to why the Call has begun to print Bret Harte's new serial, "Flip," the first installment of which appears in this number of the Argonaut. The reason is because the Call—being a large and prosperous daily—has preferred to copy it, without money and without price, from the New York Sun, rather than do as the Argonaut—a small weekly—has done: namely, pay for it. If we always did business the same way we should probably one day be as prosperous as the Call. However, the matter is a trifling one to us. It is not probable that many of our readers ever see the weekly Call—it is at least to be hoped they do not read it. It is not so trifling a matter to the Call, however. By their action its editors have infringed upon the copyright of the New York Sun, have infringed upon the right we purchased, and have violated the author's right to compensation for the product of his brains.

We recall the early history of the Republican party in California. It was a manly and courageous party, composed of brave and earnest men. Its leaders were men of conscience and brains. They were eloquent. It was a treat to attend a Republican State Convention in those early times, when there was no man in it who ever dreamed of the possibility of a party triumph during his life-time. Then the delegates were not sent from the slums of cities and from under the eaves of a county court-house. In that early organization there was no machine, and no hired manipulators of primaries. There were no slaves to capitalists, and no fawning sycophants to political power. To not less than three conventions held at Sacramento there came on foot a Scotchman from Kern County, a sheep-herder, a scholar, and eloquent in the cause of Republican principles, and from all parts of the State its best and most intelligent men. Then Frederick P. Tracey was our chief, with the brains of Webster, the eloquence of Clay, and a moral courage that no man questioned. Then Leland Stanford and the two Crockers were captains of fighting bands, doing splendid service in the ranks of the Republican army. This was when Stanford ran for Treasurer, inviting defeat for an office he did not want, in order to keep up the organization. Then Judge E. B. Crocker was on the stump, and Oscar and Jim Shafter. We recall the names of Tingley, Father Cummings of Butte, Churchman of Nevada, with Sargent, and Waite, Weeks of Sacramento, Folger, Matbewson, Nunes, Fred Low, Conyngham of Marysville, Harlow Love, and ever so many of us lesser men, then cadets, fighting for our spurs. Those conventions were models of forensic eloquence. No "Siskiyou to San Diego, Sierra to the sea" rot; but bold, eloquent declaration of great principles. Afterward there fell into line another band of men, such as Colonel Edward Baker, Starr King, Fred Billings, and others. And again, when the war came, another, and not so disinterested a band of allies came forward to fight under the Republican banner. The Northern or Douglas Democracy rallied to the standard with a splendid fighting force, but unfortunately brought along its camp-followers, and then, when victory came, the Republican organization experienced the fate of all triumphant and majority parties. So many loafers and political vagabonds joined its ranks, that, except on the question of loyalty, there was at times little to choose between it and the Democracy, and frequently nothing. As the Democracy strengthens, the Republican party improves. Democracy has had enough successes in California, and its chances of triumph now are sufficient to invite the office-seekers and party vagabonds to gravitate back to it, for it is their natural place. Once the Republican party had quite a following of the Pope's political Irish. They have now all, save a few, gone back to the Democracy, where they belong, and the Argonaut is earnestly endeavoring to drive the balance out of the Republican ranks. Now that the war is over, and the negro out of politics, the Argonaut would be willing to exchange two of the Pope's ignorant political Republican Irish for one Southern gentleman. We would exchange on favorable terms for intelligent foreigners of other nationalities, and we will, on the most favorable conditions, give the whole batch in exchange for a reasonable number of select and well-chosen native-born Americans who have heretofore been Democrats. In fact, we shall be glad to get rid of the last man of the kind we have in mind for nothing, and may the Democracy take them. We should then have restored the Republican party to something like its original purity. We should be able to meet in convention, and deliberate in the interest of good government, and for the advancement of honorable, high-minded, and intellectual men to office, instead of the men who now intrigue for place, and by their nominations determine the question whether respectable men are in a majority in California.

EDITOR ARGONAUT: Upon hearing a short time ago that it was stated on the streets that I had received money, and undertaken to corruptly influence the action of a judicial officer, or had allowed myself to be used for that purpose, I promptly denounced the statement as false, and thought then to take no further notice of it. Your particular reference to it, however, in your last issue of the eighth inst., lends it more apparent importance, and renders it in my judgment proper that I should again, and in this public manner, as I now do most emphatically, state that the charge is absolutely untrue, and without the slightest foundation in fact. Respectfully,
SAN FRANCISCO, July 12, 1882. LLOYD TEVIS.

The foregoing note, in reply to and denial of the rumor which the Argonaut gave circulation in its last issue, was anticipated. It justifies, as we think, the publication. It would be a reproach to the judiciary and to the profession of law if such a statement against men so prominent should go uncontradicted. From the conversation that occurred upon the delivery of this note for publication, we have no hesitation in declaring that there is no truth in the charges, and that Mr. Tevis's denial is entitled to the fullest credence. P.

England's iron-clad fleet, with its tremendous guns, has rained a storm of death and destruction upon Egypt's commercial emporium. The Egyptian forts are ruined and silent, her palaces are aflame, men and women are murdered, criminals are let loose to rob and plunder, the city is destroyed, and statecraft says this is not war. Egypt has borrowed money of England and France till five millions of people have a bonded debt of five hundred million dollars. The English and French have forced their tax-collectors upon the government to collect this revenue and disburse it to the creditors. The Suez Canal, largely constructed by the financial aid of Egypt, belongs to English and French stockholders. It is the highway of the world's commerce, and must not be interfered with; it is England's gate to India, and must not be closed. The Arab toilers of Egypt are slaves to a financial condition for which their government—and not themselves—is responsible. Arabi Bey is making an ineffectual protest against wrongs his people can neither endure nor remedy. Under the interpretation of modern diplomacy this endeavor of an outraged people to emancipate themselves from the tyranny of foreign oppressors will be condemned as the inexcusable revolt of a semi-barbarous power against a better and higher because a Christian civilization. If we were Egyptians we would be in favor of killing Englishmen and Frenchmen, and destroying the Suez Canal. But as we are Americans, we must either be in sympathy with England and her ironclads or hold our peace. Hence the Argonaut has determined to keep out of the fight, and say nothing. We shall remain neutral. We look forward with anxiety to the position Colonel Jackson of the Post will take in this conflict.

Those who know William R. Garrison as a former resident of San Francisco, son of Commodore Garrison, our early mayor, will deeply regret his death. A death by violence, sudden and dreadful, is calculated to shock with greater force than after a lingering illness. Mr. Garrison was thus killed by a railroad accident in returning from Long Branch to New York. His wife was Miss Betty Estell, daughter of General Estell, who is well remembered by early San Franciscans.

Mr. W. W. Foote is a promising young Democrat, from Tennessee, we think. If he is not, we apologize to Virginia and Kentucky for not accrediting to them the honor of being his birthplace. He is young, and youth is zealous. He is ambitious, and ambition sometimes overleaps itself, and falls upon the other side of the railroad track. He is fearless, and does not care for cow-catcher or engine; but he is rash, and in his earnest desire to become railroad commissioner he is rashly impetuous. How is this for a judicial candidate, one who is to patiently hear, calmly consider, and impartially determine between conflicting interests: "I am a lawyer. I know what is required in a judicial office. The railroad companies have pleaded guilty to the charges made against them, and I will render a verdict against the companies accordingly. I don't think twenty per cent. on fares and freights too much of a reduction. I believe fifty per cent. is nearer the mark, and I will vote that way every time. Six per cent. profit is too much for railroad companies to make on their invested capital." We raise no question about fares or freights, or to what extent railroads should be regulated, what percentage of reduction they can stand, what rate of interest such enterprises should earn, how capital may be controlled by political parties, or what may be the result of subjecting the business of a new country to the direction of dishonest and impetuous party loafers. The point to which we direct our readers' attention is the position assumed by W. W. Foote toward a question which he, if elected, is called upon judicially to determine. Is his attitude an honest one? We do not ask whether Mr. Foote is an honest man, for he would justly resent the implication; but if this is the proper attitude for a judicial candidate to take in soliciting votes for election, we ask what position would the demagogue or knave assume in his endeavor to outbid Mr. Foote for the popular vote?

THE "BELGIC" AFFAIR.

Some Facts and Conjectures Concerning this Peculiar Business.

That a serious outrage has been perpetrated by our health officials against the steamer Belgic very few people now doubt. That this outrage has been the result of ignorance, money, greed, and political corruption is being strongly suspected. We have but scant sympathy with the charterers of an ocean tramp, who, for a speculative purpose and in defiance of the popular wish, would bring Chinese to our harbor. The legitimate steamer lines engaged in commercial intercourse between Asiatic countries and ours are entitled to more generous treatment. There are five great competing Oriental routes of travel, of which the American overland by way of San Francisco is one. The Belgic is one of the Occidental and Oriental line. It comes to our port laden with white passengers, with merchandise, and with tea of the new crop. It is important, if we would maintain our Oriental trade, that there should be no delays or annoyances to passengers, and no hindrances to the prompt transmission of merchandise, except that which is indispensable. If, in the protection of the health of our citizens, it is found necessary to quarantine a vessel, then the comfort of travelers and the profits of commerce must not be considered. We understand that in the case of the Belgic a great mistake has been perpetrated, either through the ignorance or the malevolence of certain doctors; that a Chinese boy found with a harmless skin disease has been declared to have confluent smallpox; that similar ignorance was displayed in converting a ring-worm into a case of leprosy; that twenty-six Chinese have been sent to the smallpox hospital, and found not to have the disease, been discharged, and are now at liberty in the city—presenting this anomaly, that while Sir William Eden and other white passengers are confined in quarantine, the Chinese causing the quarantine are enjoying the freedom of the town; and this also, that the twenty-six Chinese, having been some days in a smallpox hospital, are liable to have contracted the disease, and are now abroad to distribute it. There is now lying upon our table a communication which is libelous if untrue, but which we believe to be true. It charges Doctor Murphy with lacking intelligence and professional standing to justify his appointment, and with being personally interested in the May-Lawlor intrigue, by which May was bought off and Lawlor appointed quarantine officer. It asserts that Murphy caused one Stambaugh to be appointed police-surgeon, because Doctor Clarke would not submit to certain pecuniary exactions. It accuses Murphy of having appointed his nephew to act as assistant, and Doctor Stanton to vaccinate upon Chinese ships. It states that large amounts of disinfectants are required to be purchased at Slaven's drug store at an exorbitant price. The community that has not yet quite lost confidence in Doctors Simpson, Gibbons, and Douglas, will look to them, to Mayor Blake, and the Board of Supervisors, to see to it that this most suspicious and questionable business is fully and exhaustively examined into. If the commerce of our port is being imperiled; if humanity has been outraged by the imprisonment of Christian travelers; and if the Occidental and Oriental line has been subjected to pecuniary loss through the ignorance, malice, or greed of a band of medical conspirators, who have crawled to places of position through party intrigue, and by buying their way for coin to positions where they can levy blackmail and steal, then the community ought to know it. So far as we know, Doctors Murphy, Lawlor, Stambaugh, Stanton, Faye, and the rest of this medical squad may be as learned as we think President Garfield's physicians were, and as honest as they ought to be; but we hope the investigation will be bad, and that no nonsense of "medical courtesy" will prevent it from being a searching one. The commerce of the port is of importance, and it ought not to be imperiled by political doctors who are pandering to the prejudice of the mob on the Chinese question. The importance of this commercial question will be better appreciated by reading the following statement of Mr. Stubbs, secretary of the Occidental and Oriental Company. He says:

The company has suffered a great and permanent injury by the detention of the Belgic. We have been endeavoring to secure the tea-carrying trade for this port, and beat out the Suez Canal route. To enable us to do this we must have extra fast ships, such as the Belgic, on this side. We make the run from Hongkong here in fifteen days, twelve days to cross the continent, and eight days to cross the Atlantic. This beats the Suez route nine or ten days, and makes the tea far more valuable in England. When I tell you we carry the tea from here to New York for two cents a pound, you will see that we mean business. It is therefore a serious blow to us to have our fastest steamer detained just as the new tea crop is about ready to be shipped. We make no money on the tea trade, but we are building up a business, and one which adds something to the wealth and prosperity of San Francisco. We therefore think that we ought to receive fair treatment, and not be persecuted on account of any feeling that may exist in the community.

Mr. Charles Sumner, who is something near fifty years of age, styles himself a "boy," and calls himself by the pet name of "Charlie." He is running for Congress on the social issue. He is determined not to stretch his limbs under the polished mahogany of Nob Hill. He is resolved that he will "never, no never, wet his moustache in Nob Hill soup or champagne." Of course we do not know to what extent Mr. Sumner has been importuned by Mr. Tobin of the Hibernia Bank, Mr. De Young of the Chronicle, Major Dickinson, and the other nobles of the bill, to partake of the generous hospitalities of their palatial mansions; but we fully appreciate the patriotic resolve that, before he will wet his moustache in their rich soups and delicious wines, he will cut it off. This resolve seems the more heroic in being announced to an audience of "chivs," who never pay a cent or miss a meal; men with crook-headed canes hanging on their arms, to give them the freedom of both hands at the free-lunch tables, and those other Democrats who congregate at the corner of California and Montgomery streets, and hang over the iron railing of the Nevada Bank in search of employment. Mr. Sumner, in his Union Hall speech, also said if he was elected to Congress he would see that the rates of transportation by rail across the continent should be reduced one-half. Now this is specific. If the Democracy could elect two "Charlie Sumners," we would have a free ride from the Pacific to the Atlantic.

VANITY FAIR.

"Having diamond monograms put on the clasps of garters," said a New York jeweler the other day to a reporter, "is done to identify them in case they are lost anywhere. Then by their description they can in that way be distinguished from all others. A young lady who resides on Lexington Avenue purchased a fine pair of these about two weeks ago through having lost one, which was afterward restored to her, and has got a party of well-known members of one of the clubs, not far from Madison Square, christened the 'Knights of the Garter.' The way it happened was this: The young lady, who is rather pretty, was getting in a Fifth Avenue stage in front of the club. A crowd of members, like Lorillard's 'old hens of the Union Club,' who were sitting at one of the windows, saw her, and noticed as she entered the omnibus something like a blue ribbon fall from beneath her dress. When the stage was away on its journey one of the members remarked that the blue object that the lady dropped had something valuable attached to it, for he saw it shine. After all had passed their opinion as to what the thing might be, one member said it looked more like a lady's garter to him, and he was going to get it to make sure of it. He started to go for the object, but at that moment three or four other members jumped up and pulled him back so that they could get out and secure the trophy before him. Then a regular scrimmage took place to see who could get the garter first. They bolted out of the door helter-skelter, but a more quick-witted member leaped out of a front window, and scaling the low railing that extends around the grass plot, secured the garter before any of the rest. The young lady came to me for another garter, but we advised her to advertise for the one she lost. An advertisement was put in calling for the lost 'blue band,' and a few days after the gentleman who got it came here and inquired for the owner. He at first refused to give up the garter until he was introduced to or told who the owner was, so that he might see and present it to her himself. We gave him her name, and he handed over the 'blue band,' not caring after that to see or hear any more in relation to it, for it turned out the lady was no other than the wife of a prominent banker, and one of the most honored members of the same club in front of which the garter was at first dropped. These gentlemen have since that little affair been called nothing in the club but the 'Knights of the Garter,' and there is one particular member who wants to know 'How that English-sounding title came to be placed on members of a New York club?'"

All the new stuff employed for covering and draperies in the decoration of Claremont, the Duke of Albany's residence, is of English manufacture. The duchess's hound is a sumptuous apartment, decorated in two shades of peacock blue and gold, the darker of the two shades employed on the wall being repeated on the frame of the mirror, and the reverse of a superb screen embroidered in gold and colors on a satin ground. Among the pictures are the Duke's portrait and Sarah Bernhardt's "Palm Sunday"—a picture that Clairin had more to do with painting than the fair Sarah, it is said.

A London correspondent writes: "In the French regalia there is a belt which I remember seeing on her Imperial Majesty the only time she ever put it on. Its history shows in what subtle way the influence of mean people may operate upon the highest, and through them dominate rank and fashion everywhere. The Empress went—I forget exactly in what year—to see Marc Fournier's astounding féerie, 'La Biche au Bois,' played at a boulevard theatre. There was a bewildering display of feminine loveliness on the stage, and fairest of the fair was Mademoiselle Delval. She wore a paste ceinture, which was magnificently bright, and a cause of Gaulois wit to theatrical critics. As she had a fine figure and a bold air, she looked superb in it. None of the court ladies understood the allusion of the critics, and the Empress least of all. She admired the belt immensely, and was determined to have one like it in real diamonds. All the poor dainty little ornaments of the regalia on which jewelers had expended taste and ingenuity to please king's favorites were sacrificed. The parures of the Duchess de Berry were alone respected. What the bolocaust was may be inferred from the intrinsic value of the ceinture, which is composed of small brilliants set in patterns around large diamonds. It was at a fête given by the Princess Clotilde that the resplendent girdle was donned. Its been was so powerfully striking that I imagine that I still see it and its imperial wearer. The Empress was in bright green—the color of a chestnut leaf in June—tea-roses, and the 'Biche au Bois' ceinture. But the effect was not what had been anticipated, because her majesty wore a voluminous crinoline, and Mademoiselle Delval scorned all such aids to heauty. Chance glances at mirrors bring home the most truthful impressions. Her majesty caught one of herself in the hall-room. She saw what she had not before perceived—that she was 'cut in two' by the blazing belt, which also scratched her arms badly. This put her out of conceit with it, and she relegated it to old Tberry, the custodian of the state jewels. Philistia, however, did not know this, and went into raptures about the girdle, which was called 'la ceinture Eugénie.' Manufacturers of articles de Paris copied it in jet, hughes, cbrysoscale, garnet, false pearls, and other glittering substances. It became the rage in Europe, and doubtless in the United States, for American ladies are never backward in adopting a striking fashionable novelty."

The crinoline, says the London Medical Press, can not, with propriety, be called the thin edge of the wedge of crinoline, but it may, perhaps, be correctly described as the first elevation on the ascent of that mountain of absurdity which was such a nuisance twelve or fifteen years ago. The crinoline is simply a ludicrous excrescence which gives an English woman the outlines of a Hottentot, and must be highly inconvenient, being something in the nature of a bird cage stuffed under the dress and fixed in the region of the arcaic bustle; but it does not in any way interfere with functional activity nor endanger health. With crinoline, however, the first magnitude, tending to the dissemination of nervous irritation by universal ruffling of temper and creation of embarrassment, but it was a cause of disease and a danger to life. By exposing the lower half of the body to currents of cool air and chilling, it helped to set up various disorders and to induce general debility, and by spreading out the inflammable materials of clothing in such a way that they were beyond control and almost beyond cognizance, it kept up a constant risk of conflagration whenever an open fireplace was approached. Many lives were sacrificed, owing to crinoline-inflated skirts catching fire. It behooves all sensible women firmly to set their faces against any attempt at the reintroduction of this pernicious fashion. Our modern culture is not good for much if it is not strong enough to put its foot down, (to speak metaphorically and in mixed metaphor, too,) and to burst once for all this big, silly bubble of crinoline. Let the crinoline change its name, and be popularly spoken of as the Hottentot, and we predict that it will speedily cease to offend the eyes of those who, without any Grosvenor Gallery proclivities to the love of leanness, still admire the human form divine when unmillinered, and detest unsightly protuberances.

Strap-sleeves are disappearing in England. The rarely-beard voice of the Princess of Wales has been raised against them. Yet it is not more than ten years since a society at Nice was disporting itself without either sleeve or strap. It was thought quite collet monté to have any band at all over the shoulder, in those sprightly days and in that frisky town.

The Duchess of Fernan-Nunez caused considerable sensation the other night, (says a recent number of the London Figaro), at the Spanish ambassador's reception, by appearing with a most realistic-looking bat surmounting the tiara of diamonds she wore in her hair. Every eye was turned upon this strange and daring "last new thing" in hair-dressing, the puzzle evidently being why her grace had fixed on such a creature as a bat for her purpose. But her selection was natural enough, seeing that the bat happens to be the heraldic emblem, or crest, as we should call it, of the Fernan-Nunez family. Those who have accepted the duke and duchess's splendid hospitality know very well that the bat is rampant—I am using the term in a literal, and not heraldic, sense—throughout her house. It is seen on the plate, on the china, on the glass, the linen, the walls—in short, everywhere; and her grace, in effect, only revived in a qualified way the usage of the days of chivalry, when knights went into battle with their crests upon their helmets. Whether the fashion thus set will be followed remains to be seen. It certainly is one which would have most picturesque and curious results, as a study of the crests claimed by our noble families will soon convince you. Grand dames would go into society with griffins, lions, unicorns, and all kinds of queer heraldic beasts and devices. And, after all, it is not a very great innovation. Ladies have long worn birds in their bonnets; why should they not wear beasts in their hair?

An engagement hook, says the Boston Gazette, now forms a part of the summer impedimenta. Every girl who falls upon Saratoga and Newport this season, takes with her a mysterious little volume, in which are entered, not her expenses, but the names of eligible parties who are or who are not of the marrying sort, with their reported fortunes in round figures opposite them. This is thought to be necessary caution, as some terrible financial errors have lately crept into the matrimonial ring, whereby several gushing engagements are now "off," when they never should have been "on."

The height of vulgarity was proudly reached by the "lady" who carried a parasol on which was painted a pack of cards to the Jerome races.—Mr. Labouchere says that until the straight skirt appeared he had no idea of how many of his fair countrywomen were knock-kneed.—Orchard parties are among the newest out-of-door entertainments. But first catch your orchard.—The London Queen has decided that it is unparadiseable for young women, married or single, to walk out alone.—We think we go in for pretty costly trousseaux, but they are nothing compared with those provided among Parisian swells in the last century. That of Mademoiselle de Matignon, who in 1786 married the Baron de Montmorency, cost one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars. It included twelve hundred shifts.—Froggings are becoming exceedingly popular, either for dresses or jackets; in black they form the prominent ornament of the fashionable tailor-made costume called the veston militaire, of navy blue cloth, so serviceable for traveling and every-day wear.—A wedding occurred in St. Louis last week which was truly æsthetic. The bride wore a Directoire costume, the little boy attendants wore black velvet Oscar Wilde suits, and the altar was decked with daisies, and "soulful-eyed lilies."—Strawberries can be served in a large strawberry made of ice-cream, tinted the natural coloring of the fruit.—Baskets of artistic and rustic shapes are much used now on the table for fruits or cake. It is a convenient idea for people who do not wish to take their silver-ware or valuable china into the country.—One of the helles of Paris, who is said to be very attractive, is a lady whose complexion is described as chocolate. She comes from Havana, and has Monte Christo funds of cash to spend.—President Arthur is said to have a weakness for silk stockings. Those included in the wardrobe which he takes to Long Branch are embroidered in lilacs and sunflowers, and in every touching shade known to the bosier's art—rayons de soleil, clair de lune, fond du lac, prairie du chien—all dreamy, suggestive, and full of the poetry of color.—A London paper says: The pathos of the sale which ruthlessly breaks up the historic gallery of the Duke of Hamilton is perhaps best brought out by a miniature portrait of "A Knight of the Garter," attributed to Holbein. "This," says the catalogue, "was presented by Charles I. to the Marquis of Hamilton, and bears the king's brand both as king and prince."—At a recent wedding in New York the bridal cake was put up in white boxes in the shape of horse-shoes. On the icing which ornamented the top of each box were the words, "Merrie Wedding Day" in old English, and each one was finished by a bow of white satin ribbon, tied in a true-lover's knot, with the monogram of the bride and groom on the ends.

LITERARY NOTES.

"A Sane Lunatic," the fourth number of the "Hammock Series," is by Clara Louise Burnham, author of "No Gentleman," a story which received moderate comment from the press a year ago. The present novel possesses the flavor of Chicago. While rather brightly written in parts, it teems with solecisms in taste and everything else. The author has employed dialogue on every possible occasion. It is flippant, and continuously absurd. Published by Henry A. Sumner & Co., Chicago; for sale by Bancroft; price, $1.

The first book that Mark Twain has issued through the regular channels of trade is "The White Elephant." This is a collection of tales and sketches, headed by the extravaganza which bears the title name. Most of the contents consist of articles which appeared for several years in the Atlantic, such as "An Idle Excursion," "Paris Notes," and others. The first story is one which was omitted in "A Tramp Abroad." All of them contain much that is very amusing, and they repay a second perusal. Published by James R. Osgood & Co., Boston; for sale by the booksellers.

"A Geographical Reader," compiled by James Johnnot, is one of the most sensible works of the kind that has been published for many years. Probably Marcus Wilson's series are the best set that were ever compiled, and the present volume more nearly approaches those admirable readers than anything else. As its name signifies, it pertains to the descriptions of various cities, peoples, countries, and localities of interest. The selections chosen are all by various standard English and American authors, and are printed in large, clear type, with numerous illustrations. Published by D. Appleton & Co., New York; for sale by James T. White, 32 Dupont Street.

Edward Garret is one of the most pleasing and wholesome religious novel-writers that England possesses. For many years the Sunday Magazine—the English, and not the American travesty that masquerades under the same name—has published his successive stories serially, until he has attained great popularity among the mass who follow after Norman McLeod, George McDonald, Kingsley, Meade, the author of "Jessica's First Prayer," and the many other lights of the church. Mr. Garret's latest novel is "Family Fortunes." It is a Scotch story, and one of the writer's best efforts. The plot is striking, and of great interest. Published by Dodd, Mead & Co., New York; for sale by Billings, Harbourn & Co.

One of the first biographers of America's late poet laureate in the field is Mr. Richard H. Stoddard, who issues a volume entitled "Henry Wadsworth Longfellow: a Medley in Prose and Verse." As is natural, Mr. Stoddard adopts more the style of a running criticism of the poet's works than a simple biography. He takes successive poems and sketches in their order, and not only gives their contemporary criticisms, but also many interesting and just comments from his own pen. It seems a pity, however, that Mr. Stoddard should allow his rancor and enmity against Edgar Poe to so get the better of his moderation that he should continually go out of his way in order to abuse him. Published by G. W. Harlan & Co., New York; for sale by Billings, Harbourn & Co.

The latest number of the "New Plutarch Series" is "Victor Emmanuel," by Edward Dicey, M. A. The author states in the beginning that while many of the fellow-workers of this monarch in his life's labor were men whose ambitions were loftier, whose characters were more noble, and whose careers were more blameless, yet, with all these differences, while these others failed, Victor Emmanuel succeeded; and although this success may by some be attributed to the accident of his position, nevertheless the fact still remains that by him and him alone was success achieved. The volume, in a clear and unprejudiced manner, gives a concise sketch of Victor Emmanuel's career, together with brief reviews of those connected with him. Published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York; for sale by Billings, Harbourn & Co.

Announcements: A biography of President John Tyler is to be prepared by his son, Lyon Gardiner Tyler.—The next publication on the list of Henry Holt & Co. is Heine's "Romantic School and Suanian Mirror."—Menotti Garibaldi is said to contemplate the publication of his father's memoirs, which were written by the old Italian hero with the intention of contradicting the many silly stories—"tante scischezze" as he himself termed them—told about him.—Mr. Longfellow's last volume, "In the Harbor," is issued by Houghton, Mifflin & Co. It contains a number of poems never before printed, as well as the verses published since the appearance of the last collection.—Mr. Aubrey de Vere's new volume of poems is a versification of Irish legends, entitled "The Foray of Queen Meane."—Charles Reade's new story has the Bunyan-like title of "Singleheart and Doubleface." A dramatic version of the story bearing the same title has just been produced in Edinburgh on one night only, in order to secure Mr. Reade's stage right to the novel.—Mr. Wilkie Collins is just now deserting literature for the stage. He is writing a play dealing with the contrasts of high and low life, entitled "Lady Clarissa." It is to be performed first in the German language.—Mr. Swinburne's new novel, "Tristram of Lyonesse, and Other Poems," is going through the press in London.—That indefatigable scholar, Herr Budden-sieg, has in the press a new publication concerning Wycliffe, founded on manuscripts he has discovered at Olmütz.—M. Louis Blanc is engaged in preparing for publication a complete edition of his works.

Miscellany: We have received from D. Lothrop & Co., Boston, the following four juvenile serial publications for July: Wide Awake, The Little Folks' Reader, Babylond, and The Pansy. All are handsomely printed and illustrated. For sale by news agents and booksellers; J. H. Doherty, agent for the Pacific Coast.—Our Continent begins its second volume with a change of form, and will appear hereafter as a thirty-two-page quarto. The first number in the new form is noteworthy, as it contains the first installment of Judge Tourgée's new story, "Hot Plowshares," which opens with a picture of country life in New York State thirty-five years ago.—"The New Fifth Avenue," the leading article in The Critic of July 1, is a study of the change that has come over that monotonous brown-stone street within the past ten years.—Colonel Higginson's collection of essays under the title of "Common Sense About Women," has fallen under the talons of the Saturday Review, with what result may easily be conjectured. The satirical skips and dances of the critic about the unhappy book are calculated to fill the impartial reader with awe and amazement.—Mr. Spurgeon has come to the honor of having his works translated into strange tongues. Some of them have lately been turned into the Lettish dialect of Northern Russia; and his book, "Evening by Evening," is to be translated into Tamil.—Heine's only and much-loved sister, the "Lotte" to whom he addressed that dainty "Idyl": "My child, we two were children—" is still alive at the age of seventy-eight. She has a great deal of her brother's brilliancy and cleverness. He often submitted his compositions to her censorship before publication.—One of the most amusing book-sales of the season in London was the recent one of the library of the whole literature of tobacco, collected during many years by Mr. Bragg, tobacco in all forms being treated in all styles and in almost all languages.—Next year the French Institute will, for the first time, award the prizes founded by Thiers and by the widow of Jules Janin. Each is of the value of three thousand francs, and is to be awarded triennially, the former for an historical work, the latter for a translation from the Latin.—Sismondi, the historian, received at the rate of about one cent a line for each article he contributed to the Biographic Universelle. A few years later George Sand got two hundred dollars for articles in reviews. As much as three hundred and seventy-five dollars has been paid by Murray for articles in the Quarterly.

ASCOT HEATH.

Our London Correspondent Tells How Foxhall Won the Race.

The Ascot week marks the height of the London season every year, just as the Eaton and Harvard cricket-match virtually terminates it. It is one of the oldest racing meetings in England, and has a continuous record from 1727. Not that races were run there annually, but it has been shown that Ascot Heath has been the known home of racing, off and on, since that year when those horses that had hunted the stags in Windsor Forest in the previous season tried conclusions for a piece of plate. In 1732 royalty, in the person of that famous turfite, the Duke of Cumberland, specially interested itself in the race; and in 1753 a regular course was laid down. It is quite of a different complexion from Epsom, not only by reason of its being graced by royalty and the aristocracy in abundance, but as wanting that crowd of "nobody knows who" which must be encountered on a Derby day. It is likewise more out of reach of London ruffians, and the strictness of the police makes the pick-pockets scarcer than they are on Epsom Downs. But the charms of Ascot, even to those whose interest is chiefly in the horses, consists in the promenade on the course between the various races. "Society" finds there, under the shadow of royalty, its own enclosure. The racing is always good and full of surprises, the prizes are valuable, and last, though not least, the ladies are some of the prettiest in England, and vie with each other in showing off the sweetest costumes and the latest triumphs of their milliners' ateliers. You can go by rail or road, according to taste. "You pays your money and takes your choice," is an axiom necessarily reversible on the occasion, for your choice precedes the payment. All who can of course go by road, and make one of the long variegated serpent of equipages that worms its way between the green hedge-rows—a serpent composed of drags, wagonettes, dog-carts, mail phaetons, pony carriages, landaus, victorias, and T-carts, with an occasional interspersing of cabs, flies, and country carts, as a contrast to the well-appointed coaches whose horns enliven the air with sounds with which Wagner could have more sympathy than Strauss or Offenbach. Who comes by road must leave his nerves behind, and care not for wheel-scrappings or post-rubbings. Happily for myself, I was on the top of a coach that would satisfy the most exigent, and behind a veteran whip.

The two great days at Ascot are the Procession Day and the Cup Day. The procession means the arrival in state of royalty on the first day of the meeting. Time was when it was conducted with much pomp and paraphernalia, but that was in the days when kings sat on England's throne. Now, like lots of other things of a like character, the grandeur of the exhibition is dying out, and what was once a great sight to behold is now become a sad effort to keep up a custom for custom's sake alone. Let me describe the procession this year. First came the Earl of Cork, in a green uniform, as master of the queen's buckhounds; following him were two rangers in green, and four huntsmen in scarlet and gold—all mounted; and then came eight open carriages, four of which were drawn by hay and four by grey horses. In the first carriage was the Prince of Wales, (who does the royalty business almost exclusively nowadays,) the Princess of Wales, and the Duke of Edinburgh. The Duke and Duchess of Connaught and the Duchess of Edinburgh were in the second carriage, the other carriage containing less prominent members of the court and suite. Such was the "procession." It came in at the gate, and filed up the course to the royal enclosure, acknowledging by bows the cheers of the crowd as it went along, and then the first race began. But you will naturally take more interest in the Cup Day, seeing that America carried off the cup.

Notwithstanding the unfavorable weather, and a falling off in consequence of the comers by train, the course was well covered, and the attendance large. The coaches mustered in full force, the four-in-hand teams of the Fourth Dragoon Guards, Sir Henry Meysey Thompson, Sir Blanche Payton, and the Duke of Portland attracting the most notice, while the greys of the Marquis of Waterford were greatly admired. The Prince of Wales strolled in and out through the carriages and drags, and nodded here and there. He twice passed the coach on which I sat, and each time I chanced to hear not only his voice, but what he said to his companions, Lord Suffield and Lord Lonsdale. The first time it was, "What a pooty gal!" (I give the pronunciation), and the second: "Let's take a liquor." Neither remarks are remarkable for originality, and would be unworthy of repetition, but that they may serve to show people whose ideas of princes are got from Shakespeare and nursery rhymes what princes of the present day talk about. The Dukes of Edinburgh and Connaught, too, went about among the ladies, chatting, and booking glove bets on their wristbands.

The doubtfulness of the weather of course had much to do with the dearth of millinery triumphs and the prevalence of black. There were some exceptions though, and among them were the Princess of Wales, in a cream-colored dress with a Zouave jacket of a darker shade, and the Duchess of Edinburgh, in plain color, trimmed with black velvet. Lady Castlereagh was in French gray, and Lady Ribblesdale in green. Mrs. Wheeler, who of late has rather fallen out of line with the professional beauties, wore a strawberry-and-cream dress. I don't know how else to describe it. Of course the Prince of Wales's "set" were numerous represented. Mrs. Paget (Minnie Stevens) wore a white short costume, and had under her charge Miss Chamberlain, an American young lady whom she is chaperoning about a good deal just now. Miss Chamberlain is called pretty, and the peculiar yellow color of her hair awfully raved about. However, as her papa is supposed to be rich, the peculiar yellow of the coin in his pockets may cast an upward shimmer on his daughter's tresses.

It is useless to disguise the fact that the winning of the cup by Foxhall was a decidedly unpopular event. Mr. Keene's horse has therefore come in for such an amount of faint praise as never was known, and the disposition to pick holes in him, and belittle his achievement, has been most marked. Of course the usual cheers, more marked from habit than good will, greeted Foxhall as his jockey, Cannon, rode him slowly from the winning post to the scales; but it was plain that had it been Petronel, the favorite, with Archer on top, the applause would have been an ovation. Perhaps had Mr. Keene been there himself to lead back the winner, as did the Duke of Westminster with Shotover, after the Derby, it would have had a better effect. However, the American colony did its best to get hoarse. I hardly think either Lorillard or Keene do the proper thing—I mean in sending over their horses to win big English races, and never coming themselves to see their horses do it. It looks too much like "business" to suit the tastes and ideas of the better class of English turfmen, and it seems to me a different plan would be more popular. At the outset, Foxhall was not even thought dangerous, especially as he had been beaten by Retreat in the race for the Ascot Stakes. However, there's no question he made the running with a vengeance, and half a mile from home held such a long lead that cries of "He'll never catch him!" were heard from Petronel's backers in despairing tones from the grand stand, and all over the place. Right they were, for neither Petronel nor Faugh-a-ballagh did catch him, and Cannon landed him a winner, heating Faugh-a-ballagh by a neck. There may be something in claiming that Foxhall had but two competitors in the race, for the very next day he was badly beaten by six lengths by Fiddler for the Alexandra plate, being quite done up at the end. But Mr. Keene can be satisfied, even though we're not, for his horse has won as a decoration for his sideboard, a trophy which is part of the racing plate of many a noble house in England.

Poor Mrs. Langtry!—she who used to be one of Ascot's most prominent lions. While the papers are sounding her praises and heralding her successes before the footlights all through the provinces, one can not but reflect on what time has done for her. Once the favored guest, the admired centre of attraction within the charmed circle that radiates from Marlborough house, how is it with her now? I mean, of course, socially. After doing an enormous business at Liverpool, the wife of the lessee of the Alexandra Theatre has just entertained her at an afternoon tea, to which between three and four hundred invitations were issued. I suppose that two years ago, or less even, Mrs. Saker (for that is the name of the lessee's wife) would about as soon have thought of asking the Jersey Lily to tea as the Princess of Wales. It is possible the princess would have gone the sooner of the two if she had.

LONDON, June 21, 1882.

Concerning the Guiteau execution, a correspondent writes:

Sane or insane? That is the pregnant question. So-called progress has this week called medical experts, claiming to be learned scientists, to a most novel experiment—to ascertain the seat of insanity in a man's remains. They are offering by acts, if not by positive assertion, that madness is a disease of the flesh, ascertainable after death, and the departure of the spirit that with life and motion animated the upright man. The assassin of President Garfield, imprisoned for three hundred and sixty-four days—two days less than a circling year—was throughout subjected to the most searching investigations—moral, religious, and legal. His guards were men of at least ordinary intelligence; lawyers of differing degrees of common sense and criminal law; a judge of great patience and forbearance—all and each were persistently working to ascertain the impelling power of the crime of Guiteau. "Sane or insane?"—that was the knotty question. Among them all no one more reassured more earnestly than the assassin himself. Authorities, dictionaries, and hundreds of volumes were examined, as explainers of the physical and intellectual calibre of intellect that is restrained, or loosable, in the spirit of man's life. They were at fault. The opinion of the majority, and of the prisoner, was that he was sane at the time of the murder. Guiteau was hanged. He was no longer a man. He was called "The remains." All power of resistance was destroyed in him. The flesh was, as in all other cases, on the swift road to decay, when a hatch of learned, or supposed to be learned, doctors, made their unlooked-for appearance, and with all the apparatus for microscopic investigation, took out the brains and the intestinal portion of Guiteau's body to find, through the inanimate soulless frame, how far his intellect was disordered. Perhaps if there had been a little more medical learning in the case of President Garfield—that most patient, yielding sufferer—there would, while his life lasted, have been less blundering, and less flesh-cutting. However, there was in his case a medical necessity to cut the dead flesh. They were searching for the bullet, and to that search discovered that they had never known its location, until it fell from its place of concealment. Now they are carving up his dead assassin to find the demon of disordered intellect, or to assume from the inanimate flesh the derangement or the perfection of the soul's action while it tenanted what they are cutting into.

This whole affair of the assassination and death of Garfield, and the trial and execution of Guiteau, has proved a miserable business—miserable from beginning to end. It was pitiable to observe the ignorance and jealousy of the physicians around the dying bed of the man they were murdering. It was disgusting—that drunken frolic of high officials from Elberon to Cleveland. Disgraceful is the present struggle of greedy, avaricious doctors, asking for pay when they ought to be on trial for malpractice. Infinitely disgraceful was the long and absurd trial of the vicious mountebank, as he masqueraded in the court with profane and insolent vanity, claiming that he was the agent of an avenging God. Quite as disgraceful were the scenes at the Washington jail, where photographers were invited to take Guiteau's ugly mug, and reporters to note his well-acted imitation of insanity for sensational and pictorial journals; where morbid women and men were permitted to secure his autograph; and where he was watched that he might not kill himself, and fed on rare beefsteaks that he might have the weight to break his neck in the dead-fall. Quite as disgusting was the mob of male and female cranks and crank doctors who, for the sake of a nasty notoriety, clamored around the executive mansion to save his wretched and worthless life. When the carcass was hurried in the jail-yard, we had hoped this miserable play would have ended, and that the worms would have enjoyed their feast; but now come the fool doctors of that altogether worthless and extravagant National Museum, and secure the assassin's "remains," to boil, wire, and preserve; to keep on exhibition—for what? Not for purposes of scientific instruction, but as a sensational show. A National Museum! Where poor Lincoln was murdered; where the vertebrae of Garfield is preserved, and where the anatomy of Guiteau is to be shown—a rival to Madame Tussaud's chamber of waxwork horrors. There is a church vault in Rome where the bones of dead monks are used to fresco walls and ceilings. This National Museum ought to be devoted to preserving all that is valuable of the doctors, members of Congress, and government officials who do not think that the remains of Guiteau and the National Museum ought to be buried in a common grave with quick-lime.

WHAT IS'T O'CLOCK?

Ancient and Modern Fashions in the Making of Clocks and Watches

The time of the invention of wheel-clocks moved by weights, says a writer in the New York Times, is uncertain. Some enthusiasts are found to assert that two hundred and twenty years before Christ such a clock was made—in the time of Archimedes—but there is no evidence to support such a belief. The first unquestionable fact that can be stated upon the subject is that Pope Sylvester II. did construct a wheel-clock, with weights, at Magdeburg in 996, and it is just possible that this was only a revival of an earlier invention, and that Boethius was the originator of the mechanical wheel-clock in A. D. 510. One thing, however, is certain, namely, that clocks were in ordinary use in the monasteries of Europe in the eleventh century, and no doubt the monks, who had plenty of leisure and ample means for the cultivation of experimental science, perfected them, and in a large measure contributed to the perfection of their machinery as we know it. In 1370 a clock was made in France which was considered a marvel of accurate time-keeping, and which may have had a pendulum, but we can not find positive evidence of the discovery of the use of the pendulum until the days of Galileo, although ancient astronomers are said to have used them in computing the duration of eclipses. When we come to a consideration of modern clocks we find a variety, limited only by length of purse and purpose for which they are intended, from the little time-piece costing less than a dollar, suitable for shipboard and traveling, to the exquisite horologe in marble and gold, with its cameos and statuettes, costing its hundreds of dollars. Musical and chiming clocks play an important part in modern households as surely as they are losing favor in church-steeple. They were invented in Germany, and we read of them in 1580. As adapted to rooms, they are sometimes exceeding sweet in tone, and sometimes a very great nuisance. However, chime-clocks are favorites in many homes, and what is known as the Westminster chime is as popular as the cuckoo clock of German origin was a while ago. Clocks are of course adapted in style to the rooms for which they are intended, and certainly no room is complete without one. It is becoming more and more usual to increase their number, and as every one nowadays carries a watch of some sort or other, so every room, however humble, has its clock. In France notably, and in England usually, it is the fashion to have mantel-shelf sets, including the clock and candelabra of the same style, and very handsome such sets often are. For dining-rooms they would be in marble, or bronze, or dark carved woods; in the drawing-rooms, of ormolu or gilt, beautifully decorated, very often with medallions painted by hand, and frequently covered by glass shades. Very handsome stands are made in Dresden china, the value of the clock depending, after a certain moderate sum for the works, entirely upon the material and workmanship of the case. The latest improvements in horology have been mainly in the adaptation of electricity to the working of the mechanism. The French some time ago introduced the invisible stem-winder, which obviated the necessity of the use of any key, upon much the same principle as the stem-winding watches, and by an ingenious use of electricity a clock is now made to repeat in the same manner as a repeater watch, by simple pressure upon a hall attached to the works by an electric hand. Quite recently an inventor has perfected three methods of setting the machinery of a clock in motion by means of electricity, which are known respectively as the papillomone, asteriome, and commutator escapement methods, in each of which electricity is the motive power, which, acting upon the pendulum, impels the machinery to keep in motion as long as the electric current is supplied. The little batteries which furnish the electricity, and which send the current through the coils of the electro-magnet, are concealed in a drawer fitting into the base of the clock, and are stated to contain sufficient carbon to last for two years, during which time the clock will require no attention and will not stop. If the inventor is correct in his statements, he has more nearly discovered the secret of perpetual motion than anybody else, for if a clock can go for two years without stopping, who, in these days of gigantic enterprise, will stop short of making one that will never stop? Among other novelties in the line of clocks we hear of the calendar clock, which keeps the correct date always in view, regularly producing a new one as it passes the old card out of view, and in connection with it, a new case for a clock, which ceases to be a case, and becomes a stand for the clock at the earliest possible notice. With this we have little sympathy, but we confess to an immense admiration for some of the latest fashions in the stands for clocks. In one, two female figures in gilt uphold high above their heads a bronze globe, which forms the clock, while upon it, perched as lightly as a fairy, a laughing Cupid points with dimpled finger to the hour. So much depends upon the case of a clock to-day that individual taste alone can select a fitting one. We must not omit to mention a curious controversy between the townsfolk of Beauvais, in France, and those of the famous German towns with regard to the respective merits of their celebrated clocks. The townsfolk of Beauvais claimed that besides recording calendar days of the week, month, year, zodiacal signs, eclipses, phases of the moon, etc., their clock indicated events occurring not oftener than once in four hundred years; for example, in three centuries out of four the last year leaps its hissextile, and the clock leaps from February 28 to the first of March, a movement occurring once in four hundred years. A Strasburger, not to be outdone, claimed that his town's clock not only did all that the Beauvais clock could accomplish, but in addition to them contained an ecclesiastical computator, and gave all its indications, golden numbers, solar cycles, etc., and wound up by asserting that "the Beauvais clock makes a change every four centuries. But ask an astronomer what is meant by the precession of the equinoxes. He will tell you that it is a movement of the stars describing a complete revolution round the earth in the space of twenty-five thousand to twenty-six thousand years. In our Strasburg clock there is this movement which receives only one revolution in twenty-five thousand years. As this whole thing," adds the apologist of the Strasburg clock, "can be measured, it is unnecessary to await its accomplishment."

PUBLISHERS' NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Subscription, $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance—postage prepaid. City subscribers served by Carriers at $4.50 per year, or 10 cents per week. Sample copies free. Single copies, 10 cents.
 Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as new addresses.
 The American News Company, New York, and branches, are Agents for the Eastern trade. The Argonaut can be ordered from any News Dealer in the United States or Europe.
 Persons mailing single copies of the Argonaut must affix a two cent stamp.
 No traveling canvassers employed. Order by mail, or through your local News Dealer.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."
 A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

ENTERED AT THE SAN FRANCISCO POSTOFFICE AS SECOND CLASS MATTER.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PIXLEY - - - - - Editor.

SATURDAY, JULY 15, 1882.

CONTENTS:

Page.	Page.
EDITORIALS:	EDITORIAL NOTES:
The League of Freedom and the Sunday Law—The mistake which is going to hurt the Democratic Party—What Two Prominent Democratic Lawyers Think of the Sunday Law—How are we to Obtain Reform in our State and Municipal Governments?—Should the Farmers or the Roughs Carry our Next Election?—Failure of Some Local Irish Boycotters... 8-9	The Manner in which General Stoneman is Pandering to the "B'hoys" Element—"Charlie" Sumner's Juvenile Capers—The Golden Age of the Republican Party in California—W.W. Foster's Vauntings and Vapors Before the Public... 5
"FLIP," A CALIFORNIA STORY BY BRET HARTE... 1-2-3	VANITY FAIR... 5
IN THE HARBOR... 3	LITERARY NOTES... 6
CHICAGO NOVELTIES... 3	ASCOT HEATH... 7
SOCIETY NOTES AND GOSSIP... 4	WHAT IS'T O'CLOCK... 7
SAN FRANCISCO FASHIONS... 4	ATHENIAN THEATRES... 10
THE "BELGIC" AFFAIR... 5	THE TALMAGIAN CATECHISM... 10
THE SPHINX REDIVIVUS... 4	STORYTELLERS... 11
	BETSY B.'S LETTER... 12
	THEATRICAL GOSSIP... 13
	THE TUNEFUL LIAR... 14

The League of Freedom is an organization of liquor-dealers, corner grocers, hewers, and lager-heer venders. It is composed of men who manufacture and sell alcoholic drink. The "Sunday Law" is an act of the legislature restraining the sale of drink on Sunday. This law was passed by the Legislature of California, after deliberation, by a majority of its properly elected members. The constitutionality of its provisions having been questioned, it was finally decided by the Supreme Court of California to be in accordance with our organic law. An endeavor having been made by temperance organizations for its enforcement, the league is organized to defeat it. Hence we see two contending organizations, one composed mostly of native-horn Americans, to uphold and sustain the law, the other composed mostly of foreign-horn citizens, to defeat the law. We are not discussing the temperance question, the Sunday question, or the native-American question. But no good citizen, who is intelligent and disinterested, can doubt that the League of Freedom is wrong, and the temperance people right. The league members are law-breakers, and whatever anybody may think of prohibitory liquor laws, of Sabbath observances, of the wine interests of the State, or any of the kindred questions that are allied to this one, there ought to be, and there can be, no honest difference of opinion as to the attitude of this league to the law. In a country where all are electors, and have an equal voice in making, interpreting, and executing the laws, there is no possible justification for an organization for the avowed purpose of setting a law at defiance. The Democratic party in convention has bid for this liquor-vending and law-breaking interest. It will get it. The Republican party will not bid for it, and if it does, the temperance and Sabbatharian people will run an independent ticket, the result of which would be to enable the Democracy to carry the State. If the Argonaut were a mere partisan organ, it would advise a patched-up compromise platform, so artfully arranged and carefully worded that it would catch the lager-drinking German, and not offend the water-drinking American. But as it is not, it recommends the Republican party to openly declare an honest resolution upon the Sunday law that would preserve this day as a day of rest; a day upon which all laboring men can find remission from toil; a day for innocent recreation, and for church worship. There are certain questions within the larger one that we would leave open, as ones upon which honest differences of opinion may be entertained, and which pertain more to the counties where legislative members are elected than to the executive and administrative officers of the State. But when fairly passed by the Legislature, and fully decided by the courts, we would have the Republican party resolve that that law should be rigidly enforced and fully obeyed so long as it remained upon the statute-books unrepealed; and we would do this if we knew that every German in California would vote the Democratic ticket. The party that dares not avow itself as the advocate of law, and that dares not denounce as un-American all organizations of law-breakers, had better be in the minority than the majority. The class of Germans who allow their hellies to control their brains, make their allegiance to the law subservient to their stomachs, and float their political principles in schooners of lager, may be very good citizens, but they are not good enough to entrust with the dictation of a policy to the Republican party, or with the control of the affairs of a Republican government. It is a mistake on the part of politicians to think that the respectable German vote will go to the Democracy on this question. Those of our German citizens engaged in the more important industries, who have property to tax and wealth to protect, who would find exemption from labor on one day in seven, and who have not subrogated all the traditions of Christian civilization to the heer-mug, will vote as usual with the Republican party. When the brewer and saloon-keeper undertake to declare the opinions of Germans, it may be well to remind them that in the flowing lager glass the froth comes to the top, and if this class prefers to take its political association with the whisky-drinking Irish, instead of Americans, may the devil smile his blessing on the unholy alliance. And now, let us be distinctly understood. We mean to say in this article just this, and this only: When in a Republican government a law has been fairly enacted and judicially determined, it ought to be accepted by all good citizens. Any other rule leads to anarchy, and finally to destruction. This can be accepted by the reader who is not a church-goer, who does not profess religion, and who finds his Sunday's rest not within sound of the church-hell. It can be accepted by the man who hates "blue" laws, sumptuary laws, and all sorts of laws restraining personal liberty, and interfering with the freedom of his conscience. It can be accepted by the man who does not favor prohibitory liquor laws, and by the vine-grower who conscientiously believes that the very best way to solve the temperance problem and the saloon problem is to place a bottle of pure California wine on the dinner-table or with the outgoing dinner-pail of every working man in California. It can be accepted—this proposition to obey the law, for it is that and nothing more—by every man and woman who has been reared to an observance of the Sabbath as God's holy day, to every total-abstinence temperance man who sees in the liquor traffic the greatest evil that curses humanity. If the Sunday law is wrong, let it be repealed; but until it is repealed let it be obeyed and respected as the law of the State.

The Democratic party, in resolving for a repeal of the Sunday law, has made a fatal mistake. It is an appeal to the immoral, the vile, and the irreligious for votes. It is a bid to the liquor manufacturer and whisky vender for their votes, and the votes of such of their victims as they can control. It is done in the belief that the class who make of Sunday a harvest-day from the sale of drink are more active than the great intelligent force of working and business men, who look to Sunday as a day of rest and recreation, and the great force of religious men and women who look to the Sabbath as a time set apart by divine authority, and consecrated to the worship of God. It is a fatal political mistake, because among the one hundred and sixty thousand voters in this State there are one hundred thousand to whom the law gives a protection they would not otherwise enjoy. It gives rest to mind and body, and to brain and muscle. They know that it is necessary for their physical health; they know that it is sanctified by custom, law, and tradition as old as civilization; that exemption from labor one day in seven is the key-stone of the arch of Christian civilization. The laboring man knows that it is the one law which gives his class universal protection from the exacting greed and the unrelenting tyranny of capital. To be entitled by law to have one day set apart from secular pursuits is the horn prerogative of every man, woman, and child who lives under a free, republican government. We would have no man who makes the law, or priest, or preacher compel us to observe the Sabbath according to the exactions of his faith, in opposition to our own judgment. But when the law-making power has enacted a statute which has the support of physical science and the sanction of a common law, against which the memory of man runneth not to the contrary; when the civil law enacts the code which the Divine finger wrote upon the tablet of stone, that upon that day "thou shalt not do any work—thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, thy man-servant, nor thy maid-servant, nor thy cattle, nor the stranger that is within thy gates"; and when we know that that law is to protect us from the greed of wealth and the tyranny of power; when it is equally applied, and makes the court close its portals and the lawyer his office; a day upon which civil arrests shall not be made, and civil writs shall not run; a day on which the clinking coin shall not be heard in hank, or the din of the anvil and hammer in the shop—then we would not permit the criminal to run his dead-fall in the interest of the devil, or any other association of law-breakers to league together in defiance of the Sunday law. Let the Democracy make this issue. Let the Republican party accept it—not in a half-hearted way, but in the defiance of a full challenge let the appeal he made to the sense of an intelligent people. Let this be the issue of the campaign. Let the clergy of all denominations turn out, and with the zeal of Peter the Hermit or the mad Savonarola, preach for the preservation of God's Sabbath from the iconoclasm of the gin industry; and let the ten thousand clerks, mechanics, and toilers, with their ten thousand wives and their thirty thousand children, who go out to groves, ocean shore, and brook side on Sunday, become the Salvation Army to rescue one day in seven from whisky.

Just twenty years ago Mr. Justice Field of the Supreme Court of the United States, then Chief-Justice of California, wrote a dissenting opinion sustaining a Sunday law like the present. This most admirable analysis of the law is approvingly commented upon by Professor Pomeroy, of the Hastings Law College, in a recent work edited by him, entitled "The Legislative and Judicial Work of Judge Field." Justice Field says:

In its enactment, the Legislature has given the sanction of law to a rule of conduct which the entire civilized world recognizes as essential to the physical and moral well-being of society. Upon no subject is there such a concurrence of opinion among philosophers, moralists, and statesmen of all nations, as on the necessity of periodical cessation from labor. One day in seven is the rule, founded in experience, and sustained by science. There is no nation possessing any degree of civilization where the rule is not observed, either from the sanctions of the law or the sanctions of religion. This fact has not escaped the observation of men of science, and distinguished philosophers have not hesitated to pronounce the rule founded upon a law of our race.

The Legislature possesses the undoubted right to pass laws for the preservation of health and the promotion of good morals, and if it is of the opinion that periodical cessation from labor will tend to both, and thinks proper to carry its opinion into a statutory enactment on the subject, there is no power outside of its constituents which can sit in judgment upon its action. It is not for the judiciary to assume a wisdom which it denies to the Legislature, and exercise a supervision over the discretion of the latter. It is not the province of the judiciary to pass upon the wisdom and policy of legislation; and when it does so it usurps a power never conferred by the constitution.

It is no answer to the requirements of the statute to say that mankind will seek cessation from labor by the natural influences of self-preservation. The position assumes that all men are independent, and at liberty to work whenever they choose. Whether this be true or not in theory, it is false in fact; it is contradicted by every day's experience. The relations of superior and subordinate, master and servant, principal and clerk, always have and always will exist. Labor is in a great degree dependent upon capital, and unless the exercise of the power which capital affords is restrained, those who are obliged to labor will not possess the freedom for rest which they would otherwise exercise. The law steps in to restrain the power of capital. Its object is not to protect those who can rest at their pleasure, but to afford rest to those who need it, and who, from the conditions of society, could not otherwise obtain it. Its aim is to prevent the physical and moral debility which springs from uninterrupted labor; and in this aspect it is a beneficent and merciful law. It gives one day to the poor and dependent, from the enjoyment of which no capital or power is permitted to deprive them. It is theirs for repose, for social intercourse, for moral culture, and, if they choose, for divine worship.

Professor Pomeroy comments as follows:

Indeed, every one can see that the only chance for rest to the over-worked laboring classes in our factories and workshops, and in the heated rooms of our cities, is in a law compelling cessation from secular pursuits at regular intervals. Without it there would be for them only ceaseless toil. To them, therefore, such a law is a great blessing. It enables them, one day in a week, to be with their families; to seek with them the pure air of the country; to visit gardens, and places for quiet enjoyment; to exchange courtesies with friends and relatives, and to be free from the perpetual din of the shops, and the ever-pressing thought that only by the sweat of their brow they can earn their daily bread.

To the objection that Sunday is a day of religious observance by certain sects, Judge Field replies as follows:

The power of selection being in the Legislature, there is no valid reason why Sunday should not be designated as well as any other day. Probably no day in the week could be taken which would not be subject to some objection. That the law operates with inconvenience to some is no argument against its constitutionality. Such inconvenience is incident to all general laws. A civil regulation can not be converted into a religious institution because it is enforced on a day that a particular religious sect regard as sacred. The fact that the civil regulation finds support in the religious opinion of a vast majority of the people of California is no argument against its establishment. It would be fortunate for society if all wise civil rules obtained a ready obedience from the citizens, not merely from the requirements of the law, but from conscientious and religious convictions of their obligations. The law against homicide is not the less wise and necessary because the Divine command is, "Thou shalt do no murder." The legislation against perjury is not the less useful and essential for the due administration of justice because the injunction comes from the Most High, "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor." The establishment by law of a day of rest from labor is none the less a beneficent and humane regulation because it accords with the Divine precept that upon that day "Thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, thy man-servant nor thy maid-servant, nor thy cattle, nor the stranger that is within thy gates."

Both these gentlemen are learned in the law, and both are Democrats. This Sunday law was passed by a Democratic legislature. It was affirmed by a Democratic Chief Justice. In the recent convention the resolution for its repeal would have been voted down by a decisive majority if the delegation from San Francisco, which was put up in the back-room of an Irish whisky saloon, had not voted solidly for it. We say the Democratic party has made a fatal mistake in its assault upon the Sunday law, and upon the truth of this assertion we invoke the verdict of all honest men who toil.

Cowardice and indifference are the banes of our political life. With courage and attention to our public affairs, all the evils of which we now complain can be immediately and permanently corrected. If the business men and property-owners of this State will at this time take an active interest in the coming Republican convention, they can secure State officials, members of Congress, and a State Legislature which will perform their duties conscientiously and in the direction of economy and good government. The people of this State are paying to their officials, and for the maintenance of State and municipal governments, some ten million dollars annually. Nearly every official in the whole catalogue of office-holders is over-paid. In nearly every office in this State there are extravagances of expenditure and money-leaks that can be corrected with benefit to the conduct of affairs. We are not now considering criminal peculations or malfeasance in office. We simply declare that for the capacity engaged and the labor demanded in nearly all the offices the officials are overpaid, and there is waste, growing out of inattention, that can be avoided. The evidence of this is the fact that for every position, from pound-master to the chief-justice, there are scores of candidates, all clamoring for positions for the money that is in them, and because they are places of little labor. The Chief-Justice of this State, the Honorable Robert Morrison, and each and every one of the associate justices, receive more money than any one of them ever did at his profession, and more than they could earn if they should retire from the bench to private practice. The same sweeping declaration holds good of every judge of the Superior Court throughout the State. From the writer's knowledge of the profession and the practice of law in California, he declares, without fear of successful contradiction, that there is no judge in California who is not better compensated on the bench than he would be at the bar. If it were not so, the judges would resign; but they never do resign, except when they know they can earn more money, and no attorney in successful practice is ever willing to go upon the bench. We recall two resignations from the Supreme Court—those of Crocker and Sanderson—to take employment from railroads. We recall the resignation of Alexander Campbell from a District Court, and Mr. Hayne recently from the Superior Court, one to earn more money at the bar, and the other because of his wife's health, and because he had become wealthy. We recall the names of prosperous, money-making, and talented lawyers, such as Hoge, Wilson, McAllister, Lake, and many more who have declined judicial positions because they were not well enough paid. Then, says the reader, we should give higher judicial salaries, and get better talent. There is an argument in this direction; we are not making it. What we now say is this: the judges are paid more than they can earn out of office. Not one would resign if his salary were reduced, and for every vacancy there would be ten applicants. The office of governor is overpaid. There are one thousand farmers, and as many more merchants, mechanics, and business men who have the ability and all the qualifications to fill the gubernatorial office, who in their pursuits do not earn half the money paid to the governor. From the time of Bigler down to the nomination of Stoneman, there has been no governor who has sought the nomination for the money that is in it, who could not have been replaced by a better man at half the salary. There have been governors—men of wealth—who through ambition, or for the honor, have filled this honorable place. We may mention Latham, Stanford, Low, Booth, and our present governor, Perkins, who would have sought the office if there had been no salary attached to it. We sum up this statement by saying there are a thousand gentlemen in this State who would make good executives, each of whom would gladly be governor at half the present salary. The same is true of nearly all the State officials. There are clerks in the Nevada Bank and Bank of California earning one hundred and fifty and two hundred dollars per month, whose financial ability would qualify them for Treasurer or Controller, who would gladly take these offices, and who, holding them, would at least do the work of one deputy. There are a thousand school-masters in the State who would be induced at the same salary to become Superintendent of Education. Mrs. Carr once filled this position, and filled it well. There are seven hundred school-maids in San Francisco, earning less than seventy-five dollars per month, who would have performed the duties better. The office of Sheriff is expected to bring a fortune to the incumbent every term. In every county there are hundreds of competent men who would gladly take the place for two hundred and fifty dollars per month, with all its responsibilities. There is not an intelligent young man twenty-one years of age, graduate of a high-school, who could not fill the office of County Clerk, and who would not gladly do it for one hundred dollars a month in any county in this State, San Francisco included. There are a hundred gentlemen in San Francisco who would take the office of Mayor or Supervisor, as they do in England and in many Eastern cities, without pay. Our County Clerk, Wilder, was an under-paid mining secretary; our Recorder, Cherry, was a sign-painter; our Superintendent of Streets, Graham, was a drayman; our Assessor, Badlam, was a house-broker; our Tax-Collector, O'Brien, was a lawyer's clerk; the Auditor, Brickwedel, was a merchant, who took the office not for its salary; Widber was a corner druggist; Walter Leman, Public Administrator, was an actor without an engagement; Pratt, the District Attorney, was a lawyer without practice. On the Democratic ticket, General Stoneman is a vine-grower; the Lieutenant-Governor is a miner. Of the candidates for Congress there is but one of the six who has, during any year within the last ten, earned as much money as his mileage to Washington. There is not a single name on the Democratic ticket, after we pass the Lieutenant-Governor, who has the assurance of earning, in any legitimate pursuit, one-half the amount of his salary and perquisites in office. The farmer, the merchant, the mechanic, and the professional man of the classes competent to hold office, do not, on an average, earn half that is paid officials. Many talented clergymen are glad to earn less than two thousand dollars per annum. Good lawyers, and plenty of them, are seeking places as salaried attorneys at less money. The best-paid editorial writer in this State gets three hundred and thirty-five dollars a month salary, while many good writers, educated, and with experience, are working for twenty dollars a week. The very best of mechanics do not average twenty-four dollars per week. Clerks, educated, and of good deportment, required to be well dressed, and with a knowledge of their business, are easily found at twenty-five dollars per week—and so on through all the departments of business. Because of these over-paid salaries, there is an increasing struggle for place. Civil service reform will never prevent political idlers from struggling for positions of independent leisure. This is it that makes of politics a profession. This, and what these people can steal, makes the machine. It is these prizes in the lottery of political life that keep the whole mob of office-seekers on a continual strain for nomination. Thus politics becomes a money-making industry, and has enlisted in its ranks every idle vagabond who would rather hold office than work. The man of easy conscience will pay more money for a place than it is worth, and take the chances of a criminal recoupment. Except in the case of ambition for an office of honor, it is hard to explain why men will spend so much energy, time, and money to acquire an official position, unless they intend to make criminal use of official opportunity. An industrious Governor could do all his own work with one competent secretary; but he must have a private secretary, a Governor's clerk and assistant, a messenger, and a porter. An industrious Secretary of State can get on with one competent assistant; the Controller, except when the Legislature is in session, with two. The Treasurer needs only one book-keeper and a deputy. The Attorney-General can get on with the aid of a clerk to do his writing. The Adjutant-General should do all his own work with an aid. The State Librarian should be a woman, and her assistants should be women. Half the deputyships and clerkships of all the offices in the State ought to be filled by women, instead of great, lunk, idling he-clerks, who loaf, talk politics, whittle, and smoke half their time, and the majority of whom hold their over-paid places as compensation for the dirty work they do in politics. There are ten thousand farmers in this State, intelligent, well-educated men, who work all day in the field to save the cost of a Chinaman, who would do more work for one dollar, and at every county court-house in the State, (except one), there is a ring of idle, loafing politicians, smoking, drinking whisky, and laughing at the farmer for "being such a d—d fool of a granger"; calling him "Old Hay-seed," and turning up their noses at the smell of the stable and barnyard. There are ten thousand intelligent mechanics and working men in the State, who are the slaves, peons, and born thralls of these small party pot-house Cedrics, who wear the chain and brand of the political Saxon, and are proud to be the swine-herds of a party-master.

These farmers, mechanics, and working men occasionally see these things, and every once in a while the mud-turtles of toil feel the fire on their backs, and threaten to roll over. Now and then the business men and tax-payers begin to feel the burden of this Old Man of the Sea, and they come down to the State or county convention with a full resolve to pitch him off. Freight-payers, merchants, and producers complain of the railroads; corporations have grown insatiate; the politicians are more corrupt; the lobby is more greedy; taxes increase, and the people resolve to call a State Convention. Reform is the slogan; retrenchment is the watchword. The politicians scent danger, and they say to themselves, "Old Hay-seed is up; how shall we get him?" And all at once, all over the State, in the cities, and around the corner groceries; at the country cross-roads, and around the county court-houses there goes up the cry of "Anti-monopoly!" In San Francisco and Vallejo every Irish, whisky-vending patriot scents the chance to win an election for the "grand old party." He shouts, "Anti-monopoly!" "Down with the railroad!" The ward orator takes his cue from Buckley, Kearney, Brady, Mannix, or Bill Carr, and he rushes to his club with a speech denouncing monopoly. The clubs send anti-monopoly delegates to an anti-monopoly convention, pass anti-monopoly resolutions, make anti-monopoly speeches, and nominate a man for governor who went to the convention on a free pass, went home on a free pass, and was nominated through the influence of a railroad political manager. Then "Old Hayseed" throws up his hat, and cheers for the "grand old party," upon which he has rested his hopes of reform. He goes home, and dreams of anti-monopoly, while at the court-house, cross-roads, Buckley's saloon, the corner grocery, and all through official circles is heard a broad guffaw over the way business men, mechanics, laborer, and farmers have been fooled by a trick of party management. This thing goes on, and keeps going on, year after year. The politician plays on the fears of the people. The Republican says: "I should like to have Jim Shafter, or John F. Swift, or Charley Felton, or some strong, brainy, independent man for Governor, or for Congress. But we can't elect him; he is not popular; he has offended the Irish, or the water company; he has said something, or done something; he has expressed some unpopular opinion; he is a good man, and would make a good officer, but he is not available; he slops over; he is not a true party man; he is eccentric and unreliable; he is not popular; he could not get the Irish vote, the German vote, or the Jewish vote. How is he on slickens, and the Sunday law? Has he ever hired a Chinaman?" This is the cowardly and contemptible ordeal that every proud, honest, and capable man must go through to get office. He must be born a brainless idiot, without an opinion, or he must be a politic, cowardly, skulking knave, and hide his thoughts. He must be a plausible, sniveling, politic, senseless thing, promising everything to everybody, in order that he may be available enough for a nomination, and popular enough for an election. The man who will do this; who had not rather be in private life, and who, in event of a nomination, would not be more proud of defeat with self-respect, than with victory at the expense of his personal pride, is one who, in office, will lack the nerve and moral courage to do his duty. So far as we are concerned, we are weary of popular men; we are tired of available men; we always did hate a coward, and we have no respect for a fool. We should be glad if the Republicans, without the aid of any manipulators, would send independent delegates to a State Convention who would have the courage to give us an unpopular ticket. Just for once, as in the early days of the Republican party, let us have for Governor a man of brains and courage without any pledges. Let us send men to Congress who are eloquent, and intelligent, and industrious. Let us elect judges who are independent, courageous, and learned in the law, like Jackson Temple, who had the courage to make a decision in the face of a coming convention before which he was a candidate. Give us for Railroad Commissioners and Boards of Equalization men who would have the courage to do their duty in the face of a brainless, conscienceless, howling mob. Such a ticket the Republican party can elect. It would sweep the State like a cyclone across Iowa. But if we are to consult the narrow-minded, one-idea people, avoid everybody's prejudices, stand in fear of everybody's opposition, consult General Miller, Frank Page, and all the Federal officers, conciliate the Irish, the Germans, and the Jews, pass meaningless resolutions to secure temperance-folk and lager-beer drinkers, and put as candidates on the ticket a set of cowardly, popular, brainless idiots, who may be chosen by the secret machinations of corporation agents, corporation managers, and Republican machine hirelings, we will be beaten, and will deserve to be beaten.

A native-born American citizen keeps a store for the retail of shoes at Nos. 777 and 779 Market Street. He purchases articles manufactured by Chinese. These foreigners are here under the law, entitled to its protection, and have the same right to manufacture and sell shoes as the citizen who is native-born or adopted from any other country. The Irish, inspired by a feeling of opposition to the Chinese, thinking in their ignorance and stupidity that by ruining this American merchant's business they can prevent other citizens from employing Chinese, have determined to boycott him. A mob has paraded itself before this merchant's store, with offensive speech and cards, to warn people not to trade with the offending establishment. The result could have been anticipated by any but an Irishman. Every American-born man or woman, and every foreigner of sense, is so outraged by this illegal and impudent conduct, that he or she is at once inspired by a determination to purchase a pair of shoes at Butterfield's. The result is that Butterfield is getting rich by selling Chinese shoes, and the Irish are getting poorer by wearing out their brogans on the pavement in front of his door. Boycotting is an un-American and cowardly Irish device. It won't work in this country, and if it does, two can play at the game. If we should print in our columns the names of the Irish shoe-dealers in San Francisco, and ask our readers to avoid their establishments, we should not applaud ourselves for the motive suggesting the act. But we very respectfully state to those few Irishmen who have any sense, that their countrymen are, by their outrageous conduct, making themselves conspicuously contemptible, especially to that large class of Americans who think the Chinese possess some virtues which some Irishmen might profitably imitate.

ATHENIAN THEATRES.

How Greek Royalty Attends a Play at the Phalerum Beach.

"Civilization again," I may well say, as I step from the elegant two-horse landau which has brought me from the railway station, after having come from the Piræus on the only railway—six miles long—in Greece. The Athenian hackney carriages are the finest in Europe. There is nothing but the number painted on the hack to denote that they are not private carriages. My driver is in livery. He has read my name on the Greek-written label of my luggage, and as he opens the carriage door, with his hat off, cunningly addresses me by name, and thus producing a pleasant sensation of celebrity, gets something over his proper fare of one drachma. "Luxury again," as I mount the marble steps of the hotel, after having had my hoots swept clean of dust by two dexterous whisks of a feather-brush, by a boy dressed in a neat livery, who stands at the door for this purpose. The steps bring me to a large marble-paved square hall, supported by beautiful columns. At the further end is a large fountain—all marble—its jets of water spraying over the water-lilies and marine plants in the basin beneath. At the head of the steps stands Kerios Stampulopolos, head-ideal of hotel-keepers. On the strength of my having passed a few nights at his hotel some two nights previously, he gives me a cordial but dignified reception, and tells me that my old room—the one facing the palace, from balcony of which I can hear the military band which plays in the square every afternoon—is ready for my accommodation. I have never seen a duke receiving his guests. Stampulopolos, in his former capacity of courier, often has, and has evidently profited thereby. Before going to my room I must join him in drinking a little glass of Martel brandy in iced soda water, which is brought to us as we sit on the divan opposite the fountain. I presume most people can soon enwrap themselves in the dignity pertaining to a high position, if suddenly exalted to it; but to a position which some might consider a higher class of servitude, and give it a rank of elevation, is a difficult task, which Stampulopolos has most admirably succeeded in accomplishing. He has been chief in many princely houses, and is well acquainted with the habits and manners of English and continental aristocracy. I have never seen Greek adaptability so well illustrated as in his behavior to each individual who presents himself at his hotel. Natives of any nation find in him a compatriot in language and acquaintance with their habits; members of any rank the respect they are entitled to. Withal, he is a pure republican, and all under his roof meet with the same respectful eagerness to supply their wants. The way he extinguishes a vulgar-looking man, belonging to a Cook's party evidently, is very amusing. "Garçon, very here. Appeley vous this filthy stuff cuffy?" shouts a little fellow, who has a very pronounced checked suit of clothes, and a helmet bat with several yards of muslin wound round it, the ends of which hang a long way down his back. Stampulopolos, begging my pardon for the interruption, rises, and placing himself beside the waiter, who has answered the impatient call in English, says: "Why is this gentleman dissatisfied?" "He asked for Greek coffee, and it appears does not like it," replied the waiter. "Explain to the gentleman that he can have coffee prepared in any manner. Be careful in future to state to all wishing Greek coffee that it is served with the grounds." Stampulopolos has not once looked at the choleric Cookite, who now says: "All right; bring me cuffy alley franky. I don't think," Stampulopolos remarks to me, as he resumes his seat, "that when that gentleman is at home, at his lodgings in Islington, he troubles himself much about any kind of coffee after dinner." The charges at this hotel are about three dollars for breakfast, lunch, dinner of five courses and wine, room, and service. Excellent French and Rhine wines are kept, costing what good wines must cost.

I am going this afternoon to revel in the delights of the capital, doubly enjoyable as they will be in strange contrast with my late wanderings. I am going where all the Athenian world goes in the summer afternoons—to Phalerum Bay, leaving the scorching, dusty city, to enjoy the cool sea-breeze, the baths, the promenade, the dinner in the open air, and finally the French vaudeville in the uncovered theatre. The Piræus train leaves me, with some five hundred others, in a garden, from which a few paces bring us to the promenade. The hard, sandy beach is crowded already with the wealth and fashion of Athens. The king is here, and I almost knock against him as his majesty passes, accompanied by sweet-looking Queen Olga. The king walks fast, a few feet ahead of the queen, who must find it hard work to keep only this distance between them. Two of the maids of honor and the king's aide-de-camp, on duty for the day, follow. The king lives at Phalerum for part of the bathing season, having accepted the loan of the villa belonging to the president of the national bank, situated a little past the promenade along the beach. The neighboring villas accommodate the suite. Another is rented by the bank president, to enjoy the daily sight of his royal guest, and to be at hand to receive any court favors which, under the circumstances, will naturally be offered to him and his family. As I have not a fine villa to lend to a sovereign, I think sarcastically of this way of getting asked occasionally to cut one's mutton at the royal table.

Tricoupi, the prime minister, walks slowly along with a slight limp, listening with his usual solemn look to his companion, Lombardos, minister of public instruction, as he speaks in an excited manner with much gesticulation. Lombardos is just now the prime minister's great friend and supporter. Next week the Lombardo clique in the Greek chambers may be strong enough to nominate their head prime minister, which will cause Lombardos sorrowfully to quarrel with Tricoupi, for the nation's good. This idea may also have occurred to Coumoudouros, the late—very late—premier, for he smiles when he bows his sharp, twinkling-eyed, white-moustached face as Tricoupi walks past. Coumoudouros has quite a group with him, for there can only be one minister of instruction, but there are many who ardently pant for its emoluments, and a government with a majority of ten (including the cabinet) can not last long.

In my drive through Athens this morning, I had passed a beautiful marble palaces. The one, with its flat roof crowded with the statues of the Trojan heroes, is owned by a gentleman personally well known and respected in San Francisco, and famous all over the world—Dr. Schleiman. His wealth, gained by business enterprise, has been greatly increased by the proceeds of his works on the Trojan and Mycenaean discoveries. The other palace belongs to the terribly stout gentleman who now approaches, walking with great difficulty. Schleiman's classical researches must have occupied years before he was able, among the hundreds of acres of ruined Mycenae, to fix on the few square yards containing the golden treasures of the supposed tomb of Agamemnon. The classical studies of the gentleman consisted in the following paragraph, met by chance in a classical dictionary:

"LAURIUM: A place of Attica where were silver mines, from which the Athenians drew considerable revenues, and with which they built their fleets by the advice of Themistocles. These mines failed before the age of Strabo."—Thucyd. 2; Paus. 1., c. 1; Strabo, 9.

"These mines failed before the age of Strabo," I think. Signor Thucydides was slightly mistaken," says the stout Italian gentleman, Mr. Serpieri. "Some years ago I got the idea of getting a concession from the Greek government to work for what I could find. I really don't know how many millions of francs I am worth. We continue to ship thousands of tons of lead, mixed with silver, to England."

I do not see a single Greek dress; I do not hear much Greek spoken. Those who are able to speak in French or English to each other, do so. Those who are not, put as many English or French phrases into their conversation as they can. It is fashionable not to speak Greek. The elite are the wealthy families, who have made their fortunes in England and France, and are much envied and disliked by their less fortunate countrymen. Omogetis (same birth) is the term for those born or brought up abroad. This is changed by the scornful to vromogentis (badly smelling horn).

It is a gay scene. As a background on one side (as a freshman might say) is the deep, blue Aegean Sea. The bay near us has some dozen ironclads—English, French, and Russian. The uniforms of many of the officers mingle here and there in the crowd. The Acropolis, to the left, stands sharply out from the dark purple haze now creeping over Hymettus at its back. It is time to dine, as the theatre will commence in an hour, and I accordingly dine à la table d'hôte at one of the many tables in front of the large hotel, not at all discomposed that I am so near the crowd that the waiters have scarcely room to pass on the outside of the tables they serve, since every one is doing the same about me. The king has also gone to dinner. I can hear the band playing before his villa, where there is a crowd not yet satiated with gazing on royalty, waiting to see their majesties come out shortly to the theatre.

Night is coming on; the electric lamps along the beach and in the theatre are lit. I hear the first strains of "Barbe Bleu" from the orchestra, so I rise and join the throng now pouring into the arena, filled with benches divided off for each sitter, each bench a little higher than the one in front, so that some two thousand people can be well accommodated. Only the stage, orchestra, and a space at the side, where there are two boxes for their majesties and attendants, are covered. All the audience are sitting in the open air. The king and queen shortly come into one box; aide-de-camp and maids of honor in the other. Between the acts we all go out on the beach, (including king and queen,) and walk about till the performance again commences. I do not re-enter the theatre, as I wish to avoid the crush which will take place a little later on in the cars for Athens, when every individual of the two or three thousand people will rush to go by the first train after the curtain drops. The train in question will only accommodate eight or nine hundred; but as all are allowed an equal chance on the platform, there will be a wild scene of confusion, pushing, and scrambling; gentlemen losing their wives, wives losing their husbands—both losing their tempers. It will be far into the morning before fashionable Athens, with its equanimity rather ruffled, will arrive at home.

To avoid this scrimmage I take an early train, as I also wish to drive round the columns of the Temple of Jupiter, and pass near the Acropolis, as the moon now shines through the Parthenon. "How beautiful!" "How shining!" you will say. Wait a minute; the columns of the temple come in sight. As we turn a curve of the road the brazen clangor from the orchestra of an open-air Greek theatre, opposite the temple, blows away all classic thoughts. Further on—next door to the temple, in fact—is a French café chantant. The singer, a woman, can be seen from the road as she shrieks out a song from a sixteenth-rate café chantant repertoire. Next to this is a garden, where a troupe of Bohemian girls are each alternately singing a song. After each song the singer goes round with the plate for coppers. Other singing-gardens are near by; more cafés chantants, the whole coming to a climax at the "Garden of the Nymphs," near the entrance to the ancient Stadium. On one side of the way there is an Italian opera company; on the other negro minstrels, with another café chantant next door, in opposition. We are now in the midst of a stream of carriages taking to or from these resorts the Athenian public. My ears are stunned with music and singing of all kinds; Renato, in "Ballo in Maschera," is using all his voice to make "Eri tu" heard above the negro song and accompanying banjo, and "Dormez, dormez, ma belle," from a shrill Marseillaise voice. The different orchestras, playing with the opposition music to guide them as to time, accomplish only one mingled, shuddering shriek of agony. Do you feel that you are on classic soil now? To relieve you somewhat, I will take you into Athens by the other side of the Acropolis, where all is dark and silent, though here is also a theatre—one of the ancient theatres of Athens. Curious thought: Athens gave the plays of Aeschylus to the civilized world, and receives in return a café chantant. ALEITHIA.

ATHENS, June 7, 1882.

The authorities of New College, Oxford, caused some jackdaws, who had confidently built upon their chapel walls, to be bricked up, failing in other means of dislodging them, because the cawing of these birds interfered with their most Christian service. The congregation heard the cries of these unfortunate creatures daily grow less and less, till on the fifth day death came to their release.

THE TALMAGIAN CATECHISM.

By Robert G. Ingersoll.

Question.—Do you think that Lot's wife was changed into salt? Answer.—Of course she was. A miracle was performed. A few centuries ago the statue of salt, made by changing Lot's wife into that article, was standing. Christian travelers have seen it.

Q.—Why do you think she was changed into salt? A.—For the purpose of keeping the event fresh in the minds of men.

Q.—Do you believe that Elijah went to heaven in a chariot of fire, drawn by horses of fire? A.—Of course he did.

Q.—What was this miracle performed for? A.—To convince the people of the power of God.

Q.—Who saw the miracle? A.—Nohody hut Elisha.

Q.—Was he convinced before that time? A.—Oh, yes; he was one of God's prophets.

Q.—Suppose that in these days two men should leave a town together, and after a while one of them should come back having on the clothes of the other, and should account for the fact that he had his friend's clothes by saying that while they were going along the road together a chariot of fire came down from heaven, drawn by fiery steeds, and thereupon his friend got into the carriage, threw him his clothes, and departed, would you believe it? A.—Of course things like that don't happen in these days; God does not have to rely on wonders now.

Q.—How do you account for the fact that the heathen were not surprised at the stopping of the sun and moon by Joshua? A.—They were so ignorant that they had not the slightest conception of the phenomenon. Had they known the size of the earth, and the relation it sustained to the other heavenly bodies; had they known the magnitude of the sun, and the motion of the moon, they would, in all probability, have been as greatly astonished as the Jews were; but being densely ignorant of astronomy, it must have produced upon them not the slightest impression. But we must remember that the sun and moon were not stopped for the purpose of converting these people, but to give Joshua more time to kill them. As soon as we see clearly the purpose of Jehovah, we instantly perceive how admirable were the means adopted.

Q.—Do you think that Christ knew the Jews would crucify him? A.—Certainly.

Q.—Do you think that when he chose Judas he knew that he would betray him? A.—Certainly.

Q.—Did he know when Judas went to the chief priest and made the bargain for the delivery of Christ? A.—Certainly.

Q.—Why did he allow himself to be betrayed, if he knew the plot? A.—Infidelity is a very good doctrine to live by, but you should read the last words of Paine and Voltaire.

Q.—If Christ knew that Judas would betray him, why did he choose him? A.—Nothing can exceed the atrocities of the French Revolution—when they carried a woman through the streets, and worshiped her as the Goddess of Reason.

Q.—Would not the mission of Christ have been a failure had no one betrayed him? A.—Thomas Paine was a drunkard, and recanted on his death-bed, and died a blaspheming infidel besides.

Q.—Suppose Judas had understood the divine plan, what ought he to have done? Should he have betrayed Christ, or let somebody else do it; or should he have allowed the world to perish, including his own soul? A.—If you take the Bible away from the world, how would it be possible to have witnesses sworn in courts; how would it be possible to administer justice?

Q.—Is it not wonderful that all the writers of the four gospels do not give an account of the ascension of Jesus Christ? A.—This question has been answered long ago, time and time again.

Q.—Perhaps it has, but would it not be well enough to answer it once more? Some may not have seen the answer. A.—Show me the hospitals that infidels have built; show me the asylums that infidels have founded.

Q.—If Joseph was not the father of Christ, why was his genealogy given to show that Christ was of the blood of David? Why would not the genealogy of any other Jew have done as well? A.—That objection was raised and answered hundreds of years ago.

Q.—If they wanted to show that Christ was of David, why did they not give the genealogy of his mother, if Joseph was not his father? A.—That objection was answered hundreds of years ago.

Q.—How was it answered? A.—When Voltaire was dying, he sent for a priest.

Q.—Do you think that Christ was actually God? A.—Of course he was.

Q.—Then why did Luke say that "Jesus increased in favor with God"? A.—I dare you to go into a room by yourself, and read the fourteenth chapter of St. John.

Q.—Did God always know that a Bible was necessary to civilize a country? A.—Certainly he did.

Q.—Why did he not give a Bible to the Egyptians, the Hindus, the Greeks, and the Romans? A.—It is astonishing what perfect fools infidels are.

Q.—Why do you call infidels "fools"? A.—Because I find in the fifth chapter of the gospel according to Matthew the following: "Whosoever shall say 'Thou fool!' shall be in danger of bell fire."

Q.—What do you consider is the strongest argument in favor of the inspiration of the scriptures? A.—The dying words of Christians.

Q.—What do you consider the strongest argument against the truth of infidelity? A.—The dying words of infidels. You know how terrible were the death-bed scenes of Hume, Voltaire, Paine, and Hobbes, as described by hundreds of persons who were not present; while all Christians have died with the utmost serenity, and with their last words have testified to the sustaining power of faith in the goodness of God.

Q.—What were the last words of Jesus Christ? A.—"My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?"—From Ingersoll's New Book.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

An unwilling juror in New Hampshire told Chief Justice Doe that he was deaf. Quick as a flash the Chief Justice turned to the clerk, and said: "Dismiss him. If he is deaf, we don't want him; if he lies, we don't want him."

Some years ago a young man, imbued with an iconoclastic spirit, as also with a high sense of his own abilities, wrote a critical essay upon Plato, wherein he rather pecked at the old philosopher, and sent it to Ralph Waldo Emerson, asking him to read it, and give him his candid opinion concerning its merits. Mr. Emerson, on returning the essay, made only the remark: "When you strike a king you must kill him."

At a recent trial in Paris, Madame Judic, who appeared as a witness, gave her age as "almost thirty-two." This reminds us once upon a time Mademoiselle Mars made her appearance before the court at Rouen as a witness, and was asked the customary question. "Ahemy years!" mumbled the star. "She says fifty," remarked the judge to the clerk. "Forty! Put it down forty!" screamed the actress, with no hesitation or whispering this time.—Le Figaro.

It sometimes happens that impertinence is paid back in its own coin. Once when John Randolph was leaving a country tavern, the landlord said, "Mr. Randolph, which way are you going?" The gruff Virginian replied, "I've paid my bill, and it's none of your business." Half an hour later, Randolph came to a cross road, and not knowing which way to take, sent his servant back to inquire. The landlord replied, "Tell Mr. Randolph he has paid his bill, and he can take which road he pleases."

On the occasion of Sarah Bernhardt's return to London, the Times said she looked "worse, and even thinner than before." This reminds us of the German composer who was conducting one of his overtures. As the horns played too loud, he told them repeatedly to play softer, and softer they played each time. At the fourth repetition, with a knowing wink at each other, they put their instruments to their lips, but did not blow at all. The conductor nodded approvingly: "Very good, indeed. Now one shade softer, and you'll have it!"—New York Evening Post.

They were engaged to be married, and called each other by their first names, Tom and Fanny, and he was telling her how he had always liked the name of Fanny, and how it sounded like music in his ear. "I like the name so well," he added, as a sort of clincher to the argument, "that when sister Clara asked me to name her pet terrier, I at once called it Fanny, after you, dearest." "I don't think that was very nice," said the fair girl, edging away from him; "how would you like to have a dog named after you?" "Why, that's nothing," said Tom, airily; "half the cats in the country are named after me." They don't speak now.

Madame C.'s present husband has a copious beard and moustache, and the gentleman who would probably be her husband should the divorce act be passed, wears a moustache only. She has long impetioned her husband to cut off his beard, and in order to give her a joyful surprise on the anniversary of their wedding-day he does so, and appears in her presence. With a little scream of pleased astonishment she rushes into his arms and prints two grosses of chaste kisses upon his face, exclaiming, "Oh, you darling!" "You do find me handsomer, then, with my beard off?" says the husband, as soon as he has recovered his breath. "Oh, horror, is it you?" she screams, and faints. Should the divorce act be passed.—French Joke.

"Have you got a twenty that you'd like to double in three minutes?" asked a well-dressed young man of a middle-aged citizen, last night; "it's a dead sure thing." "I've got the twenty; what's your scheme?" "I feel it in my bones that I could put ten on the ace to take the tray, and copper the king, and go the jack straight up, and scoop the game." "Oh, you do?" said the middle-aged citizen. "I do." "Will you oblige me by feeling the top of my head?" asked the middle-aged man, removing his hat. "How does it feel?" he continued, when the young man had obliged him. "Hard," said the young man, puzzled. "Now feel your cheek," said the middle-aged man, walking off.

Among the attendants at a recent children's party, given at the residence of the Secretary of State, in honor of Nellie Arthur, the President's little daughter, were Bancroft Davis, grandson of Secretary Frelinghuysen, and Blanche Emory, daughter of Lieutenant Emory. They are about four years old, and as the little girl has been taught to speak French to the exclusion of English, she consequently finds it difficult to speak with other children. But the little boy did not seem to realize any difficulty in this difference in language. Miss Frelinghuysen said: "Bancroft, how can you make Blanche understand you when she can not speak English?" He replied with the gravest innocence: "Oh, I kiss her, and she knows what I say."

Charles Dickens used to delight in describing the way in which Samuel Rogers, the poet, told dinner-table stories when grown old and feeble. A manservant stood behind Mr. Rogers's chair, and at appropriate intervals would thus admonish his master: "Tell Mr. Dickens, sir, the story of the Hon. Charles Townshend and the beautiful Miss Curzon." The old poet would start in a slow, almost Gregorian tone, and in a curious, old-fashioned phrase: "The Hon. Charles Townshend became enamored of Miss Curzon. She was bee-yewtiful. He be-riehed her maid to conceal him in her chee-amber, and when she arrived to dress for a ball, emerged from his hiding-place. She looked at him fixely, then said: 'Why don't you begin?' She took him for the 'air-dresser.'"

It was a superstition in the good old times, remarks the New York World, that if one could secure a lottery ticket the number of which had been selected by a madman, it would infallibly prove a winning one. Once upon a time Madame de Pompadour secured the numbers of all the unsold tickets in Paris, and having inscribed each upon a piece of paper, set forth for the asylum, where she desired the superintendent to lend her a lunatic. The superintendent obligingly complied, and the lunatic having been brought in, Madame de Pompadour, with her sweetest smile and most expressive pantomime, wooed him to make a selection from the contents of her reticule, which she held open to him. The lunatic stared, glared, frowned, smiled, and at last comprehending what was demanded of him, anhed up to the lady, selected a ticket with much deliberation, and swallowed it!

The following story has recently gone the rounds of the German papers: On the morning of the recent eclipse Captain Von S., of the Fusiliers, issued the following verbal order to his company, through his sergeant-major, to be communicated to the men after forenoon parade: "This afternoon a solar eclipse will take place. At three o'clock the whole company will parade in the barrack yard. Fatigue jackets and caps. I shall explain the eclipse to the men. Should it rain they will assemble in the drill shed." The sergeant-major, having set down his commanding officer's instructions in writing as he had understood them, formed the company into a hollow square at the conclusion of the morning drill, and read his version of the order to them, thus: "This afternoon a solar eclipse will take place in the barrack yard by order of the captain, and will be attended by the whole company, in fatigue jackets and caps. The captain will conduct the solar eclipse in person. Should it rain, the eclipse will take place in the drill shed."

A lady is the proud and happy possessor of a pair of the sweetest little mites of dogs that can be imagined—no bigger than her own little fists, and with the sweetest long silky hair. She stayed them with cakes, and comforted them with kisses, and her banner over them was general foolishness. One morning the maid comes with tears in her eyes to announce the fatal news that one of the little darlings had expired in the course of the night of indigestion. A fearful scene ensues, but when the three doctors have got the lady out of her hysterical attack, she rings, and sends for the furrier, and says: "Oh, you must make a muff out of the skin of my poor, dear little Paquita. I will always wear it to re-mind me of—" "Yes, madam, but the dear departed was so small that her lamented hide would only make a muff of miss's size." "Are you sure?" "Quite, madam." "Then," bursting into tears, and pointing to the twin sister of the deceased, sleeping on the silken cushion, "take this one's hide, too!"—New York World.

At a time when the Nantucket whaling trade was at its zenith, a sperm-whaler from that port in the Pacific had the misfortune to lose the black cook. Now, while this important functionary lay on the plank, in the gangway, shrouded in his canvas cover, sewed up by the sail-maker, ready for burial, and all the ship's company were mustered around the rude bier, save the look-out men aloft, (for the skipper had an eye to business,) the captain engaged, with all due gravity, reading the burial service, the ship's bell solemnly tolling, and all the air filled with the solemnity of the moment, a loft's-man suddenly discovering the spout of a whale, sang out lustily: "T-h-e-e-sh-é blows!" Before the lookout had time to repeat the ever-welcome words, the now excited skipper dropped his book, seized his glass, and jumped into the rigging, bound aloft at a fifteen-knot rate. His glass soon proved the truth of the look-out's cry, and from his lofty perch the skipper bellowed out as only a sailor can: "Knock off tolling that hell! Clear away the boats! Heave that nigger overboard!" And they hove him.—Hawkeye.

Alexis Lefere, who has just died at Paris a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor, member of a dozen learned societies, and a millionaire, began life as a gardener's laborer. He was the creator of the great peach "industry" of Montreuil, where his gardens had long been famous for the care with which each individual peach was tended and brought to a profitable maturity—six and eight francs being a by no means extravagant price. Louis Philippe was among the visitors to Montreuil, where, having admired some of the choicest products and asked the price, he whispered, "Send me two dozen of the six-franc peaches, but not a word of it to my ministers!" His caution, perhaps, was justified, since Thiers's wife was known to cut a peach in four quarters to regale her husband, herself, and their two honored guests. (N. B.—To neatly divide a peach, unless it be a clingstone, cut it round to the kernel, and gently revolve the two hemispheres in opposite directions.) When Napoleon III. and the Empress visited Montreuil there was no question about price, but both sovereigns helped themselves liberally. The proprietor made no demur, knowing that payment would be made in due course, but when he beheld the personages of the imperial suite joining in the feast he could no longer contain himself, and shouted: "Hi! hold on, gentlemen! The aides-de-camps' peaches are over there on the other side!"

The following story is told of General Harney, when he was in command at Camp Verde, Texas. He was an intensely dignified officer, and if there was one thing he detested more than another it was undignified haste. One evening, just as he was about to hold dress parade, he perceived that he had forgotten his handkerchief, and as the weather was very hot, he said to his orderly: "Go to my quarters, quick, and bring me my handkerchief." The orderly touched his cap and started for the quarters, several hundred yards distant. After he had proceeded a short distance, remembering that there was no time to lose, he broke into a trot. "See that scoundrel running as if the Indians were after him. If there is anything I hate it is to see a soldier running instead of marching properly. Here, my man," continued Harney to another soldier, "go after that man, and tell him I say to walk." The second soldier started after the first, but as the first one kept on running, the second one saw his only chance to deliver the message was to hurry up, so he, too, broke into a run. To say that Harney swore is to use but a mild expression. "Here, sergeant, go after that man, and tell him if he don't stop running I'll hang him up by the thumbs." The sergeant started off in a brisk walk, but as his predecessor had a good start he, too, began to run as hard as he could. "If all three of the scoundrels ain't running like jack rabbits!" ejaculated Harney. "I'll show 'em." And tucking his sword under his arm he started in pursuit as fast as he could run; but suddenly remembering his dignity he came to a halt, and walked stiffly and slowly back to the place the dress parade was to come off.—Galveston News.

TO HOUSEKEEPERS.

If you wish to use goods of full weight and absolute purity, see your grocer supplies you with

KINGSFORD'S
OSWEGO
STARCH.

ROYAL BAKING
POWDER.

WALTER BAKER & CO.'S
CHOCOLATE.

SMITH
BROTHERS'
PACKAGE
BORAX

WM. T. COLEMAN & CO.
AGENTS
121 and 123 Market Street,
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

A THRILLING ROMANCE,

KALANI OF OAHU,

A Historical Romance of Hawaii.

By DR. C. M. NEWELL, OF BOSTON.

One Volume, 12mo., 415 pages. Price, $1.50.

This beautiful story illustrates life in the Sandwich Islands before immigration brought the vices and disorders of European life among them, and so altered the character, habits, and tone of one of the most remarkable races of the age. The book has been read by King Kalakaua, who recently visited our city, and has received his approval. For sale by all Booksellers.

SAMUEL CARSON,

PUBLISHER AND WHOLESALE BOOKSELLER,

120 Sutter Street,

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

A copy by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price.

THE LATEST NEW BOOK,

And the One which will have the largest sale.

NASBY IN EXILE

By D. R. LOCKE, (PETROLEUM V. NASBY).

WILL BE READY FOR DELIVERY TO SUBSCRIBERS ABOUT JULY 22d.

"I shew make my way to Paris to wunst, and it will go hard with me if I can't establish myself ther in some way. I turn my back upon the Corners hawtily, only too glad to leave a ograful people which hezn't stuff appreshashun uv greatin's to furnish the trifin means to keep it alive among em. Boston alluz paid Webster's debts, while the Corners eggshiles me!" "Be it so. I go, never to return."

PETROLEUM V. NASBY, (Eggshile.)

"NASBY IN EXILE" is at once serious and humorous. The subjects are treated in the peculiar vein that has made "Nasby" famous wherever the English language is spoken, the humor being illustrative of ideas, and the satire healthful and wholesome.

The chapters on London give the reader a better idea of the great metropolis than can be found in any book published, and in no other publication are the other countries so conscientiously and carefully described. Mr. Locke set out with the idea of getting at things as they actually are, and that he succeeded those who read his letters as they appeared will bear testimony.

Concerning Ireland and the Irish, it is conceded that no such a presentation of facts about Ireland was ever put on paper.

Seven hundred pages. Two hundred illustrations. Well printed and well bound. Price, in cloth, $4; or in leather, $5. Sold by subscription only.

SAMUEL CARSON,

AGENTS FOR THE LOCKE PUBLISHING CO.,

120 Sutter St., San Francisco, California.

AGENTS WANTED.

A copy will be sent by mail post-paid on receipt of price.

GEORGE MORROW.

GEORGE MORROW & CO.

(Established 1854.)

Commission Merchants

DEALERS IN HAY AND GRAIN.

SHIPPING ORDERS A SPECIALTY. CONSIGNMENTS SOLICITED.

39 Clay Street,

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

C. ADOLPHE LOW & CO.
Commission Merchants,

SAN FRANCISCO.

OFFICE IN NEW YORK, 42 CEDAR Street

Liberal advances made on consignments.

S. & G. GUMP,

581 and 583 Market Street, S. F.,
Manufacturers

Mirrors, Cornices, Hardwood Mantles, Picture Frames, and Etc-a-Brac.

IMPORTERS OF GOUPI'S ENGRAVINGS, CHROMOS, PHOTOGRAPHS, ETC.

CALIFORNIA SUGAR REFINERY.

OFFICE, 325 Market St.

WORKS, Eighth and Brannan Sts.

C. SPRECKELS, President,

J. D. SPRECKELS, Vice-President,

A. B. SPRECKELS, Secretary.

PACIFIC ROLLING MILL CO.

San Francisco, Cal., Manufacturers of

RAILROAD AND MERCHANT IRON

Car and Locomotive Axles and Frames, and Hammered

Iron of every description. Rolled Beams, Angle, Channel,

and T Iron, Bridge, and Machine Bolts, Lag Screws, Nuts,

Washers, etc. Steamboat Shafts, Cranks, Pistons, Connecting Rods, etc. etc. Highest prices paid for Scrap Iron.

OFFICE, 202 MARKET STREET.

A RAMBLING TALK.

I wonder why it is that what men say is always called talk, while women's talk is always called chatter? I believe it was Mr. Lord Chesterfield who wrote somewhat loftily that "Women have an entertaining tattle, and sometimes wit, but for solid reasoning and good sense, I never knew one in my life that had it." My Lord Chesterfield was always willing to say a good thing at the expense of veracity, and many of us would be willing to follow in his footsteps if we could, for it is really easier for the most of us to tell the truth than to say a good thing. "Entertaining tattle" is a happy phrase, and gives weight and roundness to all that my lord says after, for there is nothing that appeals so irresistibly to a quick understanding as a well-turned expression. And yet, granting that there is sex even in conversation, the women are not all tattlers. Some of them are prattlers, and some are chatters, and now and then there really is one who can talk. Perhaps the prattlers are the most popular, but the inherent depravity of human nature makes the tattler the most amusing. I listened to such a one the other day for a good hour and a-half. She was a tall, stately, and commanding-looking creature—a new, white-shouldered Juno. One might almost have expected the words of a Hypatia from characterful lips carved like hers; but nature is an elf of mischief, and often puts the soul of a small woman in a big frame. My Juno, my Sheba queen, my stag-like, stately beauty, was reading the society column, and giving a running fire of accompaniment.

"Miss Araminta Blank," read she, "is visiting friends in Napa." I wonder what game Araminta is running down now," quoth Juno. "Whenever Araminta goes to the country, she is giving chase." And she promptly proceeded to tear poor Araminta's heart from her bosom and transfix it upon a javelin of keen rillery, where we might see every wound and batter that had been dealt the poor thing in her long and fruitless search for the love which every woman has a right to hope for. We were not a cruel group, but we laughed at the quick-witted sallies over Araminta's woes till the tears ran. "Ah," cried Juno, "here is something very touching: 'Miss Etta Hammersmith was in simple white nun's veiling, gracefully draped. Miss Helen Hammersmith in pink nun's veiling, corsage filled in with white lace.' I see Helen got the white lace this week. Take turn about at the little extras." And she went on to tell us that she had taken some one into the cleaner's last week to point out the two well-known nun's veiling dresses being cleaned, after a winter of hard service, and made ready for the summer campaign. Another talking to us might have made us weep for the heartburnings of the poor Hammersmith girls, but to such pitiful shifts to make themselves look like other girls, but Juno drew a vivid picture of the two well-known dresses dangling in the cleaner's clothes-press, as limp and clinging as their wearers, and there were peals of laughter over their poor little heart-aches, instead of compassion.

"Mrs. Erastus Golden, in court train of pink satin brocade, petticoat of pale-blue satin wrought in pearl beads. Ornaments, diamonds." Her mother was my washerwoman ten years ago," said Juno, and topped over with a word every atom of awe that we had been feeling for the stupendous wealth of Mrs. Erastus. It takes a lot of gold to gild a washerwoman, even in California, where the rivers run gold. It does not at all matter that Juno is not scrupulously exact in her statements. She makes them with crushing assertion, and she upholds well her right to be called an "entertaining tattler."

"She won that dress at poker," she said of one famous society helle, who, without much pretention to beauty, is accounted a woman of great fascination, and whose drawing-room is never empty.

"Oh, I played poker the other night," cries a Pratter, "and I won a dollar and a-half."

"A dollar and a-half?" says the Tattler. "My dear child, you are a baby. There was a time when no women played poker except the Jewish ladies of the wealthier class. But nowadays many a woman makes her pin-money at the card-table."

"Ob dear, it would frighten me to death to play for more than two heans ante," cries the Pratter; "but I think it is just perfectly lovely to win an awful lot."

"Good gracious!" speaks the Chatterer, "suppose the papers should get bold of this, and attack the ladies of California in a new way. They have accused us of too much champagne at our luncheons, of opium and morphine, and what not else; and now if they should know that we play poker, what a terrible report there would be."

"My dear, did you ever play?" asks Juno. And the Chatterer answers with a bewildered "No." Whereupon Juno very calmly adjures her to "Shut up"—a colloquial elegance much used in the fashionable world among quick-tempered people. But one does shut up. Having started upon an interesting theme, we pursue it to the end—nay, further than the end, for we go out of the world and into the books, and are brought to a stand-still at last by the picture of Beatrix Esmond, who has glided, smirched and stained, but young and fair still, out of "Henry Esmond," and comes back, haggard, pallid, and old, into "The Virginians," with her fierce, black eyes burned out of fire, except when they are bent upon the cards. What a fascination there is in these bits of pasteboard for these violent women, with whom suspense is a fierce delight, and who can find it nowhere but in the turning of a card. It is horrible to think that the love of money can outlive all the other loves of a life, yet so it is, for we shall find it so out of the hooks as well as in. I read somewhere the other day of a daring young clergyman who preached to his congregation from a new and home-made text: "The love of money is the root of all good," and made them go home and make all they could, for that it kept them out of the thousand and one temptations which make even the just man fall seven times a day. A great many sermons have been preached, a great deal of literature has been written to prove how valueless money is, but they all miss their point signally, and they will so long as "every door is barred with gold, and opens but to golden keys."

"The truth of the matter is," cries Chatterer, at this stage of the conversation, "that the young parson and the old saying were both right. It is the root of all the good and all the evil. What is the main cause of dissension in ninety-nine households out of every hundred?"—veering immediately, as women always will in a discussion, into domestic economy.

"Pocket-money," we all cry together, and promptly proceed to relate our experiences. What a lot of millionaires we all knew who never gave their wives a penny to squander as they liked, if they felt inclined to squander. Bills they might run to any amount, but when we compared notes we found that many of the women who rustle in silks and roll in carriages, were really unfamiliar with the touch of a golden coin. A singular phase this in our social life, and far from uncommon in that stratum where the nouveaux riches are found. Such women are driven to odd straits, for money in hand is an absolute necessity, and grocers and drygoods dealers could tell strange stories of a new and curious hook-keeping, when cash on the ledger loaned to Mrs. A. or B. or C. must go down on the bill as cambric or sago, as the case may be.

Next, we attacked those husbands who decline to give their wives any fixed allowance. "Come to me for whatever you want," says my lord, grandly, "and you shall have it," and he tosses a carefree five, or ten, or twenty out of his pocket, according as his mood may be; is moved to infinite wonder when his wife comes for more, and charges around the house like an infuriated bull when bills come in. This species of creature is legion. After him comes the man who boldly pinches his wife, who smokes the finest brands of cigars, drinks the choicest wines, runs a bill with the most expensive tailor, and wonders why his wife is a dowdy.

"I think you are all real horrid things," cries Pratter, at this juncture, "to put happiness in marriage upon a financial basis. Love is all that is necessary for a happy union." But we all crush the Pratter to the earth with our superior world-knowledge. We tell her that you never touch a man so nearly as when you touch his pocket. There is so much veneration in the world that it is difficult to get at the true grain beneath, but in the dispensing of his money a man must go with the grain, whether he be a grudging miser, a prodigal spendthrift, or a simple, straightforward, generous gentleman.

"Nevertheless," cries the Pratter, "I still decline to believe that married happiness is entirely an affair of pocket-money," which was branching wide of the line of argument, as such people always do, for it had only been said in the beginning that pocket-money was the leading cause of family dissensions. As for happiness, who is to say what makes that impalpable something which we all hope for, and long for, yet never know it by its touch when it is within our grasp? For if we were put to it, I wonder how many of us would know just what we want? Either there is a metaphysical miasma in the air, or it is a fashion that we are all going about with the bitter taste of the Dead Sea applies in our mouths, wondering if life be worth living, and concluding, upon the whole, that it is not. A great many people grow tired of the world nowadays, or think they are; but it is the tired ones who plunge most incessantly into the whirlpool. Society is like a baneful drug. It becomes a habit, and those people must have it or die of the horrors who best know its emptiness and its bane. Would you know them? Look for those names which occur oftentimes in the society columns. BETSY B.

"American Born" has been played at the Baldwin Theatre to large houses all the week. The drama is of the old-time melodramatic school, and possesses several very sensational scenes and incidents. Miss Ada Ward, as Mary Hope, the heroine of the piece, while her part did not demand that subtlety which her other rôles require, succeeded in her efforts to give the character a strong, vigorous personality. The other parts were sustained with equal credit. Mr. John Dillon scored a great success, and has taken a high place in the public estimation. Miss Ada Gilman received much applause, and Messrs. Grismer, Kennedy, Jennings, and Bradley acquitted themselves with their usual ability. Next Monday the Hanlons open in "Le Voyage en Suisse." Haverly's Theatre was filled with a large audience on Monday night to greet the returning Mastodon Minstrels. All the old favorites were received with much applause. Rice, Leon, Thatcher, and Frank Cushman are as funny as ever, while several new-comers are by no means behind in amusing specialty acts and character sketches. This company will continue for several weeks longer. At Emerson's Standard Theatre "My Brudder-in-Law" ended on Thursday night. Last evening a season of "Pinafore" commenced. The following is a brief sketch of the play "Le Voyage en Suisse," which opens at the Baldwin Theatre next Monday night: Dwindledown, a Parisian adventurer, although already secretly wedded, marries Juliette by means of the constraining aid of her father. Juliette was already engaged to Frank, and this forced marriage seemed about to destroy her happiness for life. Frank's father, with the help of his three nephews, determines that Dwindledown shall be the husband of Juliette in name alone, and for that purpose the four follow the newly-married pair on their wedding tour, all resolved to prevent any annoyance to Juliette from her disagreeable husband. They secretly secure herths on either side of the pair, and manage to so annoy the adventurer that he only needs the final climax of being confronted by his real wife, and an official annulment of his marriage with Juliette, to be almost driven mad. Frank is at the end, of course, married to Juliette. But the interest of the piece hangs on the many ludicrous and startling acrobatic feats performed. Among the striking hits of by-play on the part of William and Frederick Hanlon-Lees is the falling of one of them from the railroad train while it is in motion. Another prominent act is the descent of one of the servants through the ceiling of the Swiss hotel, followed by a chair, both landing upon the dining-table, a distance of about twenty feet. The falling of a trunk lid upon the neck of the person inside the trunk occurs twice in the course of the play, and the effect is heightened when another performer stands upon the lid after it has descended. The act with which the Hanlon-Lees all make their first appearance, viz., that of the up-setting stage-coach, from which the four who were on top turn somersaults and land in a line near the foot-lights, has been made familiar through printed descriptions; but the trick by which one of the servants opens a half-dozen bottles of champagne in a basket by accidentally discharging a gun, thus causing the stage to be flooded with liquid, is a veritable novelty. Equally well done is the handling of a flask of gin in the first act and a bottle of rum in the last, it being done in both cases by William and Frederick.

Madame Théo, one of the most famous bouffe singers on the French stage, has been engaged for a brief season, beginning September 11, at the New York Casino. She will be heard there in "Lily," "Niniche," "La Fille du Tannour Major," "La Jolie Parfumeuse," and other opérettes.

DRAMATIC GOSSIP.

The beautiful Mrs. Langtry, who has been drawing very large houses on the other side, especially in Scotland, seems, like the late John Brougham, to be as attractive as a speaker before the curtain as in the capacity of a star. Mrs. Sterling, another celebrated English actress, is an admirable speaker, and old Mrs. Keeley is one of the happiest wedding-breakfast orators in England. In America, since Laura Keane, and, more recently, Charlotte Cushman, we have had no good actress orators. Miss Clara Louise Kellogg is, perhaps, now the best. Of male actors the only good speaker since Brougham's death is Dion Boucault. If Mrs. Langtry is guaranteed one thousand dollars a night for her American tour, as stated, the enterprise would seem to be a risky one, for the price of seats will have to be raised to at least three dollars to yield a profit to the manager, and only a few large cities could fill a theatre at such a cost, even if the Jersey Lily should prove as attractive as expected. Concerning her American tour, "Brunswick" writes to the Boston Gazette: "There is a great deal of speculation going on as to Mr. Abbey's probable success with Mrs. Langtry. I have not found any one who thinks that she will prove a winning card. When Adelaide Neilson first came to this country, she was only a very pretty woman, and I soon tired of her; but on her last visit she was an accomplished actress—not great, but certainly the best before the public in her line—and I enjoyed her performances. Mrs. Langtry hops suddenly upon the stage as a star, and is treated as though she was a great actress, when she has had only a few months' experience. That Mrs. Langtry will have a social success there can be no doubt. The halo of the Prince of Wales hangs around her, and, republican as we are, we how down before princes. She is good-natured, her friends say, and generous, and it is not so much the money that she wants as the pleasure of spending it. The story is told that she paid seven hundred and fifty dollars for an extra train to get her from Scotland to London in time for a dinner-party. I have no doubt but that she can get plenty of extra trains in this country for that price, and she will find it an advertisement that pays."

Misfortunes seem to follow Signor Rossi wherever he goes. His disastrous failure in this country recently bids fair to be equaled by another in London, where he has been acting in an unlucky theatre, with a poor company, a poor manager, and meagre receipts. In this connection a writer in the London Figaro remarks: "An effort is being made to form, during Signora Ristori's visit, a kind of dramatic triumvirate in which she would be supported by her famous countrymen, Signors Salvini and Rossi. The performance of 'Macheth,' say, with these three in the cast, could not but be a most interesting event. It is now said that in addition to playing Lady Macbeth, Signora Ristori will play the title rôle in Giacometti's 'Queen Elizabeth' during her engagement."

The New York Puck prints the following parallel extracts: "Miss Blanche Roosevelt, the operatic artist, who was a great favorite of the late Mr. Longfellow, has published a volume of recollections of the poet."—Journal. "Miss Sarah Jewett, the talented actress, is the young lady of her name who interested the late Professor Longfellow in her verse-writing, although she has not duly appeared with her book of poems. Miss Jewett lived in her girlish days at Cambridge, and before and after her appearance on the stage was a favorite with the old poet."—New York Herald. "Miss Mary Anderson visited Mount Auburn Cemetery on Decoration Day, and placed a beautiful wreath of flowers upon the grave of the poet Longfellow, who was one of her kindest and most valued friends."—Rochester Democrat. "I want you girls to understand that I wrote his home-life! So there now."—Blanche. "I was his favorite, and I can write poetry, and I think you're real mean."—Sadie. "You're both of you too borrid for anything. I'm from Kentucky, and I'm doing this decorating, and don't you girls forget it!"—Mamie. "Well, I've worked the flower scheme, and the diamond snap, and the runaway graft; but this new advertising racket is kinder odd, morally, ain't it?"—Ada Richmond.

While the theatres in New York are closed it is the thing to visit the popular Alcazar of an evening, and gaze on the pretty Vanoni, a new and much gushed-about comic opera singer. This is the way in which the World's dramatic critic talks of her: "A pair of pink stockings tapering nicely down to a pair of dainty white satin slippers, a fluttering little garment, an arch smile, and two dimples, all crowned by a cluster of curls—such is one's first impression of Signora Maria Vanoni; and when the pink stockings glide gracefully over the stage as she goes through her various captivating devices, and sings her pretty songs, this pleasant impression is confirmed. She is one of the few agreeable surprises of the summer season." The World's critic has it very bad.

The London public, on the twenty-sixth ultimo, gave a reception to Mr. Edwin Booth, who played the first night of his reappearance in that metropolis at the Adelphi. Conspicuous in the van of the veterans were the worldly-wise-looking countenances of George Augustus Sala, Mr. Burnand, Sir Theodore Martin, Henry Labouchère and Lord Londesborough. Mr. Booth, before the curtain rose, received a letter from the American Minister, Mr. Lowell, regretting his inability to be present. Julie de Mortimer was played by Miss Bella Pateman, and de Mauprat by Mr. Eben Plympton, recently of the New York Madison Square Theatre. The other characters were taken by Mr. Robert Pateman, Mr. E. H. Brooke, Mr. Lin Rayne, Mr. William Young, Mr. J. G. Shore, Mrs. Edward Price, and Miss Ellen Myrick. Mr. Booth made the most marked effect in the famous scene in which Richelieu draws the awful circle of the power of Rome around Julie, but his unquestionable success was a success of declamation, it is said, rather than that of tragic art.

The Cincinnati man who led his wife out of a theatrical matinee by the ear, in order to break her of the habit of going to theatres, has been made very conspicuous by the publication and discussion of his exploit. "But I don't mind it," he says, "for I feel that I have accomplished much good. My wife is not the only woman in Cincinnati who has neglected her children and her household affairs to visit matinées once or twice every week, but there are hundreds of them, and it is time that husbands and fathers entered their protest. She knew the characters and plot of at least a hundred plays, and was forever talking about them. She gave me no rest, and was worse than a stage-struck youth who is eternally quoting from the drama. Nearly every move I made, or opinion I expressed, she likened me to some character she had seen at the theatre. One night I had the toothache like thunder, and was walking up and down the sitting-room floor with my hand up to my jaw, when she peeped in at me, and after looking a moment, said: 'Hello, Hamlet, to pull or not to pull.' His chief grievance, however, was that she called him Toodles, and that seems to have been the inciting cause for his raid in the theatre."

An official prohibition against playing in Paris heretofore paying the forfeit she has incurred has been served upon Mademoiselle Bernhardt at the instance of the Comédie-Française. In consequence of its having been for a benefit, one performance given by Mademoiselle Bernhardt when last in Paris will be overlooked, but future appearances will be resisted to the utmost. Bernhardt's spasm of virtue has had a disastrous effect on Parisian actresses, who are marrying themselves off, right and left, since Monsieur Damalas came to the fore. It is really sad to read the Paris papers nowadays.

Obscure Intimations

We have received so many communications in reply to "Stella's" Santa Cruz letter of last week that we can not print them all. One lady in particular—who begins by remarking that "Stella" is probably a cantankerous old maid with the liver complaint—"devotes about three columns to the refutation of "Stella's" one. There is no doubt that the letter in question was a somewhat querulous one, and that it was colored by the discomforts of a small town overcrowded with holiday visitors. Yet many of its assertions were true, notably that referring to the number of loose women there.

"A Woman's Way," Edith—Declined.
"A Lay of the Latest Minstrel," C. M. S., Chalmers—Declined.
"Marriage," Judson—Declined.

—IT IS A REFLECTION ON THE AGE THAT WHILE progress in science, literature, and industrial economy has marked each decade of the century, very little advancement in culinary science has been evinced. Travelers from the world over say that Americans do not know how to live, although nature in her lavish bounty, has bestowed everything that may be classed as raw material. The Romans, two thousand years ago, knew how to cook fish, make bread, and furnish a feast that would excite the envy and surprise of modern caterers. The French have preserved some of the economies, and a few of the luxuries of antiquity. Americans started anew after the landing at Jamestown and Plymouth Rock, and in some directions have gained nothing since. It is a "pat phrase" that our grandmothers knew how to make bread, but our mothers lost the art; yet everything connected with the lost art was so simple that it should have been handed down from mother to daughter.

The bread we eat really measures the dyspepsia we suffer. Cheap preparations, attractive to the eye, and possessing effervescent quality, find extensive sale as baking powders. Lately some attention has been paid to reform in this direction, and if the testimony of eminent chemists can be trusted the manufacturers of the New England Baking Powder have made a commendable step forward.

There may be, after all, a renaissance of the nineteenth century—a revival of the art of cooking, and the science of living, the art of living long, living well, and living happily.

Certainly nothing ministers more readily to the happiness of the people than good digestion after the enjoyment of good food.

It may be said, to the credit of the manufacturers of the New England Baking Powder, that they went to work in the right way to produce something useful and attainable. They sought to ascertain the proper proportions of bicarbonate of soda and cream of tartar, and moreover paid due attention to the necessity of providing the best quality of each. The end aimed at was to produce a baking powder free from impurities, and yet an article that would generate the gas required when subjected to the proper conditions of temperature and moisture. It would seem that they kept apart from business rivalries, participating in none of the controversies, and resorting to none of the cheap methods of houses engaged in the business of manufacturing inferior compounds for the market. They were guided by the conviction that nothing was needed to make the purest and most wholesome bread but the proper combination of pure ingredients. The object was to ascertain the right adjustment of ingredients, and thus produce a powder that could stand the inquiry of the chemist and surpass any other baking powder made.

The public is so easily gulled and caught with something new and attractive on the surface, that it is really a waste of skill to deceive, except for pecuniary advantage. The incentive of gain has flooded the country with poisonous and impure mixtures, and that fact can be verified by any chemist of good standing.

The New England Baking Powder has been subjected to the skill of the chemist. It is placed on the market for what it is worth, and that is what the manufacturers claim for it. At any rate, it is worth a fair, impartial trial on its merits.

It is pure, and does not contain ammonia, starch, or any other adulteration. As a baking powder it produces the best results, and leaves no injurious effect.

The New England Baking Powder will be introduced into every family whose members keep abreast of the times, because the preservation of health, the development of strength, and the promotion of happiness depend so largely on the quality of food that no sensible family can afford to disregard it.

Believing that mothers who give attention daily to the physical and mental development of their children, and particularly observe their diet should know what the New England Baking Powder is made of, we append the following analysis from Professor Ad Sumner, a chemist of high standing. He says after careful examination:

"I find the New England Baking Powder is carefully prepared from the best brands of cream of tartar and bicarbonate of soda which can be obtained, and nothing else; that one ounce of the powder evolves one hundred and seventy-four and seven-tenths inches of carbonic gas at two hundred and twelve degrees Fahrenheit."

This is about the temperature required for baking bread.

CCXXXVII.—Bill of Fare for Ten Persons.

July 16, 1882.

Oysters on the Shell.
Mock Turtle Soup.
Salmon, Excelsior Sauce.
Marble Potatoes.
Chicken Salad.
Stewed Terrapin, Hominy.
Fillet of Beef with Truffles and Mushrooms.
Oyster Patties.
Baked Bell Peppers, French Carrots.
Roman Punch.
Roast Saddle of Lamb, Mint Sauce.
Tomatoes, Spanish Dressing.
Cheese.
Raspberry and Vanilla Ice-cream.
Brandy Peaches, Wine Jelly Cake, Fruits Glacés.
Sherry, White Wine, Claret, Champagne.
Coffee and Liqueurs.

RASPBERRY AND VANILLA ICE-CREAM.—Take three small boxes of raspberries, put three cups of powdered sugar on them, let them cook until sufficient juice comes out to form the syrup; strain and mix with sweetened cream, and freeze well. Take your vanilla cream when frozen, put in the mold until half full, then fill with the raspberry. Cover well and secure the cover by placing a little butter around the edge; plunge into a bucket of broken ice and salt, and let it stand a couple of hours. Turn out carefully, and you will have an ice-cream of two colors.

—A NATURAL PYRAMID OF COPPER.—AMONG the many interesting specimens of ore designed by Arizona miners for the Denver Exposition the one about to be shipped by the Copper Queen Company will certainly occupy a foremost position. The specimen in question is one solid mass weighing two tons. It is of pyramidal form, about eight feet high, and two and a quarter by three feet thick at the base. On one side, about midway between the base and the apex, is a recess—the only interruption in its symmetrical shape. At this recess is a miniature cave, sixteen inches deep, seven inches high, and nine inches wide. It is in the form of an assayer's muffle. The sides and roof are covered with beautiful stalactites. The carbonate ore of which this peculiarly attractive piece is composed assays from twenty-three to twenty-five per cent. This company is running the famous Pacific Water Jacket Smelters, made by Rankin, Brayton & Co., of the Pacific Iron Works, San Francisco. Two, of thirty-ton capacity, giving a regular hullion product of about twelve tons per day, running from ninety-six to ninety-eight fine. The great success that has attended the operation of these smelters has given a wonderful impetus to copper mining in all parts of the country.—S. F. Daily Exchange.

The eminent composer and pianist, Joachim Raff, died in Berlin the other day, at the age of sixty years.

—USE REDDING'S RUSSIAN SALVE in the house, and use Redding's Russian Salve in the stable.

The great seal of Great Britain and Ireland is affixed to yellow wax for English documents, red for Scotch, and green for Irish.

—WRITE TO MRS. LYDIA E. PINKHAM, LYNN., Mass., for names of ladies cured of female weakness by taking her Vegetable Compound.

An ex-Pullman car porter, says a Western journal, just returned from abroad, says that Queen Victoria is very harshful. She seemed entirely overcome by his presence, and replied to him in monosyllables as timidly as a young girl. He humbled himself for the occasion as much as possible, too.

—A GOOD PURGATIVE MEDICINE IS ONE OF THE absolute necessities of the age. This want has been supplied by Dr. J. C. Ayer & Co., whose celebrated Cathartic Pills are known to be the safest, surest, and best purgative medicine ever offered to the public. They are mild but certain in their effects, and keep the system in good condition.

—EVERY ONE DELIGHTED. EVERY PURCHASER recommends German Corn Remover. Get the genuine. 25c.

Mr. Ernest Morris, who has been investigating the poison used by the Woorari Indians, on the Upper Amazon, says that no antidote for it is known when the poison is fresh and the arrow heavily charged. To kill game they charge very lightly, as otherwise poisoned animals soon grow putrid.

—A LADY, FORMERLY PUPIL OF PROF. DE FILIPPE, desires a few more pupils in Spanish and French; teaches by the same method. Address M. L., box 81, Oakland, Cal.

A grand piano, of Viennese manufacture, that once adorned the drawing-room of the Empress Marie Louise at the Tuilleries, was sold under the hammer two weeks ago in Paris for one hundred and eighty two dollars.

—MR. A. J. KELLEHER DESIRES TO INFORM HIS pupils that he will resume tuition on July 10th. Apply at Gray's music store, 117 Post, or at his residence, 2324 Clay Street.

Mr. Belmont is investigating South American affairs again. Mr. Belmont will be remembered as the gentleman who sowed the wind and reaped Mr. Blaine.—Chicago Tribune.

—LADY READERS OF THE ARGONAUT WILL REMEMBER that the place to buy colognes, perfumery, toilet soaps, brushes, sponges, cosmetics, etc., is at the elegant and well-stocked store of James G. Steele & Co., Chemists and Apothecaries, 635 Market Street, Palace Hotel, San Francisco.

Only one out of seven sporting prophets of various London papers hit on the Derby winner.

—ROWELL, HAZAEL, O'LEARY, HART, AND other pedestrians all use German Corn Remover. 25c. All druggists.

Sweet girl—"Is it wicked to sing that song on Sundays?" Brother Jack—"Yes, it is wicked to sing it any day." "Why?" "Because it makes people swear."—Philadelphia News.

—MORSE HAS THE FINEST GALLERY IN THE world, 826 Market Street, (Phelan Block).

—DR. E. O. COCHRANE, DENTIST, 850 MARKET cor. Stockton (over drug store.) Office hours, 9 to 5.

—Go to Bradley & Rulofson's, 429 Montgomery.

JNO. LEVY & CO.

MANUFACTURING JEWELERS,

Importers of DIAMONDS and other PRECIOUS STONES, WATCHES, CLOCKS, and SILVERWARE,

118 SUTTER STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.

(Of the late Firm of BRAVERMAN & LEVY.)

F. JOS. LOCHER,
Can now be found with
J. H. CURLEY & CO.,
FINE TAILORING,

14 Montgomery St., opp. Lick House, San Francisco.

HOUSEKEEPERS!

DO NOT SACRIFICE YOUR GOODS AT AUCTION, but STORE THEM with H. WINDEL & CO., NO. 310 STOCKTON STREET. Furniture, Pianos, Household Goods, Paintings, Trunks, etc., well taken care of. We have three large, airy, brick buildings, and no rent to pay, and can store goods very moderate. Money advanced on goods at one per cent. per month. We guarantee against damage and moths, and can give references dating back 20 years.

SPECIMEN OF OUR ARTIST'S HUMOR.

THE MUSIC LESSON.

HUNDREDS OF DELIGHTED ONES see for the first time in their lives the JAPANESE ARTIST and EMBROIDERERS at work in their native costume at ICHI BAN, 22 and 24 Geary Street.

The Argonaut is printed with Shattuck & Fletcher's Ink.

BALDWIN THEATRE.

Monday.....July 17th

THE HANLONS

In their laughable Parisian Absurdity, entitled

"LE VOYAGE EN SUISSE."

Six Evenings and Saturday Matinee.

No Sunday Night Performance or Wednesday Matinee.

JENNIE E. MacGOWAN,
Dress and Cloak Maker.

428 Sutter Street.

Original designs, perfect work, and reasonable prices.

J. R. COWEN. J. W. PORTER.

COWEN & PORTER,

FUNERAL DIRECTORS,

118 Geary Street, San Francisco.

OPPOSITE STARR-KING CHURCH.

THE "DRESS REFORM"
CORSET,
Specialty for Stout
Figures, by mail,
$3.00. Send waist,
hip, and bust measure. Also, Shoulder
Braces, Union
Under Flannels,
Ladies' and Children's Comfort
Waists, Bustles,
Hose Supporters,
etc.

Send for Circular.
The only Depot
for these Goods.
Mrs. M. H.
OBER & CO.
Boston
Dress Reform,
326
Sutter St.,
SAN FRANCISCO.

An Elegant Corset to Order for $4.

SHERIFF'S SALE.

ANTHONY WADDY, Plaintiff,
vs.
JAMES JONES, Defendant.
Superior Court,
No. 5571.
Department No. 3.
Execution for Deficiency
after Sale.

UNDER AND BY VIRTUE OF AN

Execution for Deficiency after Foreclosure Sale, issued out of the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, duly attested on the twenty-third day of May, A. D. 1882, in the above entitled action, wherein Anthony Waddy, the above-named plaintiff, obtained a judgment against James Jones, defendant, on the sixth day of March, A. D. 1882, for the sum of 1,173 dollars, U. S. gold coin, with interest thereon and costs, etc., and whereas an order of sale was on March 8, A. D. 1882, issued to the Sheriff of the City and County of San Francisco, which said order of sale was on May 10, 1882, returned by said Sheriff, showing a deficiency thereon in the sum of $1,207.05, as appears of record, which said deficiency was docketed. Pursuant to said judgment and decree I have levied upon all the right, title, and interest which the said defendant, James Jones, had on the sixteenth day of May, 1882, the day on which said judgment was docketed, or which he may have subsequently acquired in and to the hereinafter-described property, situate, lying, and being in the city and county of San Francisco, State of California, standing of record in the office of the County Recorder of said city and county in the name of James Jones, and bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the southerly line of Pleasant (formerly Riley) Street distant twenty-two feet and nine inches easterly from the southeasterly corner of Jones and Pleasant Streets, and running thence easterly upon the southerly line of Pleasant Street, twenty-two feet and nine inches; thence southerly, at right angles, to Pleasant Street, sixty feet; thence westerly, and parallel with Pleasant Street, twenty-two feet nine inches; thence northerly sixty feet to place of beginning; being portion of fifty-vara lot No. 825, as shown on the official map of San Francisco.

Public notice is hereby given that on MONDAY, THE SEVENTH DAY OF AUGUST, A. D. 1882, at twelve o'clock, noon, of that day, in front of the Old City Hall, in the city and county of San Francisco, I will sell all the right, title, and interest which the said defendant, James Jones, had on the sixteenth day of May, 1882, the day on which said judgment was docketed, as aforesaid, or which he may have subsequently acquired in and to the above-described property, to the highest and best bidder for gold coin of the United States.

San Francisco, July 15, 1882.
JOHN SEDGWICK, Sheriff.
B. B. NEWMAN, Attorney for Plaintiff.
July 15, 22, 29, and August 5.

J. M. LITCHFIELD & CO.

MERCHANT TAILORS,

And Dealers in Gents' Furnishing Goods,

415 MONTGOMERY STREET,

Bet. California and Sacramento San Francisco

THE
AMERICAN SUGAR REFINERY

SAN FRANCISCO,

MANUFACTURERS OF ALL

Classes of Refined Sugars, including Loaf Sugar for export.

C. ADOLPHE LOW, President.

Office—208 California Street.

DO NOT SACRIFICE YOUR FURNITURE, PIANOS, and HOUSEHOLD GOODS, at auction sales, while you are boarding or out of the city, but

STORE THEM,

As well as your Trunks and Paintings, with

J. H. MOTT & CO.,

647 Market St.,

Nucleus Block, Second Floor.
Large, airy brick building, with elevator. MONEY LOANED on valuable goods. Terms moderate.

COMPOUND OXYGEN

NEW TREATMENT BY INHALATION, for Consumption, Asthma, Bronchitis, Dyspepsia, Catarrh, Headache, Debility, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, and all Chronic and Nervous Disorders. Prepared by DR. STARKEY & PALER, Philadelphia, Pa. Package contains all directions, and is easily sent by express, ready for USE AT HOME. H. E. MATHEWS, Forwarding Agent, 606 Montgomery street, San Francisco, Cal. 25c send for Free Pamphlet.

WEST'S NEW ELECTRIC BELT.—C. N. West's Electro-Medical Belts always have excelled all other electrical appliances. They have taken the premiums at all State Fairs.

This new Belt excels every other that he has invented. Cures all diseases without medicine. Price, from $5.00 to $20.00. Warranted ten years. Patronize the representative men and leading ladies of the city. Address or call on C. N. WEST, 632 Francisco.

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

New York Society Item.
Mrs. Gill is very ill.
And nothing will improve her,
Unless she sees the Tuleries,
And waddles through the Louvre.

Scanned.

"Her foot is a poem," the lover said;
"A melodious rhythm is her tread."
"Yes," said his friend, (a sort of beat),
"Spondaic the measure, two long feet."
—Louisville Courier-Journal.

Like a Gun.

Oh, woman, lovely woman,
You are just like a gun—
You're "loaded" up with "powder,"
And "wadding," too, a ton;
And when you "sight" a haughty man
And set your "cap" with care,
And with a "bang" you slyly "shoot"
Your eye—"ball" at him there.
Oh, woman, happy woman,
We know you're like a gun—
You always hate to "make a miss"—
Your "aim" is to be won.
And you are "charged" by pa and ma
To "go off" and your "bore"
Is that you will "hang fire" till,
In years, you've made a "score."
Oh, woman, angry woman,
You know you're like a gun—
Because a "slow match" sets you off,
And you can "kill" for fun;
And then you have a "trigger," too,
Of causing men to marry
Before they know how great a "load"
They afterward must "carry."
—H. C. Dodge.

Mat Arnold on America.

I hate the vulgar Philistine—
The word is T. Carlyle's and mine.
We Britons have a noble line,
Barbarian, but not Philistine;
But all you Yankees, I opine,
Are quite too wholly Philistine.
At high noon on pie you dine—
A prandial practice Philistine.
For toothpick you—oh, certain sign
Of ways and manners Philistine!
Affect the fork's defiled tine,
Though I've not been across the brine,
My cobbler once—a Philistine—
Sent home my shoes, marked two-and-nine,
Wrapped in a journal Philistine—
I think, the Wayback Bandoline—
The name, meaneers, is Philistine.
I kept the paper and the twine—
They're useful, though they're Philistine.
I read the sheet, and I incline
To think—don't call me Philistine—
That's all I need to know. I'll sign
M. Arnold,
Anti-Philistine.

The writer begs grace for the points he has missed in Not rhyming the name, in pure Oxford, Philistine.
—H. C. Bunner in Puck.

An Indian Mutiny.

The son of the Jam of Rus Beyla, Meer Ali Khan, rebelled against his father, and took and plundered two towns in Scinde, but the Jam marched against, dispersed his followers, and taking him prisoner, returned in triumph to Rus Beyla. —Calcutta Dispatch.
The son of the Jam of Rus Beyla,
Meer Ali Khan, felt for his pa
Not the most remote degree of awe;
"Quotha," "No longer will I obey law.
I am satisfied—tired of him I am—
If I serve him no longer I'll be Jam,
I'll raise me an army and march awa'
Straight to the city of Rus Beyla.
Come, fill up my cup! come, fill up my Khan, (2)
And hearken me swear by the holy Koran
I either will conquer thy crown with clat,
Or pour my blood's red current, Jam Rus Beyla!"
He plundered two towns that belonged to the Jam,
And sent out the news in a terse telegram,
From the East to Western Ind, (3)
In Latin, "Pecavi,"—"I have Scinde."
Into the palace of Rus Beyla
There rushed a messenger, pale with awe,
And he gave the door a profound salaam,
And said he, "May Allah preserve the Jam!
Meer Ali Khan, your highness's heir,
Has rebel turned, and his soldiers swear
By the Prophet's beard and I don't know what Besides, they'll send the old Jam to pot."
The Jam he wept—good, easy man—
At the revolt of Meer Ali Khan;
Till then his content had known no flaw,
And he sighed, with Horace, "O Rus—Beyla!"
Then he waxed wroth: "I vow I'll ne'er
Shave till I have cut off my heir.
The dog, to lift 'gainst me his foe paw!—
It is he for the turbans of Rus Beyla!"
So he marched against Meer Ali Khan,
Whose every gunner and matchlock man
Sighed for a chance a bead to draw
To pot the Jam of Rus Beyla.
"On to the fight!" cried Meer Ali Khan,
"Let every rebel now play the man!"
And he promised, as an incentive to,
The lascivious pleatings of the loot, (4)
But the Jam came down upon Meer Ali
On a war-elephant fourteen feet high,
And the elephant trumpeted in fierce glee
To the thick of the fight as the Jam bore he, (5)
And the Khans of Meer Ali were scattered in flight,
And the Jam's son was caught and in fetters bound tight,
And the conqueror frowned when the youth met his view,
And he said, from his elephant's back, "Howdah
do?"
Ho, guards, with this traitor, to prison repair!"
But he had time to harm not one head of his heir,
But let him in jail wait the will of his pa.
Then he marched back in triumph to Rus Beyla.

EXPLANATORY NOTES.—(1) The introduction of the negative rescues the young rebel's sentence from profanity without any sacrifice of accuracy.

(2) It is customary in the Orient to intoxicate warriors before sending them upon dangerous enterprises, while the accustom them to the noise of battle, are given to appear.

(3) "Pecavi"—a little scratched.
(4) "Pecavi"—a little scratched.
(5) "Pecavi"—a little scratched.

—New York World.

MRS. LYDIA E. PINKHAM, OF LYNN, MASS.,

Woman I can sympathize with Woman.

Health of Woman is the Hope of the Race.

Lydia E. Pinkham
LYDIA E. PINKHAM'S VEGETABLE COMPOUND.

In a Positive Cure

for all those Painful Complaints and Weaknesses
so common to our best female population.
It will cure entirely the worst form of Female Complaints, all ovarian troubles, Inflammation and Utera-tion, Falling and Displacements, and the consequent Spinal Weakness, and is particularly adapted to the Change of Life.

It will dissolve and expel tumors from the uterus in an early stage of development. The tendency to cancerous humors therewith checked very speedily by its use.
It removes faintness, flatulency, destroys all craving
for stimulants, and relieves weakness of the stomach.
It cures Bloating, Headaches, Nervous Prostration, General Debility, Sleeplessness, Depression and Indigestion.

That feeling of bearing down, causing pain, weight
and headache, is always permanently cured by its use.
It will at all times and under all circumstances act in harmony with the laws that govern the female system.
For the cure of Kidney Complaints of either sex this Compound is unsurpassed.

LYDIA E. PINKHAM'S VEGETABLE COM-
POUND is prepared at 233 and 235 Western Avenue, Lynn, Mass. Price $1. Six bottles for $5. Sent by mail in the form of pills, also in the form of lozenges, on receipt of price, $1 per box for either. Mrs. Pinkham freely answers all letters of inquiry. Send for pamphlet. Address as above. Mention this Paper.

No family should be without LYDIA E. PINKHAM'S
LIVER PILLS. They cure constipation, biliousness,
and torpidity of the liver. 25 cents per box.
Sold by all Druggists.

AYER'S CATHARTIC PILLS,

For all the Purposes of a Family Physic,

CURING

Costiveness, Indigestion, Jaundice, Dysentery, Dyspepsia, Flatulency, Breath, Headache, Erysipelas, Piles, Rheumatism, Eruptions and Skin
Diseases, Biliousness, Liver Complaint, Dropsy,
Tetter, Tumors and Salt
Rheum, Worms, Gonorrhea, etc.

Pill, and Purifying the Blood, are the most congenial purgative yet perfected. Their effects abundantly show how much they excel all other pills. They are safe and pleasant to take, but powerful to cure. They purge out the foul humors of the blood; they stimulate the sluggish or disordered organs into action, and they impart health and tone to the whole being. They cure not only the every day complaints of everybody, but formidable and dangerous diseases. Most skillful physicians, most eminent clergymen, and our best citizens, send certificates of cures performed, and of great benefits derived from these Pills.
They are the safest and best physic for children, because mild as well as effectual. Being sugar-coated, they are easy to take, and being purely vegetable, they are entirely harmless.

PREPARED BY

DR. J. C. AYER & Co., Lowell, Mass.

PRACTICAL AND ANALYTICAL CHEMISTS.

Sold by all Druggists and Dealers in Medicines.

PEBBLE SPECTACLES!

MULLER'S OPTICAL DEPOT

135 Montgomery St., nr. Bush,

Opposite Occidental Hotel.

Specialty Thirty-two Years.

COMPOUND ASTIGMATIC LENSES

Mounted to Order. Two Hours Notice.

The most complicated cases of defective vision thoroughly diagnosed, free of charge.

ALLEN, MCGARY & CO.,

IMPORTERS AND WHOLESALE

Liquor Dealers. 322-324 FRONT STREET

SAN FRANCISCO

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free.

Address H. HALLET & Co., Portland, Maine.

$72 A WEEK. $12 a day at home easily made. Costly outfit free. Address TRUE & Co., Augusta, Maine.

RUHL BROTHERS

AGENTS FOR THE PACIFIC COAST

522 Montgomery Street,

SAN FRANCISCO.

EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS.

ZEITSKA INSTITUTE

922 Post Street.

FRENCH, GERMAN AND ENGLISH

Day and Boarding School for young ladies and children. KINDERGARTEN.

The twentieth year of this Institute will commence July 24, 1882. MADAME E. ZEITSKA, Principal.

CALIFORNIA

MILITARY ACADEMY,

AT OAKLAND, CAL.

The Nineteenth Year will begin Monday, July

17, 1882.

REV. DAVID McCURE, Ph. D., Principal.

ASSESSMENTS AND DIVIDENDS.

CALIFORNIA MINING COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 10th day of June, 1882, an assessment (No. 4) of Ten Cents per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, 309 Montgomery Street, Room 23, Nevada
Block, San Francisco, California.
Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the (18th) eighteenth day of July, 1882, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on Wednesday,
the 16th day of August, 1882, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors,
C. P. GORDON, Secretary.

Office—Room 23, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery
Street, San Francisco, California.

DIVIDEND NOTICE—OFFICE OF

the Silver King Mining Company, San Francisco,
July 4, 1882.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors
of the above-named Company held this day, a Dividend
(No. 31) of Twenty-five Cents (25c) per share was declared, payable on Saturday, July 15, 1882, at the office of the Company, Room 19, 328 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California. Transfer books will close July 10, 1882, at 3 P. M. JOSEPH NASH, Sec.

DIVIDEND NOTICE—OFFICE OF

the Standard Consolidated Mining Company, San Francisco, July 1, 1882.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named Company, held this day, Dividend No. 43, of Seventy-five cents per share was declared, payable on Wednesday, July 12, 1882, at the office in this city, or at the Farmers Loan and Trust Company in New York. WM. WILLIS, Secretary.
Office—Room No. 29, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal.

DIVIDEND NOTICE—THE CALI-

FORNIA SAVINGS AND LOAN SOCIETY,
Northwest corner Powell and Eddy Streets. The Board of Directors have declared a dividend to Depositors at the rate of four and thirty-two one-hundredths (4 32-100) per cent.
annum on Term Deposits, and three and sixty one-hundredths
(3 60-100) per cent. annum on Ordinary Deposits, free from Federal Tax, for the half year ending June 30, 1882, payable on and after Monday, July 2, 1882.
VERNON CAMPBELL, Secretary

DIVIDEND NOTICE—THE GER-

man Savings and Loan Society. For the half year ending June 30, 1882, the Board of Directors of the GER-MAN SAVINGS AND LOAN SOCIETY has declared a dividend on Term Deposits at the rate of 4 32-100 per cent. per annum, and on ordinary deposits at the rate of 3 60-100 per cent. per annum, free from Federal Taxes, and payable on and after the 10th day of July, 1882. By order, GEORGE LLETTE, Secretary.

LEGAL NOTICES.

SHERIFF'S SALE.

D. HARNEY, Plaintiff,
vs.
WILLIAM CORCORAN,
et als., Defendants.

Superior Court,
Department No. 3,
No. 6375.

Late 23d District Court.
Order of Sale and Decree
of Lien and Sale.

UNDER AND BY VIRTUE OF AN

Order of Sale and Decree of Lien and Sale, issued out of the Superior Court, Department No. 3, of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on the 17th day of May, A. D. 1882, in the above-entitled action, wherein D. Harney, the above-named plaintiff, obtained a Judgment and Decree of Lien and Sale against Thomas
Kelly, George B. Knowles, A. Himmelman, John B.
Lewis, A. W. Hanna, J. P. Dameron, Aug. Hemme,
John Tucker, William Klump, M. Kedon, John Brickell,
B. O. Devos, M. Kelly, D. Swett, S. F. Sinclair, T. G.
McLeran, J. Agnew, J. Dunne, E. Hogan, John Henry,
M. Hayes, J. O'well, George Clark, L. B. Williams,
Charles Main, B. Kelsey, W. Bosworth, and G. K. Por-
ter, defendants, on the 17th day of April, A. D. 1879, which said Judgment and Decree was, on the 7th day of June, A. D. 1879, recorded in Judgment Book C of said
23d District Court, at page 71, I am commanded to sell all that certain lot, piece, or parcel of land, situate, lying, and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the east line of Valencia Street, distant 130 feet north from the northeast corner of Valencia and Ridley Streets, and running thence north on the east line of Valencia Street 25 feet; thence at right angles east 80 feet;
thence at right angles south 25 feet; thence at right angles
west 80 feet, to the point of beginning.

Public notice is hereby given that on Monday, the 17th
day of July, A. D. 1882, at 12 o'clock, noon, of that day, in front of the Old City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, I will, in obedience to said order of sale and decree of lien and sale, sell the above-described property, or so much thereof as may be necessary to raise sufficient to satisfy said judgment, with interest and costs, etc., to the highest and best bidder, for gold coin of the United States.
San Francisco, June 24, 1882.

JOHN SEDGWICK, Sheriff.

J. M. Wood, Attorney for Plaintiff.

June 24, July 1, 8, 15.

SHERIFF'S SALE.

D. HARNEY, Plaintiff,
vs.,
J. CALLAGHAN, et als.,
Defendants.

Superior Court,
Department No. 3,
No. 6630.

Late 23d District Court.
Order of Sale and Decree
of Lien and Sale.

UNDER AND BY VIRTUE OF AN

Order of Sale and Decree of Lien and Sale, issued out of the Superior Court, Department No. 3, of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on the 27th day of May, A. D. 1882, in the above-entitled action, wherein D. Harney, the above-named plaintiff, obtained a Judgment and Decree of Lien and Sale against George K.
Porter, T. G. McLeran, Jeremiah Callaghan, Daniel Callaghan, B. F. Hilliard, Solon Pattee, W. W. Crane Jr., W.
E. Holcomb, R. McKee, P. McAtee, E. R. Thomson, and
D. Jordan, defendants, on the 4th day of February,
A. D. 1879, which said Judgment and Decree was, on the 25th day of February, A. D. 1879, recorded in Judgment
Book E, of said 23d District Court, at page 764, I am commanded to sell all that certain lot, piece, or parcel of land, situate, lying, and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the northwesterly line of Mission Street, distant 39 feet 5 inches north from the intersection of the east line of West Mission Street with the northwesterly line of Mission Street, and running thence northerly on the northwesterly line of Mission Street 27 feet
and 10 inches; thence at right angles west to the east line of West Mission Street; thence south on the last-mentioned line 27 1/2 feet; thence east in a straight line to the point of beginning.

Public notice is hereby given that on Monday, the 17th
day of July, A. D. 1882, at 12 o'clock, noon, of that day, in front of the Old City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, I will, in obedience to said order of sale
and decree of lien and sale, sell the above-described property, or so much thereof as may be necessary to raise sufficient to satisfy said judgment with interest and costs, etc.,
to the highest and best bidder for gold coin of the United States.
San Francisco, June 24, 1882.

JOHN SEDGWICK, Sheriff.

J. M. Wood, Attorney for Plaintiff.

June 24, July 1, 8, 15.

Department No. 9—Probate.
IN THE SUPERIOR COURT
In and for the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

In the matter of the Estate of
WILLIAM W. JOHNSTON,
Deceased.

NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN, THAT

Monday, the seventeenth day of July, A. D. 1882, at ten o'clock A. M. of said day, and the Court Room of said Court, at the New City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, have been appointed as the time and place for proving the will of said William W. Johnston, deceased, and for hearing the application of Charles G. Johnston for the issuance to him of Letters Testamentary. Dated June 22, A. D. 1882.

DAVID WILDER, Clerk.

By D. H. SCHINDLER, Deputy Clerk.

H. F. CRANE, Attorney for Petitioner.

C. P. SHEFFIELD, N. W. SPAULDING, J. PATTERSON

17 and 19 FREMONT ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

BONESTELL
PAPER WAREHOUSE

411 413 & 415 SANSOME ST. S.F.

Importers of All Kinds of Paper.

San Francisco, Cal., Jan. 1st, 1881.

We take pleasure in presenting this our Semi-Annual Statement.

RESOURCES.

Bank Premises.....$159,000 00
Other Real Estate.....5,325 35
United States Bonds.....626,972 35
Loans on Real Estate.....134,868 00
Loans on bonds, gas, water and bank stock.....132,198 35
Loans on other securities.....577,443 96
Loans on personal security.....1106,004 27
Due from banks and bankers.....392,457 61
Money on hand.....398,669 34

LIABILITIES.

Capital paid up.....$1,000,000 00
Surplus.....460,759 13
Due Depositors.....1,888,655 07
Due Banks and Bankers.....174,370 53
Dividends unpaid.....59 50
$3,523,844 27

R. H. McDonald, President.

NEW ENGLAND
BAKING POWDER

NO Alum
Flour
Starch
Ammonia
Phosphates
Tartaric Acid

Cream Tartar and Bi-Carb. Soda

NOTHING ELSE

Newton Bros. & Co.

SAN FRANCISCO

Arpad Hargatzky & Co.
530 WASHINGTON ST. S. F. CAL.

N. B.—Examine the cork.

LOUIS BRAVERMAN & CO.

(Successors to BRAVERMAN & LEVY.)

Manufacturers of FINE JEWELRY, and Importers of WATCHES, DIAMONDS, and other PRECIOUS STONES, STERLING SILVERWARE, and FRENCH CLOCKS.

Keep the best assortment and sell at LOWER PRICES than any house in this city.

119 MONTGOMERY STREET.

Apollinaris
"THE QUEEN OF TABLE WATERS."

British Medical Journal.

"Tonic, Restorative, and Enlivening."

Dr. Thilenius.

"Exhilarating, good for Loss of Appetite."

Peter Squire, Chemist to the Queen.

ANNUAL SALE, 10 MILLIONS.

Of all Grocers, Druggists, and Mineral Water Dealers.

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

FOR SALE BY RUHL BROTHERS,

522 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal.

HENRY F. MILLER

PIANOS, OF BOSTON,

Are pronounced the BEST by the leading artists of the present time, and are used by them in public and private.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES mailed to any address.

WOODWORTH, SCHELL & CO.,

Sole Agents, 105 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

INSURANCE COMPANY

OF CALIFORNIA.

CAPITAL.....$750,000
ASSETS, DECEMBER 31, 1881.....$1,240,000

D. J. STAPLES, President.

ALPHEUS BULL, Vice-President.

WILLIAM J. DUTTON, Secretary.

E. W. CARPENTER, Asst. Secretary.

AGENTS IN ALL PRINCIPAL LOCALITIES.

E. DETRICK & CO.

Importers, Manufacturers, and Dealers in BAGS AND BURLAPS, all kinds, BAG-TWINES, HYDRAULIC HOSE. Sole Agents for MOUNT VERNON CO.'S DUCK, all widths, Russell Manfg Co.'s COTTON BELTING, Russell Manfg Co.'s SEAMLESS LINEN HOSE. Tower's Celebrated OILED CLOTHING.

TENTS, HAMMOCKS, CAMP COTS, CHAIRS, STOOLS, AND CAMPERS' OUTFITS.

Tents let by the Week or Month. AMERICAN FLAGS, BUNTING.

5, 7 AND 9 CALIFORNIA, AND 108, 110 AND 112 MARKET ST.

J. C. MERRILL & CO.,

Shipping and Commission Merchants

204 and 206 California Street,

SAN FRANCISCO.

The Regular Dispatch Line of Packets to Honolulu, H. I.

S. P. COLLINS & CO.

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL

dealers Old London Dock Brandies, Port Wines, Sherries, and all the choicest brands Champagne, Apple Jack, Pisco, Arrack, Cordials, Liqueurs, etc. 329 MONTGOMERY, and 511 CALIFORNIA STREETS, S. F.

IRA P. RANKIN.

A. P. BRAYTON

PACIFIC IRON WORKS

RANKIN, BRAYTON & CO.,

127 to 132 First Street,

San Francisco.

Mining Machinery of all kinds, Sugar Mills, Engines—both Marine and Stationary, Boilers, etc., etc.

JOHN TAYLOR & CO.

118 and 120 Market Street, and 15 and 17 California Street.

ASSAYERS' MATERIALS, MINE

Mill Supplies; also Druggists Glassware

J. W. EVANS,
29 Post Street, San Francisco.

PRICE REDUCED

FOR

SEATTLE COAL

ALL DEALERS KEEP IT.

MAIN OFFICE:

210 BATTERY STREET,
San Francisco.

DEPOTS:

Beale Street Wharf, San Francisco.
Foster's Wharf - Oakland.

ROEDERER CHAMPAGNE.

NOTICE—THE TRADE AND THE

Public are informed that we receive the Genuine LOUIS ROEDERER CARTE BLANCHE CHAMPAGNE direct from Mr. Louis Roederer, Reims, over his signature and Consular invoice. Each case is marked upon the side, "Macondray & Co., San Francisco," and each bottle bears the label, "Macondray & Co., Sole Agents for the Pacific Coast."

MACONDRA & CO.,
Sole Agents for the Pacific Coast.

WILLIAMS, DIMOND & CO.

SHIPPING AND

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Union Building, Junction Market and Pine Streets, San Francisco.

AGENTS FOR PACIFIC MAIL S. S.

Co.; Pacific Steam Navigation Co.; The Cunard Royal Mail S. S. Co.; The Hawaiian Line; The China Traders' Insurance Co., Limited; The Marine Insurance Co. of London; The Baldwin Locomotive Works; The Glasgow Iron Co.; Nich. Ashton & Son's Salt

CHARLES R. ALLEN

Wholesale and Retail Dealer in

COAL Order for House or Office by Telephone 308.

Agent Pittsburg Coal Mining Company.

118 and 120 Beale Street, S. F.

PAYOT, UPHAM & CO

STATIONERS, BOOKSELLERS,

Commercial Printers.

and Blank Book Manufacturers

204 Sansome Street, near Pine.

TABER, HARKER & Co.,

IMPORTERS AND WHOLESALE

GROCERS, 108 and 110 California St., San Francisco

ART-PAINTED, PLAIN and GLAZED

TILES

For Decorations.

W. W. MONTAGUE & CO.

110 to 118 Battery Street.

CRUSHED INDIAN.

A NEW AND DELICIOUS PREPARATION FROM CORN, FOR BREAKFAST. IT COOKS THOROUGHLY IN A FEW MINUTES.

TRY IT.

For Sale by all GROCERS.

The Argonaut.

VOL. XI. NO. 4.

SAN FRANCISCO, JULY 22, 1882.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

BRET HARTE'S NEW STORY.

"Flip"—A California Romance.

PART II.—CHAPTER III.

For six months the sea fogs monotonously came and went along the Monterey coast; for six months they beleaguered the Coast Range with afternoon sorties of white hosts that regularly swept over the mountain crest, and were as regularly beaten back again by the leveled lances of the morning sun. For six months that white veil that had once hidden Lance Harriott in its folds returned without him. For that amiable outlaw no longer needed disguise or hiding place. The swift wave of pursuit that had dashed him on the summit had fallen back, and the next day was broken and scattered. Before the week had passed, a regular judicial inquiry relieved his crime of premeditation, and showed it to be a rude duel of two armed and equally desperate men. From a secure vantage in a seacoast town, Lance challenged a trial by his peers, and as an already prejudged man escaping from his executioners, obtained a change of venue. Regular justice, seated by the calm Pacific, found the action of an interior, irregular jury rash and hasty. Lance was liberated on bail.

The postmaster at Fisher's Crossing had just received the weekly mail and express from San Francisco, and was engaged in examining it. It consisted of five letters and two parcels. Of these, three of the letters and two parcels were directed to Flip. It was not the first time during the last six months that this extraordinary event had occurred, and the curiosity of the Crossing was duly excited. As Flip had never called personally for the letters or parcels, but had sent one of her wild, irregular scouts or henchmen to bring them, and as she was seldom seen at the Crossing or on the stage road, that curiosity was never satisfied. The disappointment to the postmaster—a man past middle age—partook of a sentimental nature. He looked at the letters and parcels, he looked at his watch; it was yet early; he could return by noon. He again examined the addresses; they were in the same handwriting as the previous letters. His mind was made up; he would deliver them himself. The poetic, soulful side of his mission was delicately indicated by a pale blue necktie, a clean shirt, and a small package of gingernuts, of which inexpensive article Flip was extravagantly fond.

The common road to Fairley's ranch was by stage turnpike to a point below the Gin and Ginger Woods, where the prudent horseman usually left his beast, and followed the intersecting trail afoot. It was here that the postmaster suddenly observed on the edge of the wood the figure of an elegantly-dressed woman. She was walking slowly and apparently at her ease; one hand held her skirts lightly gathered between her gloved fingers, the other slowly swung a riding-whip. Was it a picnic of some people from Monterey or Santa Cruz? The spectacle was novel enough to justify his coming nearer. Suddenly she withdrew into the wood; he lost sight of her; she was gone. He remembered, however, that Flip was still to be seen, and as the steep trail was beginning to tax all his energies, he was fain to hurry forward. The sun was nearly vertical when he turned into the cañon, and saw the hark roof of the cabin beyond. At almost the same moment Flip appeared, flushed and panting, in the road before him.

"You've got something for me," she said, pointing to the parcels and letters. Completely taken by surprise, the postmaster mechanically yielded them up, and as instantly regretted it. "They're paid for," continued Flip, observing his hesitation.

"That's so," stammered the official of the Crossing, seeing his last chance of knowing the contents of the parcels vanish; "but I thought ez they're valooable packages, maybe ye might want to examine them to see they was all right afore ye receipted for them."

"I'll risk it," said Flip, coolly, "and if it ain't right I'll let ye know."

As the girl seemed inclined to retire with her property, the postmaster was driven to other conversation. "We ain't had the pleasure of seeing you down at the Crossing for a month o' Sundays," he began, with airy yet pronounced gallantry. "Some folks let on you was keepin' company with some feller like Bijah Brown, and you were getting a little too set-up for the Crossing." The individual here mentioned being the county butcher, and supposed to exhibit his hopeless affection for Flip by making a long and useless divergence from his weekly route to enter the cañon "for orders," Flip did not deem it necessary to reply. "Then I allowed ez how you might have company," he continued. "I reckon there's some city folks up at the summit. I saw a mighty smart, fash'n'ble gal cavorting round; hed no end o' style and fancy fixin's. That's my kind, I tell you. I just weaken on that sort o' gal," he continued, in the firm belief that he had awakened Flip's jealousy, as he glanced at her well-worn home-spun frock, and found her eyes suddenly fixed on his own.

"Strange I ain't got to see her yet," she replied, coolly, shouldering her parcel, and quite ignoring any sense of obligation to him for his extra-official act.

"But you might get to see her at the edge of the Gin and Ginger Woods," he persisted, feebly, in a last effort to detain her, "if you'll take a passer there with me."

Flip's only response was to walk on toward the cabin, whence, with a vague complimentary suggestion of "drippin' in to pass the time o' day" with her father, the postmaster meekly followed.

The paternal Fairley, once convinced that his daughter's new companion required no pecuniary or material assistance from his hands, relaxed to the extent of entering into a querulous confidence with him, during which Flip took the opportunity of slipping away. As Fairley had that infelicitous tendency of most weak natures to unconsciously exaggerate unimportant details in their talk, the postmaster presently became convinced that the butcher was a constant and assiduous suitor of Flip's. The absurdity of his sending parcels and letters by post when he might bring them himself did not strike the official. On the contrary, he believed it to be a masterstroke of cunning. Fired by jealousy and Flip's indifference, he "deemed it his duty"—using that facile form of cowardly offensiveness—to betray Flip.

Of which she was happily oblivious. Once away from the cabin, she plunged into the woods with the parcel swung behind her like a knapsack. Leaving the trail, she presently struck off in a straight line through cover and underbrush with the unerring instinct of an animal, climbing hand over hand the steepest ascent, or fluttering like a bird from branch to branch down the deepest declivity. She soon reached that part of the trail where the susceptible postmaster had seen the fascinating unknown. Assuring herself that she was not followed, she crept through the thicket until she reached the little waterfall and basin that had served the fugitive Lance for a bath. The spot bore signs of later and more frequent occupancy, and when Flip carefully removed some bark and brushwood from a cavity in the rock, and drew forth various folded garments, it was evident she had used it as a sylvan dressing-room. Here she opened the parcel. It contained a small and delicate shawl of yellow China crepe. Flip instantly threw it over her shoulders, and stepped hurriedly toward the edge of the wood. Then she began to pass backward and forward before the trunk of a tree. At first nothing was visible on the tree, but a closer inspection showed a large pane of ordinary window-glass stuck in the fork of the branches. It was placed at such a cunning angle against the darkness of the forest opening that it made a soft and mysterious mirror, not unlike a Claude Lorraine glass, wherein not only the passing figure of the young girl was seen, but the dazzling green and gold of the hillside, and the far-off silhouetted crests of the Coast Range.

But this was evidently only a prelude to a severer rehearsal.

When she returned to the waterfall she unearthed from her stores a large piece of yellow soap and some yards of rough cotton "sheeting." These she deposited beside the basin, and again crept to the edge of the wood to assure herself that she was alone. Satisfied that no intruding foot had invaded that virgin hower, she returned to her bath, and began to undress. A slight wind followed her, and seemed to whisper to the circumjacent trees. It appeared to waken her sister naiads and nymphs, who, joining their leafy fingers, softly drew around her a gently moving hand of trembling lights and shadows, of flecked sprays, and inextricably mingled branches, and involved her in a chaste sylvan obscurity, veiled alike from pursuing god or stumbling shepherd. Within these hallowed precincts was the musical ripple of laughter and falling water, and at times the glimpse of a lithe, hrier-caught limh, or a ray of sunlight trembling over bright flanks or the white, austere outline of a childish bosom.

When she drew again the leafy curtain, and once more stepped out of the wood, she was completely transformed. It was the figure that had appeared to the postmaster; the slight, erect, graceful form of a young woman modestly attired. It was Flip, but Flip made taller by the lengthened skirt and clinging habiliments of fashion. Flip freckled, but through the cunning of a relief of yellow color in her gown, her piquant brown-shot face and eyes brightened and intensified until she seemed like a spicy odor made visible. I can not affirm that the judgment of Flip's mysterious modiste was infallible, or that the taste of Mr. Lance Harriott, her patron, was fastidious; enough that it was picturesque, and perhaps not more glaring and extravagant than the color in which Spring herself had once clothed the sere hillside where Flip was now seated. The phantom mirror in the tree-fork caught and held her with the sky, the green leaves, the sunlight, and all the graciousness of her surroundings, and the wind gently tossed her hair and the gay ribbons of her gypsy hat.

Suddenly she started. Some remote sound in the trail below, inaudible to any ear less fine than hers, arrested her breathing. She rose swiftly, and darted into cover.

Ten minutes passed. The sun was declining; the white fog was beginning to creep over the coast range. From the edge of the wood Cinderella appeared, disenchanted, and in her homespun garments. The clock had struck—the spell was past. As she disappeared down the trail even the magic mirror, moved by the wind, slipped from the tree top to the ground, and became a piece of common glass.

CHAPTER IV.

The events of the day had produced a remarkable impression on the facial aspect of the charcoal-burning Fairley. Extraordinary processes of thought, indicated by repeated rubbing of his forehead, had produced a high light in the middle and a corresponding deepening of shadow at the sides, until it bore the appearance of a perfect sphere. It was this forehead that confronted Flip reproachfully as became a deceived comrade, menacingly as became an outraged parent in the presence of a third party and—a postmaster!

"Fine doin's this! Yer receivin' clandestine bundles and letters, eh?" he began. Flip sent one swift, withering look of contempt at the postmaster, who at once becoming invertebrate and groveling, mumbled that he must "get on" to the Crossing, and rose to go. But the old man, who had counted on his presence for moral support, and was clearly beginning to hate him for precipitating this scene with his daughter, whom he feared, violently protested.

"Sit down, can't ye? Don't you see you're a witness?" he screamed, hysterically.

It was a fatal suggestion. "Witness?" repeated Flip, scornfully.

"Yes, a witness! He gave ye letters and hundles."

"Weren't they directed to me?" asked Flip.

"Yes," said the postmaster, hesitatingly; "in course, yes."

"Do you lay claim to them?" she asked, turning to her father.

"No," responded the old man.

"Do you?" sharply, to the postmaster.

"No," he replied.

"Then," said Flip, coolly, "if you are not claimin' 'em for yourself, and you hear father say they ain't his, I reckon the less you have to say about 'em the better."

"Thar's suthin' in that," said the old man, shamelessly abandoning the postmaster.

"Then why don't she say who sent 'em, and what they are like," said the postmaster, "if there's nothin' in it?"

"Yes," echoed dad. "Flip, why don't you say?"

Without answering the direct question, Flip turned upon her father.

"Maybe you forget how you used to row and tear round here because tramps and such like came to the ranch for suthin', and I gave it to 'em? Maybe you'll quit tearin' round and lettin' yourself be made a fool of now by that man, just because one of them tramps gets up and sends us some presents back in return?"

"'Twasn't me, Flip," said the old man, deprecatingly, but glaring at the astonished postmaster. "'Twasn't my doin'. I allus said if you cast your bread on the waters it would come back to you by return mail. The fact is, the gov'ment is gettin' too high-handed! Some o' these bloated officials had better climb down before next leckshen."

"Maybe," continued Flip to her father, without looking at their discomfited visitor, "ye'd better find out whether one of them officials comes up to this yer ranch to steal away a gal about my own size, or to get points about diamond-making; I reckon he don't travel round to find out who writes all the letters that go through the postoffice."

The postmaster had seemingly miscalculated the old man's infirm temper, and the daughter's skillful use of it. He was unprepared for Flip's boldness and audacity, and when he saw that both barrels of the accusation had taken effect on the charcoal-burner, who was rising with epileptic rage, he fairly turned and fled. The old man would have followed him with oburgation beyond the door but for the restraining hand of Flip.

Baffled and beaten, nevertheless Fate was not wholly unkind to the retreating suitor. Near the Gin and Ginger Woods he picked up a letter which had fallen from Flip's pocket. He recognized the writing, and did not scruple to read it. It was not a love epistle—at least not such a one as he would have written; it did not give the address nor the name of the correspondent; but he read the following with greedy eyes:

"Perhaps it's just as well that you don't rig yourself out for the benefit of those dead-heats at the Crossing, or any tramp that might hang round the ranch. Keep all your style for me when I come. I can't tell you when—it's mighty uncertain before the rainy season. But I'm coming soon. Don't go back on your promise about lettin' up on the tramps, and being a little more high-toned. And don't you give 'em so much. It's true I sent you hats twice. I clean forgot all about the first; but I wouldn't have given a ten-dollar hat to a nigger woman who had a sick baby because I had an extra hat. I'd have let that baby slide. I forgot to ask whether the skirt is worn separately; I must see that dress-making sharp about it; but I think you'll want something on beside a jacket and skirt; at least it looks like it up here. I don't think you could manage a piano down there without the old man knowin' it, and raisin' the devil generally. I promised you I'd let up on him. Mind you keep all your promises to me. I'm glad you're gettin' on with the six-shooter; tin-cans are good at fifteen yards, but try it on suthin' that moves! I forgot to say that I am on the track of your big brother. It's a three-years-old track, and he was in Arizona. The friend who told me didn't expatiate much on what he did there, but I reckon they had a high old time. If he's above the earth I'll find out bet. The Verba Buena and the Southern right—they smelt like you. Say, Flip, do you remember the last—the very last—thing that happened when you said 'Good-bye,' on the trail? Don't let me ever find out that you've let anybody else kiss you —"

DINING AT DELMONICO'S.

Our Correspondent Describes its Inmates on a Hot Summer Night.

But here the virtuous indignation of the postmaster found vent in an oath. He threw the letter away. He retained of it only two facts—Flip had a brother who was missing; she had a lover who was present in the flesh.

How much of the substance of this and previous letters Flip had confided to her father I can not say. If she suppressed anything, it was probably that which affected Lance's secret alone, and it was doubtful how much of that she herself knew. In her own affairs she was frank without being communicative, and never lost her shy obstinacy even with her father. Governing the old man as completely as she did, she appeared most embarrassed when she was most dominant; she had her own way without lifting her voice or her eyes; she seemed oppressed by mauvaise honte when she was most triumphant; she would end a discussion with a shy murmur addressed to herself, or a single gesture of self-consciousness.

The disclosure of her strange relations with an unknown man, and the exchange of presents and confidences, seemed to suddenly awaken Fairley to a vague and uneasy sense of some unfulfilled duties as a parent. The first effect of this on his weak nature was a peevish antagonism to the cause of it. He had long, fretful monologues on the vanity of diamond-making, if accompanied with "pestering" by "interlopers"; on the wickedness of concealment and conspiracy, and their effects on charcoal-burning; on the nurturing of spies and "adders" in the family circles, and on the seditiousness of dark and mysterious councils in which a gray-haired father was left out. It was true that a word or look from Flip generally brought these monologues to an inglorious and abrupt termination, but they were none the less luxurious as long as they lasted. In time they were succeeded by an affectation of contrite apology and self-deprecation. "Don't go out o' the way to ask the old man," he would say, referring to the quantity of hacon to be ordered; "it's nat'ral a young gal should have her own advisers." The state of the flour-barrel would also produce a like self-abasement. "Unless ye're already in correspondence about more flour, ye might take the opinion o' the first tramp ye meet ez whether Santa Cruz Mills is a good brand, hut don't ask the old man." If Flip was in conversation with the butcher, Fairley would obtrusively retire with the hope "he wasn't intrudin' on their secrets."

These phases of her father's weakness were not frequent enough to excite her alarm, but she could not help noticing they were accompanied with a seriousness unusual to him. He began to be tremulously watchful of her, returning often from work at an earlier hour, and lingering by the cabin in the morning. He brought absurd and useless presents for her, and presented them with a nervous anxiety poorly concealed by an assumption of careless, paternal generosity. "Suthin' I picked up at the Crossing for ye to-day," he would say, airily, and retire to watch the effect of a pair of shoes two sizes too large, or a fur cap in September. He would have hired a cheap parlor organ for her but for the apparently unexpected revelation that she couldn't play. He had received the news of a clue to his long-lost son without emotion, but lately he seemed to look upon it as a foregone conclusion, and one that necessarily solved the question of companionship for Flip. "In course, when you've got your own flesb and blood with ye, ye can't go foolin' around with strangers."

These autumnal blossoms of affection, I fear, came too late for any effect upon Flip, precociously matured by her father's indifference and selfishness. But she was good-bumored, and seeing him seriously concerned, gave him more of her time, even visited him in the sacred seclusion of the "diamond-pit," and listened with far-off eyes to his fitful indictment of all things outside his grimy laboratory. Much of this patient indifference came with a capricious change in her own habits. She no longer indulged in the rehearsal of dress. She packed away her most treasured garments, and her leafy boudoir knew her no more. She sometimes walked on the hillside, and often followed the trail which she had taken with Lance when she led him from the rancho. She once or twice extended her walk to the spot where she had parted from him, and as often came slyly away, her eyes downcast, and her face warm with color. Perhaps because these experiences, and some mysterious instinct of maturing womanhood, had left a story in her eyes, which her two adorers, the postmaster and the butcher, read with passion, she became famous without knowing it. Extravagant stories of her fascinations brought strangers into the valley. The effect upon her father may be imagined. Lance could not have desired a more effective guardian than he proved to be in this emergency. Those who had been told of this hidden pearl were surprised to find it so jealously protected.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

The Harvard Advocate insinuates that Cambridge girls have procured catalogues of the University, and check off eligible young men, with their "probable financial chances." Here are examples: "Brown, Delancey Fitz-Hugo; a lovely fellow—lives in Brooklyn; goes in the best society; up on art, science, and pedigree; besides, is an only son, with a prospective three hundred thousand dollars." "Simpkins, Follanshee De Jones, Matthews Hall; very good form in dress and manners; can give points to Dolly Brown on religion, stamps, and looks—a much better catch; reputed to be an orphan with five hundred thousand dollars, and in poor health," etc.

"What will your wife wear at the ball, Governor?" said the millinery man of a "society" paper to one of our ex-governors recently, at a fashionable Eastern watering-place. "My wife is not going to the ball, sir." "Impossible, Governor. I have telegraphed her name to my paper as among the guests. Now, (appealingly,) what would your wife wear if she was going?" "Sir," replied the ex-governor, in his austere manner, as he turned on his heel, "since you have sent my wife to the ball, dress her yourself." And sure enough there was an elaborate "toilet" described next morning.

New York is an odd sort of place in summer. It is deceptive. It puts on an appearance of death and desolation that impresses strangers forcibly. Just now it is beginning to assume this dreadful air of decay, and people are turning up their eyes, and saying that the city isn't fit for a hermit's abode, and is as dull as a desert plain. Every one is seen in the act of rushing violently out of town, hut no one is seen in the act of returning. Fifth Avenue is deserted. The windows are all blank stretches of the horrible green muslin lately come into vogue, and the doors are concealed behind the solid board casings that fit into the arches. Nowhere is life visible. In the morning grooms may be seen taking victorias, carts, landaus, and broughams, all swathed in linen covers, toward the various railway and steamboat termini; but in the afternoon nothing is to be seen but the lumbering stages and a few outré conveyances. No one will walk on Fifth Avenue, though it is a pleasant stroll, because it isn't proper, though no end of people walk on Madison Avenue, a single block to the east. But there is an astounding change in the appearance of the city at night. Then you look over the audiences of any of the five theatres now running, and there are no end of good people, while in the concert halls sit numberless gentlemen of high social position; and there are lots of billiards and suppers going on at the clubs. Then look in at the Brunswick, and the tight-waisted, tight-trousered, and light-moustached fraternity is almost as largely represented as on an opera night in the season.

Go across the street to Delmonico's, and behold the æsthetic and well-behaved Mr. A. Weber, sitting in the west corner of the café with his legs on the back of a chair, displaying a liberal complement of red hose, while the head-waiter stares at him fixedly, and the gentlemen at the other tables stick the single glass in the refractory eye, and attempt to wither him at a glance. But he is not to be withered, because his papa left him a lot of money gained by making pianos and centennial awards, and Mr. Weber believes that his money is as good as other people's money. His money doubtless is, but his manners are certainly not.

In another corner sits John T. Raymond. I believe that if Raymond should be stricken deaf and dumb, and come to New York, he could make a profitable season by just appearing on the stage and holding up a handful of trade-dollars. His popularity is unbounded. He is supposed to be at Long Branch, but spends most of his nights at Delmonico's, working assiduously with his trade-dollars. He matches the coins all the time, everywhere, and with every one. He talks constantly on two subjects: his bahy, and his losses at matching dollars. At another table can be seen a little group of actors who patronize Delmonico's faithfully: Osmond Tearle, Gerald and Gilbert Eyre, (Mr. Kerr, as he always calls himself,) and Mr. Lester Wallack, sit and drink porter, and talk English lingo. Mr. Wallack's face and neck show his sixty odd years, hut he still looks comparatively young, and I must admit that he is far ahead of any other American in wearing the single glass. He has been known to eat soup a number of times without dropping the glass once. They are often joined by a fat little round-shouldered man whose head is perfectly bald, who wears a thick moustache, and has eyes that are perpetually sleepy. He is Charley Delmonico, the only living member of the great firm of caterers. He superintends the up-town place himself, and has responsible stewards for his three down-town places. His fortune is estimated at three million dollars.

At another table sits a very slight youth of low stature, who wears women's shoes and gloves, and dresses in the very extreme of fashion. His hair is carefully banged, and his moustache is curled, and he talks Angloism quite well for an American. I don't know whether he has ever been heard of in San Francisco or not, hut he made a great stir here by starting the Rockaway Hunt in opposition to the Queen's County Hunt a year or two ago. He had just returned from England, and desired to institute fox-hunting in better style than the Queen's County Club did it. He failed. His name is John W. Cheever, and he waltzes quite well, when he is not carried off his feet by too big a partner, as was the case when he danced with Miss Youmans at the Patriarchs' ball last winter. He usually sits alone, sipping brandy-and-soda, when in the café, hut is occasionally joined by others of his set, who talk languidly. His one unhappiness is that his father is in business—rubber-cushioned axles, or something of that sort. The old gentleman evidently regards his son in the light of a sort of agreeable curiosity. He gives him all the money he can spend, and then amuses himself by watching the son's efforts to appear English and aristocratic.

At another table sits a gentleman, also undersized, whose face, despite its ruddy color and brown moustache, has a slightly Hebraic cast. It is Mr. August Belmont Jr., who has just returned from wintering on the Nile with his bride, formerly the beautiful Bessie Morgan. He is, to a certain extent, the leader of the present Anglomaniac craze, and enjoys considerable popularity. He is older than he looks, and has a quiet but excessively snobbish manner. He has a habit of sticking his glass in his eye, and staring at a stranger for ten minutes with the utmost insolence. We are waiting for him to tackle some Western genius, who will retaliate with true Western vim some time.

Another man always to be found at Delmonico's is Morrison. I never heard his first name. He is tall and very finely built, and wears glasses. I first saw him on the night of the French Cooks' ball last winter, at the Academy of Music. It was a dreadfully wild ball. I couldn't get my head out of bed till five o'clock the next afternoon. It was quite late in the morning, and things were rapidly getting beyond the limits on the floor, when a tall and finely built fellow came up, and snatching a "lady" from my side whirled her into a set. She protested that she wouldn't dance any more, and tried to get back to me. For a moment he insisted on her dancing, but she was firm, and then he seemed suddenly to see me, and brought her hastily back, apologizing earnestly to her, and saying he thought her unaccompanied. She slipped down beside me, and he was extremely polite in trying to excuse what he termed an outrage. The whole transaction had seemed to me rather an interesting incident, and I said: "That's all right, m' dear fell," and we exchanged cards. Later he came back, and asked me if I could spare my partner for a dance. I was, to tell the truth, only too glad to get rid of her, and insisted on her going. Then I looked a long time for my crush hat, and finding it on my head, I made a halt for the supper-room, where a lot of my old college classmates were having a stag party and service of song. In the course of time, we slunk across the street to Huger's and had it out there. When we came back, Morrison returned my partner, and was as profuse as myself in thanks, for it seemed that each had done the other a favor, and we adjourned together to supper. I talked with him, and found that he was an American who had just returned from England that morning on the steamer Britannic. He knew almost no one, and said that he was going to put up at the Lambs Club, of which he had been elected a member before he went abroad, ten years ago. I tell you all this to show you what a clever, polite, and well-educated man can do in New York society; for, although he knew no one there, he is now, less than eight months later, one of the best known men about town in New York. His popularity is solely the result of polish and good nature. He knows nearly every one at Delmonico's. Whether he met many of them as he did me, is more than I can say; but he certainly knows a great many people, but—no ladies. He is not to be found where women are. It takes something more than good fellowship to get into society here, though the majority of society men are not good fellows.

Another habitué of Delmonico's is Mr. Freddy Gebhard, whose intense Anglism I have twice noticed in the Argonaut. I mention him again because some one has made a deep and astounding sensation by stating that there used to be a l on the end of his name. Gebhardt! Gracious! In the same group that includes him may usually be found Gould Redmond, Fred Rhinelander, Frederic Stevens, J. Grey Griswold, etc., etc. In fact, the young society men all cling together. Their manners are very bad. I use "manners" in its broad sense. The café is the favorite lounging place, too, of some of the better class of politicians, though the big political lights remain in private apartments in the Fifth Avenue Hotel.

Another habitué is a man about thirty-five years old, who has a long and crooked neck, and a prominent nose. He is rather awkward, and carries himself loosely. His heavy moustache is not worn with any style, and he dresses plainly. His skin is very dark and sunburned. It is Nathaniel L. Tiehlin, editor of the Hour, a weekly paper devoted to society and politics. He was the private secretary of Don Carlos during the pretender's struggle with the king, and knows all Europe. He speaks many languages, and moves freely among the foreign element in New York. He is the "N. L. T." who writes the weekly two-column review, "What is Going On in Europe," in the Sun, and he occasionally does papers for the magazines on European politics. He is not popular with society men—which is, after all, a good deal to his credit. The Hour is his bobby. He has not made much of a success of it, however; it is too heavy for the taste of New Yorkers.

Nearly opposite the Broadway entrance to the café are four or five tables that are tacitly given up to a certain class of customers. The section is vulgarly called "The New Jerusalem." Mr. Seligman, the hanker, sits there a great deal, talking with various other gentlemen (whose noses are eloquent indicators of their race) about "monys." So as I said, New York is not deserted nights, though it looks so in the day-time. The truth is that New Yorkers find more fun in New York than anywhere else, even during the "heated term." They may go down with their families to Newport or Long Branch, but they don't stay long. They come back to see "the boys" whenever they can get away.

The season opened at Newport with two very important weddings—something that never occurred before. The season at a watering-place should open with acquaintance, proceed through flirtation, and end in engagement with the wedding in the spring. The most important of Newport's two weddings was that of Miss Maud Ledyard and Mr. Frederick Newbold. It was a very elegant affair. Miss Ledyard is a pronounced beauty, and divides the honor with three or four others of being the prettiest girl in New York. She is the only daughter of the late Mr. Henry Ledyard, descendant of Chancellor Livingston, and formerly Minister of the United States to France. He was president of the Redwood Club, and one of the most popular elderly men in New York society. He married a daughter of Lewis Cass, but I forgot which one it was. The wedding was celebrated at Mrs. Ledyard's villa, at five o'clock last Thursday afternoon. The groom is not very popular. The Newbolds and the Newboulds have been so long muddled up and tangled up, and belligerent, that society has to a certain extent been drawn into their quarrels, and it has reacted upon the younger members of the families, and taken away a large part of their popularity. The groom's best man was Mr. James H. Jones, of New York. Among the guests were Mr. and Mrs. George Bancroft, which is considered of importance, as the aged historian goes out very little now, and only when compelled by a strong motive. The motive in this case was his admiration for Lewis Cass, who was on of the greatest men this country ever produced. All of the Astor family, the Stuyvesants, the Rhinelanders, and indeed the best people of New York were there.

The other wedding occurred on the same day. Miss Nellie Hazard, who has been known for two seasons as the Newport beauty, was married to Paymaster I. Goodwin Hobbs. She is the daughter of the late Lewis L. Hazard, and he, despite his somewhat disheartening name, is one of the most popular men in the navy. The wedding was attended by an immense number of army and navy celebrities, who wore their full-dress uniforms, and helped to make the wedding brilliant and picturesque. Still I must object to people marrying at the beginning of the season, because it leaves nothing to look forward to—except—er—of course some scandal.

FLANEUR.

NEW YORK, July 15, 1882.

Some great Dutch capitalists are going to reclaim Zuyder Zee. The dykes will be stupendous.

ECHOES FROM EVERYWHERE.

"It is a pity," said Goethe, "that there should be so many echoes in this world, and so few voices." It is indeed a pity. How many of us are only Echoes! I am an Echo. Yet I wish I were a Voice. I have at least the consciousness of my defect. Yet many of the most perfect Echoes I have ever known go through life thinking they are Voices.

I am not original. I wish I were. Sometimes I think I say a good thing. But on reflection I nearly always find that some one has said it before me—frequently some centuries before me. Literature, some writer has remarked, is merely a continual pouring from large vessels into smaller ones.

All this is merely introductory to the fact that I have written some lines. I thus disarm accusation and criticism by admitting that I am an Echo. Before you finish you will know whom I have echoed. And I have echoed thus:

O'er the hills of San Francisco boomed the thunder of the guns,
In the streets of San Francisco paused her many toiling sons.

But they smiled, and shrugged their shoulders, saying, after the report:
"It's the regulars a-shootin' out beyond there at the fort."

Why thus smiled the San Franciscans? Why thus mocked they at the noise
Made by engines of destruction worked by Uncle Samuel's boys?

Ah, they knew those gentle cannon never could a creature kill,
For the warriors who worked them never even hit the hill.

Fair the hill of Saucelito, towering grandly o'er the seas,
Facing forts that frown with cannon, kissed by the Pacific breeze.

Yet the hill of Saucelito bears no trace of cannon-scar,
Never seam or gash from shrapnel does its fair proportions mar.

Whither go then all the missiles hurtling, howling, through the air?
Who can tell? They're hapless foundlings—bullets billeted nowhere.

O'er the hills of San Francisco booms the thunder of the guns,
But the night broods o'er the city, wrapped in slumber are her sons.

O'er the Bay of San Francisco spit the cannon sheets of flame,
And they rip and tear the darkness out through which the gunners aim.

Yet the dull reverberation rumbles weirdly on my ear,
And I tremble while I listen, nothing knowing why I fear.

Yes, of such the human heart is, feeling things it does not know,
Though the scientific gray-beards ever claim it is not so.

Still is heard the sullen cannon, with their dull sepulchral boom,
Still flash forth the unsubstantial sheets of fire through the gloom.

But what men are these that work them? that stand toiling at the guns?
They are clad in hose and doublet—these must be Hispania's sons!

In the background an hidalgo, wizened, spindle-shanked, and lean,
Resting upon a rusty rapier, overlooks the busy scene.

Don Joaquin de Arrillaga from the glimpses of the moon
Is returned to the Presidio, with a shadowy platoon.

Queer and quaint these ghostly warriors, clad in leathern jerkins art—
Compañías de cuera—sombre fellows, grim and tall.

Curiously shaped mustachios twine around their lantern jaws,
And they swirl them while they listen, as their leader bids them pause.

"Hark ye, men," speaks Arrillaga, "now you have the range aright,
We will show these paltry fellows how the Spaniards used to fight."

Even though the brazen cannon that we once were wont to fire
Have been melted down ignobly, for some base shopkeeper's hire,

Still with their own clumsy pieces we will fire on yonder fort,
And by blessed Saint Francisco its existence shall be short.

Compañeros! To you pieces! The Castilian skill display!
Shame these dull Americans! For Dios y por el Rey!

Dully boomed the ghost-worked cannon, crashed the balls through brick and stone,
Fell the fortress into ruins—Alcatraz was overthrown.

O'er the hills of San Francisco boomed the thunder of the guns,
And up started from their pillows many of her slumbering sons.

I am of them—I have slumbered—but to me it scarce can seem
That Joaquin de Arrillaga was the creature of a dream.

Yet I mutter, turning over for a morning slumber short,
"Tis the soldiers—they are firing out beyond there at the Fort."

O'er the hills of San Francisco booms the thunder of the guns;
O'er the hills of Saucelito hurtle cannon-balls by tons.

Yet the gunners hear an echo to the cannons' rumbling tones,
When they miss—as they do always—Joaquin Arrillaga groans.

Now whom have I echoed? Bret Harte, you reply. Still, he idea is mine, suggested by the bad shooting done by the regulars stationed here, in their artillery practice, and by the further fact that Don Joaquin de Arrillaga was governor here a hundred years ago. Yet, you say, Bret Harte originated all this legendary Spanish lore. So he did. And I am only an Echo.

But after all is it not rather hard that Harte should own the whole of California, considered as literary material? How many people have laid down their pens in despair, when writing something distinctively Californian, convinced that they would be accused of "imitating Bret Harte." And probably they would be justly so accused. We are all of us Echoes.

Harte himself is an Echo. The methods of Dickens are apparent on every page he writes. And as Charles Reade is probably the most skillful English delineator of the subtleties of womankind, Harte has adopted his methods in that respect. And in construction he is a careful student of Wilkie Collins, who is the Master of the Unforeseen.

But, as I have said, Harte is the owner of literary California. Staked all over it are notices reading like this:

NOTICE TO PROSPECTORS.

The undersigned claims the following leads:
50,000,000 feet in the Large-Hearted Red-Shirt.
2,000,000 feet in the Velvet-Eyed Señorita.
500,000 feet in the Courtly Mexican Don.
100,000,000 feet in the Impulsive Child of Nature ("M'liss," "Flip," etc.)
50,000,000 feet in the Profane Stage-Driver.
10,000,000 feet in the By-Gad, Sah.
1,000,000,000 feet in the Spanish Days of California.
20,000,000 feet in the Romantic Gambler.
5,000,000 feet in the Sentimental Prostitute.

Prospectors are notified that the undersigned is the owner of the foregoing leads or lodes, with all the dicos, spurs, angles, and sinuosities thereof, and that he intends to work them within the time required by the laws of this mining district.

BRET HARTE.

Last Monday evening I went to see the Hanlons in their "Parisian absurdity" entitled "Le Voyage en Suisse." It is certainly an absurdity—how Parisian it is I do not know. But it is not to be wondered at that it ran a long time in Paris, for the Parisians are but overgrown children after all. "Your majesty," quoth Savary, Duc de Rovigo, to Napoleon, "your majesty, there is much discontent among the Parisians at present. They are murmuring against the government."

"Murmuring, are they?" replied the Emperor; "in that case gild the dome of the Invalides."

The gigantic dome was gilded, and contentment reigned once more.

Yes, in Paris, at the Folies-Bergères, where you can drink and smoke, and where many of the ladies wear the golden grille, "Le Voyage en Suisse" may be endurable. At the Baldwin, where you can not smoke, must go out to drink, and where the ladies are like Caesar's wife, "Le Voyage en Suisse" is wearisome. True, the tumbling is funny, the tricks are well done, and the machinery works perfectly, but the play is plotless, the action drags, the dialogue is insufferably dull, and the jokes timeworn.

Still, as I said, it pleased the Parisians, and I think it will please a great many others. There is a certain order of mind to which it will prove irresistibly attractive. I have seen children with beards.

Two of the performers were, to my thinking, better than any one of the Hanlons. The one was set down as Wyatt on the bill, and played the part of a French professor. The other was left off the bill, through some oversight apparently, and took off a waiter to perfection. Both were irresistibly droll. I could not help but pity the little woman who played "Juliette," the leading part. The "playwright" has given her a line about once in twenty minutes, and she was obliged all the rest of the time to counterfeit interest in the action by means of that facial play which must become so tiresome.

Apropos. When I quitted the theatre there was an indignation meeting of scribes without. The critics of the dailies had not been allowed to enter without putting up coin of the realm. While their indignation was somewhat comic, it was none the less rather ominous for the management. The newspapers can get along without the theatres. But the theatres can not get along without the newspapers.

It is true that some newspapers are disposed to abuse the "deadhead" privilege. It is generally the proprietors, and not the critics. For instance, Mr. MacCrellish, of the Alta, used to demand whole rows of seats for the use of his friends. Mr. Mike DeYoung, too, of the Chronicle, has always been afflicted with a morbid taste for boxes. This is, of course, annoying, but it does not justify the managers in refusing admission to the scribes. It does not justify them on pure, cold, business principles, I mean. For the theatrical scribe can, by his silence or his condemnation, do more harm to an engagement than the cost of a dozen rows of seats.

Matters are generally complicated, too, by the induction of some gnat-brained boor or other into the box-office or at the door, who will set the scribes upon their ear, and get the public's back up by his stupidity or his insolence—it matters not which.

The ruin of the Montaldo engagement was largely due to an incompetent impertinent in the box-office the first ("Norma") night.

I am frequently tempted to think that some of the editorial offices in this country are recruited from idiot asylums. This remark is general, but its special application is on this wise. The Argonaut has the habit of frequently resurrecting things which are old but good. This is particularly so in the poetry line, and many a familiar yet forgotten piece of verse has appeared in its columns under the heading of "Old Favorites." So far, so good. But various journals will copy these poems, credit them to the Argonaut, and then the verses will go around until some editorial idiot, fancying the Argonaut is edited by fellow-idiot, will fatuously accuse it of stealing. The latest case of this is in a recent number of the Philadelphia Press, where a legal idiot writes to the editorial idiot accusing the Argonaut of "stealing and mutilating" a poem entitled "A Lawyer's Invocation to Spring." Inasmuch as the poem, which is by H. H. Brownell, appeared in Punch as long ago as 1851, and has been in nearly every collection of verse published since, it might be supposed that even the editor of the Philadelphia Press would know it, and that he might so flatter the editors of the Argonaut as to think they did too.

Here is another case: Some months ago the Argonaut republished one of Fitz-Hugh Ludlow's most charming stories—"Regular Habits." A Cleveland paper immediately reprinted it, with the credit, "Fitz-Hugh Ludlow in the San Francisco Argonaut." Ludlow died twelve years ago.

I picked up at a watering-place the other day half of a Massachusetts paper, the name of which I have forgotten. I was amused to find in it "An Invisible Demon," (which appeared in this paper some weeks ago,) thus credited:

"Fitz-James O'Brien in the San Francisco Argonaut." Poor O'Brien! He fell in battle early in the war. His body has lain in the grave for over twenty years.

But the worst case I ever heard of was when a St. Louis paper reprinted that well-known ballad, "The Friar of Orders Gray," and credited it: "Thomas Percy in the San Francisco Argonaut." I expected that the much-enduring poetry editor of this journal would have a fit. He gnashed his teeth and howled:

"Blank St. Louis editors! Percy died in 1811, and they don't know it yet!"

I heard a story last week in which occurred the most sublime piece of cheek that ever mortal man was guilty of. I am an admirer of great things, and even of some lesser ones when, like cheek, they reach sublimity. And this instance was certainly sublime.

I will premise by remarking that the hero of the story possesses the most extraordinary, the most colossal, the most adamant cheek known to the history of the world. He would have asked the fourteenth Louis who the Man in the Iron Mask was. He would have asked Frederick Barbarossa why he didn't cut his hair. And yet he does not know that he is cheeky, and his cheek is so naive that he is a charming fellow withal.

Well Juron (let us call him so) was on the staff of an evening paper, and was sent to an interior city to report an execution. When he arrived there he found, to his great chagrin, that the unfortunate culprit was to shuffle on the hangman's coil at exactly two o'clock. This would be just too late for Juron's paper, while all the others would have it the next day.

Most men would have felt that there was nothing to be done. Not so Juron. He rose with the occasion. He soared, if I may so speak, to the Alpine heights of Cheekdom, where everything is frozen.

He repaired to the sheriff. He was quite affable with this official. He kindly but firmly impressed upon his mind how much more important it was that the murderer's convenience should be consulted. He wanted the hanging expedited.

"But," said the sheriff, "it is quite possible that the man himself may have some feeling in the matter. Perhaps he doesn't want to die until two o'clock."

"If he doesn't," quickly replied Juron, "it would merely be the natural weakness of one in the shadow of death. But he does want to die. I shall go and see him. He must die!" muttered Juron, gloomily.

He went to see him. What happened within the sombre cell will never be known. Whether Juron simply asked it as a personal favor; whether the murderer considered death preferable to imprisonment; whether Juron so embittered his last hours by reading him the Evening Boast as to render death a happy release—none of these things will ever be known. Suffice it to say, the murderer sent a message to the sheriff, and was hanged at twelve o'clock.

The Evening Boast of that date contained a charming and gracefully written account of the affair. It was headed "A Necktie Party."

Zulana has returned from the country. I am overjoyed I have expatiated at great length to her on the cheerlessness of our silent house with its shrouded furniture, of the monotony of club life, of how existence without her is—and so forth. Oh, I have made myself solid.

But I am afraid she is beginning to suspect me. I have not the air of one returning to a feast. I fear I more resemble one returning from a feast. (Perhaps I am a trifle jaded. We crowded too many of those little dinners into the past few weeks.)

At breakfast the other morning she spoke:

"Zulano," said she, "you never seem to have any appetite for your breakfast now. What is the matter?"

"Nothing—nothing at all, my dear," and I vigorously attacked a cold biscuit and a leathery omelette.

"I am afraid you have been spoiled for plain home fare," she said, a trifle querulously.

"Not so—you are wrong, Zulana. But now that you speak of it, I wish you'd see that the cook would make good omelettes. They are always bad, and they are never alike. Sometimes they resemble a sponge; sometimes they look as if they had started out to be scrambled eggs, and had concluded to solidify; sometimes they remind me of a tough tortilla. Now, if I have a weakness, it is omelettes. Will you see to it, Zulana?"

She said she would.

"Ah," I continued, meditatively, waving my fork in forgetful enthusiasm, "ah, what omelettes that cook at the club does make! M-m-m-m-m-eltling! Delicious! I do bethink me, Zulana, of a certain omelette au confiture he confected for me the other day. The dark purple masses of jelly hidden within its golden folds reminded me of the violet bands of cloud through which the sun descends over the Golden Gate!"

Zulana poured some cream into her coffee with a trembling hand.

"Then there was another," I went on, in gastronomic rapture, "an omelette poem. Its substratum was chicken livers, cooked into a savory stew; mingled with them here and there were fresh green peppers. The whole was then incorporated—assimilated, so to speak—with an omelette. Ah me! when I think of the bland little livers struggling with the fiery flavor of the peppers, the whole pacified, as it were, by the omelette proper, I could weep, Zulana, I could—"

Zulana arose so violently that the toast-rack trembled, and fell over.

"If you do not like your own table," she began, in a voice which she vainly tried to render steady, "you had better go back to your old c-c-c-lub!"

She flounced out of the room.

What extraordinary creatures these women are! I had said nothing whatever deprecatory of my own table. Well, some women are melting and sweet, like omelette au confiture; some are fiery, like pepper omelette; some are both kinds—of omelettes.

SOCIETY.

Notes and Gossip.

Mr. and Mrs. Samuel M. Wilson, who have been upon an extended visit to Eastern and Canadian cities, returned home on Wednesday last. Mrs. Wiltshire, who has been spending several weeks at the Geysers, returned home on Saturday last. Miss De la Montanya, who has been in the East several months, returned on Sunday last. Mrs. Peter Donahue and Miss Mamie, her very agreeable daughter, will remain at the Geysers until August. Miss Juliet Shafter, who has been in Boston and elsewhere in the East for more than a year, returned home on Wednesday last. Miss Jennie Hawley has returned from the Yosemite. Lieutenant Milton, U. S. N., and Mrs. Milton, left San Francisco for the East on Wednesday. Mrs. C. J. Torbert and daughters are sojourning for a brief period at Monterey. Miss Minnie Mizner, of Benicia, who has been visiting in the East for nearly a year, returned home on Wednesday last. Lieutenant-Commander Charles O'Neil, U. S. N., and family, are at the Baldwin for a short time. Mrs. Theodore Tracy has returned from her visit to Oregon. Mrs. John Wright, of Sacramento, went to Monterey on Sunday last, to remain a few weeks. Major Kimball, U. S. A., and Mrs. Kimball, have been visiting in this city during the week. Miss Mattie Sheldon has returned from Santa Clara County. Mrs. Goad has gone to Monterey, to stay a few weeks. Miss Nellie Trowbridge will return from Lake Tahoe in a few days. Midshipman Craven and Commander Merriman, of the navy, have been at the Baldwin during the week. Mrs. Charles McLaughlin has returned from Monterey. Mrs. John C. Fall left here for Cheyenne on Saturday last. Lieutenant Livingston, U. S. N., has been at the Palace most of the week. Mrs. E. B. Pond and family have returned from Clear Lake. Mrs. L. S. B. Sawyer is visiting friends in San Joaquin County. Mr. and Mrs. Tristram Burgess returned from the East on Monday last. Mr. and Mrs. Charles Crocker, with their daughter and son William, are in London. Mrs. David Hudson has returned from the Geysers. Mrs. C. L. Wilson has returned from San Rafael. Miss Wilkins, of Napa, who has been visiting Mrs. W. T. Wallace, has returned home. Doctor and Mrs. McNulty will break up housekeeping on the first of next month, and return to their old quarters at the Palace. Mr. and Mrs. Freeman have returned from Lake Tahoe. The Misses Lake have returned from San Rafael. The Misses Hudson have returned from the Geysers. Mr. and Mrs. R. P. Hastings are back at the Palace. Misses Carrie and Mary Wright have returned from the Geysers. Governor Tittle, of Arizona, who has been on a visit to Washington, has been spending the present week in Oakland and San Francisco. Mrs. John A. Paxton has been on a visit to the Geysers. The Misses Tichenor, who have been at the Geysers for a while, have returned. Doctor and Mrs. Hutchins have returned from Magnetic Springs. Mrs. John Hemphill has returned from Napa Valley. Mrs. M. A. Wightman and Miss Kate Grimm have gone to Monterey for a few days. Miss Julia Bray, of Fruit Vale, is visiting friends in Nevada County. Commodore Shufeldt has withdrawn his request to be placed in command of the Asiatic squadron. Mrs. Selden S. Wright and Miss Wright have returned from Monterey. Mrs. Barclay and Miss Barclay, of Oregon, who have been visiting in this city for several weeks, have returned to their home in Portland. Mr. and Mrs. Charles Phelps, of Oakland, who have been recreating in Lake County, have returned home. Miss Jennie Hanchett has gone to Monterey. Mrs. J. B. Dayton, of Oakland, is visiting Mrs. General Estee, in Napa County. The Misses E. Farrier, and F. G. and H. Tubbs, of Oakland, have been spending a few days at Monterey. Mrs. L. A. Booth and daughter have returned from Southern California. Mrs. W. W. Crane and her daughter, Miss Nannie Crane, of Oakland, have been spending a few days at Monterey. Mrs. J. N. Requa, of Piedmont, has returned from Santa Monica. Mrs. Adam Grant returned from Monterey a few days ago. Mr. and Mrs. James P. Pierce and Miss Carrie Pierce, of Santa Clara, who have been at Monterey a part of the summer, have returned home. Miss Lillie Hastings has also returned from Monterey. Miss M. Whittier went to Monterey on Friday last. Henry Heyman has returned from Lake Tahoe. George Redding and Frank Cummins have gone to Shasta and the McCloud River. George Crocker and J. A. Fillmore have returned. Mrs. William Stewart is at Monterey. Mr. and Mrs. B. R. Norton, of Alameda, have gone to Monterey. Mr. and Mrs. W. E. Bowen have returned to San Francisco. Mrs. G. L. Coleman went down to Monterey on Saturday last. Mrs. May Miller has returned from the Yosemite Valley. General Stoneman has returned to his orange groves. Mr. and Mrs. Casserly and Miss Casserly went to Monterey on Saturday last. Miss Kate Felton and Mrs. Loomis have returned to Menlo. Mr. and Mrs. W. W. Traylor are at Webber Lake. Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Buffington, of Oakland, are at Glenwood. Mr. and Mrs. S. P. Middleton have returned from Napa Soda Springs. Mr. and Mrs. F. Sullivan are spending a few days at Monterey. I. D. Castello, U. S. N., is at Monterey. Mrs. A. C. Lawrence has returned from Monterey. Miss Doyle, of Menlo Park, went to Monterey on Saturday last. Mrs. William Kohl and her daughter have returned to San Mateo from Tahoe. Robert Dickson has gone to Oregon to be absent for five weeks. Mrs. A. E. Head and Miss Head have returned from Monterey. J. C. Freeman, U. S. A., is at the Baldwin. Captain Boyd, U. S. N., who went East as a commander, returned to the Navy Yard at Mare Island on Thursday last with increased rank as above. H. S. Warring, U. S. N., arrived here from the East on Monday last. Evan J. Coleman has been in Los Angeles quite a while as the guest of J. de Barth Shorb. Harry Tevis, Frank Wilson, and Charles Cole have gone to Mount Shasta and the McCloud River to stay until the first of August. Mrs. Major Hayden McLellan, of Los Angeles, who has been on a visit to Mrs. Captain Goodall, has returned home. General Keyes is at Tahoe. Miss May Millikin, of Sacramento, who has been visiting in Oakland, has returned home. Eugene Lent returned on Tuesday last. A. W. Grant, U. S. N., is at the Occidental. James Phelan is spending the present week with his family at Monterey. The Earl of Hopeton returned from Monterey on Monday last. H. C. Parkhurst and S. Cook, U. S. N., are at the Palace. Mrs. D. W. Thompson returned from Monterey on Sunday last. Mr. and Mrs. A. N. Towne, Charles McLaughlin, Mr. Laton, Samuel Miller, and Mr. and Mrs. I. N. Requa are at the Yosemite in a party. H. H. Cook and E. B. Chapman, of Oakland, went to Monterey on Sunday last. Robert Sherwood and family left San Francisco for the East on Tuesday last. Mrs. J. S. Taber and her sister, Mrs. Smith, who have been at the Yosemite for nearly two months, have returned. Mr. and Mrs. I. Taber, who went to the Yosemite last week, have also returned. Mrs. E. B. Crocker and Miss Amy Crocker, of Sacramento, are at Idlewild, their beautiful place on Tahoe. Mr. and Mrs. D. J. Staples and Miss Kittie Staples have returned from Etna Springs. Mr. Seligman, of New York, is visiting the Yosemite. Mr. and Mrs. Henry Schmiedell and daughter, will return to the Palace, from San Rafael on or about the first of August. Mrs. Joseph Austin returned from the Geysers on Monday last. A. Malpas, accompanied by his wife and three children, went to Monterey on a brief visit on Tuesday last. Captain W. H. Taylor and family, who have been spending a month at the seashore, returned on Monday last. Mrs. M. J. Kelier, of Oakland, has gone to Santa Cruz to stay a week or two. Charles Miller and family returned from their third annual visit to Monterey on Monday last. Mrs. J. L. Moody and family also returned from the seashore on Monday last. Mrs. W. E. Dean and maid went to Monterey on the seventeenth instant; also the Misses K. and M. Nugent. Mrs. D. J. Tallant and family, who have been spending a month at the Hotel del Monte, have returned to the city; also Mr. and Mrs. J. P. Verdon. Mr. and Mrs. A. K. P. Harmon Jr., of Oakland, will return from their bridal tour to-day. Mr. and Mrs. C. P. Huntington and Miss Huntington, who have been visiting the Pacific Coast since the summer of 1879, will arrive here to-morrow and take apartments at the Palace. Mr. and Mrs. D. B. Libbey and F. Washington went down to Monterey on Tuesday last. Judge Hoffman returned from Monterey on Tuesday. Miss Lizzie Coffee, who has been visiting Mrs. M. R. Taylor and Miss Lena Smith, at Sacramento, returned home on Tuesday last. Mr. and Mrs. Harry May and Miss May returned from Monterey on Tuesday last. Mrs. R. Brown, of Sacramento, is at Tahoe. Mr. and Mrs. Drury Melone came down from their summer retreat in Napa County a few days ago to inhale the ozone from the trade winds, and to do some shopping; they have not returned for the season, however. Mrs. N. D. Rideout and family, of Marysville, went down to Monterey on Tuesday last, to stay a week or two. A. A. Cohen and wife, of Alameda, are also at Monterey, enjoying the zephyrs from the sea-shore. Mrs. J. Brinkerhoff and the Misses A. and I. Brinkerhoff, of Dixon, are also spending a few days at Monterey. Mrs. H. Miller and family returned from Monterey on Tuesday last. Lieutenant G. W. Wilson, U. S. A., is at Los Angeles. Mrs. General Stoneman arrived here on Thursday last, and is at the Palace. General Beale arrived from Washington on Thursday last, and is at the Palace.

DECORATIVE ART NOTES.

The November Competitive Exhibition of Designs and Embroideries.

The Society of Decorative Art of California has issued a circular, stating the conditions and rules which will regulate competition for the ten or more prizes which, under its auspices, will be awarded for the best work in designing for embroidery and in art needlework that shall be sent to it for exhibition from Monday, October 30th, to Wednesday, November 1st. For the conditions and rules we refer all interested to the circular itself. The prizes are as follows. The society also promises that other special prizes will probably be offered before the competition takes place, "of which due notice will be sent to all desiring information":

One hundred dollars for the best piece of embroidery—the most artistic in design, color, and work—suitable for a portiere.
Fifty dollars for the design or piece of embroidery receiving the majority of votes of visitors during the exhibition.

Various managers have generously provided funds for the following:

Seventy-five dollars for the best design of screen of not less than three panels.

Fifty dollars for the best design of portiere. Competition limited to Pacific Coast art-workers.

Fifty dollars for embroidered table-cover.

Twenty-five dollars for best sample of drawn work, original design.

Twenty-five dollars for the best design of outline work on silk or linen.

Twenty-five dollars for embroidered lambrequin, suitable for mantel.

Twenty-five dollars for the best design of California wild flowers, suitable for decorative purposes.

Twenty dollars for the best figure design, suitable for panel.

This is an undertaking that should commend itself to all who are interested either in the growth of artistic capacity and taste, or in the development specially of California talent. The society's object was primarily to offer encouragement to Pacific Coast workers, and it feels confident that, if all who can do good work, both with the pencil and the needle, will exert themselves to compete for these prizes, the display of California works will be very creditable. The School of Design has annually, for some seven years, turned out pupils who have found occupation in the more practical paths of art-work. Among these several hundred graduates there surely should be some who can profitably and satisfactorily design for the best class of art needlework. If so, now is their opportunity. Not only those sanguine of carrying off a prize should send to the exhibition; but those who, executing pretty and tasteful embroidery, still feel that others will distance them in the race for "first place," because all designs and works can be for sale, including even those that take prizes. So that during the early part of November the rooms of the society will be the best sales-place for artistic handiwork to be found in San Francisco. There is a sentence in the circular, printed in italics, which should be duly considered by all would-be competitors: "To add to the attractiveness of the exhibition, competitors, when convenient, are urged to send finished work illustrating their designs." At the competitive exhibition held in New York last year this suggestion was very generally observed. Indeed the first prize for a design for portiere was taken by the portiere itself, all worked. It is possible that in some cases the person who makes the design is not able, from lack of either time or skill, to work it. In this event a partnership between the artist of the pencil and of the needle would be a wise and satisfactory combination. As a matter of fact, one of the greatest difficulties decorative art societies have to contend with in their efforts at improving the style and quality of art needlework, is in securing artistic and appropriate designs. A very pretty study of flowers is by no means a good design for embroidery. Purpose, place, and material have all to be considered, particularly this last, for a pattern which would be very charming done in outline on linen would appear poor, cold, and cheap done in double crewels or plush. Furthermore, color has to be considered, and it is in this respect that our attempts so often fail. A design well-drawn and happily balanced is often entirely robbed of its effect by crudely arranged or too highly toned colors. What is really needed is a more general and correct knowledge among our art-workers of the fundamental principles of the decorative arts. One great difficulty encountered in procuring good designs for any of the applied arts, is an ignorance of these principles. We find artists who offer designs for workers following the law of pictorial art, rather than the law of ornamental art. The heavy scroll-work of a Roman frieze, carved in stone, and placed far above the level of the eye, is entirely appropriate to its place, but it is absurd as a pattern imitated in relief on a carpet or table-cloth, or on a muslin curtain. Each fabric has its own peculiar qualities of texture, lustre, etc., and unless these are considered by the designer, no matter how effective his work is on paper, it will be in bad taste, and ineffective when executed. There is great room for and need of originality in designs among our California workers, if we are to be anything more than feeble imitators of Boston or New York. With the floral wealth which we have at command, we ought to be able to continually produce a new pattern for curtain, tidy, and baby-blanket. Our contributions depend too much on a "new pattern from the East," when, if they would only use their eyes, they could find more beautiful ones from our own California hills and dales. We believe the November exhibition will serve to rouse both energy and ambition among local artists. M.

SAN FRANCISCO, July 19, 1882.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A Schoolmaster's Opinion.

[The following extract from a private letter is from the son of one of the old fighting guard of early Stanislaus Republicans. He is a schoolmaster. We wonder if he would not make a good superintendent of education? We refer the matter to the Stanislaus delegation to the Republican convention:—]

EDITORS ARGONAUT: No office in our government is of more importance than that of Superintendent of Public Instruction. Our school system must be preserved and perpetuated, pure and efficient, or our government goes down. Professors, demagogues, and self-styled educators, have thrown glittering sand in the eyes of the people in the shape of new-fangled methods of instruction, short-cuts up the hill of science, and "royal roads" to knowledge, until our school system is on trial for its life. Stuffing machines, military discipline, and a grading system that grinds out at graduation the blockhead and the gifted on the same plan—these are the implements used by the supporters of our "higher education" and our "modern civilization." Hence the pupils of our public schools are remarkable for a wonderful smattering of everything, and a knowledge of nothing. The graduates of our high schools and University, so far as a good common English education—a knowledge of reading writing, spelling, grammar, and practical business arithmetic is concerned—would be a disgrace to the public schools of fifty years ago. I have been a teacher in the schools of the State for the last twenty years. Opposition to educational rings, and innovations on common sense, have been my constant fight. The financial part of our system (except the manner of expending it) is all right enough. The schools are supported in a princely manner, and without a murmur from the people. But the teaching is all wrong; our grading system is all wrong; the text-book matter is all wrong; and the "Commencement Day" is the grandest bung of the whole. The child is taught to read without knowing its letters. He is taught to spell phonetically—by use of diacritical marks—before he has any knowledge of the pronunciation or simplest combination of letters. Geography is taught with mud pies, and grammar as a science is commenced in the cradle. Yours respectfully, JOHN YORK JR.

OKAIDALE, July 17, 1882.

What an Intelligent Foreigner Thinks of Us.

EDITORS ARGONAUT: Ever since the initial number I believe I have been a constant reader of the Argonaut, and nothing has given me so much gratification as the perusal of its editorials, written in a spirit of freedom, candid in thought, and treating the important living issues of the day in a practical manner—in short, if I may be allowed the term, "taking the hull by the horns" every time. I can not help admiring the journal that has the daring to speak out boldly and plainly upon the various questions that agitate the people of the country. In the issue of last week I noticed a paragraph relating to the boycotting of Butterfield's shoe store on Market Street, and was pleased with your comments concerning it. The question of Chinese immigration is indeed a serious one to the people of this State, and I have always been with you in the feeling that they should be positively prohibited from coming here. But the thought has often arisen in my mind whether it would not be the just and proper thing for the native-born Americans to be allowed the privilege of solving this serious question. Admitting the argument that foreign help is necessary, would it not be becoming for them to assist the Americans, and not reverse the situation? Has it ever occurred to the Americans, and more especially to the intelligent and law-abiding foreigners, how ridiculous and how utterly contemptible it seems for one foreigner to insist on informing the native-born what other foreigner is to be allowed the freedom of this land? It has to me. I am a foreigner. I am here because this is the best government on God's footstool; because here I can breathe the pure air of a freeman; where the vote of a scavenger counts as much as that of the millionaire; where all are equal before the law. I would not go back to Germany; I could not be driven to depart from this country, and for the privilege of enjoying the great blessings afforded only by this nation, it would ill become me to dictate to the people, by whose liberal spirit I am permitted to be here, how the government should be constituted. I feel it my duty, as an intelligent, well-wishing citizen of this republic, to cast my ballot for the best interests of the government, and I equally believe that no other foreigner, be he from Ireland, France, or any other country, has more rights here than I have as a German. I am forced to the conclusion that, taken from an American standpoint, a Chinaman is no more and no less a foreigner than the German, Irish, French, Italian, or the native of any other country, and has some rights perhaps that we, who are also here on sufferance, can not gainsay. True it is, we are a civilized foreign immigration, and demand and receive better and higher consideration; but the Americans say that their laws regarding foreign immigration were never so constructed as to admit of discrimination between the semi-civilized and the civilized, ignorant and intelligent, of foreign countries. If they were, would not the white foreign population shrink considerably, and New York city and San Francisco be Republican for time and eternity?

SAN FRANCISCO, July 18, 1882.

APPRECIATIVE FOREIGNER.

OUR SOUTHERN NEIGHBORS.

What the Mexicans Eat, How they Live, and their Future Prospects.

Mascota is the third town as regards population in Jalisco, though Ixtlan disputes the point of precedence. Ahuacatlan is a pretty little town; the road to it winds around the base of the volcano Cehurco, only lately become quiescent. During the recent eruption a new cuchillo or spur has been formed, which is still glowing (the rosy color only visible at night) and smoking, and which affords a fine study of volcanic action in shaping the visible crust of the earth. The termination "atlan" is Indian, and it means "place of." Aguacate is a fruit; hence Aguacatlan, "the place of aguacates." Maza, I believe, is a bird; hence Mazatlan, "the place of a bird." The farms here in Jalisco (haciendas de campo) remind me of the plantations in our Southern States, with their "quarters" clustered near the homestead. The hacenderos live something of a planter's life, except that they work far harder, taking the saddle early in the day, and following the work untiringly. They have administradores, (overseers), and various under-foremen; but I have not met one who does not look after his own work. Each year they usually spend a part of the season with their families in Guadalajara—much like "going to the Virginia Springs, sir." Not a few of the families live at Guadalajara altogether. A hacienda of moderate size will have one hundred working hands; a large one, three hundred or more. The people are paid thirty-one and a quarter to thirty-seven and a half cents per day; boys and lads receive twelve and a half to twenty-five cents. These people, largely descendants of the aboriginal inhabitants of the country, work very hard. They are amiable, forward to do one any service in their power, intelligent, and quick to learn, but wholly without education beyond the ability to read. In the domestic establishment on the haciendas, as in the towns, one is again reminded of the plantation; all supplies, and in fact everything, are kept under lock and key, and doled out to the domestics as needed.

A thing that strikes one is the extreme minuteness of the trading in Mexico. The coins are peso, one dollar; toscon, fifty cents; peseta, twenty-five cents; real, twelve and a half cents; medio, six and a quarter cents; cuartilla, three cents; llaco, one and a half cents; centaro, one cent. Fully one-half in amount of the buying is done in terms of the real, twelve and a half cents, to the llaco, one and a half cents. The common people (paisanos) buy corn, lard, sugar, beef, and tobacco in these terms, and those items are the staple of life. The staple fabrics are, for the men, manila, a kind of coarse, white cotton, and for the women, prints. All who achieve hoots or shoes wear them enormously high heeled. On the haciendas the laborers buy their supplies from the hacenderos, who keep them for the purpose of selling to their hands. They usually anticipate their wages, and are rarely out of debt to their employers.

Though the tortilla is to the Mexican what rice is to the Chinaman, everywhere one gets delicious bread. It is not made in the domestic establishment, but is bought of the baker. The kind most liked is that made with eggs; the next in preference contains, in addition to the eggs, lard, the proportions varying until it becomes a true "short-cake." Next is preferred a sweetened kind; this is habitually eaten at the desayuno, as well as often at the cena. Finally, the sort used least, but which to our taste would head the list, is the plain bread made with water, or pan blanco, and finer certainly is not eaten in this world of good eating. None of these are made into loaves. The pan blanco comes as a large roll. The other sorts are made into various cake-forms. The ovens are all, of course, of mason-work. I have not mentioned that the tortilla is made of corn, which is first hoiled with a little quicklime, to soften or destroy the husk. Still soft, it is rubbed down into a paste between two stones, with a movement as of a woman rubbing clothes on a washboard. Then a dab of it is patted out between the hands into a thin leaf, and this is cooked on an earthen griddle. They are served up hot, of the consistency and pliability of a well-hoiled piece of hide. They are not had. The coffee-berry is exquisite. They burn it to a char, then mill it to a flour, and serve it in the drink. The people of the country drink their coffee with all the sugar it will dissolve. For all that cows are plenty, milk is scarce, and butter is almost wholly unknown. In the larger towns it can be bought of American-make, in tins holding perhaps a pound, and usually had. The little that is made in the country is white and tasteless. The cattle are of the big-horned sort that used to prevail in California, known as Spanish cattle, and a cow of this strain that gives two quarts of milk at a milking is looked upon as a valuable animal. There are a few sheep in the country, but I fancy they are too valuable to kill for mutton, at least I have never seen that meat. They are of the coarse-wooled "kempy" kind that used to be known in California, and the wool of which was sold at six cents per pound, when well-hred grades were worth twenty cents and over. Yet these mountains ought to be the natural habitat for the light-footed Spanish merino sheep. Black wool is more valuable than white, because it is scarcer, and mixed with the white gives a gray fabric without the need of dyeing. The swine are of two sorts, one of which is a woolly-haired, round, corpulent beast, with a strain, I think, of the Chinese breed. These are only seen on the haciendas of the more important kind. The pig of the country is the fine old Western animal, with a snout like a clipper plow, lank, lazy, and limber. His life is compressed in the words "root, hog, or die," and he roots. When taken in hand to be made lard of, and fed corn, he lays on the fat readily, and after a very brief season of enough to eat, which he can hardly have done wondering at when the end arrives, goes to the frying-pan. His flesh is eaten, but it is not esteemed. I have seen it only once, and then at a wayside hailing-place for arrieros. Beef is eaten the same day it is killed, and the hroiling-iron is unknown. The flesh in its fresh state is fried, the result being less disastrous than one might think, for very little is eaten, except as a "relish." I have scarcely stopped at a hacienda where I have not been asked about American agricultural implements, capacity, power required, etc. I have sown some seed for the drummers to reap when they come along.

I had fancied there must be some trifle of exaggeration in the accounts I had received of the exquisite climate of Guadalajara. But not so. Guadalajara is one of the favored spots of the earth. Its climate is choicer than that of Nice, for in Nice there are icy winds sometimes that come down off the Alps. But at Guadalajara the Sierra Madre is, in the first place, too far off, and in the second place, not high enough to offer this phenomenon. More fully at Guadalajara than elsewhere did I realize that stirring times have begun for Mexico. I saw there the beginning of great business activity and good feeling. She has entered upon her railway era. A company has been formed to construct the Jalisco system from a connection with the Eastern road to the sea. In Guadalajara the houses, like those of the other places I had visited, were of adobe and stone, plastered and whitewashed. The cathedral, on one side of the plaza, has a large dome (covered with figures in colored tiles) between the steeples. The paseo runs a mile and a quarter through the city, to the alameda. Of course Guadalajara has its bull-ring. The only bull-fight I witnessed was at Ahuacatlan. I attended the opera, and must say you may hear the equal of the Guadalajara orchestra in New York, but nowhere else on this continent; and the chorus is worthy of the orchestra. I am told that in Guadalajara music is cultivated with assiduity, and that the occasional concerts given by private performers in aid of charities are brilliant. They prefer Italian and French music.

In the district of Jalisco extensive tracts occupied by the aborigines remain semi-independent to this day. The paisanos call them "barbaros." At Tuxham I saw a pueblo of these purros indigenos. They are a square, thick-set, almost squat people, the men with headless faces, and the women wearing a costume peculiar to them—a black skirt, with a white body garment which may be shortly described as a towel with a slit in it. The head passes through the slit as it does in a serape. And these were the people who gave the Spaniards their experience of the "Noche Triste."

I had a letter from a friend not long ago in which the writer said: "I think it (Mexico) will be a great country when Americans have protection for their lives and money." I have traveled somewhat, and have naturally informed myself, and have to say that if there be any safer country than Mexico I do not know it; and the New Yorkers have found it out. It is safer, in every sense and in every part, than our own Pacific States and Territories. A man may walk the streets of Guadalajara by night with less danger of being robbed than in San Francisco. Since I have been in the country there has been one stage robbery. At the time I left San Francisco there were in Arizona about one a week. Rogues are not wanting in Mexico, but they are far from being the dangerous animals they are often painted. They are much more of a sneak-thief than a highwayman; nearer allied to the coyote than to the wolf. Even the wolf, we know, is a notorious sneak, and only attacks when he conceives he has a sufficient advantage in point of numbers. In this he is only like other thieves, of whatever breed or clime; but mean and sneaky as he is, the coyote is meaner and sneakier. And a similar difference is that, in general, between the American and Mexican footpad. The Mexican footpad is usually a rustic, who attempts the road as a speculation, and he seldom conducts his operations in a business-like manner. The American footpad is apt to be a professional, and therefore he rarely makes any hundle. To sum up, I can only pronounce the notion as to the danger to life and property in Mexico pure delusion.

July 3, 1882.

W.

Senator Logan is clearly right in the introduction of a bill to allow Chinese to pass into and across our country on their way from the West Indies to China. Why not? And who will object to it except a class of unprincipled and ignorant foreigners, who ought themselves never to have been permitted to land upon the shores of the American continent? Chinese, under proper restrictions and conditions, should have the privilege of crossing our country to any other. To limit this privilege would indicate a cowardice on the part of our legislators for which no intelligent person in California would respect them. We think, for various reasons, that the immigration of Chinese, to become fixed laborers and residents of the country, undesirable; but we are not so illiberal and bigoted as to deny to any nationality the privilege of using our country as a highway to another. Logan's ideas should prevail, whether they are suggested in the interest of the Chinese or transportation companies. We wish our railroad and steamship companies to have their share of the world's traffic. We wish our transcontinental railroads from San Francisco to the East to be thronged with the commerce and the passengers of other lands. We desire our port of San Francisco to become the entrepot of this trade, and if Senators Miller or Farley think to make themselves popular among intelligent constituents by any other policy, they will find themselves entirely mistaken. To compel Asiatic travelers to go around the continent to avoid the United States of America is an idea altogether too absurd to write about.

It is quite marvelous, the indignation that has been aroused among Democrats because Republicans assess office-holders for party election purposes. There are certain legitimate and indispensable disbursements necessary in the conduct of a political campaign, and if the office-holders should not pay them, who should? The surprising thing is that this should seem so unusual to the Democracy. They do it when in office, and if they think those out of place should pay all the expenses of campaigns, we wish them joy in the indulgence of a virtuous spasm.

At a meeting of the Commissioners of Golden Gate Park, held at the Park Lodge on Friday morning, Commissioner Alvord resigned after some seven years of service, and in his place Governor Stanford was elected. The Commission is now constituted is: Frank M. Pixley, Chairman of the Board; John Rosenfeld, and Leland Stanford.

Mr. Cornelius Walford, the London insurance authority, says that there are few towns or large villages in China which have not their insurance office.

In the reign of Victor Emanuel's father, Charles Albert, Garibaldi was sentenced to be shot in the back for inciting a mutiny of troops.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

Every man or woman who owns a dollar's worth of taxable estate in California is interested in maintaining and enforcing the Sunday-law, and closing the drinking-houses on that day. Formerly, election day was an occasion of riot, disorder, and violence. The law closed all places for the sale of intoxicating drinks, and election day is now one of the most quiet and orderly of the year. Enforce the Sunday-law, and it will give us a day of quiet and order for rest, recreation, or worship, as each individual may desire. If on the day when the worst party passions are aroused, and when partisan conflicts culminate in a final struggle at the polls, we can have exemption from personal encounters, and from disorder and violence, we can form some idea of a Sunday without gin.

Next door to the Argonaut office is the German Savings Union, next door to that is the San Francisco savings bank, next to that again, a French savings bank, and next beyond is a larger beer saloon, where Bavarian beer is dispensed at five cents a glass, with sausage, bread, and blood-pudding, with mustard and onions for an appetizer. It is good beer. The Sunday law closes these hanks on Sunday, and their managers—German and French—make no complaint, and offer no resistance. The larger beer institution joins the "League of Freedom," keeps open on Sunday, resists the law, and, in the interest of blood-pudding, Limberger cheese, and Democracy, insists upon its right to violate a law of the country to which its owner came. We can see no reason why the beer-seller should enjoy privileges not extended to the hanker.

Mr. W. W. Foote, Democratic candidate for Railroad Commissioner, writes a letter to the Examiner. The Record-Union reviews it, and in the review characterizes Mr. Foote, his candidacy, and his character by the use of the following terms which the reader can apply to the Democratic candidate in any shape they please: "Mendacious," "dishonest," "unscrupulous demagogue," "indecent," "unprincipled," and a howler," "flagrant falsehoods and mis-statements," "phenomenal ignorances," "reckless falsifier," "howling demagogue," "Sand-lot spouter," "disgraceful self-exposure," "profound ignorance," "shameless lack of principle," "reckless mendacity," "political tramp," "wild howler," "mere dummy," "idiot," "unprincipled office-seeker," "gross falsehoods," "reckless pledges," "capable of making a market of his position," and "W. W. Foote." The Record-Union once read us a severe lecture because we applied certain inelegant epithets to one of the Hoars of Massachusetts. We have been awaiting our opportunity to call our readers' attention to the forcible and elegant style of this model journal. We present the foregoing as a specimen of choice and eloquent English. If W. W. Foote were the son of his father, and the Record-Union were edited by S. S. Prentiss, and the time were fifty years ago, there would be fur a-flying in the valley of the Sacramento; but, alas, the days are degenerate, and no fun will come of it.

If the writer were one of the Egyptian Fellaheen, horn to the inheritance of an acre of Nile land, or a Bedouin Arah with only the desert for a home, taught to believe that God is God and Allah His only prophet, and in the utterance of that prayer to turn only to Mecca; if his native land had been invaded by the worshipers of another religion, the followers of another prophet, who came to collect its revenues and disburse them to their brethren in a distant land in payment of a debt he had no hand in creating; if from these revenues, wrung from his hard-earned toil, these foreigners lived in princely splendor, and led lives of luxurious idleness; if in the great cities of Alexandria and Cairo the European quarter was one of ease, plenty, wealth, and lavish display, while he lived in a narrow street in squalor and in poverty; if he were compelled to pay tribute to a Turkish Sultan and taxes to an Egyptian Khedive to maintain armies and harems—armies officered by foreign-horn Pashas, and harems filled with foreign slaves; if this was an inherited condition, and was hopeless of change, and if from out of the native race there sprang one of the Faithful and follower of the Prophet, a warrior who would lead the people against Khedive, Sultan, and foreign invader; if without declaration of war, and before the happening of any serious act of rebellion, an English fleet with eighty-ton guns had blown forts to pieces, slaughtered Egyptian troops, burned the Egyptian quarter of Alexandria, while sparing the European quarter; if the fleets of the European and English sympathizing world had stood by in encouragement of the cruel slaughter—if all this were the case, then the writer is inclined to think that he would have followed Arabi Bey, and would now be found in the tent of the rebel chief, with an English stem-winder, full-jeweled, in his pocket, with his face turned toward Mecca, invoking Allah to destroy the vile Christian dogs that had invaded his native land. If the writer were in command of an American ship-of-war lying in the port of Alexandria, and if from any cause he found Americans and Europeans, women, children, and non-combatants gathered around the American flag in an American consulate, and in the midst of an infuriated and bloody mob, in the midst of a burning city, with murder and rapine on every side, madly fighting for their lives; if the writer were commander of that ship, he would send his hundred armed marines to hear the American flag to the rescue of all who sought its protection, and hid them fight like star-spangled heroes in its honor, and in defense of every man, woman, child, and Christian dog that would ask its protection and the defense of an American sailor. And after the scrimmage was over he would let Mr. Frelinghuysen and the American people settle the diplomatic value of the act. If the writer was the editor of a journal whose opinions were of the least importance in forming and directing public sentiment in the right direction, he would deem it wise to withhold the utterance of any very oracular expression till he had learned all the facts of this very remarkable and questionable homardment from some authority more disinterested than that of the writer who precipitated it. England should only be write one side of the history of this war. It belongs to Oriental literature.

VANITY FAIR.

"Clara Belle" says that New York ladies are fond of going to opera beer-gardens, and that "within a few years New York women have taken to beer like babies to milk. At no time is there less than one beer-garden that can correctly be described as fashionable. The Alcazar is the current venture in this line. It is the Casino renamed, with a stage performance of operetta and ballet, and is doing fairly. In August a new Casino is to be opened. Thus far the Alcazar has had perfectly respectable countenance, and often holds quite a brilliant throng. One of the handsomest women to be seen there is sent by a leading dressmaker as a figure on which to display her wares. This is not an entirely new form of advertising, but it has seldom if ever been so thoroughly well done. The woman is about thirty, superbly molded, and has a most graceful bearing. She is escorted by the male member of the firm which employs her, and it is his part of the scheme to let it be known that her clothes are exhibits from his concern. This he does in part by telling all the acquaintances whom he encounters, and in part by a covert announcement in the advertising columns of the concert programme. It is a clever device, and I have no doubt brings custom."

It makes it pleasant for a bashful young man to admire a lady's ornate shoe and silky stocking, and be told she is a Little Barefoot. Yet this is the latest fashion, and a certain distinguished writer and publisher who once had his sensibilities shocked by a fair guest appearing minus shoes and stockings in his drawing-room, would now find the custom as likely to become popular.

"A New York jeweler," says the Boston Gazette's correspondent, "makes the very true observation that 'imitation kills fashion.' I have been forcibly struck with this during the last few years. I defy Tiffany & Co. to get up a design that the Cheap Johns can not imitate. You look through their cases, and you see fine specimens of Egyptian bangles in solid silver and gold that cost ten dollars and twenty-five dollars respectively, and you go to Daniel's or Stern's, and you find the same design in washed silver and rolled gold for one dollar and two dollars. Unless you take them in your hand, and feel how light they are, you would never suspect their genuineness. Even furs are imitated. I could not tell half the time last winter who wore sealskin and who wore imitation. I have seen girls coming out of tenement houses dressed to all appearances as girls who come out of Fifth-Avenue houses. The tight-fitting jackets, coachman's capes, large hats, and long gloves gave them at a distance a most picturesque and fashionable appearance. Closer inspection showed the fur cape to be imitation, and the other materials of the cheapest sort. There is alligator skin. For a time that baffled imitators. But only for a time. They soon came out with an imitation that only an expert could tell. A genuine alligator-skin pocket-book costs seven dollars—that is the cheapest. The imitation costs twenty-five cents. The imitators are not baffled by antiques. For a time scarf-pins made of antique coins were fashionable, and quite expensive. The coins were genuine, and the settings of gold. You can buy them to-day for twenty-five cents, the coins looking just as ancient and the gold just as pure."

A useful novelty for holding the large corsage bouquets that are now fashionable is called the bouquet pin, and consists of a plain bar of gold or of silver protruding in the middle to make room for the stems of the flowers and attached to the dress by a pin and clasp like that of any brooch. Made of silver these are one dollar and a-half, and of gold they are five dollars.

"Lawn parties," says a New York correspondent, "have become a charming feature with the residents of pretty suburban localities, and New York particularly. At these parties small tables are set on the shaded piazzas and also under the trees, and are further protected by the new 'lawn' umbrellas, which can be set in the ground, are of large size, and are shaped like the Japanese parasols. Low dishes, or glass troughs, or small china boats filled with flowers are used for decorations, while about the grounds a very natural-looking dog or other animal, meekly couchant or ready to spring upon an intruder, appear among the rhododendrons, the feather trees, the flower beds, the shaded walks by the river, and the rich shrubbery. Lawn-tennis, croquet, and other games furnish amusement, and there is usually a 'lemonade' tent or awning, where claret cup and lemonade can be procured by thirsty individuals, who are always in a majority. The gentlemen affect very light but conventional costumes on these occasions—white flannel with blue silk tie, or very delicate tweed with crimson silk tie, or (if it is a gentleman with more quiet taste) ficelle silk tie and ficelle silk lining to the tweed coat. The majority of the young ladies are in white—white mull, lace-trimmed, or white linen grenadine (often called cheese-cloth), trimmed with Florentine lace. There is, of course, variety in the adornments, but the more refined girls choose that their costumes shall be all ivory-white or they will drape a soft Roman sash, pale pink and blue, about their skirts, which are very little draped."

"Baby Snatcher" is the descriptive title bestowed on those fashionable New York girls who are marrying men much younger than themselves. The past year has been so prolific in marriages of well-seasoned belles with youths of tender age, something bad to be said about it. Hence the Baby Snatcher.

A young lady, a handsome brunette, attracted considerable attention recently by driving through Central Park, New York, in a little gold-colored phaeton. She was dressed in a striking costume of "Pharaoh" red satin, draped with black Spanish lace, with bright glimpses of the unveiled satin showing here and there on the bodice and upper portion of the overdress. Attached to the phaeton was an immense canopy of red satin, lined with "sunset" brocade, and edged with a deep ruffle of yellow ficelle lace. The lady wore an Italian peasant's hat of immense brim and high towering crown, covered with red and gold covered feathers, laid one over the other alternately. Long Mousquetaire driving-gloves of deep yellow were drawn over the close red satin sleeves, and at her throat was pinned a bunch of yellow covelees.

A new ring has a cat's head, copied with wonderful fidelity to nature, in gold and silver, with topaz eyes. Strange and characteristic stones are much sought for, and the rings now fashionably worn comprise a serpent with diamond eyes, a ruby and emerald butterfly, and the cat's head just mentioned. With all these lively specimens of natural history on, a lady's hand resembles a section of the circus.

Shoes are well heeled this summer, the high French heels giving place to quite low and sensible ones. Most of the stores have the summer shoes, such as the low Newport ties of kid or patent leather, with both French and other heels, so that the purchaser may take her choice. Patent leather will cover the feet of most New York belles for ordinary wear this summer. This is sensible, as it is readily cleaned, and can be kept bright alike at the damp seashore or in the dusty mountains. Slippers with broad heels will be worn more than anything else. They are cut so low that little but the toes and heels are covered, and are not ornamented with bows, so that the stocking is well displayed. For full dress black satin or prunella slippers of the same plain style will be correct. Says a fashion correspondent: "I recently saw a pair of shoes made in as many colors as the rainbow. On the foundation lining of the shoes were narrow strips of various colored satins. At the toe was a strip of gold-colored satin; then, overlapping each other, were strips of blue, pink, white, cream, silver, blue, and other colors of the finest satin. These shoes were made as a test, but I venture to assert that few ladies are willing to initiate the style, especially when the modest sum of thirty-two dollars is required to purchase them."

An English statistic says that no less than seven thousand swans' skins are annually imported into London alone for the exclusive manufacture of the "puffs" used for the purpose of laying powder on the face. Every swan's skin makes about sixty puffs, which would make an annual consumption of four hundred and twenty thousand puffs. Is then the natural whiteness of the English skin a myth? The same English statistic says that tons of rice and wheat powder are consumed annually in England, and he regrets the waste of so much rice and wheat, which might be better used to feed the starving.

"Here," remarks the Detroit Free Press's Gotham correspondent, "are some lovely costumes made for three debutantes who are inseparable companions, who intend wearing them at a ball to be given in their honor: The 'beauty' of the three will wear a combination costume of pink and blue satin with plastron front of white satin and short rounded lace tabliers. The corsage bouquet will be made of snowballs and lilies of the valley. Her beautiful blonde sister will appear in ivoire blanc satin, with cuirass bodice and volants of point gaze lace and train garniture of the same. Garlands of white crushed roses are artistically disposed about the skirt. The third dress is white China crêpe, lavishly trimmed with white lace, and garnished with roses and lilies of the valley. The centre of white satin is covered with small white rosebuds."

"Now, can you imagine anything lovelier?" said a New York dressmaker to a reporter, when displaying a robe of silver-blue satin, fairly glistening with blue, jet, and crystal garnitures. The panels of the dress were painted in the most delicate designs. The long, flowing sleeves were lined with white satin, and finished with point appliqué lace; the corsage, cut square in front and back, was bordered with narrow bands of "blanc de perle" satin.

At the fashionable hotel at Old Point Comfort, the other day, a beautiful young lady made the unfortunate mistake of entering the dining-room unchaperoned. As no one speaks to another there without an introduction she was unnoticed, and some wiseacre gossip started the story that she was the wife of a wine-taster of a New York hostelry. Beautiful as she was, all admiration instantly died away, and in the eyes of many she became a most imperfect creature. Judge of the general distress and mortification when, the day before her departure, her husband, a prominent naval officer, for whom she had been waiting, returned from China. The busybodies too late found that she was an heiress, and that her father, a retired army officer of high rank, was an invalid incognito at the same hotel.

Among the latest foolish fashionable customs, remarks the American Queen, is that adopted by ladies riding on horseback in the Park or elsewhere in the city limits, of carrying short riding-sticks having a leather loop at the end. This, like many other customs brought from abroad, which have some sensible foundation there, but are entirely bereft of any such here, should be laughed down as soon as possible. These sticks are employed by the buntsmen in England and on the Continent to open gates without dismounting, and are often provided with steel knobs wherewith to break padlocks open.

"Jeweled garters are displayed in the stores," says the Cincinnati Enquirer's New York correspondent, "but it is naturally beyond public knowledge whether they are a great deal worn. I do not personally know of a single instance; yet I am told that many modest girls thus decorate their limbs. Jeweled garters are kept in stock by the jewelers, and they must, therefore, have a sale. Some of them are handsome and costly, being set with genuine stones. One pair on exhibition bear in each a big, brilliant diamond, and the price is five hundred dollars. But dealers sometimes get up such things to attract attention, without expecting ever to sell them. 'At all events,' said a woman who was examining this pair, 'it ought to be a safe way of carrying one's diamonds.' 'Not so,' was her companion's reply; 'it would merely add a new horror to the perils of highway robbery.'"

THE TROTTING-HORSE REPORTER.

Advice He Gave Two Ladies on Writing Poetry and Naming Babies.

"Do you ever print poetry in this paper?" asked a young lady as she came into the editorial room yesterday afternoon.

The horse-reporter, who had been compiling some exciting statistics regarding the number of animals that had trotted in 2:30 during the past season, abandoned this fascinating pursuit, and spoke as follows:

"In answer to your question, miss, I may say that not only does poetry sometimes appear in this paper, but that we now have on our staff of contributors some of the most gifted songsters of the Golden West. We aim to afford all persons who feel within their minds the surging of a flood of metrical melody an opportunity of depicting in vivid word-pictures the beautiful images that Fancy has limned with delicate touch upon the rose-tinted chambers of the imagination, it matters not whether the horny fist of the sweat-crowned son of toil or the dimpled fingers of a patrician maiden guides the pen which gives expression to these thoughts—all are alike welcome. From out the stately chimney that frets the sky in the rear of this establishment come forth in curious curl and with fantastic quirk great clouds of fleecy smoke that wrap the structure in a white filmy mantle. Within one year after the establishment of its free-for-all poetry bureau this journal abandoned the use of coal for fuel. I dislike to give away the game, but you are so pure and beautiful, and your eyes have such a wistful, trusting look that I could not find it in my heart to deceive you. Go in peace, and by way of the stairs, gentle maid, and take the fruits of the God-given genius which enabled you to produce 'Save Our Mother's Hoops for Clara' to some other shop"—and with a pearly tear dimming his bright blue eye the biographer of Maud S again turned to his work.

"Has anybody been in to see me?" inquired the literary editor as he entered the room half an hour later. "I had an appointment with one of our best-known poets."

"I guess she was here," said the horse-reporter, "and I may say, without divulging any professional secrets, that when you pull up your string of suckers at the end of the season there will be one poet missing."

"Is Beatrice a good name for a baby?"

A young woman of prepossessing appearance stood in the door of the editorial-room, and addressed her interrogatory in a seemingly general manner to the gifted gentlemen who were occupying the several corners of the apartment.

For a moment nobody seemed to regard the question as directed particularly to him, but finally the trotting-horse reporter removed his generously proportioned feet from the desk on which they had been resting, and allowed a witching smile to play over his quarter-stretch features.

"Have you a baby?" he asked.

"Why, certainly," replied the young woman, the tone of her voice indicating surprise slightly tinged with anger.

"Well," said the personal friend of Rarus, "you mustn't get angry; because one soft, sensuous day in summer, when the birds were twittering their sweetest twits, a woman came up here on the same errand that brings you; and after we had picked out a pretty smooth title for her infant—I forget whether it was Miriam or Carita we settled on—she went away happy, and along in the fall—the golden-tinted fall—just as the leaves were turning brown, and all nature seemed hushed in sweet repose, waiting for the base-ball championship to be decided, she came back again with a wistful, weary look in her dark-brown eyes, and said she had been mistaken—it was a boy. Woman's nature, you know, is so buoyantly hopeful, so sweetly previous, that she will frequently mistake a four flush for the real article. It is the painful memory of a blackened past that makes us cautious about furnishing names for babies until we know that the little cherubs are here. Do you catch on?"

The lady nodded.

"Well," resumed the admirer of Maud S, "there are lots of things to be considered in naming a baby. Your husband's name is —?"

"Perkins," replied the lady.

"That isn't a bad name, although it would be difficult to enshroud it with the mystic glamour of romance. But I hardly think 'Beatrice' would look well in front of it. The name of 'Beatrice,' you know, is always associated with stateliness and beauty, and your little tootsy-wootsy might grow up bow-legged and pug-nosed. And besides 'Beatrice Perkins' wouldn't sound right. You might call it —"

"Her, if you please," said the lady, severely.

"We always call 'em 'it' in this office—it saves time, and prevents our getting rattled. As I was saying, we might call it 'Perkins Maid' or 'Belle of Perkinsville,' or something like that. I knew a man who had a chestnut gelding —"

"I hardly see what that has to do with the matter under consideration," said the lady, in a severe tone of voice.

"You are right, madam; I did swerve a little that time. 'Sweetheart' is a good name. If you had twins you might call one 'Sweetheart' and the other one 'Darling,' put the tallest one on the off side, and by checking the near one up a little higher, nobody could see the difference between them. Of course, if they were not gaited alike, or you had to put a kicking strap on one of 'em, it might be that —"

"Let me tell you again, sir," said the lady, "that I am not naming a horse. Perhaps this gentleman," turning to the literary editor, "could give me the information I desire."

"Certainly, madam," replied that person. "You should name your little treasure Cecil—the name has such a sweet, dreamy, aristocratic sound."

"Of course I should," said the mollified parent, "and I am exceedingly obliged for your suggestion"—and she departed.

"You seemed to lose your savoir vivre," said the literary editor to the horse-reporter.

"Yes," replied the young man, "she carried me to a double break at the turn, but I should have settled pretty quick and come down the homestretch very fast. If she hadn't hurried me so much in scoring I'd have picked out a daisy name for that filly of hers."—By Joseph Medill, the Chicago Tribune Novelist.

MOUNT HAMILTON.

A Description of a Visit to the Lick Observatory.

Having recently spent a very delightful day on Mount Hamilton, I want every one of intelligence to share the pleasure. There are two ideas prevalent about Mount Hamilton. Some think that it is a place sacred to science, and too abstruse for the uninitiated, while others believe that the selection of the mountain site is all the progress that has been made towards the Lick Observatory. But both are mistaken. The superintendent is a very companionable and genial gentleman, who will adjust the instruments and explain their uses to any visitor, and the sight of stars at mid-day, marvelously magnified, the moon at night with its silver disk of molten lava and crater openings, planets resplendent in magnitude and gorgeous in color, are certainly pleasurable sights to all eyes. To the trained disciples of Galileo, and the students of Herschel and Proctor, I promise a most agreeable surprise, and recommend the trip as a very profitable substitute for mineral springs and fashionable seaside.

Two hours in the cars will take you to San José, and any stable there will furnish you with a two-horse team that will carry four persons to the observatory in about four hours, of thoroughly safe and exceedingly pleasant driving. Leave San José by Santa Clara Street, which is the direct road for three or four miles, and until you reach a wayside saloon, bearing very prominently and in large letters the sign "Junction House," where you turn to the right, and as Mount Hamilton is the main factor and only termination of this road, it will be impossible to miss it, unless you drive into barn-yards, which are the only deviations along its entire length.

Mount Hamilton was for many years the lookout for Joaquin, the famous California bandit, and his trails, caves, and haunts are yet visible in its environs.

The observatory peak is about thirteen miles, by an air-line, from San José, and twenty-six miles by the graded road, and the best graded road I ever saw, being from twelve to fourteen feet wide, and so gradual an elevator that the rise nowhere exceeds six and a half feet to the hundred. As you ascend the mountain side the view is a continuous but ever-changing panorama. The valley of Santa Clara lies at your feet, spotted with townships and studded with houses; yellow harvest-fields lie adjoining to and in picturesque contrast with emerald vineyards, and the city itself is changed to toy houses amid pigmy shrubbery; the glimmer of Monterey Bay in the distance, and the frowning summits of Mounts Pouchet, Story, Loma Prieta, and Mission and Murphy Peaks, with the more distant Block Mountain and Mounts Santana, Diablo, and Tamalpais, and even the snow-capped Shasta, form a picture of grandeur that more than compensates for the labor of its ascent.

At its summit I was prepared to see some attempt at the realization of this branch of the Lick Trust, but was astonished at the progress of the Trustees toward the completion of what will unquestionably be one of the largest and most complete observatories in the world. Already a substantial brick and stone-capped edifice, with a revolving roof of nickel, adorns its apex, in which a twelve-inch telescope of great power, with its rotary clock and other complicated but most accurately adjusted machinery, renders easy intercourse with the stars and planets a thing accomplished. But this building, with its solidity of walls and stone cores, on which the machinery rests in defiance of wind and storm, is but the avant-courier of still greater things, portrayed in the massive foundations now going up on every side, destined for the mammoth glass now in process of construction by Alvin Clark & Sons, of Massachusetts, and which instrument, it is confidently expected, will, with its many modern improvements, have no equal for power, clearness, and convenience of operation in the world.

In another building, due west from this, I found in excellent working order a first-class meridian or transit circle, which resembles a highly finished mortar gun of large calibre, narrowed at both ends, and hung in the centre on steel trunnions, and by which, with its spider lines across the glass and microscope micrometers, the size of stars is measured and their distances calculated. Scientists call this apparatus "the fundamental instrument of modern astronomy." But until very recently this instrument was operated at great disadvantage, and required the skill of two operators—one to observe the transit of the star, and the other to note the time of its passage. But even then the computation of fractions of a second was guessing, and of course inaccurate. But with the aid of electricity a most interesting and marvelously accurate instrument has been invented which marks upon a paper-covered revolving tube each second, and the minutest particle of a second during which the observation lasts. And this instrument (the electro chronograph) is controlled by a wire in the hand of the observer, who thus starts and stops it at his instantaneous will. Of course this is here also.

Outside of these structures, and in the open air, are two solid brick pillars, about seven feet high, on which the erection is partially completed of a first-class reflector, to be used in making drawings of lunar scenery and of the planets and nebulae, but the instrument not being in working order, I had to take the Superintendent's word as to its purpose and efficiency, for its complication of tubes and wheels conveys no idea of its use to the unskilled eye.

In still another structure there is a complete set of meteorological instruments for testing and recording temperature and humidity; two excellent barometers—one a large Aneroid graduated to hundredths of inches, and the other a standard mercury; an anemometer of great delicacy of movement, for measuring the velocity of the wind; a comet-seeker; two very delicate chronometers, particularly the one that keeps the stellar time—and to all of this the public have free access, and a large number of visitors, mainly from San José and that neighborhood, daily avail themselves of the privilege. But I would suggest right here, that unless the conditions of the Trust absolutely forbid it, a hotel should be established in the vicinage for the convenience of visitors who desire being there at night, without the necessity of sleeping out of doors or trespassing upon the Superintendent's hospitality, as their only alternative. The nearest accommodations for either man or beast are now at Smith's Springs, on the road to, but distant seven miles from the observatory.

The atmosphere of California at the 4,250 feet elevation of Mount Hamilton is singularly well adapted to astronomical work, and the future discoveries of this observatory will necessarily place it in the first rank of scientific labor. In illustration of that opinion is the fact that Professor Burnham, with a six-inch telescope of very ordinary power, while testing the atmospheric fitness of Mount Hamilton for the Lick Observatory, in 1880, discovered forty-two double stars that had up to that time escaped the vigilance of all astronomers. Therefore the capabilities of this location, with the thirty-six-inch glass now in process of construction, are beyond any positive computation.

Some newspaper comments having lately been made, on the propriety of the employment by the trustees of Mr. Fraser, as superintendent of the observatory, in justice to that gentleman I must be allowed to say that from a critical and thoroughly impartial examination of his duties and their performance, I arrived at the conclusion that he is more necessary to the place than the place is to him, for besides running house and farm, water-works, brick-kiln, blacksmith and carpenter shops, etc., intelligently, it is absolutely indispensable that every part of the many and complicated instruments now in place, and in process of erection, should be adjusted and put together with such precision as not to admit of a deviation in any direction of even one-thousandth part of an inch; and nearly all of this manipulation has been done by the Superintendent, who is a mechanic and an enthusiast in his work, and beyond all doubt, the most useful and efficient assistant that could have been selected. Of course his labors are directed in these particulars by Captain Floyd, who has the reputation of being one of the ablest mathematicians in America, and it was this familiarity with the whole subject of astronomy and observatories which guided Mr. Lick to his selection of Captain Floyd as a trustee.

SAN FRANCISCO, July 12, 1882.

"STELLA" VINDICATED.

A Letter from a San José Lady in Her Behalf.

EDITORS ARGONAUT: Did you see that outrageous thing in the Santa Cruz Sentinel about "Stella's" letter? I wish to say just this: "Stella" has my sincere thanks for the well-deserved dressing down she gave the louts who live at or frequent that delectable resort. Every word she wrote was truth, and she might have written twice as much, and put it twice as strong, and yet been truth. It strikes me that the Sentinel got its "back up" because she did tell the truth. I have been so annoyed by just what she complains of that I have quit going there during the season. I have been stared out of countenance, leered at, and even spoken to there, when I was going strictly and quietly about my business. It could not have been provoked by my good looks, for I have none. It could not have been my dress, for I always dress quietly, and in a way not to excite remark or attention. It could not have been my demeanor, for I certainly conduct myself like a womanly woman. (I object to the term "lady.") The only reason I could think of was this: Santa Cruz, from its nearness to the city and its eagerness to "get money," has made itself the resort of a loose class, and has encouraged them. Every woman without a male escort close at her heels is looked upon by the local and transient hooligan as "game," and so treated, implicitly or openly. That the town is full of loose women, no one who knows the place will deny; that they are encouraged to remain there everybody knows who read the Santa Cruz papers of a year ago, when there was a legal fight made to get rid of some of them; but it failed. The place has ten thousand advantages over Monterey, but it is no place for any decent woman to go unaccompanied by her husband or some near male relative. Not long ago I was visiting there, and wishing to get something at a store, my friend remarked: "We will have to wait until my husband comes home; we are hardly safe from insult if we go down there without him." She was a resident of the place. We waited. I have been at every place on this coast, from Humboldt Bay to Santa Monica. I have not found one place that excels Santa Cruz in point of natural attractiveness. Santa Cruz is ruining itself simply by its greed. If its people would content themselves with respectability instead of money for a few years, they could kill Monterey, and become really "the Long Branch of the Pacific." A.

SAN JOSE, July 18, 1882.

[NOTE.—The paragraph referred to above appeared in the Santa Cruz Sentinel of July 15, 1882. A number of friends have sent us marked copies. We would reproduce the paragraph, but its language is such as to render it unfit for publication—at least in San Francisco. But not, it would seem, in Santa Cruz.—ED.]

On Wednesday morning Dr. Harkness, of the Academy of Sciences, left for Carson, Nevada, where, in the excavations for the foundation of the new State prison, some wonderful discoveries have been made. A week ago a ledge of sandstone was reached, in which were found mammoth remains of surprising proportions, and in admirable condition. But the most wonderful discovery was the huge fossil foot-prints. Some of them are foot-prints of a mammoth man or ape, and measure twenty-two inches in length. They are a magnified fac-simile of the present human foot. Doctor Harkness has made arrangements for purchasing the lot, and for that purpose has taken the necessary implements to make casts of the bones, and to cut out and preserve the foot-prints in slabs. The value of this treasure-trove can not be estimated until a careful examination has been made.

The London Times says "It is pleasing to note that the average expenditure for strong drink of every man, woman, and child in England has fallen from twenty-nine dollars in 1875 to sixteen in 1881," but gives no reason for this reduction in the price of drinks.

Mr. Charles Phelps, editor and proprietor of the Californian, announces that he has sold his entire interest to Mr. Warren Cheney, who will henceforth conduct the magazine.

THE CANAL QUESTION IN CONGRESS.

It became the duty of the writer, three months since, to appear before the Congressional Committee on Foreign Affairs on behalf of the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua. The recent events in Egypt, and the probabilities of the near future in that country, give special emphasis to some of the assertions I had the honor of making at that time, and renew the interest among close observers of current events in the political consideration of the interoceanic canal question. I say the political consideration. Did the merchants and agriculturists of the Pacific Coast realize the assured results and enormous benefits which would accrue to them especially, and to our Pacific commonwealths generally, they would make the passage of the incorporation act a leading issue of the political campaign near at hand, and insist upon prompt Congressional action, instead of leaving the work of pushing this beneficent measure in the hands of the three active and influential commercial bodies in Oregon and California. The future will place the stamp of its approval upon the intelligent minds which have grasped this question. To serve the community in which we live, the country of our patriotic love, and the mercantile interests which enter into one's life-work, this is an honorable ambition. Gentlemen actuated by such motives can afford to await results. However, it is with political propositions in this connection that we have now to deal, and I beg to call the reader's attention to a portion of the evidence before the committee alluded to:

The Nicaragua Canal concession is a remarkable one, gentlemen of the committee. Allow me to explain why. I know the President and the statesmen of that country; I have associated with them, and had business with them. At the time when the application was made for that concession, the Central American governments were afraid of the French. All Central American countries remember what occurred a few years since in Mexico, and the Nicaraguan Government, probably actuated by this feeling, objected to any concession that might get into French hands. The act of concession to an American company was introduced into the legislature and passed, after they had declined passing such an act at the request of Count de Lesseps and his associates, represented by the eminent French engineer, Blanchet. It was passed because they felt that the United States was friendly to their country, and that we were the only great power upon which they could rely for fair treatment. They gave this concession practically for two centuries, as against other concessions for one century. If you do not take advantage of it, you will never get another like it, because some other government will take it up, and solve the interoceanic problem. Then, without a collision we shall never occupy the position which now awaits our acceptance. Now, gentlemen, I would like to convince you that this canal question means build, buy, or fight, and that the fight will come within ten or twelve years. I assure you the canal question controls our Central American policy. If we construct a canal, or take a canal under our protection, we shall acquire a preponderating commercial and political influence with all Central America, which will place our nation where it deserves to stand, as the leading power on this continent. But if we do not either build or buy, the time will soon come when we will have to fight or "take a back seat." That is just what this question means, gentlemen. And it is not a question on which you can delay. It is a question that presses upon us for solution. In a very few years we shall be forced face to face with it, and I do not want to see my country superseded in its influence among those Central American nations that did have some little respect for us a while ago. I want to see our position maintained as the leading nation on this continent. Those powers depend upon us for protection, and when they see upon the Isthmus of Panama a condition of things that is not permissible with due regard to our self-respect, they will begin to look down on us.

How soon have events verified the value of these ideas! The guns of the British fleet, enforcing the edict that the Suez Canal is temporarily closed by order of the British Government, appear to vindicate, in the most forcible manner, the value of the arguments then placed before the committee. It remains for Congress to heed a warning so timely and so impressive. If events can prove anything, American statesmen and American merchants should be satisfied that an American interoceanic canal must be under the control of our government, jointly with that of the power through whose territory it is constructed, if we would maintain our self-respect, our commercial influence, and our national prestige. While the most eminent men of both political parties, and the administration, favor the policy of a canal constructed at Nicaragua, under the conditions necessary for our national peace and prosperity, there are too many who are indifferent and uninformed as to the conditions involved, although it is but due to all our Pacific Coast representatives to state that they are doing what they can to insure the passage of the incorporation act which guarantees the construction of an interoceanic canal under American auspices. The writer heard one of the most influential members of Congress tell the Foreign Affairs Committee that it would be better for the United States to pay forty millions outright than to lose the present opportunity offered by the Government of Nicaragua. The Suez Canal being the key of England's pathway to India, we can not wonder that for its control she is ready to put forth all her strength, if necessary. Still the careful student of this question will arrive at the conclusion that the control of an American interoceanic canal is of still greater importance to our country than the Suez Canal can be to England. Not only would it be the passage-way for a great portion of our foreign commerce, but it would be an integral part of the coast-wise route between the east and the west coasts of the United States. Any European power controlling it would not only dominate our foreign and coastwise commerce, but would at the same time exercise a political and commercial preponderance over our sister republics of Central and South America ruinous to our interests. The thunder of England's guns at Alexandria conveys a lesson to every American heart that throbs with patriotic impulse. When a government loses the respect of its own citizens it is on the road to dissolution, and the American people will not fail to uphold the statesman who protects the honor and cherishes the prestige of his native land. We are rich enough and powerful enough to have a foreign policy; not aggressive, for that would not be in harmony with our institutions and our history, but firm, decisive, and self-respecting. The lesson we have received at Alexandria should not be forgotten. We are to have an interoceanic canal; it will be the gateway to the Pacific. Our interests, our patriotic impulses, and the necessity of our position, alike enforce upon us the absolute necessity for American control, and the statesmen who understand the temper of the American people when they fully comprehend the issues involved, will not fail to see the path of duty plainly marked.

WILLIAM J. MERRY,
SAN FRANCISCO, July 21, 1882.

PUBLISHERS' NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
Subscription, $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance—postage prepaid. City subscribers served by carriers at $4.50 per year, or 10 cents per week. Sample copies free. Single copies, 10 cents.
Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."
A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

ENTERED AT THE SAN FRANCISCO POSTOFFICE AS SECOND CLASS MATTER.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PIXLEY - - - - - Editor.

SATURDAY, JULY 22, 1882.

CONTENTS:

Page.	Page.
EDITORIALS:	EDITORIAL NOTES:
A Review of the Democratic Platform and its Framers—The Profound Learning Displayed by Some of the Delegates on the Sunday Law—The Opportunity Which is Now Afforded to the Republicans—A Few Good Candidates for State Officers in the Coming Election—Is Our City Attorney the Servant of the Mob?	Shall we Have Sundays Without Gin?—Have Saloon-keepers Better Rights than Bankers?—Senator Logan's Bill to Permit the Chinese to Pass Through This Country—The Democratic Indignation Over Republican Method—The Cause of the Oppressed Egyptians.....
Let's B.....8-9	MOORE HAMILTON.....7
"Flip": Part II.....2	THE CANAL QUESTION IN CONGRESS.....7
DINING AT DELMONICO'S.....2	FLUTSAM AND JETSAM.....10
ECHOES FROM EVERYWHERE.....3	OLD FAVORITES.....10
SOCIETY NOTES AND Gossip.....4	LITERARY NOTES.....10
DECORATIVE ART NOTES.....4	THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.....11
CORRESPONDENCE.....4	BETSY B.'S LETTER.....12
OUR MEXICAN NEIGHBORS.....5	SCRIBNER BRICA-BRAC.....12
VANITY FAIR.....6	INNER MAN.....14
THE TROTTER-HORSE REPORTER.....6	THE TUNEFUL LIAR.....14

In continuation of our last week's suggestions, let us review the Democratic platform, and consider the men by whom and the conditions under which it was formulated. And right here and now, at the very beginning of the campaign, let us admit that in the Democratic party of California there are a large number of honest and most excellent citizens, who are honorable in their motives and earnest in their desire to secure good government. Why this class should be divided from the same class in the Republican party is one of the anomalies of our political organization. Having admitted so much, we assert, as an indisputable fact, that the larger part of the criminal classes, the most ignorant of foreign and native-born, the most bigoted and superstitious of all nationalities, the most unprincipled of machine politicians, and the most unscrupulous of law-breakers are Democrats. We state further that they are Democrats because in that party they find greater immunity for their offenses than in the Republican party. God knows that there are enough of this kind among the Republicans; but there are less than among the Democrats. And now that we may not be misunderstood in our somewhat broad indictment, we declare that all of the more important efforts at resistance of law, those that have occurred within the last twenty years, are attributable to Democrats; notably the civil war, and the local uprisings, and the riots that have occurred in the country within that time. The civil war was an evil of native growth. We can not charge it upon any other than our own people. The Philadelphia riots of the olden times were specimens of native Americanism. The underground railroad of the Quakers and other abolitionists, John Brown and his business—all of these things we are willing should not be saddled upon the Democracy. But since the civil war there has been no serious attempt to resist the law except by Democrats and foreigners; and of all foreigners the most riotous have been the Irish, and that is simply because they are more ignorant, more bigoted, and in every respect more unprincipled than any other class. The Germans, as a rule, are good citizens, law-abiding, and willing to recognize the rights and respect the property of others. The Irish are, as a rule, Democrats; the Germans, as a rule, Republicans. The better class of Irish are Republicans; and as Irishmen become intelligent, and acquire property, they are very apt to join the Republican party. The more ignorant and unprincipled of the Germans are liable to become Democrats; and if, for any unlawful purpose they organize to resist the law, they prepare in a body to go over to the Democracy. The Germans of San Francisco are, as a body, good citizens; but no sooner had a minority of them determined to resist the law by the formation of a league, than they prepared to become Democrats. No sooner had the League of Freedom been called into existence, than the Democratic party determined to bid for its vote. It is so everywhere. If the Sand-lot, composed of foreign adventurers, says "the Chinese must go," the Democratic party in convention take up the insolent demand, and in defiance of decency, policy, and common sense, declares itself in favor of the removal of every Mongolian from the country. This is to pander to the Irish vote. The Democratic party is inconsistent, for while it declares that the Chinese must leave the country, its orators, writers, and ward flunkies denounce the Argonaut for saying that the Irishmen must behave themselves while they remain in it. Mussel Slough revolts against the law, and sets at defiance the mandate of the courts of the United States. The Democracy has not the courage to rebuke this lawlessness, for fear of losing votes. There is a controversy pending in the courts between the miners and farmers, and the cowardly Democracy dares not even say that the decision of one of its own judges—Jackson Temple—is the law of the case until it is repealed by an appellate tribunal. The Democratic party, finding that a popular prejudice exists against corporations, at once endeavors to fan the embers into a flame, and proposes, in defiance of law and in subversion of all rights of property, to confiscate railroads. It declares land-grants forfeited, well knowing that that is a judicial question, depending upon facts; that railroads should pay taxes at full values, well knowing that all corporation property is assessable and taxable under the same laws that assess and tax all other property; that it will reduce fares and freights by a sweeping percentage, without reference to the rights of transportation companies, without knowledge of their business, and ignoring the general principle that the legislature has no other or higher right to regulate the cost of transporting freight or passengers by steam than by coach, or to regulate express companies and all other common carriers, or hotels, or any other business holding similar relations to the public.

The resolution of the Hon. Tom Fowler, to reduce the railroad rates twenty per cent., was greedily accepted by the late Democratic Convention, not one individual of whom knew, or pretended to know, what would be the effect of such a law, if it could be enforced, or whether railroads could be operated under it; or whether, if it was carried out, Mr. Tom Fowler, of Tulare, would not be compelled either to walk or ride his brother to the next Democratic State Convention. The Hon. David S. Terry accepted it, and all the lawyers in the convention swallowed the resolution. Then came the grand contest of the convention. It was over the Sunday law. This question, divested of the sacrilegious and shameful pretense that selling whisky and lager beer on Sunday involves a question of freedom of conscience and right to worship God—this question was intelligently presented by D. J. Antrem, of Alameda, who declared, in substance, that it was done to catch the votes of those whisky and beer venders who, in defiance of law, persist in selling on Sunday. He charges in direct language that the League of Freedom is an organization banded together to defeat the ends of justice, and that it packs juries, and strives to bribe judges. He declared that no honest member of any Christian denomination, Protestant or Catholic, can stand on a plank that repeals the Sunday law, and meet his God. He also hinted that the committee had been packed in the liquor and anti-Sunday law interest. The resolution was defended by Judge Terry in a characteristic speech, assuming the broad position that it is in violation of the constitution that Sunday should be in any sense distinguished from other days, or any enactment be made to set it apart as a day of rest. His speech was a sneer at religion, at law, at tradition, and all custom or sentiment that sets apart Sunday as a day of rest, recreation, and religious observance. Then Mr. Whipple, of Sonoma, aired his very imperfect knowledge of the word "sumptuary," by an argument in opposition to sumptuary laws. As most of the Argonaut's readers have a dictionary at their houses, they may see how very absurd that word seems in the Democratic platform, or in Mr. Whipple's mouth, as applied to the Sunday law. The Salic law, or the law of Gavelkind would, in its use, have been equally appropriate. Judge McGarvey, of Mendocino, declared that the resolution passed the committee by "legerdemain"; that it would be a "firebrand" in the ranks of the party, and would "ruin" it. Judge Flournoy called the Sunday law a sumptuary law. We advise him to consult his law dictionary. But he had the political honesty to admit that the Sunday law was the "livest issue" before the people of this State. We use his language: "A live issue that the Democratic party should be proud to come up to." Mr. Holloway had some idea of the meaning of the term "sumptuary law." He said this: "So far as my constituents are concerned, you might as well cut up the Democratic party. [Cheers.] There are not enough Democratic orators in the State of California to convince the people that we do not mean the repeal of the Sunday law. My constituents declared to me at the primaries that they would not vote for any party that advocated the repeal of the Sunday law." Mr. O'Grady, of Fresno, favored "the repale of the law, for fear that Mrs. O'Grady would lave him if he was not forninst it." Mr. O'Grady, of Fresno, not only spoke for himself and for Mrs. O'Grady, but for the church element, and for "South Methodist who never scratch." Mr. Oulahan, of San Joaquin, was deeply pained at the reflections cast upon a class of Democratic voters who worshiped at the shrine of Bacchus, King Barleycorn, and the Emperor Gambrinus. We quote from the Call the following sentence: "I must say I was sorry to hear a gentleman on this platform uttering such a sentiment as that a church voter is as good as a 'whisky voter.'" Mr. Oulahan, of San Joaquin, undoubtedly appreciates the value of that whisky voter who votes early and votes often, takes a drink, changes his coat, and continues on voting often and late. Mr. Morehouse, of Monterey, declared that to pass a resolution in favor of a Sunday law "would raise a stir in the convention." Declaring himself a member of the Methodist Church South, and one who never scratched his ticket, he characterized this resolution as a "firebrand," and when the roll of counties was called upon striking out the clause that demanded the repeal of the Sunday law, Alameda, with its machine delegation, voted twenty solid noes; Santa Clara, solid thirteen, and San Francisco, with its gin-mill delegation, one hundred and five solid. From the greater cities of San Francisco, Sacramento, Oakland, and San José, where the liquor interest is strongest, and from the village delegations of the counties, such as Vallejo, in Solano, ninety-nine per cent. of the delegates voted for unlimited gin—for that freedom of conscience that delights to exercise itself in a whisky saloon or lager-beer saloon on Sunday, and the liberty to worship God in those devil's dens where strychnine and tanglefoot are the communion wines. We have discussed these resolutions at length because we know they will be dodged in this campaign. The Democracy are already endeavoring to wriggle out of the consequences of this anti-Sunday law business. We do not believe it can succeed. The Democracy, in order to secure the whisky-seller's and whisky-drinker's vote, and the vote of lager-drinking Germans, has deliberately said to the working men, salaried employees, clerks, mechanics, artisans, toilers, and business men: "You shall have no law to protect you in the setting apart of one day as a day of rest." It has deliberately declared to the religious people and church members, both Protestant and Catholic: "Your Sunday worship shall not be protected by law from disturbance. In the absence of a Sunday law the boiler-maker may ply his vocation next door to cathedral or church. Tivoli, Winter Garden, and beer saloons may play their hands of music with open doors, and there shall be nothing to distinguish Sunday from the other days of the week." This thing the Democratic party has done in order to gain votes. It is the unprincipled effort of an unprincipled party to gain political power. The anti-monopoly resolution is a sham. The cry is a hollow pretense, in which there is neither honesty nor sincerity. The gubernatorial candidate is, so far as his opposition to railroads is concerned, a sham and a humbug. He came from Los Angeles to the State Convention at San José on a free railroad pass. He went back to Los Angeles as a railroad deadhead. He went from San Francisco to the East and returned on a free pass. And these are things which a proud, sincere, earnest, and independent opponent of the railroad company would not do. The men nominated for railroad commissioners, and the mode of their nomination, are in no sense assuring of any railroad opposition, and assuredly not of any honest opposition. The Democratic party in California is what it has been for twenty years—a cowardly sham, destitute of courage, intelligence, or principle.

The Republican party has now the opportunity to demonstrate that it has principles, intelligence and courage, by the platform it shall dare to enact, and the candidates it shall have the boldness to propose. The occasion presents itself to show that it is what it has claimed to be—the party of moral ideas, the party that is steadfast in upholding the law and in protecting the rights of property; that it is, in that broader sense, the American party—an American party under the banners of which all law-abiding and self-respecting foreigners will be glad to enroll themselves. Let the convention avoid the example of the Democracy, and instead of repeating, as they do from year to year, the meaningless formula of endorsing their own past, "as illustrated by the teachings and example of a long line of Democratic statesmen and patriots," etc., let the Republicans omit this preamble of self-laudation. Let them refrain from mention of the civil war, and show that they are willing to let such national recollections repose during this State contest. Let them refrain from endorsing the administration of President Arthur, for there is a difference of opinion among men who intend to vote the Republican ticket, and who think themselves pretty good Republicans, in reference to some of his acts; and the administration will not be endorsed except under a vigorous protest and roll-call of delegates. If the Republicans desire to pass compliments to the working men of the nation, and approve their acts, let this resolution be so drawn that it shall be quite clearly understood that in endorsing labor movements and working men, it does not approve of the Molly Maguires in Pennsylvania, and the riots that burn and destroy under the guise of labor strikes. Let the party be careful that it does not countenance the cowardly and selfish policy that prevents boys from learning trades, nor Sand-lot agitators, who disguise politics under the mask of labor movements, nor conspiracies of Irish against Chinese. And let the convention be very careful that it does not confound idlers, tramps, and political adventurers with the eminently respectable and honorable class that toils; and that it does not confound criminals, vagabonds, and loafers with working men. In reference to the Chinese question, let it simply declare what is right, and what every sensible man in California recognizes as the true policy in reference to the Chinese question, the principle that is embodied in the law of Congress, viz.: We desire to arrest further Chinese immigration, and we recognize that we have no legal right to drive those Chinese away who are now here, but that they are entitled to the equal protection of law with any other class of foreigners who have come to our shores. Let it not be too cowardly to declare that the Chinese question has, by the act of Congress, been taken out of honest politics for ten years, and that none but the Pope's political Irish are now agitating a dead issue. There might be a short paragraph in that connection declaring that boycotting is un-American, cowardly, and altogether contemptible. Let the Republican Convention unreservedly resolve that the Sunday law shall not be repealed; and if there is any class of Germans or other foreigners who claim the right to come to America for the purpose of making drunks on Sunday, let it be taught that we have traditions, customs, and laws older than their immigration, and more dear to us than their presence; that they shall not be permitted to violate existing laws with impunity so long as Americans outnumber them, and that the League of Freedom is, in the opinion of the Republican party, a criminal conspiracy against the law for which every one of its active members should be punished by fine and imprisonment. In reference to railroad taxes, let the convention declare that railroad property ought to be valued and taxed exactly the same as other property; that it should be treated in the courts the same as all other property; that railroad owners, stockholders, and managers should be dealt with under the law, like other people; that the forfeiture or nonforfeiture of railroad land grants is a question of law, dependent upon facts to be determined by the courts; that the regulation of fares and freights, if pushed to the extension of confiscation, is a cowardly robbery under guise of law; and that the present agitation against monopolies, and the present drift of the ignorant and unprincipled toward agrarian and communistic crimes, indicate a political movement that is dangerous to every man who owns property and who works at any honest employment, or who is interested in the preservation of order and good government. Upon the debris question, let it be remembered that this is a property question now in the courts. Judge Temple has decided it in favor of the farmers as against the miners. Judge Temple's decision is the law of the case until reversed. No Republican convention, candidate or orator, has the right even to discuss this question while it is pending in the courts. The Republican party is composed of intelligent men. Their interests, and the interests of localities and of pursuits differ. Republicans differ in opinions. Let there be opportunity for difference of opinion within the party, and upon those questions in which no principle is involved let the convention be silent. Then for State officers, or candidates for office, give us men of intelligence and high personal character. Demand from them but few pledges; trust to their antecedents and to their honor. Let the active politician who has been intriguing for nomination for governor; who has in his employ the vile machine in San Francisco; who is working in the shadow of county court-houses, and among the small politicians of the cross-roads; who in the town boasts of his granger strength, and in the country that the merchants favor him; who has promised the anti-slickens men of Marysville that he is their friend on the sly; who argues to the wine-grower that he has a vineyard, and to the Good Templars that he drinks no wine; to the Methodist that he favors the Sunday law, and to the League that he will not veto its repeal—let this ambitious statesman be beaten, and beaten at the convention, for it will save him trouble, and will relieve him from being beaten by the people. Let the men who are intriguing for place on the Railroad Commission and Board of Equalization be smoked out and exposed, and for these offices let us have neither the body-lice of rich men, nor the parasites of railroads, nor the howling demagogues who, for popularity and votes, have the shameless audacity to proclaim their personal hatred to the owners of property, and who think it good party politics to bleed enterprise and blackmail the prosperous. In other words, let the Republican party dare to be honest, both in its platform and its candidates. Let it presume that the average voter is intelligent enough to know that all his interests are identified with honest administration. Let the delegates to the Republican State Convention presume that the voter knows as much and is as patriotic and is as much interested in the welfare of the State as he is. Let him understand that the party never succeeds by indirection and fraud as well as by open and manly conduct. Let this convention know and fully realize the fact that a majority of the voters of this State are of American birth; that a majority of all other nationalities, except the Irish and other exclusively Catholic races, such as Portuguese and Italians, are Republicans, and that the Germans are not all lager-beer drinkers; that a vote among the Germans alone would disclose a majority vote for upholding the law; that the Catholic clergy, and a very large number of the better class of the Irish are in favor of preserving the Sunday law un repealed; that all other denominations of Christians favor its retention upon our statute book; that all temperance men are in favor of closing drinking saloons on Sunday; that the Jews do not now, and never have, agitated this question, but are a model class—a model even to Americans in their obedience to the law. With a platform of the kind we have outlined, with candidates of the character we have suggested, and with a campaign active, aggressive, and fearless, there can be but one result.

In reply to a letter received from a personal and political friend in San Bernardino, asking whom we desired as Republican candidate for governor, we answer: The Argonaut has no candidate; is not in anybody's confidence; belongs to no section of the party; and yet it has its opinions upon all public questions, and its choice as to all public men. If today we could make the governor of California, it would be Newton Booth. He has had experience, and our confidence in his intelligent integrity is strengthened by our observation of his public career. We would prefer next to him the Hon. John F. Swift, because of our knowledge of his ability and our appreciation of his thorough independence. For the fun of an heroic campaign, under a broad-minded, brave leader; for a campaign against the world, the flesh, and the devil, Democracy, rum, and the Pope's political Irish, we would choose Jim McM. Shafter. If we felt compelled to seek availability, and were yet unwilling, even for the sake of success, to have a man in the gubernatorial chair who is unable to fill it; in a word, if we wanted a good candidate and a good governor, one who, from residence and occupation, was outside of local jealousies; who would not revive Dolly Varden times and Greeley times; who could not be charged with being a corporation flunky nor a pig-headed enemy of the railroad system; who does not think the right to drink gin on Sunday is freedom of conscience and right to worship God; who would not persecute a Chinaman to please an Irishman; who would not, in order to get votes, apostrophize a drunken tramp, smoking his dhudeen under a haystack, as an enthroned king of labor; who would not be either a rich man's parasite or a poor man's sycophant; a self-respecting, independent representative of both wealth and labor—wealth that he honestly earned, and labor that he himself performs—we would choose Joseph Russ, farmer, dairyman, and lumberman, working man and gentleman, of Humboldt County. He has been twice in the legislature, and was honest. He went to the National Convention at Chicago with the writer of this article, and voted for James G. Blaine, first, last, and every time. He is a wealthy, intelligent, honest, generous, and respectable citizen, and if his friends and Republican neighbors of the northern counties will bring down a delegation for him, we of the centre and the south will give him a fair hearing and a generous consideration. We should very willingly see Charles Felton, of San Mateo, governor of this State. We believe him possessed of capacity, courage, and thorough integrity. We sincerely hope that neither M. M. Estee, nor George Evans, nor Horace Davis will get the nomination of the party. We have our reasons, and they are good ones; and we honestly believe that if either of these is nominated he will be defeated. That we do not give these reasons is an evidence that the Argonaut is neither as independent nor as bold as some of its friends credit it with being. There are some things one can not say of personal and party friends unless the persons themselves challenge the exposition. Mr. Estee would make an excellent Railroad Commissioner. So would Governor Booth, whose name has been mentioned in that connection, but who, we are sure, would not take it. George Evans would make a good candidate for Lieutenant-Governor, and in the event of his election would make a better presiding officer of the Senate than anybody we know. Horace Davis was an excellent member of Congress, but he has fallen into bad company—(political.) Lansing B. Mizner, of Benicia, would make an excellent Attorney-General. Fred Castle, Captain Merry, or Frank Whittier would make Railroad Commissioners who would be acceptable to the people, and ought to be acceptable to the railroad companies. Henry Edgerton would make a most eloquent representative in Congress, and for candidate-at-large would be strong. W. W. Morrow has qualities that would make him a most useful member of Congress; there are few young men in our State who would be more serviceable. Governor Wood, of Santa Clara, is an orator, and so far as we are advised of his qualifications for a representative, would make a good one. If we could name the Treasurer, we would, as against any man in California, give it to Cyrus Wheeler, of Sacramento, the senior member of the firm of Booth & Co. James McM. Shafter is available material for Congress. There are good men all over California for its offices. There is one danger that ought to be avoided in convention, and that is bargaining for candidates. One county comes with a delegation solid for some local candidate, and trades, swaps, barters, forms combinations, and intrigues with other delegates to exchange votes. This is politics, but it is mean and nasty politics, and if we get into the convention and catch anybody at that work, we will expose it, and if any living man gets a candidacy by any such work, we will oppose the business, if we can find it out, and defeat the candidate, if we can, even if his defeat shall elect a worse man. We hope our Republican friends in the country will send unpledged delegations of their best men. The chances are that our San Francisco delegation will be a made-up compromise between two sets of small ward politicians; one under the respectable name of "milkmen," and the other, the old machine set. These "milkmen" are skim-milk politicians masquerading in the cream of purity, one wing of which is endeavoring to circumvent the devil to get a father-in-law in office; the other has set its heart and trousers pocket upon getting a gubernatorial nomination for M. M. Estee—and that is the important reason why we hope he will not succeed.

It is some seven or eight years since the Bulletin has been waging war against the Spring Valley Water Company to determine the question as to whether the company should supply water for municipal use free of charge to the city, which, interpreted by the laws of common sense, and tested as a practical result, declared that private consumers should pay for all water used by the city for the public. The Bulletin and Call have harped upon the question in season and out of season. They have carried it into politics, into social life, and into the courts. At the last municipal election for Mayor, Supervisors, and administrative officers, it was made THE issue. The Bulletin and Call columns were filled with one continuous tirade against Spring Valley. It was wearisome, day after day, week after week, month after month, and year after year, to have the reader's otherwise acceptable evening and morning journal devoted to a false argument to convince him that he ought to pay two prices for water for his domestic use so that the general property of speculators, absentees, and owners of merchandise might pay nothing. The people revolted against this sham, smoked the motive of personal vindictiveness, accepted the issue, went to the polls upon the water question, and triumphed. It was not a triumph of the Spring Valley Water Company, but a triumph of small consumers. The candidates who would not pledge themselves in favor of "free water" to the city, which meant dear water to the citizen, were elected over the candidates who pledged everything, and were willing to pledge more. Supervisors who refused to wear the manacles of the twin journals were elected. The City Attorney, who sold out his comrades on the Republican ticket by over-bidding for free water buncombe, was elected by the skin of his teeth. The Supreme Court having decided against "free municipal water," the Bulletin and Call have inspired Mr. Cowdery, their attorney, to move for a rehearing. The Supervisors, having been instructed and commanded by the writ of the highest court of the State to fix rates for water supplies for all municipal purposes, are willing to obey the command without further contest, and by this means expect to reduce the rates of householders from twenty to thirty per cent. By a vote of eleven to one, they have instructed the City Attorney to withdraw the petition for rehearing and reargument, and now we will see whether Mr. Cowdery is the attorney of the city, which instructs him through its legalized authority, or the attorney of the Bulletin and Call, who enjoy the luxury of an attorney who does their bidding while he draws his salary from the people who pay the taxes. The resolutions passed by the Board read as follows:

Whereas, By a late decision of the Supreme Court in the case of the Spring Valley Water Works vs. the Board of Supervisors of the City and County of San Francisco, the question of the city's liability to pay for the water used for the purpose of sprinkling streets, cleaning sewers, irrigating public parks and plazas, the extinguishment of fires, and other public uses has been determined, and is in general with the expressed views and action of the Board; and

Whereas, This decision is one acceptable to the general public, inasmuch as it establishes the principle that property shall bear a portion of the expense of a plentiful supply of water for all public purposes to the relief of the present water-rate payers of this city and county; and

Whereas, The principle has been endorsed by the action of the people at large at the polls during the last municipal election; and

Resolved, That the City and County Attorney he and he is hereby instructed and required to withdraw his application for a rehearing of the said case of the Spring Valley Water Works vs. the Board of Supervisors of this city and county.

In conclusion of our opinion in the premises, we say that, as this question of "free water" has been decided by the people at a municipal election, by the Supreme Court of the State, and by the Board of Supervisors, the Bulletin, Call, and Cowdery ought to submit, and as they will have to submit, we suggest that they do so gracefully, and give us from this never-ending controversy.

FLOTSAM AND JETSAM.

At Berlin, on June 9, twenty-one members of the German Parliament, on the invitation of a Doctor Hermes, sat down to discuss an omelet composed of forty-three eggs laid by one of the serpents in the Berlin aquarium.

According to the author of "Through Siberia," English is the best language for telegraphy; for by means of it more can be expressed in fewer words than in any other. The Russians prefer to use English rather than their own language for telegrams.

The many collectors of postage stamps may follow in the steps of a Benedictine monk, who has solved the mystery of their usefulness, and with them has papered the wall of a room in the monastery in a most ingenious and effective manner. In three months he collected eight hundred thousand stamps, sorted them according to their colors, and then arranged them in a variety of animal and other designs, such as flowers, mottoes, and inscriptions, together with the date of the day when the task was finished.

The Chinese have long been in the habit of printing "sleeve editions" of the classics to assist candidates at the competitive examination whose memories are not sufficiently retentive. A similar benevolent idea has lately induced a native merchant at Shanghai to print a diamond edition of the "P'ei won yun foo," one of the largest lexicons in the language, consisting of one hundred and six books. That it might be small enough to be easily hidden in the candidates' sleeves, or plaited in their queues, it was necessary to print it in so small a type that the editor announces in his advertisement that he will supply a magnifying glass to each purchaser, to enable him to read it.

The Salem, Mass., museum has in its possession a cherry-stone containing one dozen silver spoons. The stone is of the ordinary size, the spoons being so small that their shape and finish can be distinguished only by the microscope. Dr. Oliver gives an account of a cherry-stone on which was carved one hundred and twenty-four heads, so distinctly that the naked eye could distinguish those belonging to popes and kings by their mitres and crowns. A Nuremberg clock-maker inclosed in a cherry-stone a plan of Sebastopol, a railway station, and the "Messiah" of Klopstock. Pliny, too, mentions that Homer's "Iliad," with its fifteen thousand verses, was written in so small a space as to be contained in a nut-shell. A copy of the Bible was written by a chancery clerk in so small a space that it could be inclosed in a walnut shell.

The Käfernburg "Willkomm" furnishes ample evidence of the degeneracy of the art of drinking in Germany. That willkomm is a tankard in the shape of a huntsman's hagle, capable of containing about four quarts. Whoever visited the castle of the Counts of Käfernburg (one of the three Gleichen, near Arnstadt), was invited to empty the drinking-horn at one quaff. The names of those who attempted the task were put on record, which distinctly stated to what extent they had succeeded. Until 1866 only such drinkers were named as actually emptied the horn. From that year until 1868 only one-half of those who made the attempt achieved the feat. From 1868 to 1700 not one of the visitors was able to accomplish it, and since then no one appears to have even attempted it. The drinking-horn and the record are preserved as historical curiosities in the so-called Prince's House at Arnstadt.

M. Barbier, a French mathematician of eminence, has for the last twenty years been investigating the subject of pitch-and-toss. He has flipped up a common penny piece, and collected and analyzed the results in groups of ten thousand "flips," coming to the conclusion that in any ten thousand "flips" there will be five thousand "heads" and five thousand "tails." Sometimes the "heads" will come out fifteen or twenty ahead; but on the next ten thousand "tails" will catch up, or vice versa. It is not stated whether M. Barbier investigated a more interesting and practical part of the subject—his own "personal equation" in the game of pitch-and-toss, and the possibility of winning thereat by scientific play. For instance, if a penny is tossed up one hundred times, it will probably come up "head" fifty times and "tail" fifty times; but if a player undertakes to call each toss he will not be right fifty times.

Mr. James Greenwood, in his English grammar of 1711, says many pleasant and suggestive things. He says: "One ought not promiscuously to write every noun with a great letter, as is the fashion of some now adays." He says: "Our ancestors misliked nothing more in King Edward the Confessor than that he was Frenchified." He says: "Hern, 'ourn,' 'yourn,' 'hien,' for 'hers,' 'ours,' 'yours,' 'his,' 'is bad English.' He says: "'Yes' is more usual and modish than 'yea.' 'I' for 'yes,' is used in a hasty or merry way, as 'I sir, I sir'; and sometimes we use 'ay'; but this way of affirming is rude and ungentle." He says: "They say that the Americans bordering on New England * * * can not pronounce either an 'l' or 'r,' but use 'n' instead of it; so for 'lobster' they say 'nolsten.'" He says, in respect of dialect at home: "Whereas the inhabitants about London would say: 'I would eat more cheese if I had it,' a Northern man would speak it: 'Ay sud eat mare cheese gyn ay had it,' and a Western man: 'Cbud eat more cheese an chad it.'"

A Frenchman, who is evidently an ardent explorer of the realms of dreamland, has recently made some curious experiments upon himself, and as a result has announced to the world that it is possible to control dreams, and make them either pleasant or otherwise. His method is to stimulate the brain through the agency of heat, and to place the body in certain positions. He finds that by bandaging his head with a layer of wadding his dreams always become sane and intelligent. As regards the position of the body, the results, so far as the nature of the dreams are concerned, are varied. For example, when he lay upon his back, he experienced luxuriant and sensorial dreams. To sleep on the right side brought him dreams which were absurd and full of exaggeration, and which brought old matters vividly back to his mind. While lying on his left side, the exaggerated character of the visions disappeared. They became sensible and intelligible, and recalled more recent experiences. The phenomenon of speech in slumber was also more apt to be noted while the body lay in this posture.

The advertising columns of a widely circulated newspaper are printed in a language peculiar to themselves. It embraces the technical phrases of every calling known to man, and is more condensed even than communication by telegraph; for while in a telegram words are economized, in an advertisement even the space the words occupy, after they have been pruned to the finest point, is closely limited. In the "help wanted" columns of the New York Sun, for instance, an advertiser seeking skilled operators on Wheeler & Wilson's sewing-machines, advertised for "experienced W. & W. operators." The same sense of saving prompted the man who wrote: "Wanted—Boy to kick Gordon, and make himself useful." Gordon meaning a Gordon job-printing press, and kicking being the technical term for working the treadle of the press with the feet of the operator. The notice in the same column of "A Peerless feeder wanted" indicates the sort of press that is to be fed with blank sheets of paper, and not any desire on the advertiser's part to get a person of unprecedented appetite. In spite of the saving, the sense is usually quite clear, as in the demands for "experienced female hands on cloaks," "burial-robe hands," "bead bands on laces," "paper-boxes—glue hands," "scarf hands," and "shoe salesman, apply, etc." Less apparent is the meaning of the call for a "boy in salt store to fill small pockets," or the demand for "two buffers," "hands on piquets," "yardman at hotel," "a rubber-in," "man to rough tune and chip up," and "a castor-place servant" or "a young girl improver." The advertisement for a girl "to sew and paste white hairs in furs" is, on the other hand, too plain "to sew and paste white hairs in furs" is a marked characteristic in the columns of "Help wanted—females," where the old-fashioned word woman is dropped and lady substituted in offers for foreladies, salesladies, lady canvassers, and lady cashiers. "A boy as dishwasher," is asked for in one advertisement, and in another, calling for a horseshoer, the caution is added, "No society men need apply."

OLD FAVORITES.

Cupid Schooled.
When she was gay as a linnet,
And I was as fresh as a lark,
Never a day but some minute
We met betwixt dawning and dark.
"Katie, and when shall we marry?"
"Marry?" she said, with a sigh—
"That's cake and ribbons on Monday,
And sorrow ere Saturday's by."
"You are as lean as a lizard,
I am as poor as a mouse;
Nothing per annum, paid quarterly,
Hardly finds rent for a house."
"Love and a crust in a cottage";
Capital! just for a pair;
What if the hut should grow populous?
How would the populace fare?
"Oh, aye! the uncle you reckon on,
Gouty, and rich, and unweid—
Dick! They wait ill, says the adage, who Wait for the shoes of the dead."
"Ah! If I loved you I'd risk it,
That's what you're thinking, I guess—
Why, I would risk it to-morrow,
Dick, if I cared for you less."
"Love's apt to fly out at the window
When poverty looks in at the door;
Rather I'd die than help banish him,
Dick, just by keeping you poor."
"Kiss me! You'll look in on Sunday?
Won't my new bonnet be brave?
June at its longest and leanest—
My! what a ramble we'll have!"
"Bye-bye! There's grandmother waiting
Patient at home for the tea.
Dick, if you wouldn't wed both of us,
You must be patient for me."
Showers, if they ruffle its foliage,
Freshen the green of the grove;
True lovers'iffs, said old Terrence, are
Only fresh fuel to love.
If I flung off in a passion—
If she crept in for a cry—
Sunday came smiling and settled it;
Katie was wiser than I.
Love's hut a baby that, passionate,
Tries to be mated at birth;
Time isn't lost if it teaches you
What a good woman is worth.
What if the waiting was wearisome?
What if the work-days were drear?
Time, the old thief, couldn't rob us of Fifty-two Sundays a year
How long was liberty coming?
Long enough—even her way;
Lustrum, or decade, or century—
What does it matter to-day?
Nunky died single at sixty,
Granny at eighty or so;
Well, if we didn't weep long for 'em
'Twasn't in nature, you know.
Grannies and uncles are liable
All to die some day, that's clear;
Sorrow finds wonderful comfort in Five or six hundred a year.
And lovers may marry at forty,
Aye, and live happy to boot;
Though Phillis be gray as a hager,
And Corydon bald as a coot.
—A non.
Do You Remember?
"UN BACCIO DATO NON E MAI PERDUTO."
Because we once drove together
In the moonlight over the snow,
With the sharp bells ringing their tinkling chime,
So many a year ago.
So now, as I hear their jingle,
The winter comes back again,
Though the summer stirs in the heavy trees,
And the wild rose scents the air.
We gather our furs around us,
Our faces the keen air stings,
And noiseless we fly o'er the snow-hushed world
Almost as if we had wings.
Enough is the joy of mere living,
Enough is the blood's quick thrill;
We are simply happy—I care not why—
We are happy beyond our will.
The trees are with icicles jeweled,
The walls are o'er-surfed with snow;
The houses with marble whiteness are roofed;
In their windows the home-lights glow.
Through the tense, clear sky above us
The keen stars flash and gleam,
And wrapped in their silent shroud of snow
The broad fields lie and dream.
And jingling with low, sweet clashing
Ring the bells as our good horse goes,
And tossing his head, from his nostrils red
His frosty breath he blows.
And close you nestle against me,
While around your waist my arm
I have slipped—'tis so bitter, bitter cold—
It is only to keep us warm.
We talk, and then we are silent;
And suddenly—you know why—
I stooped—could I help it? You lifted your face—
We kissed—there was nobody nigh.
And no one was ever the wiser,
And no one was ever the worse;
The skies did not fall—as perhaps they ought—
And we heard no paternal curse.
I never told it—did you, dear?
From that day unto this
But my memory keeps in its inmost recess,
Like a perfume, that innocent kiss.
I dare say you have forgotten,
'Twas so many a year ago;
Or you may not choose to remember it,
Time may have changed you so.
The world so chills us and kills us,
Perhaps you may scorn to recall
That night with its innocent impulse—
Perhaps you'll deny it all.
But if of that fresh, sweet nature
The veriest vestige survive,
You'll remember that moment's madness—
You'll remember that moonlight drive.
—W. W. Story.

LITERARY NOTES.

John S. Hittell's "Pacific Coast Guide" appears in a new edition with many corrections and additions. It proves a neat and comprehensive volume for the tourist's use. One of its most agreeable features is the chapter on "Camping, and Where to Camp," which embraces a well-written enumeration of the various localities in which game may be procured. The maps of California and Oregon are unworthy of the volume, from their objectionable lack of detail. Published and for sale by A. L. Bancroft & Co.

The latest number of the "American Men of Letters Series" is the life of Henry D. Thoreau, by F. B. Sanborn. It takes the author one hundred and twenty-five pages to really get to Thoreau, and while the matter would be interesting to an inhabitant of Middlesex County, Massachusetts, its insertion here displays a lack of taste. The part of the volume which relates to Thoreau is of great interest, and we know of no source from which a better idea can be obtained of this philosopher of nature in so short a space. Published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston; for sale by Bancroft; price, $1.25.

"Bridal March, and Other Stories" is the latest volume of Björnsterne Björnson's that Professor Andersen has translated into English. These stories conclude the author's series of peasant novels, and were originally dedicated to Hans Andersen. The translator remarks in the preface that Björnson will henceforth deal only with political and social questions in his works. Interesting features of the volume are the four illustrations of Norse home life, which are taken from the original paintings, executed by Norway's most distinguished genre painter, Adolph Tidemand. Published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston; for sale by Bancroft; price, $1.

"Gloria," a Spanish work by Perez Galdós, translated by Clara Bell, contains several strong situations, together with much that is rather forced and strained, as is the wont in Spanish stories. It is the story of a young English Jew who visits Spain, and there gaining the esteem of a noble Catholic family, who do not discern his Hebrew blood, succeeds in seducing the beautiful young daughter. He really loves the girl, and after a struggle with his conscience, agrees to become a Catholic, in order that they may be married. At this point his mother, hearing of his intent, procures a warrant for his arrest. He escapes, but only in time to have a last interview with his dying sweetheart. Published by W. Gottsberger, New York; for sale by Bancroft; price, $1.00.

Announcements: Sir Theodore Martin, at the urgent request of the family, has consented to write a life of the late Lord Lyndhurst. Lady Lyndhurst has furnished him with the family papers. Mr. Wilkie Collins is writing a new serial novel in which the subject of vivisection is treated. It will be translated, by special arrangement, into French, Dutch, Italian, German, and Swedish. A well-known French writer, M. Aurelien Scholl, has lately published a short pathetic story on the same subject. A faithful and loving dog is the hero, and it is impossible to read of the fate of the intelligent little creature under the knife of the lecturer without a shudder of pity and of horror. Mr. Longfellow's intimate friend, John Owen, rendered valuable assistance to Dr. Austin in the preparation of the doctor's "Life of Longfellow"—a volume which will be brought out this month by Lee & Shepard. "The Lambs" is the title of a satire on Wall Street operators which Mr. Robert Grant has contributed to the forthcoming number of The Century. Mr. Grant will be remembered as the author of the "Confessions of a Frivolous Girl" and of "The Little-Tin-Gods-on-Wheels." A new novel of poems on various picturesque and dramatic Arabian themes is shortly to be brought out by Mr. Theodore Tilton. R. Worthington is to be the publisher. The little book in which Miss Baker describes her "Summer in the Azores" contains the story of John Boyle O'Reilly's escape from Australia, as related by the captain of the ship which carried him away from his captivity.

The germ theory in disease is now occupying the attention of the scientific world. Several physicians, in advance of their time, turned their attention to it years ago. But the results of recent discoveries in Berlin, Paris, and London have called forth numerous publications on the subject. Professor John Tyndall has for some time been giving the question his attention, and has from time to time published several essays on its various phases. These essays are now collected in book form, under the title of "Floating Matter of the Air in Relation to Putrefaction and Infection." The volume will prove of great interest to the average reader, as well as to the scientific student. The author shows the disastrous effects resulting from allowing the slightest amount of unfiltered or common air to reach an exposed wound. The antiseptic system of Professor Lister, of Edinburgh, is used to illustrate the statements. The result of Lister's system in his department was so successful that, even in the midst of abominations too shocking to be mentioned here, and in the neighborhood of wards where death was rampant from pyæmia, erysipelas, and hospital gangrene, he was able to keep his patients free from these terrible scourges. This wonderful result was attained by his process of spraying the wound while it was exposed for operation with diluted carbolic acid, and thus destroying all the live germs that crowded in from every cubic inch of air. Professor Tyndall then proceeds to illustrate the various processes by which these dust-germs of disease are developed. It is to be hoped that the medical fraternity of this country will profit by this volume, for it certainly contains much that is of great value to their experiments and practice. Published by D. Appleton & Co., New York; for sale by James T. White & Co., 23 Dupont Street.

Miscellany: The June number of the Victorian Review contains, among other interesting papers, "Longfellow," by Georges Hamington; "The Return of the Native," by Charles Warren Stoddard; "Ethnology of the Zulus," by D. C. F. Moodie, and an article with the singular heading of "Shouting," which turns out to be a disquisition upon the pernicious habit of what Americans call "treating," but which is called "shouting" by the provincial Australian. The tenacity with which Englishmen cling to a name or trade-mark is well illustrated by the Gentleman's Magazine, which has always borne the name of "Sylvanus Urban, Gentleman," on the cover, as that of the editor. Mr. Joseph Knight, the dramatic critic of the Athenæum, has been the editor for several years. Nobody ever sees Mr. Ruskin's books on sale in the London shops, for the simple reason that the eminent critic boycotted the booksellers, and the booksellers retorted by boycotting him. The Ruskin Society of Manchester have arranged with a local bookseller to keep Mr. Ruskin's works in stock. A change seems to be coming over the French people. They are beginning to read. Ten years ago it was considered wonderful when a book got into its tenth edition. Now one of M. Zola's works is in its one hundred and sixteenth, and another in its ninety-sixth. M. Daudet's "Numa Roumestan," in six or seven months, is in its fifty-fifth edition, and M. Ludovic Halévy's delightful Franco-American novel—"L'abbé Constantin"—has, in ten weeks, run through twenty editions. M. Jules Claretie's strong story of modern Parisian political life, "M. le Ministre," of which a mangled mistranslation has been published in Philadelphia, first appeared about nine months ago, and has now got into its forty-fifth edition. In France, it may be well to say, an edition means a few more than a thousand copies. Michelet's continued popularity in France may be inferred from the fact that a Paris printer has just signed a contract for an edition of ten thousand copies of his "Histoire de France" and his "Histoire de la Révolution Française," with illustrations, at the amazing price of nearly forty dollars a volume. Those who have been flattering themselves, says the Springfield Republican, that in knowing a certain brilliant young lawyer of this city, who has had a hand in some of the brightest of comparatively recent book-work from the pens of young Harvard men, they know the author of that new and remarkably clever novel, "Guernedale," are finding themselves mistaken. He protests that he did not write it; and who did he "can not tell." Others who "guessed" first that a graduate of 1878 or 1879, a Baltimorean, well known in certain sets of Boston and Cambridge society, is the author, are holding fast to that guess. It is a pleasant summer pastime, this guessing at the authorship of anonymous new novels.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

The Complete Letter-Writer.

LETTER FROM A GENTLEMAN OFFERING MARRIAGE.—Dear Miss Tillie Tuff: Stocks, notes, and securities, $100,000; brown-stone house, $65,000; furniture, $25,000; country-seat, $40,000; horses, harness, and carriages, $30,000; cash on hand, $10,000. Total, $270,000.—Yours, very truly, Tom Wealthy.

FAVORABLE REPLY.—Dear Mr. Wealthy: Provided you are willing to settle all the property and one-half the money on me before marriage.—Tillie Tuff.

UNFAVORABLE REPLY.—Dear Mr. Wealthy: Your candied date I can not be.—Tilly Tuff.

NOTE TO THE OLD MAN ASKING HIS DAUGHTER'S HAND.—Hon. Sam. Tuff: Please chain the dog to-night.—Yours truly, Tom Wealthy.

FAVORABLE REPLY TO FOREGOING.—Dear Tom: Have sold the dog and bought a pair of slippers.—Yours, Sam Tuff.

UNFAVORABLE REPLY.—Mr. T. Wealthy: They are No. 11's, with box toes, and the gate has been newly varnished.—Yours, S. Tuff.

INVITING A YOUNG LADY TO A PICNIC.—Dear Mary: The Patrick Duffy Chowder Club will hash at Barren Island, Thursday. Want to go long?—Jimmy Murphy.

ACCEPTING.—Mr. J. Murphy: You bet!—Mary Donahue.

DECLINING.—Dear Jimmy: Thursday is the mistress's day out. Can't go.—Mary Donahue.

FROM A PASTOR TO A MEMBER OF THE CHURCH.—Dear Mrs. Smith: What evening this week will your husband be absent from home?—Your brother in the cause, John Doe, D. D.

TO A FRIEND ON LEARNING THAT HIS MOTHER-IN-LAW IS DEAD.—Dear Bill: Just heard of it. Champagne and lobsters at ten to-night. We'll give her a send-off.—Henry Wells.

FROM A COLLEGE STUDENT TO HIS FATHER.—Dear Father: Ante.—Yours, Charley.

UNFAVORABLE RESPONSE.—Dear Charley: Try "Uncle."—Yours, John A. Dad.

TO AN EDITOR.—Dear Sir: Please stop my paper.—A Dampfool.

A DAUGHTER TRAVELING FOR HER HEALTH TO HER FATHER.—Dear Papa: I am just too splendidly awful well for anything, only I'm broke. Please remit at once.—Stella.

UNFAVORABLE RESPONSE.—Dear Stella: Am glad you are better. Enclosed please find railroad pass, sleeping-berth ticket, and a reliable time-table.—Yours, C. B. Dammit.

FROM A YOUNG MAN TO A FRIEND.—Dear Ike: Please send me ten dollars per bearer. Will pay it back Saturday.—Yours, Steve.

INEVITABLE RESPONSE.—Dear Steve: Haven't got it.—Yours, Ike.

FROM A YOUNG LADY TO HER PASTOR.—Dear Mr. Jones: Enclosed please find a pair of slippers. Give my love to your wife, but don't tell who sent them.—Affectionately, Julia.

GENERAL LETTER FOR ALL OCCASIONS.—Dear Sir: Am very short, and would like that little amount before dark to-day.—Yours, A. Taylor.—Brooklyn Eagle.

Darwin's Discovery.

It was not until the year 1879 that naturalists became aware of the existence of a new species of hair-pin. Up to that time there had been but two varieties of hair-pin—the straight and the corrugated. These were of about the same size—the full-grown hair-pin attaining a length of four inches—and were found throughout Europe and America. Every female head contained, according to Cuvier, fifty-six, and according to Huxley and most of the scientific men of the present day, fifty-eight hair-pins. The woman who was furnished with fifty-six or fifty-eight hair-pins was as useful to civilized man as is the date palm to the wild Arab. If a man found his pipe clogged up, he plucked a hair-pin from the nearest woman, and ran it through the pipe-stem. If he needed a button-hook, the hair-pin was an efficient substitute. The discovery of an entirely new species of hair-pin was made by the elder Mr. Darwin not quite three years ago. His attention was one day attracted by a hair-pin of unfamiliar appearance, which he found entangled with one of his sleeve-buttons. It was only two inches in length, and was wonderfully slender, its diameter, as afterward measured, proving to be only that of the ordinary human hair. He at once perceived that this hair-pin belonged to a species which had wholly escaped the notice of naturalists. He found, after careful investigation, that a young woman who was studying the theory of development under his guidance was well acquainted with the new species, and that her hair contained no less than three hundred and seven hair-pins precisely like the one which had in some mysterious way fastened itself on his sleeve-button. Mr. Darwin at once published a monograph on the new species of hair-pin, describing its peculiarities and habits, and suggesting that it had been developed by the process of natural selection from the older and better known species. His views have been generally adopted, and the new species is now as well known as any production of nature. The small, thin hair-pin, like the Norway rat, is rapidly driving out its predecessor. It is wonderfully prolific, and occupies, by reason of its small size, only an eighth of the space formerly occupied by the large hair-pin. It may be safely asserted that at the present moment two-thirds of all civilized women have adopted the new hair-pin, and the best statistics sustain the belief that the average number of small hair-pins in any one head is three hundred and fourteen. This is an amazing quantity, but we can not impugn the truth of statistics. There is many a scientific person who, having in the interest of science requested a lady to allow him to take out her hair-pins, has grown weary as well as astounded as he drew out one by one the three hundred and fourteen hair-pins. The prevalence of the new species of hair-pin undoubtedly tends to render the sexes more independent of one another. The new hair-pin is of little or no use to man. It is too small to be of much service in cleaning pipes; and it can not be converted into fish-hooks for the use of shipwrecked men. Thus woman is no longer as useful to man as she formerly was. He does not instinctively turn to her as an indispensable store-house of hair-pins, and he must inevitably grow away from her, and seek in broom-straw and common pins substitutes more or less satisfactory for the large hair-pin that seems doomed to extinction. Moreover, the dangerous character of the new hair-pin will have its share in rendering men timid in the society of women. Even the old hair-pin occasionally fastened itself to the coat-collar or the sleeve, and thus exposed innocent men to misconstruction and suspicion at the hands of hasty wives. We can hardly exaggerate the extent to which the new hair-pin will infest the clothing of impulsive and incautious men. Who can approach a cousin or a wife's sister who has three hundred and fourteen hair-pins about her without inadvertently carrying away at least one of them? As soon as men fully realize this danger they will consult their safety by avoiding the society of women, and the new hair-pin will thus prove a barrier between the sexes. From every point of view the prevalence of the small hair-pin and the disappearance of the larger species is to be deprecated. It is, however, idle to bewail the operations of nature. We can only wait in patience for still another new species which will be in every way unobjectionable, and which nature will perhaps kindly develop in response to the universal demand of mankind.—New York Times.

It Looked So Easy.

The pious editor of this paper was driving on Prospect Avenue, Monday evening, when a crowd at a base-ball park attracted his attention, and with the idea that there might be a picnic or something there he hurried to the gate, left his horse with a boy, and rushed in. There was a crowd of a thousand or more people on the grand stand, yelling, and on getting nearer the editor found that a prize-fight was in progress between two local athletes, with gloves. The crowd was not a pious one, and the editor felt out of place, but you know in our business it is necessary to visit all sorts of crowds. Well, it was worth a dollar to see that crowd. It was about evenly composed of friends of the two principals, and when one would get in a blow on the other's nose, his friends would yell, and vice versa. It was one continued round of pleasure. The men were fairly scientific, but out of training. We have no doubt half the men in the crowd thought they could have whipped either of the contestants, but they couldn't. There is nothing so deceiving as boxing-gloves. An amateur, after he has had them on a few times, thinks he could knock anybody silly, but however good a man is at boxing, there is somebody else a little better. A man wants to have the conceit taken out of him on boxing, the same as he does on draw-poker. We never had on boxing-gloves but once, and that was in St. Louis in 1864. Our company was stationed at Benton Barracks, and to kill time the boys got a set of boxing-gloves, and they used to practice half the time. It looked so easy to hit a fellow on the nose with the big soft things, that one day we put on a pair, and gently tapped a newsboy on the ear. He put on the other pair, deliberately, and we laughed derisively at him, and all the boys shouted as the little shrimp squared off at us. He was not more than three feet high, and just to humor him, and to have some fun, we stood up, and put up our hands, and told him to fire away. The boys surrounded us, and made a ring, and we smiled, and reached out our right to slap him gently on the forehead. Well, you wouldn't believe it, but that little rascal jumped back six feet, and our arm went so far, and strained a cord, so that before we could get it back the blasted newsboy had come back, and hit us on the nose, in both eyes, on the left ear, and on the neck. We were never so surprised since we sat down on a chair that somebody had pulled out from under us. To tell the truth, we were a little bit offended at the boy. We had always treated him kindly, bought his St. Louis Democrat regularly, and to have him take advantage of us that way was enough to hurt a sensitive nature. We were going to take off the gloves, but the boys laughed so, and yelled, that we thought we would just knock the little fool over flat on the ground, and then quit, so we slyed up to him, and struck him a powerful blow right on the nose. If he had been there for the blow fell, there would have been a newsboy's funeral, attended by several bus-loads of sympathizing co-laborers, and he would not be, as we learn he is now, a prominent St. Louis business man. But he was away from the vicinity where we struck, and then we began to hear houses and things fall on us. We shut our eyes and lay down, and a pile-driver hit our ear, while a brick building, used as a hospital, fell on our stomach. A mule walked over us, and when we came to, the boys were taking the newsboy away for fear we would get mad and hurt him. We would not have hurt him. They needn't have been afraid of that, because it would not have been right. We found out that he was one of the best boxers in St. Louis, afterward. After that the boys tried to get us to put on the gloves with a blind girl who used to peddle apples, but we didn't want to hurt the girl. The best thing anybody can do who has never had on the boxing-gloves, is to first put them on with a cigar-sign, and then the chances are that the cigar-sign will fall over on him and black his eyes. A man wants to be brought up to boxing, and have his nose broke, and a hair-lip cut for him in early youth, and then if he is real spry he can get out of a boxing-match without getting whipped, if he is a good runner. It is like the old man's advice to his boy about learning to swim before he went into the water.—Peck's Sun.

The Pretzel.

This delicious food grows best in the shade, and the shade of a beer garden being preferred. It is ripe at birth, and is ready to eat as soon as it is picked. In North Germany, where the benighted people do not know any better, the pretzel is called a "kringle." This is enough to spoil the pretzel, only that is impossible. The pretzel is always planted on free-lunch counters. There is more nutrition in a barrel of sawdust than there is in a clothes-basket full of pretzels. But then the pretzel is much the drier of the two. The genuine pretzel has a heart like a marble-yard, and the hide is varnished to keep it dry. It is varnished with hot lye, and sprinkled with salt and aniseed to give it tone. Before it assumes the expression so familiar to the lovers of this perennial fruit the pretzel is about the size of a garter snake. After it is tied up in that intricate knot which makes the eater wonder where to take his first bite, no man can guess at its length. Enough is known, however, to warrant scientific authorities in saying that if a man should swallow a pretzel whole, and it should suddenly straighten out in him, it would kill him in a minute. It is not possible, however, for a man to eat a pretzel whole. You can eat all the rest of it, but while there is more bole than pretzel to begin with, yet the more you eat the pretzel the more hole there is left.—Burdett.

TO HOUSEKEEPERS.

If you wish to use goods of full weight and absolute purity, see your grocer supplies you with

KINGSFORD'S
OSWEGO
STARCH.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER.

WALTER BAKER & CO.'S
CHOCOLATE.

SMITH
BROTHERS'
PACKAGE
BORAX.

WM. T. COLEMAN & CO.
AGENTS,
121 and 123 Market Street,
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

THE LATEST NEW BOOK,

And the One which will have the largest sale.

NASBY IN EXILE

By D. R. LOCKE, (PETROLEUM V. NASBY).

WILL BE READY

FOR DELIVERY TO SUBSCRIBERS ABOUT JULY 22D.

"I shal make my way to Paris to wunst, and it will go hard with me if I can't establish myself ther in some way. I turn my back upon the Corners hawtily, only too glad to leave a ongrateful people wich hezn't enuff appreshiasbun uv greatinis to furnish the trifin means to keep it alive among em. Boston alluz paid Webster's debts, while the Corners eggshles me!"

"Be it so. I go, never to return."

PETROLEUM V. NASBY, (Eggsile.)"

"NASBY IN EXILE" is at once serious and humorous. The subjects are treated in the peculiar vein that has made "Nasby" famous wherever the English language is spoken, the humor being illustrative of ideas, and the satire healthful and wholesome.

The chapters on London give the reader a better idea of the great metropolis than can be found in any book published, and in no other publication are the other countries so conscientiously and carefully described. Mr. Locke set out with the idea of getting at things as they actually are, and that he succeeded those who read his letters as they appeared will bear testimony.

Concerning Ireland and the Irish, it is conceded that no such a presentation of facts about Ireland was ever put on paper.

Seven hundred pages. Two hundred illustrations. Well printed and well bound. Price, in cloth, $4; or in leather, $5. Sold by subscription only.

SAMUEL CARSON

AGENT FOR THE LOCKE PUBLISHING CO.,

120 Sutter Street,

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

AGENTS WANTED.

A copy will be sent by mail post-paid on receipt of price.

GEORGE MORROW.

GEORGE MORROW & CO.

(Established 1854.)

Commission Merchants

....AND....

DEALERS IN HAY AND GRAIN.

SHIPPING ORDERS A SPECIALTY. CONSIGNMENTS SOLICITED.

39 Clay Street,

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

C. ADOLPHE LOW & CO.

Commission Merchants,

SAN FRANCISCO.

OFFICE IN NEW YORK, 42 CEDAR Street

Liberal advances made on consignments.

S. & G. GUMP,

581 and 583 Market Street, S. F.,
Manufacturers

Mirrors, Cornices, Hardwood Mantles, Picture Frames, and Brice-a-Brac.

IMPORTERS OF GOUPIL'S ENGRAVINGS, CHROMOS, PHOTOGRAPHS, ETC.

CALIFORNIA SUGAR REFINERY.

OFFICE, - 325 Market St.
WORKS, Eighth and Brannan Sts.

C. SPRECKELS, President,
J. D. SPRECKELS, Vice-President,
A. B. SPRECKELS, Secretary.

PACIFIC ROLLING MILL CO.

San Francisco, Cal., Manufacturers of

RAILROAD AND MERCHANT IRON

Car and Locomotive Axles and Frames, and Hammered Iron of every description. Rolled Beams, Angle, Channel, and T Iron, Bridge, and Machine Bolts, Lag Screws, Nuts, Washers, etc. Steamboat Shafts, Cranks, Pins, and Pins, etc. Highest price paid for scrap iron.

OFFICE, 202 MARKET ST.

I remember reading somewhere a long ago that "Le Voyage en Suisse" was in litigation. Anything worth fighting about should be worth having, but the most definite idea which I carried away with me from the performance on Monday was wide wonder as to what the litigation had all been about. It can not have been the plot, for that is time-honored; and in any case it is nothing more than the harassing of a grumpy old bridegroom on his wedding tour. It can not have been the dialogue, for that is something beneath the consideration of the frailest intellect. It can not have been the action, or the business as the stage lingo puts it, for that would be nothing in the hands of any other than the two brief Hanlons, in the plush smalls and powdered locks of the lackey tribe, and the long-legged young man with the tripping French accent.

In short, they must have gone to law about the name, which is the only meritorious part of the play proper. For what does not "Le Voyage en Suisse" suggest? It opens up a delightful vista of frowning Alps and seas of snow, of rustic chalets and wayside inns, of perilous paths and threatening glaciers, of picturesque guides and alpenstocks, of eidelweiss and jodels, of the little Swiss opera maiden who is always starting out in the world in search of a lover, with her trousseau done up in her pocket-handkerchief. Every one has been to Switzerland in the spirit, if not in the flesh, and the spirit of romance broods over the sturdy little country like a warm red cloud.

But alas, in "Le Voyage en Suisse" we have none of these familiar visions of the guide-book, the novel, and the opera. The first act starts out like any French opera bouffe, with a wedding, and a chorus—and a queer chorus it is, by the way—and in the second, we are bolted immediately into a railway car. One might as well be in Colorado as in Switzerland, but that the little carriage is in compartments, and the guard looks like a gendarme.

The latest idea of the new dramatists would seem to be a new Babel, for the French bridegroom speaks cockney English, the main thorn in his side is a wild Irishman, the long-legged young man becomes quite twisted up in his rolling French r's, and at a later period, without rhyme or reason, a German student "Ich bins," and a profane Spaniard roars the soft Castilian till the rafters ring. What does it all mean? No one knows, and possibly it is not intended that any one shall. At distinct intervals the two Hanlons and the long-legged young man are seized with spasms of mischief. Everything and everybody on the stage seems to go to pieces. Shutters flap, doors fall down, tables and chairs become animated beings, bottles and boxes obey the word of command, the stage becomes a wild, riotous tangle of dexterous confusion, the audience becomes convulsed with laughter and amazement, and presently all is quiet and a trifle dull again.

For what is it all but pantomime with the floodgates of silence broken loose? Harlequin has dropped his black mask and laid by his broadsword for the regimentals of Jeames Yellowplush, and there are two of him instead of one. Columbine has departed from her spangles, her tarlatan, and her pirouettes and wears a tie-back and a modern bonnet. Pantaloon has shed his pajamas for an eccentric bridegroom costume, and Clown is merged in Harlequin. But all the old tricks and grimaces are there, with a puzzling familiarity in their new framing. Then, too, there is a clever new one here and there, and the two little Hanlons are so dexterous, so quick, so neat, that as a pantomimic performance it is unquestionably a success. Unfortunately, since "Le Voyage en Suisse" assumes to be a play, one finds one's self fishing for an idea or a rational word now and then. But alas! words and ideas have gone out of fashion, and muscle has come in.

It is a commentary upon the tastes of our town that out of five first-class theatres, three are closed for want of patronage, and in the other two muscle alone draws, for with the Mastodon Minstrels the champion clog is by far the most attractive feature of the entertainment, and bodily expertness is the only excellence of the famous Hanlon-Lees combination.

"What's in a name?" asks Juliet, illogical as all young lovers are, and because Shakespeare put the words in her mouth, he has been challenged through three centuries for having said an untrue thing. For my own part, I never saw a Hanlon-Lees till Monday, but the whole family, from some early impression, are indissolubly associated in my mind with that curious "le-jointed" word, "Zampillerostation," which is to flash from the play-bills whenever a circus comes to town. Whenever the name of Hanlon-Lees is mentioned, in fancy I see them floating through the air in those daring leaps for life, which made the family famous. But here are degenerate scions of a sinewy race, for but two of them are but clever, quick Harlequins, and the other two are nil. One may hear half a hundred people ask after the play, "Where were the other two Hanlons?" What right has a man to the famous name unless he have the famous muscle?

When Guy Livingstone began crushing silver goblets in his thin, nervous fingers, the muscular wave was beginning to sweep over the land, and when Geoffrey Delamayne was held up as a frightful example of the triumph of matter over mind, people execrated him aloud, but fell down in private awe before him, and the collegians went with renewed will at boat and ball, and all the other physical exercises which go to complete a gentleman's training. The thinkers are dying out. There is no room left for them, poor fellows; no work for them to do. Muscle reigns in the world, in the books, in the plays, nay, even in the pulpit, for your muscular clergyman is become a demi-god, and your deep theological thinker an old frump. Pardon the word. I quote it from a fashionable dévote. What wonder then that it has crept into the theatres to the displacement of all fine art? How long is it since we have had a good strong juicy play? and when we had them what ill-luck befell them. They are getting up a dramatic school in England under the patronage of the Prince of Wales. If it be to meet the taste of the times what shall be its furnishings? What but heights from which to leap, and depths from which to creep, and trapezes, and turn-bars, and foils, and perhaps a natarorium, and a rink? One never knows to what gymnastic lengths the next play may go; for if Harlequin be the latest success, Harlequin must be outdone, and some specialist is studying a new trick somewhere. I was one of a group not very long ago who started out to amuse themselves with a good talk. They were many of them accounted "bright," as the new phrase goes, and although one of them announced at the very beginning that "conversation was a lost art," and we each as usual put in our little spoke about the brilliant salons of the last century, a brilliancy which had passed away with the commonplaceness of the latter day, perhaps we all flattered ourselves that we could talk if we would. But at a critical juncture it was discovered that one had a double thumb-joint, whereat we branched off upon physical peculiarities, and we had an amateur exhibition of eccentricities, which I am bound to say became deeply interesting. I do not recall a single remark in the after conversation distinguished either for wit, brilliance, profundity, or exceptional good sense, but for some reason or other we had a very good time of it, and although that young gentleman who wagged one ear independently of the other came off triumphantly as the star of this little private exhibition, the young lady who put a movable scalp through its paces is worthy of honorable mention. Perhaps it is telling out of school to relate these incidents, but it serves to illustrate the tendency of the times, which is entirely to hoidly feats. Perhaps it is a reaction from the degenerate effeminacy of the last few decades, and that we are returning to a state of nature where all are "iron-jointed, supple-sinewed" as the poet's dusky children in dreamland were to be. Whatever it be, there was a quick responsive intelligence in the eyes of the sight-seers on Monday night, which showed that they were enjoying something they could understand. Time was when great artists trembled in waiting for the verdict of the Californian audience, for its yea was strong and big and far-reaching, and carried success with it. But we have come to have uses when nothing but pantomimic tricks can draw an audience, however excellent those pantomimic tricks may be. We are caught like children with trap-doors and hinges, and a neat handspring across the boards is one of the heights of dramatic excellence. It will hold its sway long, for it is something which we can not all turn, and it is human nature to admire that which it is not given to us to do, as it is human nature for us sometimes to attempt to pass for that which we are not.

I saw a paragraph of cordial invitation to Clara Morris in a London paper the other day, assuring her that if she had the talent of her distinguished compatriots, Edwin Booth and Bella Pateman, she should not lack a welcome in the motherland. Can it be that English Bella has been parading before English eyes as an American after her successful sojourn on Columbian soil, upon the principle that a prophet is not without honor save in his own country? They have Plympton and his Anglomaniia over in England, but the papers crushingly allude to him as "a young American actor," and Plympton must be signally unhappy. It is hard, indeed, after a lifetime of effort to have the British scribblers make such an unerring guess. The same paper mentions that they are expecting "Hazel Kirke" across the pond, and alludes to it vaguely as a play which has made some little stir in America. Some little stir? Can it be possible that benighted England has not had an avalanche of the silhouette souvenirs? Truly, England is behind the times, for they have no less than three dramas running in the metropolis of the world, and never a gymnast among them.

BETSY B.

"CENTURY" BRIC-A-BRAC.

My Sweetheart.
She is neither short nor tall,
Rather what I think you'd call
Just the size;
And her hands and feet are—well,
I'll say ditto, and not tell
Any lies.

Though her eyes are soft and blue,
They have not the brilliant hue
Of the sky;
Yet when in their depths I look,
Like a picture in a book,
There am I.

Not so very small her nose is;
Neither are her cheeks like roses,
Red and white;
And my muse does not embolden
Me to call her brown hair golden,
Though I might.

Just a village maiden she—
Many ladies that you see
Rank above her;
Men have seldom called her pretty;
I have never thought her witty;
But I love her.

—D. C. Hasbrouck.

Ballade of a Coquette.

She wears a most bewitching hang—
Gold curls made captive in a net;
Her dresses with precision hang;
Her hat observes the stylish set;
She has a poodle for a pet,
And drives a dashing drag and pony;
I know it, though we've never met—
I've seen her picture by Sarony.

Her phrases all are fraught with slang,
The very latest she can get;
She sings the songs that Patience sang,
Can whistle airs from "Olivette,"
And in the waltz perhaps might let
You squeeze her hand with gems all stony;
I know it, though we've never met—
I've seen her picture by Sarony.

Her heart has never felt love's pang,
Nor known a momentary fret;
Want never wounds her with his fang;
She likes to run papa in debt;
She'll smoke a slender cigarette
Sub rosa with a favored crony;
I know it, though we've never met—
I've seen her picture by Sarony.

ENVOY.

Princes, beware this gay coquette!
She has no thoughts of matrimony;
I know it, though we've never met—
I've seen her picture by Sarony.

—Frank D. Sherman.

To an Intrusive Butterfly.

"Kill not—for pity's sake—and lest ye slay,
The meanest thing upon its upward way."
—Five Rules of Buddha.

I watch you through the garden walks,
I watch you float between
The avenues of dahlia stalks,
And flicker on the green;
You hover round the garden seat,
You mount, you waver. Why,
Why storm us in our still retreat,
O saffron Butterfly!

Across the room in loops of flight
I watch you wayward go;
Dance down a shaft of glancing light,
Review my hooks a-row;
Before the hush you flaunt and flit
Of "blind Mæonides"—
Ah, trifter, on his lips there lit
Not butterflies, but bees!

You pause, you poise, you circle up
Among my old Japan;
You find a comrade on a cup,
A friend upon a fan;
You wind around, a breathing while,
Around Amanda's brow—
Dost dream her then, O Volatile!
E'en such an one as thou?

Away! Her thoughts are not as thine
A sterner purpose fills
Her steadfast soul with deep design
Of baby bows and frills;
What care hath she for worlds without—
What heed for yellow sun,
Whose endless hopes revolve about
A planet, atlat One!

Away! Tempt not the best of wives!
Let not thy garish wing
Come fluttering our Autumn lives
With truant dreams of spring!
Away! Reseck thy "Flowery Land";
Be Buddha's law obeyed;
Lest Betty's undiscerning hand
Should slay—a future Præd!

—Austin Dobson.

Triumph.

The dawn came in through the bars of the blind—
And the winter's dawn is gray
And said: However you cheat your mind,
The hours are flying away.
A ghost of a dawn, and pale and weak—
Has the sun a heart, I said,
To throw a morning flush on the cheek
Whence a fairer flush has fled?
As a gray rose-leaf that is fading white
Was the cheek where I set my kiss;
And on that side of the bed all night
Death had watched, and I on this.
I kissed her lips, they were half apart,
Yet they made no answering sign;
Death's hand was on her failing heart,
And his eyes said: She is mine.
I set my lips on the blue-veined lid,
Hail-veiled by her death-damp hair;
And oh, for the violet depths it hid,
And the light I longed for there!
Faint day and the fainter life awoke,
And the life was overpast;
And I said: Though never in life you spoke,
Oh, speak with a look at last!
For the soace of a heart-beat fluttered her breath,
As a bird's wing spread to flee;
She turned her weary arms to Death,
And the light of her eyes to me.

Century for August. —H. C. Bunner.

OBSCURE INTIMATIONS.

"Peter Sousloff," W.—Declined.
"Their New Plug Hat," S. B.—Declined.
"My Demon Visitor," Burnham.—Declined.
"A Bad Wager," W.—Declined.
"A Ball-room Romance," A. L. W.—Declined.
"Mother Margaret," B.—Declined.
"My Castle," H. F. B.—Declined.

We have received the following little note:

SAN FRANCISCO, July 10, 1882.
EDITORS ARGONAUT: Being constant perusers of your perfectly splendid paper, and having your interest at heart, we contribute some poetry, which we hope will please your many readers, and add a new charm to your very valuable paper. We beg leave to assure you that we require no remuneration whatever, as we write for "fame," and not "filthy lucre." In printing the poetry please do not sign our real names, but our fictitious ones, which are "Birdie Bluebell" and "Daisy Darling." We beg of you not to print our names or address, as we intend to surprise our friends. Hoping that you will be pleased enough with the accompanying poems to send for more, we remain, yours respectfully, Corner — and — Streets.

"OWEN" TO BUB.

Once there was a boy
In manners very coy,
To his parents a great joy,
Without a bit of alloy,
His name it was "Bub."
He went sailing in a tub,
And it went down,
And wet his gown,
But he did not drown,
While his poor lub
She cried for her lub.

DAISY DARLING.

MRS. MACK AND HER ZACH.

Once there was a Mrs.
Who thought of naught but kisses,
For which she was hailed with hisses.
Her name it was Mrs. Mack,
But she changed it to Zach.
Zach, he carried a pack,
And was a great quack.
Zach, alas, stepped on a tack,
And of blessings (at that moment) there was a lack.
And Mrs. M. got up her back,
Which she did with a great deal of knack,
And hung her switch on a rack.
Good-bye, Mrs. Mack,
Good riddance to Zach. BIRDIE BLUEBELL.

We think your poem is real nice, Birdie; and yours, Daisy, is just too sweet. If your friends are not surprised they ought to be.

The Mastodon Minstrels will continue through next week at Haverly's California Theatre. At the Baldwin Theatre the Hanlons will continue to play in "Le Voyage en Suisse." Both the Bush-street and the Standard theatres remain closed.

We have received an invitation to a "Memorial Meeting and Choral Services In Honor And In Commemoration of Rev. Hy. H. Garnet, D. D., United States Minister Plenipotentiary to Liberia." The horder is tastefully and appropriately printed in black.

Madame Julie Rivé-King played last evening to an appreciative audience at Platt's Hall. This afternoon she will make her last appearance in this city, when the numerous friends whom she has made during her sojourn will pay her a farewell tribute.

— EXILED! PETROLEUM V. NASBY, LATE OF Confederate Cross Roads, which is in the State of Kentucky, has been banished—"eggsilled"; but he does not seem to be very much cast down by his fate. Here is what he says: "I shel make my way to Paris to wunst, and it will go hard with me ef I can't establish myself ther in some way. I turn my back upon the Corners hawtily, only too glad to leave a ongrateful people, which hezn't enuff appreshashun uv greatins to furnish the triffin means to keep it alive among em. Boston alluz paid Webster's debts, while the Corners eggsille me. Be it so. I go, never to return." PETROLEUM V. NASBY, (Eggsille.)

— A LADY, FORMERLY PUPIL OF PROF. DE Filippe, desires a few more pupils in Spanish and French; teaches by the same method. Address M. L., box 81, Oakland, Cal.

"Student" wants to know what kind of a bird was the dodo? From the fact that the species is entirely extinct, we suppose it was the fabled spring chicken, of which we still hear so often and see so never.—Burlington Hawkeye.

— MR. A. J. KELLEHER DESIRES TO INFORM HIS pupils that he will resume tuition on July 10th. Apply at Gray's music store, 117 Post, or at his residence, 2324 Clay Street.

"Journalism is the grave of genius," said one of the graduating class at Harvard in his essay. "This is indeed true, and a college graduate makes the hoss corpse," comments the Chicago Tribune.

— THE CELEBRATED VEGETABLE COMPOUND for females, which within a few years has made the name of Mrs. Lydia E. Pinkham known in every part of the civilized world, relieves suffering by the safe and sure method of equalizing the vital forces, and thus regulating the organic functions. It is only by such a method that disease is ever arrested and removed.

— RUSSIA SALVE IS UNRIVALED FOR ITS SPEEDY healing qualities. Ask your druggist for it. 25c.

Another dynamite mine in Russia. Go east, young man, and blow up with the country.—Burdette.

— HALL'S VEGETABLE SICILIAN HAIR RENEWER is highly recommended by physicians, clergymen, and scientists as a preparation accomplishing wonderful results. It is entirely harmless, and a certain remedy for removing dandruff, making the scalp white and clean, and restoring gray hair to its youthful color. It imparts a gloss and freshness to the hair which all admire.

REMOVED TO 32 GEARV ST

THE INNER MAN.

Middle-aged men can remember, says an English journal, when native oysters were sold in London at sixpence per dozen; now they are thought cheap at six times the money, and it is a singular fact that they are at this moment dearer in London than they were in Rome when the Emperor Vitellius devoured them all day long, and Cicero sustained his philosophy by swallowing scores of them brought from the coast of Kent.

The Rothschilds, fortunate with their vineyards as with most of their other enterprises, have just sold, after retaining an ample supply for their own use, last year's crop of Chateau Lafite for one hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars, this being at the rate of sixteen hundred dollars for a hoghead containing forty-five gallons, or about seven dollars a bottle. They do sell in New York what purports to be Chateau Lafite at from three to six dollars per bottle, and lips are smacked over it as genuine.

At very refined small dinners in New York, the Oriental practice is followed of sending round embossed silver bowls or basins of Benares brass, and a ewer filled with scented water, which is poured by the servant over the fingers of each guest in turn, which are then dried on the long embroidered Turkish towel thrown over the man's arm. But such practices are mere copies of foreign practice, not specially recommending themselves by obvious fitness, are the pedantry of etiquette, and always appear forced, comments the New York Sun. Serving methuein and Greek wine in crystal flacons after dinner may sound very romantic and cultivated; but who wants to drink sweetened water, or wine that has lost its flavor, at the close of a dinner, be it ever so classical?

Somebody asked several weeks ago how to use the etched or embroidered doilies which appear with finger-bowls at dinner, says the New York Sun. The etiquette of the doilies and finger-bowls, as laid down by the best New York authority some little time ago, is that two napkins are brought with each finger-bowl, the smallest of which is laid folded on the plate to deaden the sound of glass, and the finger-bowl lifted from the side of the plate, and placed on it. The tips of the fingers are delicately dipped in the scented water, and dried by pressing on the larger napkin, which is then cast aside, or thrown lightly over the bowl. If grapes or berries which stain have been part of the dessert, the slice of lemon in the water is used to remove stains, handling everything with lightest, quietest of touches. It is entirely in keeping with good foreign manners to dip a corner of the white napkin into the water, and pass it over the lips to freshen the mouth.

Club circles have recently been excited in New York, says the World, over an incident of perhaps more practicable importance to all who frequent these institutions than the right of governing committees to expel members under a star chamber proceeding. At a dinner recently given in an uptown club the guests were so much delighted with the flavor and quality of the soup that two or three of them ventured, with the approval of the host, upon the eccentricity of asking to be served a second time. Two of these appreciative gourmets fell to with gusto upon their plates. The third paused, glared into his plate, spoon in hand, turned deadly pale, and sank back with an exclamation of horror into his chair. Bending eagerly forward, his neighbors exhibited an emotion equal to his own, and one of them hastily rising, with a stammering excuse fled from the room. In the plate floated, "bobbing up serenely," a small and daintily proportioned mouse! Over the subsequent history of the banquet humanity draws a veil. But it has been observed that though another chef graces the kitchen of the establishment, confidence has not yet been restored, and that many of the habitués of the club have been dining rather regularly since at Delmonico's. The deposed functionary, it is understood, solemnly declares that he was led into this indiscretion in good faith, by being assured that the dinner was given in honor of one of the members of the Chinese legation from Washington.

A decidedly novel application of electricity is reported in the French papers, says a New York journal. The shop of a vintner at Carcassonne was recently struck by lightning. Among the contents was a ton of wine, so sour as to be absolutely undrinkable even by Frenchmen. When in the course of repairing damages, the vintner came to examine the shattered cask, the remaining contents were found to be very palatable. The astonished vintner called in a scientific friend, and now it is reported that by sending a weak current of electricity through a cask of sour or harsh wine, the wine will not only be restored to soundness, but will be mellowed into a body and flavor such as it has been heretofore supposed time alone could confer. That ordinary Malaga rain-water could be chloroformed into fine old Madeira wine has long been believed in some parts of this country, and it is a matter of club gossip that an aspiring new settler at Newport some years ago was kindly assisted by an accomplished friend to fill his cellars with precious old brands produced in that manner. If the grands crus of the Garonne can be matched by exposing a lot of "little blue wines" to a sharp thunder-storm, the point will soon be knocked out of such tales as the following, which turns up in a recent number of a London society journal:

Said the host, a very "new rich," to his critical guest: "There, my boy, there's a glass of claret you don't often meet—I bought the whole lot; nothing left of it; cost me thirty pounds for the entire stock!" The guest sniffed and tasted, and quietly commented: "What an enormous stock of it you must have, old chap!"

CCXXXVIII.—Bill of Fare for Six Persons.

Stuesday, July 23d.

Rice and Tomato Soup.

Cantaloupes.

Fried Oysters.

Corn. Baked Tomatoes.

Roast Beef.

Mashed Potatoes.

Vegetable Salad.

Rice Cake, with Peaches.

Apples, Pears, Apricots, Grapes, Figs, Plums, and Nectarines.

RICE CAKE, WITH PEACHES.—When some rice is cooked with milk, and is still hot, add a little butter, sugar, and two eggs. Butter a plain pudding-mold; strew the bottom with bread-crumbs, and put in a layer of rice half an inch thick; then a layer of peaches, and continue alternate layers of each until the mold is full. Bake this for fifteen or twenty minutes. When done turn the cake out of the mold, and pour into the bottom of the dish a boiled custard sauce, flavored with wine or vanilla.

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

The Poignard and the Pills.

Margaret of Burgundy,
Fairest of the frail,
Tempted many a gallant
To the "Tour de Nesle";
With caresses burning
Made his soul her own;
Then she softly stabbed him
Dead—without a groan.
Stabbed him—while her kisses
Draimed his parting breath;
What a modulation
That—from Love to Death!
Mozart—the magician—
Thus from jubilee
Deftly shifts the tonic
To a minor key!
Were not death more welcome—
Last of mortal ills—
In a shower of kisses
Than—a box of pills?
—Sam Ward in New York World.

The Current Expression.

Why trenchant slang should we deary?
In its bold diction pray believe.
If Eve had been sufficient "fly"
To say, when Satan tempted by,
"Not this Eve—another Eve,"
"Good Eve" would then to her apply.
—New York Clipper.

The Boston Maid's Lament.

WARSAW, N. Y., June 29.—The large bean-raising districts in Western New York are now afflicted by a worm called the bean weevil, which is committing great devastations upon newly planted crops. In some localities destruction of the entire crop is complete. —New York Times.

She sits in her chamber sad as air,
(The wind it moaneth in turret and tree!)
And the slumberous cloud of her sunny hair
Like a golden aureole charms the air,
(But the wind it moaneth in turret and tree!)

Out on the night she looks and sighs,
(Breathe low, O wind, in turret and tree!)
And the wondrous light of her lambent eyes
Shines like the stars ere the moon doth rise,
(And the wind breathes low in turret and tree!)

She maketh her moan: Long hours shall fly,
(Roareth the wind in turret and tree!)
The long, long days, mount the sun on high,
Or lowly sink in the wintry sky,
(Soft blows the wind in turret and tree!)

The blossom I love shall come no more,
(Loath howls the wind in turret and tree!)
The canker-worm gnaweth its inmost core,
Full low it lieeth that bloomed of yore,
(The wind shrieks mad in turret and tree!)

Soon like that blossom I'll fade and die,
(The wind it moaneth in turret and tree!)
And cold on my bosom that flower shall lie,
While the breeze breathes low as it wanders by,
(It shall hear not the wind in turret and tree!)
—New York Graphic.

"Vanity Fair."

All the world's a wardrobe,
And all the girls and women merely wearers.
They have their fashions and their fantasies,
And one she in her times wears many garments
Throughout her seven stages. First, the baby,
Beitried and brodered, in her nurse's arms.
And then the trim-hosed school-girl, with her flourishes
And small-boy scolding face, tripping, skirt-wiggling,
Coquettishly to school. And then the flirt,
Ogling like Circe, with a business attitude,
Kept on her low-cut corset. Then a bride,
Full of strange finery, veiled like an angel,
Veiled vapourously, yet vestured of glance
Seeking the woman's heaven—admiration—
Even at the altar's steps. And then the matron,
In fair rich velvet, with suave satin lined,
With eyes severe, and skirts of youthful cut,
Full of dress-saws and modish instances,
To teach her girls their part. The sixth age shifts
Into the gray yet gorgeous grandmamma,
With gold pinces on nose, and fan at side,
Her youthful tastes still strong, and worldly wise
In sumptuary law, her quivering pipe
Prosing of fashion and Le Follet, pipes
Of robes and bargains rare. Last scene of all,
That ends the sex's Made-swayed history,
Is second childishness and sheer oblivion
Of youth, taste, passion, all—save love of dress.
—Unknown Liar.

A Missouri Roundelay.

I'm a bandit bold, with a lust for gold, and a heart
That knows no fear;
I rob and slash, and plunder and gash throughout
The joyous year.
My favorite food's gunpowder and blood, washed
Down with whisky neat;
And I'd rather kill than have my fill of Delmonico
Dinners to eat.
You should see my mien as I board a train, and my Pons on the passengers pull.
The way I do it is quite too, too; it indeed is just Awfully aw-ful.
The ladies squeak, and the gents, so meek, pass out
Their wallets rich;
And I gather them in—the diamond pin, the watches,
And rings, and such.
At home with the boys, all my household joys are Aesthetic and chastely gay;
We have prayers with meat, and there's always a seat
When the parson comes our way;
For pa wore the cloth, and though I may be off, ma
Hasn't forgot her place,
And there's never a dollar that I may collar to which
She don't say grace.

POSTSCRIPT.

(Communicated through Madame de Limerick, seventh daughter of a seventy-seventh son, born with a caul. Ladies, soc., gents, $1.)
By treachery's bolt from an army Colt I was kicked into Paradise,
And now I frolic on wings angelic in the mansions
Of the skies.
I've a job on hand, and it looms up grand—just whisper to them at home:
Jack Sheppard and me has it fixed, you see, to capture the golden throne.
—From the Papers of the Late Jesse James, Esq., in the Judge.

LYDIA E. PINKHAM'S VEGETABLE COMPOUND.

Is a Positive Cure

For all those Painful Complaints and Weaknesses
so common to our best female population.

A Medicine for Women. Invented by a Woman.
Prepared by a Woman.

The Greatest Medical Discovery Since the Dawn of History.

It revives the drooping spirits, invigorates and
harmonizes the organic functions, gives elasticity and firmness to the step, restores the natural lustre to the eye, and plants on the pale cheek of woman the fresh roses of life's spring and early summer time.

Physicians Use It and Prescribe It Freely.
It removes faintness, flatulency, destroys all craving
for stimulant, and relieves weakness of the stomach.
That feeling of bearing down, causing pain, weight
and backache, is always permanently cured by its use.
For the cure of Kidney Complaints of either sex
this Compound is unsurpassed.

LYDIA E. PINKHAM'S BLOOD PURIFIER
will eradicate every vestige of humors from the Blood, and give tone and strength to the system, of man, woman or child. Insist on having it.

Both the Compound and Blood Purifier are prepared at 233 and 235 Western Avenue, Lynn, Mass. Price of either, $1. Six bottles for $5. Sent by mail in the form of pills, or of lozenges, on receipt of price, $1 per box for either. Mrs. Pinkham freely answers all letters of inquiry. Enclose 3¢ stamp. Send for pamphlet.

No family should be without LYDIA E. PINKHAM'S
LIVER PILLS. They cure constipation, biliousness,
and torpidity of the liver. 25 cents per box.

Sold by all Druggists.

This standard article is compounded with the greatest care.

Its effects are as wonderful and satisfactory as ever.
It restores gray or faded hair to its youthful color.
It removes all eruptions, itching and dandruff, and the scalp by its use becomes white and clean.

By its tonic properties it restores the capillary glands to their normal vigor, preventing baldness, and making the hair grow thick and strong.

As a dressing nothing has been found so effectual or desirable.
Dr. A. A. Hayes, State Assayer of Massachusetts, says of it: "I consider it the best preparation for its intended purposes."

BUCKINGHAM'S DYE, For the Whiskers,

This elegant preparation may be relied on to change the color of the beard from gray or any other undesirable shade to brown or black, at discretion. It is easily applied, being in one preparation, and quickly and effectually produces a permanent color which will neither rub nor wash off.

MANUFACTURED BY

R. P. HALL & Co., Nashua, N. H.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS AND DEALERS IN MEDICINES.

PEBBLE SPECTACLES!

MULLER'S OPTICAL DEPOT

135 Montgomery St., nr. Bush,

Opposite Occidental Hotel.

Specialty Thirty-two Years.

COMPOUND ASTIGMATIC LENSES

Mounted to Order. Two Hours Notice.

The most complicated cases of defective vision thoroughly diagnosed, free of charge.

411 413 & 415 SANSOME ST. S.F.

Importers of All Kinds of Paper.

EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS.

ZEITSKA INSTITUTE

922 Post Street.

FRENCH, GERMAN AND ENGLISH

Day and Boarding School for young ladies and children. KINDERGARTEN.

The twentieth year of this Institute will commence July 24, 1882. MADAME B. ZEITSKA, Principal.

LEGAL NOTICES.

SHERIFF'S SALE.

ANTHONY WADDY, Plaintiff,
vs.
JAMES JONES, Defendant.

Superior Court.
No. 5571.

Department No. 3.

Execution for Deficiency
after Sale.

UNDER AND BY VIRTUE OF AN

Execution for Deficiency after Foreclosure Sale, issued out of the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, duly attested on the twenty-third day of May, A. D. 1882, in the above entitled action, wherein Anthony Waddy, the above-named plaintiff, obtained a judgment against James Jones, defendant, on the sixth day of March, A. D. 1882, for the sum of $1,173 dollars, U. S. gold coin, with interest thereon and costs etc., and who was an order of sale was on March 8, A. D. 1882, issued to the Sheriff of the City and County of San Francisco, which said order of sale was on May 16, 1882, returned by said Sheriff, showing a deficiency thereon in the sum of $1,207.05, as appears of record, which said deficiency was docketed. Pursuant to said judgment and decree I have levied upon all the right, title, and interest which the said defendant, James Jones, had on the sixteenth day of May, 1882, the day on which said judgment was docketed, or which he may have subsequently acquired, and to the hereinafter-described property, situate, lying, and being in the city and county of San Francisco, State of California, standing of record in the office of the County Recorder of said city and county in the name of James Jones, and bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the southerly line of Pleasant (formerly Riley) Street, distant twenty-two feet and nine inches easterly from the southeasterly corner of Jones and Pleasant Streets, and running thence easterly upon the southerly line of Pleasant Street, twenty-two feet and nine inches; thence southerly, at right angles, to Pleasant Street, sixty feet; thence westerly, and parallel with Pleasant Street, twenty-two feet nine inches; thence northerly sixty feet to place of beginning; being portion of fifty-vara lot No. 825, as shown on the official map of San Francisco.

Public notice is hereby given that on MONDAY, THE SEVENTH DAY OF AUGUST, A. D. 1882, at twelve o'clock, noon, of that day, in front of the Old City Hall, in the city and county of San Francisco, I will sell all the right, title, and interest which the said defendant, James Jones, had on the sixteenth day of May, 1882, the day on which said judgment was docketed, as aforesaid, or which he may have subsequently acquired in and to the above-described property, to the highest and best bidder for gold coin of the United States.

San Francisco, July 15, 1882.

B. E. NEWMAN, Attorney for Plaintiff.

July 15, 22, 29, and August 5.

ASSESSMENTS AND DIVIDENDS.

CHOLLAR MINING COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of Works, Virginia, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 17th day of July, 1882, an assessment (No. 9) of Twenty-five Cents per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately, in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 79, Nevada Block, No. 309
Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the twenty-second day of August, 1882, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on Tuesday, the 18th day of September, 1882, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

W. E. DENN, Secretary.
Office—Room 79 Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery
Street, San Francisco, Cal.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF

the Eureka Consolidated Mining Company, Nevada Block, Room 37—San Francisco, July 15, 1882.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named Company, held this day, a Dividend (No. 75) of 25 cents per share was declared on the capital stock of the company, payable on Thursday, the 27th day of July, 1882. Transfer books close with the 25th instant.

P. JACOBUS, Sec'y pro tem.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF

the Silver King Mining Company, San Francisco,
July 4, 1882.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors
of the above-named Company held this day, a Dividend
(No. 31) of Twenty-five Cents (25c) per share was declared, payable on Saturday, July 15, 1882, at the office of the Company, Room 19, 328 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California. Transfer books will close July 10, 1882, at 3 P. M.

JOSEPH NASH, Sec.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—THE CALI-

FORNIA SAVINGS AND LOAN SOCIETY,
Northwest corner Powell and Eddy Streets. The Board of Directors have declared a dividend to Depositors at the rate of four and thirty-two one-hundredths (4 32-100) per cent.
per annum on Term Deposits, and three and sixty one-hundredths
(3 60-100) per cent. per annum on Ordinary Deposits, free from Federal Tax, for the half year ending June 30, 1882, payable on and after Monday, July 10, 1882.

VERNON CAMPBELL, Secretary

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—THE GER-

MAN SAVINGS AND LOAN SOCIETY. For the half year
ending June 30, 1882, the Board of Directors of the GER-MAN SAVINGS AND LOAN SOCIETY has declared a dividend on Term Deposits at the rate of 4 32-100 per cent. per annum, and on ordinary deposits at the rate of 3 60-100 per cent. per annum, free from Federal Taxes, and payable on and after the 10th day of July, 1882. By order.

GEORGE LEITE, Secretary.

ALLEN, MCGARY & CO.,

IMPORTERS AND WHOLESALE

Liquor Dealers. 322-324 FRONT STREET

SAN FRANCISCO.

RUPTURE

Cured. Greatest Invention of the Age. PIERCE & SON
704 Sac. St., San Fran. Cal.

$5 To $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free

Address STINSON & Co., Portland, Me

NEW ENGLAND BAKING POWDER

NO Alum
Flour
Starch
Ammonia
Phosphates
Tartaric Acid

Cream Tartar and Bi-Carb. Soda
NOTHING ELSE
Newton Bros. & Co.
SAN FRANCISCO

When ordering wine, don't call for "California Champagne," merely, but state the brand, "EXTRA DRY," or the firm's name.

Arpad Haraszthy & Co.
530 WASHINGTON ST. S.F. CAL.
N. B.—Examine the cork.

IRA P. RANKIN. A. P. BRAYTON
PACIFIC IRON WORKS
RANKIN, BRAYTON & CO.,
127 to 132 First Street, San Francisco.
Mining Machinery of all kinds, Sugar Mills, Engines—
both Marine and Stationary, Boilers, etc., etc.

J. C. MERRILL & CO.,
Shipping and Commission Merchants
204 and 206 California Street,
SAN FRANCISCO.

The Regular Dispatch line of Packets to Honolulu, H. I.

S. P. COLLINS & CO.
WHOLESALE AND RETAIL
dealers Old London Dock Brandies, Port Wines, Sherry, and all the choicest brands Champagne, Apple Jack,
Pisco, Arrack, Cordials, Liqueurs, etc. 329 MONTGOM-ERY, and 511 CALIFORNIA STREETS, S. F.

LOUIS BRAVERMAN & CO.

(Successors to BRAVERMAN & LEVY.)

Manufacturers of FINE JEWELRY, and Importers of WATCHES,
DIAMONDS, and other PRECIOUS STONES, STERLING SILVER-
WARE, and FRENCH CLOCKS.

Keep the best assortment and sell at LOWER PRICES than any house in this city.

119 MONTGOMERY STREET.

Apollinaris

"THE QUEEN OF TABLE WATERS."

British Medical Journal.

"A necessity at every Table and at every Bar."

New York Tribune.

ANNUAL SALE, 10 MILLIONS.

Of all Grocers, Druggists, and Mineral Water Dealers.

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

FOR SALE BY RUHL BROTHERS,

522 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal.

HENRY F. MILLER

PIANOS, OF BOSTON,

Are pronounced the BEST by the leading artists of the present time, and are used by them in public and private.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES mailed to any address.

WOODWORTH, SCHELL & CO.,

Sole Agents, 105 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

FIREMAN'S FUND

INSURANCE COMPANY

OF CALIFORNIA.

CAPITAL, $750,000
ASSETS, DECEMBER 31, 1881, $1,240,000

D. J. STAPLES, President.

ALPHEUS BULL, Vice-President.

WILLIAM J. DUTTON, Secretary.

E. W. CARPENTER, Asst. Secretary.

AGENTS IN ALL PRINCIPAL LOCALITIES.

E. DETRICK & CO.

Importers, Manufacturers, and Dealers in BAGS AND BURLAPS, all kinds, BAG-TWINES, HYDRAULIC HOSE. Sole Agents for MOUNT
VERNON CO.'S DUCK, all widths, Russell Manfg Co.'s COTTON BELT-
ING, Russell Manfg Co.'s SEAMLESS LINEN HOSE. Tower's Celebrated
OILED CLOTHING.

TENTS, HAMMOCKS, CAMP COTS, CHAIRS,
STOOLS, AND CAMPERS' OUTFITS.

Tents let by the Week or Month. AMERICAN FLAGS, BUNTING.

5, 7 AND 9 CALIFORNIA, AND 108, 110 AND 112 MARKET STS.

Hunyadi János

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST NATURAL APERIENT WATER.

"SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHER LAXATIVES."

"SPEEDY, SURE, AND GENTLE."—Prof. Roberts, F.R.C.P. London.

The most certain and comfortable cathartic in cases of sluggish liver or piles.

ORDINARY DOSE, A WINEGLASSFUL BEFORE BREAKFAST. OF ALL DRUGGISTS AND MINERAL WATER DEALERS.

NONE GENUINE BUT WITH A BLUE LABEL.

FOR SALE BY RUHL BROTHERS,

522 Montgomery Street, Cal.

PRICE REDUCED

FOR

SEATTLE COAL

ALL DEALERS KEEP IT.

MAIN OFFICE:

210 BATTERY STREET,
San Francisco.

DEPOTS:

Beale Street Wharf, San Francisco.
Foster's Wharf - Oakland.

ROEDERER CHAMPAGNE.

NOTICE—THE TRADE AND THE
Public are informed that we receive the Genuine
LOUIS ROEDERER CARTE BLANCHE CHAM-
PAGNE direct from Mr. Louis Roederer, Reims, over his signature and Consular invoice. Each case is marked upon the side, "Macondray & Co., San Francisco," and each bottle bears the label, "Macondray & Co., Sole Agents for the Pacific Coast."

MACONDRAY & CO.,
Sole Agents for the Pacific Coast.

WILLIAMS, DIMOND & CO.

SHIPPING AND

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Union Building, Junction Market and Pine Streets, San Francisco.

AGENTS FOR PACIFIC MAIL S. S.

Co.; Pacific Steam Navigation Co.; The Conard
Royal Mail S. S. Co.; The Hawaiian Line; The China
Traders' Insurance Co., Limited; The Marine Insurance Co. of London; The Baldwin Locomotive Works; The Glasgow Iron Co.; Nich. Ashton & Son's Salt

J. M. LITCHFIELD & CO.

MERCHANT TAILORS,

And Dealers in Gents' Furnishing Goods,

415 MONTGOMERY STREET,

bet. California and Sacramento San Francisco

CHARLES R. ALLEN

Wholesale and Retail Dealer in COAL Order for House or Office by Telephone 308.

Agent Pittsburg Coal Mining Company.

118 and 120 Beale Street, S. F.

PAYOT, UPHAM & CO

STATIONERS, BOOKSELLERS,

Commercial Printers.

and Blank Book Manufacturers

204 Sansome Street, near Pine.

THE

AMERICAN SUGAR REFINERY

SAN FRANCISCO,

MANUFACTURERS OF ALL

Classes of Refined Sugars, including Loaf Sugar

for export.

C. ADOLPHE LOW, President.

Office—208 California Street.

TABER, HARKER & Co.,

IMPORTERS AND WHOLESALE

GROCERS, 108 and 110 California St., San Francisco

ART-PAINTED, PLAIN and GLAZED

TILES

For Decorations.

W. W. MONTAGUE & CO.

110 to 118 Battery Street.

DRINK FALK'S MILWAUKEE BEER.

The Argonaut.

VOL. XI. NO. 5.

SAN FRANCISCO, JULY 29, 1882.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

BRET HARTE'S NEW STORY.

"Flip"—A California Romance.

PART III.—CHAPTER V.

The long, parched summer had drawn to its dusty close. Much of it was already blown abroad and dissipated on trail and turnpike, or crackled in harsh, unelastic fibres on hillside and meadow. Some of it had disappeared in the palpable smoke by day and fiery crests by night of burning forests. The besieging fogs on the Coast Range daily thinned their hosts, and at last vanished. The wind changed from northwest to southeast. The salt breath of the sea was on the summit. And then one day the staring, unchanged sky was faintly touched with remote, mysterious clouds, and grew tremulous in expression. The next morning dawned upon a newer face in the heavens, on changed woods, on altered outlines, on vanished crests, on forgotten distances. It was raining.

Four weeks of this change, with broken spaces of sunlight and intense blue aerial islands, and then a storm set in. All day the summit pines and redwood rocked in the blast. At times the onset of the rain seemed to be held back by the fury of the gale, or was visibly seen in sharp waves on the hillside. Unknown and concealed watercourses suddenly overflowed the trail, pools became lakes, and brooks rivers. Hidden from the storm, the sylvan silence of sheltered valleys was broken by the impetuous rush of waters. Even the tiny streamlet that traversed Flip's retreat in the Gin and Ginger woods became a cascade.

The storm drove Fairley from his couch early. The falling of a large tree across the trail, and the sudden overflow of a small stream beside it, hastened his steps. But he was doomed to encounter what was to him a more disagreeable object—a human figure. By the bedraggled drapery that flapped and fluttered in the wind, by the long, unkempt hair that hid the face and eyes, and by the grotesquely misplaced bonnet, the old man recognized one of his old trespassers—an Indian squaw.

"Clear out 'en that! Come, make tracks, will ye?" the old man screamed. But here the wind stopped his voice, and drove him against a hazel bush.

"Me heap sick," answered the squaw, shivering through her muddy shawl.

"I'll make ye a heap sicker if ye don't vamose the ranch," continued Fairley, advancing.

"Me wantee Wangee girl. Wangee girl give me heap grub," said the squaw, without moving.

"You bet your life," groaned the old man to himself. Nevertheless an idea struck him. "Ye ain't brought no presents, hev ye?" he asked, cautiously. "Ye ain't got no pootty things for poor Wangee girl?" he continued, insinuatingly.

"Me got heap cache nuts and berries," said the squaw.

"Oh, in course! in course! That's just it," screamed Fairley; "you've got 'em cached only two miles from yer, and you'll go and get 'em for half a dollar, cash down."

"Me bring Wangee girl to cache," replied the Indian, pointing to the wood. "Honest Injin."

Another bright idea struck Mr. Fairley. But it required some elaboration. Hurrying the squaw with him through the pelting rain, he reached the shelter of the corral. Vainly the shivering aborigine drew her tightly-banded papoose closer to her square, flat breast, and looked longingly toward the cabin; the old man backed her against the palisade. Here he cautiously imparted his dark intentions to employ her to keep watch and ward over the rancho, and especially over its young mistress—"Clear out all the tramps 'ceptin' yourself, and I'll keep ye in grub and rum." Many and deliberate repetitions of this offer in various forms at last seemed to affect the squaw; she nodded violently, and echoed the last word, "rum." "Now," she added. The old man hesitated; she was in possession of his secret; he groaned, and promising an immediate installment of liquor, led her to the cabin.

The door was so securely fastened against the impact of the storm that some moments elapsed before the bar was drawn, and the old man had become impatient and profane. When it was partly opened by Flip he slipped in, dragging the squaw after him, and cast one single suspicious glance around the rude apartment which served as a sitting-room. Flip had apparently been writing. A small inkstand was still on the board table, but her paper had evidently been concealed before she allowed them to enter. The squaw instantly squatted before the adobe hearth, warmed her bundled baby, and left the ceremony of introduction to her companion. Flip regarded the two with calm preoccupation and indifference. The only thing that touched her interest was the old squaw's draggled skirt and limp neckerchief. They were Flip's own, long since abandoned and cast off in the Gin and Ginger woods. "Secrets again," whined Fairley, still eyeing Flip furtively. "Secrets again, in course—in course—jess so. Secrets that must be kep' from the ole man. Dark doin's by one's own flesh and blood. Go on, go on! Don't mind me." Flip did not reply. She had even lost the interest in her old dress. Perhaps it had only touched some note in unison with her reverie.

"Can't ye get the poor critter some whisky?" he queried, fretfully. "Ye used to be peart enuff before." As Flip turned to the corner to lift the demijohn, Fairley took occasion to kick the squaw with his foot, and indicate by extravagant pantomime that the bargain was not to be alluded to before the girl. Flip poured out some whisky in a tin-cup, and approaching the squaw, handed it to her. "It's like ez not," continued Fairley to his daughter, but looking at the squaw, "that she'll be huntin' the woods off and on, and kinder looking after the last pit near the madroños; ye'll give her grub and lick ez she likes. Well, d'ye hear, Flip? Are ye moonin' agin with yer secrets? What's gone with ye?"

If the child were dreaming, it was a delicious dream. Her magnetic eyes were suffused by a strange light, as though the eye itself had blushed; her full pulse showed itself more in the rounding outline of her cheek than in any deepening of color; indeed, if there was any heightening of tint, it was in her freckles, which fairly glistered like tiny spangles. Her eyes were downcast, her shoulders slightly bent, but her voice was low and clear, and thoughtful as ever.

"One o' the big pines above the madroño pit has blown over into the run," she said. "It's choked up the water, and it's risin' fast. Like ez not it's pourin' over into the pit by this time."

The old man rose with a fretful cry. "And why in blazes didn't you say so at first?" he screamed, catching up his ax, and rushing to the door.

"Ye didn't give me a chance," said Flip, raising her eyes for the first time. With an impatient imprecation, Fairley darted by her and rushed into the wood. In an instant she had shut the door and bolted it. In the same instant the squaw rose, dashed the long hair not only from her eyes, but from her head, tore away her sbawl and blanket, and revealed the square shoulders of Lance Harriott! Flip remained leaning against the door; but the young man in rising dropped the bandaged papoose, which rolled from his lap into the fire. Flip, with a cry, sprang toward it; but Lance caught her by the waist with one arm, as with the other he dragged the bundle from the flames. "Don't be alarmed," he said, gayly, "it's only—"

"What?" said Flip, trying to disengage herself.

"My coat and trousers."

Flip laughed, which encouraged Lance to another attempt to kiss her. She evaded it by diving her head into his waistcoat, and saying, "There's father!"

"But he's gone to clear away that tree," suggested Lance. One of Flip's significant silences followed.

"Oh, I see," he laughed; "that was a plan to get him away! Ab!" She had released herself.

"Why did you come like that?" she asked, pointing to his wig and blanket.

"To see if you'd know me," he responded.

"No," said Flip, dropping her eyes, "it was to keep other people from knowing you. You're hidin' again."

"I am," returned Lance; "but," he interrupted, gayly, "it's only the same old thing."

"But you wrote from Monterey that it was all over," she persisted.

"So it would have been," he said, gloomily, "but for some dog down here who is hunting up an old scent. I'll spot him yet, and—"

He stopped suddenly with such utter abstraction of hatred in his fixed and glittering eyes that she almost feared him. She laid her hand quite unconsciously on his arm. He grasped it—his face changed.

"I couldn't wait any longer to see you, Flip, so I came here anyway," he went on gayly. "I thought to hang round and get a chance to speak to you first, when I fell afoul of the old man. He didn't know me, and tumbled right in my little game. Why, do you believe he wants to hire me, for my grub and liquor, to act as a sort of sentry over you and the ranch?" And he related with great gusto the substance of his interview. "I reckon as he's that suspicious," he concluded, "I'd better play it out now as I've begun, only it's mighty hard I can't see you here before the fire in your fancy toggery, Flip, but must dodge in and out of the wet underbrush in these yer duds of yours that I picked up in the old place in the Gin and Ginger woods."

"Then you came here just to see me?" asked Flip.

"I did."

"For only that?"

"Only that."

Flip dropped her eyes. Lance had got his other arm around her waist, but her resisting little hand was still potent.

"Listen," she said at last, without looking up, but apparently talking to the intruding arm, "when dad comes I'll get him to send you to watch the diamond pit. It isn't far; it's warm, and—"

"What?"

"I'll come after a bit and see you. Quit foolin' now. If you'd only have come here like yourself—like—like—a white man."

"The old man," interrupted Lance, "would have just passed me on to the summit. I couldn't have played the lost fisherman on him at this time of year."

"Ye could have been stopped at the Crossing by high water, you silly," said the girl. "It was." This grammatical obscurity referred to the stage-coach.

"Yes, but I might have been tracked to this cabin. And look here, Flip," he said, suddenly straightening himself, and lifting the girl's face to a level with his own. "I don't want you to lie any more for me. It ain't right."

"All right. Ye needn't go to the pit, then, and I won't come."

"Flip!"

"And here's dad coming. Quick!"

Lance chose to put his own interpretation on this last adjuration. The resisting little hand was now lying quite limp on his shoulder. He drew her brown, bright face near his own, felt her spiced breath on his lips, his cheeks, his hot eyelids, his swimming eyes; kissed her, hurriedly replaced his wig and blanket, and dropped beside the fire-wall with the tremulous laugh of youth and innocent first passion. Flip had withdrawn to the window, and was looking out upon the rocking pines.

"He don't seem to be coming," said Lance, with a half shy laugh.

"No," responded Flip, demurely, pressing her hot oval cheek against the wet panes; "I reckon I was mistaken. You're sure," she added, looking resolutely another way, but still trembling like a magnetic needle toward Lance, as he moved slightly before the fire, "you're sure you'd like me to come to you?"

"Sure, Flip?"

"Hush!" said Flip, as this reassuring query of reproachful astonishment appeared about to be emphasized by a forward amatory dash of Lance's; "hush! He's coming this time, sure."

It was indeed Fairley, exceedingly wet, exceedingly bedraggled, exceedingly sponged out as to color, and exceedingly profane. It appeared that there was indeed a tree that had fallen into the "run," but that, far from diverting the overflow into the pit, it had established a "back-water," which had forced another outlet. All this might have been detected at once by any human intellect not distracted by correspondence with strangers, and enfeebled by habitually scorning the intellect of its own progenitor. This reckless selfishness had further only resulted in giving "rheumatics" to that progenitor, who now required the external administration of opodeldoc to his limbs, and the internal administration of whisky. Having thus spoken, Mr. Fairley, with great promptitude and infantine simplicity, at once bared two legs of entirely different colors, and mutely waited for his daughter to rub them. If Flip did this all unconsciously, and with the mechanical dexterity of previous habit, it was because she did not quite understand the savage eyes and impatient gestures of Lance in his encompassing wig and blanket, and because it helped her to voice her thought.

"Ye'll never be able to take yer watch at the diamond pit to-night, dad," she said; "and I've been reck'nin' you might set the squaw there instead. I can show her what to do."

But, to Flip's momentary discomfiture, her father promptly objected. "Mebbee I've got suthin' else for her to do. Mebbe I may have my secrets too—eh?" he said, with dark significance, at the same time administering a significant nudge to Lance, which kept up the young man's exasperation. "No; she'll rest yer a bit just now. I'll set her to watchin' suthin' else, like as not, when I want her." Flip fell into one of her suggestive silences. Lance watched her earnestly, mollified by a single furtive glance from her significant eyes; the rain dashed against the windows, and occasionally spattered and hissed on the hearth of the broad chimney, and Mr. David Fairley, somewhat assuaged by the internal administration of whisky, grew more loquacious. The genius of incongruity and inconsistency which generally ruled his conduct came out with freshened vigor under the gentle stimulation of spirits. "On an evenin' like this," he began, comfortably settling himself on the floor beside the chimney, "ye might rig yerself out in them new duds and fancy fixin's that that Sacramento shrimp sent ye, and let your own flesh and blood see ye. If that's too much to do for your ole dad, you might do it to please that digger squaw, as a Christian act." Whether in the hidden depths of the old man's consciousness there was a feeling of paternal vanity in showing this wretched aborigine the value and importance of the treasure she was about to guard, I can not say. Flip darted an interrogatory look at Lance, who nodded a quiet assent, and she flew into the inner room. She did not linger on the details of her toilet, but reappeared almost the next moment in her new finery, buttoning the neck of her gown as she entered the room, and chastely stopping at the window to characteristically pull up her stocking. The peculiarity of her situation increased her usual shyness; she played with the black and gold beads of a handsome necklace—Lance's last gift—as the merest child might; her unbuttoned boot gave the squaw a natural opportunity of showing her admiration and devotion by insisting upon fastening it, and gave Lance under that disguise an opportunity of covertly kissing the little foot and ankle in the shadow of the chimney; an event which provoked slight hysterical symptoms in Flip, and caused her to sit suddenly down in spite of the remonstrances of her parent. "Ef you can't quit gugglin' and squirmin' like an Injin baby yourself, ye'd better git rid o' them duds," he ejaculated with peevish scorn.

Yet under this perfunctory rebuke his weak vanity could not be hidden, and he enjoyed the evident admiration of a creature whom he believed to be half-witted and degraded all the more keenly because it did not make him jealous. She could not take Flip from him. Rendered . . . by liquor, he went to voice his contempt for the . . .

attempt it. Taking advantage of his daughter's absence to resume her homely garments, he whispered confidentially to Lance:

"Ye see these yer fine dresses, ye might think is presents. P'raps Flip lets on they are. P'raps she don't know any better. But they ain't presents. They're only samples o' dressmaking and jewelry that a vain, conceited shrimp of a feller up in Sacramento sends down here to get customers for. In course I'm to pay for 'em. In course he reckons I'm to do it. In course I kalkilate to do it; but he needn't try to play 'em off as presents. He talks suthin' o' coming down here, sportin' hisself off on Flip as a fancy huck! Not ez long ez the old man's here, you bet." Thoroughly carried away by his fancied wrongs, it was perhaps fortunate that he did not observe the flashing eyes of Lance behind his lank and lustreless wig; but seeing only the figure of Lance as he had conjured him, he went on: "That's why I want you to hang around her. Hang around here until my hoy—him that's comin' home on a visit—gets here, and I reckon he'll clar out that yar Sacramento counter-jumper. Only let me get a sight o' him afore Flip does. Eh? Dog my skin if I don't believe the d—d Injun's drunk." It was fortunate that at that moment Flip reappeared, and dropping on the hearth between her father and the infuriated Lance, let her hand slip in his with a warning pressure. The light touch momentarily recalled him to himself and her, but not until the quick-witted girl had revealed to her in one startled wave of consciousness the full extent of Lance's infirmity of temper. With the instinct of awakened tenderness came a sense of responsibility and a vague premonition of danger. The coy blossom of her heart was scarce unfolded before it was chilled by approaching shadows. Fearful of she knew not what, she hesitated. Every moment of Lance's stay was imperilled by a single word that might spring from his suppressed white lips; beyond and above the suspicions his sudden withdrawal might awaken in her father's breast, she was dimly conscious of some mysterious terror without that awaited him. She listened to the furious onslaught of the wind on the sycamores beside the cabin, and thought she heard it there; she listened to the sharp fusillade of rain upon roof and pane, and the turbulent roar and rush of leaping mountain torrents at their very feet, and fancied it was there. She suddenly sprang to the window, and pressing her eyes to the pane, saw through the misty turmoil of tossing boughs and swaying branches the scintillating intermittent flames of torches moving on the trail above, and knew it was there!

In an instant she was collected and calm. "Dad," she said, in her ordinary indifferent tone, "there's torches movin' up toward the pit. Likely it's tramps. I'll take the squaw and see." And before the old man could stagger to his feet she had dragged Lance with her into the road.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

While Eugene Schuyler was yet at St. Petersburg he was visited by his brother, then a lieutenant in the United States army. During the visit there was a grand review of Russian troops at which Lieutenant Schuyler was present, on the invitation of the Emperor Alexander; but he found that his humble shoulder-straps were looked at rather scornfully by the brilliantly dressed generals and colonels of the emperor's staff. This treatment he did not mind, and found ample enjoyment for the day in watching the evolutions of the troops. The staff and foreign officers after the review went to the emperor's palace. There Lieutenant Schuyler found himself left as severely alone as before. But his consolation was to come. After dinner he strolled out into the garden, and while walking along one of its paths he suddenly came upon the emperor and empress. They were examining at the moment a stuffed buffalo—one of several shot in this country by the Grand Duke Alexis. All the officers in the garden were keeping respectfully at a distance from the emperor, who, however, happened to look up, and seeing the young American officer, motioned him to approach, and then asked him about the habits of the buffalo. Lieutenant Schuyler had been an officer on the plains for several years. He was therefore able to give the emperor a graphic description of the animal. The emperor seemed greatly interested, detaining Lieutenant Schuyler in conversation nearly half an hour. Meanwhile the Russian officers were observing the scene, and when Lieutenant Schuyler returned to the palace he found himself warmly greeted by them. He had become the emperor's own guest, in their opinion, and from that time to the end of his visit they were rivals in doing him favors.

A remarkable bicycle ride has recently been accomplished by the Hon. I. Keith-Falconer, the distance traveled being from Land's End to John o' Groat's House, in Great Britain. He left the Land's End hotel early on the morning of Monday, June 5th, and traversed Cornwall rapidly. The Devonshire roads were difficult; but those in Somersetshire gradually improved, and the journey through the centre of England was rapid. With the Yorkshire journey began a continuous series of northwest winds, increasing as he drew near the border, and when he entered Scotland attaining the violence of a positive gale. On Saturday, June 17th, he started for the last time, rode along the coast of Sutherland, mounted the Ord of Caithness before the sun had set, reached Wick a few minutes after midnight, and by twenty minutes after three o'clock on the morning of Sunday, June 18th, he was knocking at the door of the John o' Groat's hotel. The distance was exactly nine hundred and ninety-four miles, and the time occupied twelve days, twenty-three hours and a quarter, or speaking roughly, thirteen days. The last two hundred and fifteen miles were ridden in forty-two hours.

Sir Bernard Burke, the antiquarian, declares that there is not now living a single descendant in the male line of Chaucer, Shakespeare, Spencer, Milton, Cowley, Butler, Dryden, Pope, Cowper, Goldsmith, Scott, Byron, or Moore; not one of Sir Philip Sidney, nor of Sir Walter Raleigh; not one of Drake, Cromwell, Hampden, Monk, Marlborough, Peterborough, or Nelson; not one of Bolingbroke, Walpole, Chatham, Pitt, Fox, Burke, Grattan, or Canning; not one of Bacon, Locke, Newton, or Davy; not one of Hume, Gibbon, or Macaulay; not one of Hogarth, Joshua Reynolds, or Sir Thomas Lawrence; not one of Garrick, John Kemble, or Edmund Kean.

ARGONAUT VERSE.

Cast Before.

Pleasant the page, and dear the room,
And soft the circle pallid bright
The lamp-shine makes within the gloom—
In oceaned dark an isle of light.

And to me who, of all her train,
For her dear sake am vigil keeping.
The midnight howls, and at my pane
With fitful sighs is softly weeping.

Sweet hour—and adjuncts of the hour
Still sweeter, while I read these stories,
Wherein by his, our Chaucer's, power
The Red Horse dons the Tahard's glories.

Yet in a vast and rayless dark,
This world to unweaved thought displayed,
And these whose antique ways I mark,
Sink in the shadow of one shade.

The shadow of the shape I see—
A prophet's instant, cycles long—
From Lethe dip that draught for me
Which dulls the eye and stills the tongue.

When those who seek their way to hed
This door shall pass with noiseless feet,
And hurried, as in formless dread
To rouse some form they fear to meet—

When all this silent emptiness
Shall peopled be to some now near,
With faces on whose blank distress
Despair writes out the sign of fear—

When storm, and shine, and moonlight's flow
Shall seek this chamber, blank and bare,
Like those dumb friends who may not know
Why cold the couch, unfilled the chair.

And on the outskirts of the town,
Where now I passed with measured pace,
An August rain shall trickle down
Slow oozing to my confined face.

July, 1882.

A. E. WATROUS.

An East Wind.

"The glitter of wheels far down the street—
Ah, me! and alack-a-day;
And I heard the thud of his horse's feet
Beating a roundelay.

And I felt a little song coming, coming,
Over my lips as humming, humming,
I turned my eyes that way.

"Somebody passed who was wont to pause—
Ah, me! and alack-a-day;
He bowed and smiled, yet for some cause
The mirth went out of my lay.

A wind from the east rose sighing, sighing,
I felt my little song dying, dying—"
She laughed as they rode away.

July, 1882.

ELLA WHEELER.

Three Fragments.

I.—A DAY LILY.

Ah, fair white face, I see thee in a dream
At eventide; you shine out like a star
Amid the shadows, vague, and dim, and far.

The saddened face set in the burnished gleam
Of sun-touched hair; the tender, wistful mouth,
As red as passion-flowers horn in the south;
The great, dusk eyes brim full of sombre light,
Like the sad glory of an autumn sky;

As dark and brooding as the thought of night
To some lost soul, when life is drifting by.
I see thee in a trance of dreamful blisses;
I walk into the mists that shade the land;
I strive to clasp thee with impassioned kisses,
And, lo! a broken lily in my hand.

II.—OCTOBER.

A Bacchanal fair at the edge of the wood
She stands, where the grapes hang purple and low;
Her crimson hodie is torn aside,
And her soft, pale bosom gleams like snow;
Amber buds in her tresses droop;
Her sensuous lips are red and rare,
And curved in a dazzling, treacherous smile;
Her arms and her feet are white and bare;
Her cheeks are stained with the blood of the vine;
A jeweled serpent is on her neck;
Her sleepy eyes are filled with the light
Of hateful heacons in time of wreck;
A Circe of beauty, half divine,
Yet wholly earthy—a queen of wine!

III.—APHRODITE.

She rises from the bosom of the deep;
The waves drip from her rounded limbs with moan,
And lap against her thighs with lambent gleams;
Her eyes are languid still, and warm with sleep,
And misty with vague, half-remembered dreams.

She sweeps aside the loosened lengths of hair
That, lily wreathed, enshroud her slender form,
And lifts one arm, that glimmers white and bare,
Unto the heavens, dark and dim with storm.

She leaps upon the sand, and stands alone,
With red lips parted, in her strange surprise;
And brooding shadows creep into her eyes—
The dim foreshadowing of the rapturous pain
And passion that shall mar her soul with stain!

July, 1882.

FANNY DRISCOLL.

ANECDOTES OF CELEBRITIES.

There was a time when the local manners at Brighton had a rough pleasantness about them, corresponding with the primitive simplicity of the place. When Miles (or Smoaker, as the Prince of Wales, and therefore everybody, called him) was chief bathing-man, he once saw his royal highness swimming too far, as Miles thought, out to sea. Miles hailed "Mr. Prince" to come back. The prince struck further out. Thereupon Smoaker dashed in after him, and brought his royal highness back by the ear, exclaiming, as he thus towed the princely freight: "I aren't a-goen to let the king hang me for letten the Prince of Wales drown hisself; not I, to please nohuddy, I can tell 'e." The prince forgave the act in consideration of its motive.

One evening Mary Lamb took a sudden and violent fancy to have some Stilton cheese for supper. It was very wet, and getting rather late, but Charles at once volunteered to try whether any could be got. He sallied forth, and reached their cheesemonger just as the shutters were being put up. In reply to his demand, he was assured that they had some fine ripe Stilton; and the shopkeeper proceeded to cut off a slice. As it lay on the scales, Lamb's attention was forcibly arrested by the lively gambols of a number of maggots which came to the surface of the "fine ripe Stilton." "Now, Mr. Lamb," said the cheesemonger, "shall I have the pleasure of sending this home for you?" "No, th-th-thank you," said Charles. "If you will give me a bit of twine, I cou-could, p'rhaps, l-l-l-lead it home!"

Once upon a time, as the dinner hour approached, Dumas felt in his pocket, and found it empty. He had forgotten his purse. Making his way promptly to the house of Paul Meurice, he found Madame Meurice at home, but not her husband, who had gone out, taking the key of his cash-box with him, and leaving her one solitary louis for domestic expenses. "Well, I'll take that," said Dumas; "I wanted at least five; but it'll be hard if I can't scrape together the other four." And pressing the lady's hand warmly he was about to take his leave when she called him back. "Oh, M. Dumas, I know you are fond of my pickles, and as I've just been making some, I've put aside a jar for you." "Oh, thank you ever so much. I'll take it now." "No; I'll let the servant girl carry it out to your cab." Dumas regains the vehicle, followed by the maid, who deposits the precious jar on the seat beside him. "Thanks, puss," says the novelist, with a paternal chuck of the chin; "here, take this for your trouble." And he hands her the louis he had just borrowed from her mistress.

Lord Dudley had a trick of rehearsing over to himself, in an undertone, the good things he was about to deliver to the company, so that the person who sat next to him had generally the advantage of his wit before any of the rest of the party. A man not very remarkable for agreeableness once proposed to walk from the House of Commons to the Traveler's Club with Lord Dudley, who, discussing the proposal mentally (as he thought) with himself, said audibly: "I don't think it will bore me very much to let him walk with me that distance." A happy specimen of his wit was this retort to a German lady, at Vienna, who had somewhat rudely complained of the bad French spoken by "you English," in London. "True, madam," he said, "we have not enjoyed the advantage of having had the French twice in our capital." This recalls a retort about as good made by an Englishman to the Duc de Broglie, when ambassador in England, who said, with equally lax manners, that they were right in thinking the English a nation of shopkeepers. "Perhaps so," was the reply, "just as we always thought you were a nation of soldiers."

"Call that a kind man?" said an actor to Douglas Jerrold, speaking of an absent acquaintance; "a man who is away from his family, and never sends them a farthing! Call that kindness?" "Yes, unremitting kindness," Jerrold replied. . . . On the occasion of starting a convivial club, somebody proposed that it should consist of twelve members, and he called "The Zodiac," each member to be named after a sign. "And what shall I be?" inquired a somewhat solemn man, who was afraid that his name would be forgotten. Jerrold: "Oh, we'll bring you in as the weight in Libra." . . . "God has written 'honest man' on his face," said a friend to Jerrold, speaking of a person in whom Jerrold's faith was not altogether blind. "Humph!" Jerrold replied; "then the pen must have been a very bad one." . . . A gourmet joined a social club to which Jerrold belonged, and opened a conversation on dinner. "Now, nobody," said the London Savarin, "can guess what I had for dinner to-day." The company declined to speculate, whereupon the gourmet said, with an air, "Why, calf's-tail soup." Jerrold: "Extremes meet."

The daughter of an English country gentleman, a girl remarkable for her beauty, had been profoundly impressed by John Wesley's exhortations. After the sermon Wesley was invited to this gentleman's house to luncheon, and with him self one of his preachers was entertained. This preacher like many of the class at that time, was a man of plain manners, and not conscious of the restraints of good society. The fair young Methodist sat beside him at the table, and he noticed that she wore a number of rings. During a pause in the meal the preacher took hold of the young lady's hand, and raising it in the air, called Wesley's attention to the sparkling jewels. "What do you think of this, sir," he said, "for a Methodist's hand?" The girl turned crimson. For to Wesley, with his known and expressed aversion to finery, the question was a peculiarly awkward one. But the aged evangelist showed a tact which Chesterfield might have envied. He looked up with a quiet, benevolent smile, and simply said: "The hand is very beautiful." The blushing beauty had expected something far different from a reproof wrapped up with such felicity in a compliment. She had the good sense to say nothing; but when a few hours later she again appeared in Wesley's presence, the beautiful hand was stripped of every ornament except those which nature had given.

THE ENGLISH ARISTOCRACY.

A Little of the Gossip which at Present Interests London.

After many threatenings, consequent upon a lack of bidders whenever the place has been put up for sale, Kensington House is at last about to be pulled down. Kensington House is a noble mansion, facing Kensington Gardens, and was built by the famous (or infamous, whichever you like), "Baron" Grant, when he was the financial king of the city, some nine years ago. It is in the Italian style, and cost him near a million pounds. In luxuriousness of appointments and splendor of decoration it equals if not surpasses any of the royal palaces. The grand hall and staircase are built of white marble, and the grounds extend over an area of twelve acres. But the bubble upon which the baron soared aloft did not remain unpricked long enough for him to enjoy the princely abode. Upon his downfall in '76, the place fell into the hands of his creditors, who found it plastered all over with mortgages. It has twice been put up at auction, and for years has been ready to pass into the possession of any millionaire or joint-stock company, for none other could afford to purchase it. But no millionaire was found willing, and no company dared risk the funds of its stockholders. There was a rumor in the spring of 1878 that Mackay, the bonanza man, had either bought it or was in treaty for it, and was going to take up his residence in London. But as it turned out he had only been thinking about it, and was not willing to give the price asked, something like two million pounds sterling.

Had he bought it, installed his wife there, allowed her the swing she has had in Paris, and had gone the proper way about it, there can be no question that the Mackays would soon have occupied a position in London enjoyed by no foreigners and few natives. All they would have been obliged to do would have been to get hold of some one of the Prince of Wales's "set" (the higher up in the aristocratic scale and the lower in their creditor's books the better) to back them, and then give a series of grand entertainments, balls, and dinners—especially the latter. The prince, whose epicurean tastes are his weakest point, next to professional beauties, would soon ask his "pal" about the new comers, and the delicately replenished condition of the "pal's" bank account would show itself in all the nice things the "pal" would have to say about them. "Capital chap, Mackay," he'd drop out, knowingly; "dined there yesterday. His cook is a chef, and his wine the finest I know. He's got some Chateau Margeaux that the Emperor Louis Napoleon laid down in '53, that cost him two pound ten a bottle, so be told me; and he pays Morris half a guinea apiece for his cigars." There the "pal" would stop, and the prince would ask no more, but the two would meet again next day at the Marlborough Club, and the prince be treated to fresh ravings about the purée du saumon, and filets de sole à la Russe to be got at Kensington House, and the upshot of it all would be a dinner from Mackay to the prince, arranged by the pal, and made one of the grandest that money could provide. From that on, the Mackays would go, and in time select their guests from among those who at first would not have selected them. It was a rare chance, there's no doubt about it. But Mr. Mackay didn't seem to see it at all, or if he did, not to care for it; for instead of Kensington House being to-day the swell house of the far West End, as it might have been in his hands, the gardens are now covered with weeds; the picturesque lake, once alive with fish, is a dried-up pool; the house is to be demolished, and upon its magnificent grounds a square of fashionable residences is to be erected.

The sale of the scapegrace Duke of Hamilton's art treasures has begun, and day after day the dissemination of the gems of Hamilton Palace goes on. It is indeed a pitiable sight to see these evidences of the wealth and refined tastes of a once great and noble house ruthlessly knocked down to the highest bidder, and scattered broadcast among dealers and rich parvenu collectors of objets d'art, who are as incapable of appreciating them for their intrinsic value, as they are anxious to pay fabulous prices for them because they once belonged to a duke. I say "a once noble house," for only in name is the house of Hamilton noble any longer. Since the present possessor came into the title, some nineteen years ago, he has left nothing undone that a low mind could suggest to drag his purple through the mire or trample his proud coronet under foot. A great, coarse, sensual-looking, red-haired man he is, of seven and thirty, without a feature in his face evincing intellect or refinement, without a point in his unwieldy person to indicate blood. He and the Marquis of Hastings came into princely patrimonies about the same time, that is to say, the duke succeeded his father the same year that the marquis came of age. In 1863 they began life together, if one long unbroken term of unbridled riot and dissipation can be called life. Lord Hastings died in 1868, a physical and financial wreck, but the pace which destroyed his body and ruined his estate only partially affected the duke, whose brutish physique withstood the strain to which his more refined companion succumbed, though his estates, like those of the other, passed into the hands of his creditors. He then became a pensioner, so to speak, upon their bounty, living on what they chose to allow him, while his affairs underwent a settlement. He has passed much of his time in Paris, where his phaeton and pair are as well known in the Rue de la Paix and the Bois as they once were in Pall Mall and Hyde Park, and where his fast proclivities and immoral tendencies have gained a position of note for him. He is married to one of the Duke of Manchester's daughters who is greatly pitied. He has lately begun to show himself on the English turf, but has experienced rather a cold reception, and buys yearlings for hundreds of guineas apiece at Tattersalls, while his family heirlooms are being sold to pay for them. "It's an ill wind," etc., for such a course as his suits the snobs down to the ground. By just such downfalls and degradations of the nobility do they profit and raise up their beads.

We have some snobs in this country of ours, and real vulgar snobs they are; such people, for instance, as the McGard-Hoggs, the Sassoons of Ashley, the Goodrich-Allfreys, the Morgan-Lloyds, the Loftus-Orways, and the Brasseys.

You can tell a snob nowadays by one sign if all others fail: they adopt a compound name, or stick "of some place" after it. The Brasseys are perhaps the greatest snobs we've got, and that is saying a good deal. Fate has named them with much appropriateness. Mr. Brassey has lately been made a baronet, and is also a junior lord of the Admiralty. Gladstone has done all he could to make him a gentleman and his wife a lady, but the job has been too much for even the redoubtable premier. Sir Thomas—that's his name now—instead of attending to the small duties of his government office, goes round bragging about his wife being the greatest authoress of the day, because she wrote a book called "The Cruise of the Sunbeam," and people read it for fun, and so gave it a large sale. Lady Brassey does affect literature ad nauseam, and keeps no end of private secretaries and amanuenses, all for the look of the thing, and gets herself "interviewed" by the society papers, and has articles published about her hours of work, and all that sort of rubbish; but the sort of person she is shows itself better in things like this: Among the Duke of Hamilton's art collection is a chandelier of rock crystal. It is regarded by connoisseurs as one of the gems of the collection, a mate to it being unknown in Europe. Its singular character; its being, as it were, sui generis, makes its chief value in the eyes of the connoisseur. Not so, however, with Lady Brassey. The day before the sale began she wrote to the auctioneers to say she wanted the chandelier, and instructed them to buy it in for her at any price; provided they could get another one to match it.

The report of the widowed Countess of Lonsdale having been privately married to Honorable Luke White, Lord Annally's eldest son and heir, turns out to be a canard. Her decided leaning toward that gentleman, even during the late earl's lifetime, made such a dénouement highly probable; but there are several other male members of the Prince of Wales's set—to which the young countess also belongs—whose names might be as appropriately coupled with hers as has been Mr. Luke White's. She has a place down near Windsor, and the Prince and Princess of Wales took luncheon with there one day during the Ascot week. This they couldn't have done had the clandestine marriage taken place.

LONDON, July 11, 1882.

COCKAIGNE.

The "professional beauty" is no new feature of the London season. In the days of our great-grandfathers and great-grandmothers the reigning belles excited just as much vulgar curiosity and gossip as they do now. Take, for example, the Gunninges, Maria and Elizabeth, who appeared at the court of George II., one at the age of eighteen and the other of nineteen, and both without a shilling to their dowry. "They are declared," writes Walpole, "to be the handsomest women alive; they can't walk in the park or go to Vauxhall but such crowds follow them that they are generally driven away." The younger of the two sisters became the wife of James, Duke of Hamilton; he fell in love with her at a masquerade. His Grace was so enamored of the lovely Elizabeth that he left the faro-table, where he had staked a thousand guineas, and "let the game slide," while he paid devoted court to his enchantress. Two nights later, at half an hour past midnight, they were married by Dr. Keith with the ring of a bed-curtain in Mayfair Chapel, one of the most hasty and eccentric marriages on record. In less than three weeks Maria Gunning followed her sister's example, and was wedded to Lord Coventry. The two beauties were even greater objects of popular curiosity after their marriages than before. When the Duchess of Hamilton was presented, the crowd at the drawing-room was so great that even "noble persons" clambered upon chairs and tables to look at her, while mobs gathered round the doors of the two "goddesses" to see them get into their sedan-chairs; and such crowds flocked to see the duchess when she went to her castle, that seven hundred persons sat up all night in a Yorkshire town in order to see her start in her post-chaise the next morning. Lady Coventry was equally run after. At Worcester a shoemaker made two guineas and a half by showing, at a penny a head, the shoe which he was making for the countess. She had, however, little but her beauty to recommend her. It was she who made the singularly maladroit remark to his majesty that the one sight she longed to see was a coronation. Her husband, who was a sensible man in many respects, though somewhat of a bear in manners, objected strongly to her ladyship's excessive use of red and white powders and paints; and once at a large dinner-party, suspecting that she had been "making herself up," he chased his wife round the table till he caught her, when, before all the company, he scrubbed her face with a napkin.

A writer in the Paris Figaro obliges the public of that great metropolis with a minute sketch of the life and misfortunes of Victor Hugo's surviving daughter, Adèle, who has now for ten years been the inmate of a private lunatic asylum in the neighborhood of Paris, and who is now very ill. She is fifty years of age, and her story is a very sad one. She fell in love with a naval officer, who had some property in England and estates in Trinidad. Her relatives were opposed to her marriage; but, as she was of full age, she carried her point, and the newly married couple proceeded to the West Indies. After a few years of life together the commodore abandoned his wife, whose previous eccentricity, under this blow, rapidly developed into insanity. She has her own servants, and spends most of her time walking in the grounds. Her father often visits her, and the days of his visits are red-letter days both to her and the other patients, who know him well. While the others are about him the daughter caresses her father's face, exclaiming: "I have lost my life." She speaks in a low tone, and as her venerable father is somewhat deaf, her companions repeat what she says in their way.

"An advance notice of Mark Twain's new book has been sent to this office," says the Denver Tribune, "accompanied by a request to publish. Mr. Twain is reputed to be a gentleman of abundant means; by a life of penury and stinginess he has managed to get richer than most people in his line of business, and if he wants newspaper puffing he should pay for it, just as other business men do."

SAN FRANCISCO FASHIONS.

Our merchants are actively laying in their fall and winter stock, and among the new goods there are many novelties, especially in the material for expensive toilets. I saw one pattern which has never before been in this market. It is called "Satin Ottoman," the name relating to the groundwork, which is a light sort of silver-gray with vines running through it of pale delicate tints of pink and greenish-yellow. Dispersed over this ground are clusters about three inches apart of flowers and leaves, representing wild roses and huds in a shade known as strawberry. These flowers are of embossed velvet. This handsome fabric is intended to be used in combination with plain satin of the strawberry shade, the ground showing the Turkish colors. The costume is to be made à la Turque, gracefully slashed the entire length of the skirt, and held in position with bouquets of velvet flowers to correspond with the embossed ones. Another new dress material is of striped grenadine, and bands or stripes of velours d'Utrecht. These velvet stripes are not embossed, but are raised in uncut velvet, forming vines and various descriptions of flowers of all the new shades, while the leaves give the autumnal tints. This fabric is intended for a full-dress dinner party or reception, and is made up with satin the exact shade of the grenadine stripe, which, in the piece I saw, was a light blue of the new fashioned tint. It could also be combined with strawberry color to match the flowers in the stripes, the waist, paniers, and train being of the velours d'Utrecht, and the front of the plain satin, covered with little drops of chenille, the shade of the flowers, and finished at the base with a moss fringe of the autumnal tints. In another material for dresses I saw some new stripes of satin and plush, the stripes of each about one and a half inches wide, making in the width of the material six stripes of each. The beauty and novelty of this was the stripes of the plush, which were ribbed about an inch apart, forming several delicate shades. This material was marked at six dollars a yard, and was intended for the skirt of a suit, to be made up with elegantly embroidered lady's cloth. The embroidery showed a lace pattern in imitation of guipure, one side of it being at least twelve inches wide, and the other, for waist and sleeve trimmings, two or three inches wide. Among other things, I saw a recently finished costume remarkable for its simplicity, and at the same time for its quiet elegance. It was of satin foulard in Japanese designs. Over a navy blue ground were borns-of-plenty in terra cotta shades, mingling with moss rosebuds in their natural tints. This fabric formed the body with a creux à la Charles IX., the back extending into deep paniers. The skirt was of the same, opening on the sides in the shape of a long narrow V, showing a cluster of kilt-pleatings which were inserted, and made of plain faillie of navy blue. The faillie was also formed into soft drapery, coming from under the creux and caught gracefully back, without even a bow of any description. At the base of the skirt was a narrow double box-pleating of figured foulard. But the most novel and pretty material of all was some which was first introduced and worn by the celebrated actress Made-moiselle Granier in the character of "Madame Le Diable." It is called seguns de nacre. It is a sort of spangle work of metal pieces, changeable, and reflecting all of the new dark shades, the greens predominating. These spangles, or bangles, are dependent from a network of colored metal beads, which are worked upon Brussels net in diamond pattern. The reflection of these is wonderful. Their glinting and glistening when the body of the wearer is in motion has the effect of producing a constant blaze of light. There has as yet been but one pattern of this lovely fabric received. It measures one yard wide, and is intended as the complete front of a princess robe, with sleeves of the same. Accompanying this are six yards of the same brilliant stuff, of three or four inches in width, intended for trimming. What I saw is to be made up with terra-cotta satin, or any color corresponding with the colors of the brilliants. Another piece of the same description was entirely black, and of jet, the beauty of it being that, although it looks heavy, it is light to wear, and would be very appropriate for a lady who, although not in mourning, does not wish to appear in colors. Another fresh importation is jet-work in Brussels lace. One piece shown me, which was marked at fifty dollars a yard, was three-quarters of a yard in width, and elaborate with thick, short-cut beads, showing a pattern of roses, water-lilies, and long, graceful lily leaves. This was intended as the waist and sleeves of a costume. Another piece of the same description had longer beads and a longer design in the pattern, and revealed field-grass and wheat. It was intended for the trimming of dress skirts to be put on in V-shape, or as panneaux. One novelty of fashion is intended for the front of a dress, and is of an apron-shape of ladder-work, joined together by four strips of jet passementerie. The ladder part is wrought out of large silk balls, and good sized cut jet beads. The article was entirely black, and to be worn over black or any of the new dark shades. I also saw new trimmings; one, in particular, was of black velvet, some eight or nine inches wide, and was marked at ten dollars per yard. The flowers had first been traced out on a solid piece of velvet, and then worked with a kind of silk cord, after which they were cut out of the body of the velvet, giving the design of lace-work. Speaking of lace, reminds me of some new lace sets of ficelle, which are intended as dress garniture, and include paniers, collar-ette, and cuffs. It is all hand-made, and in guipure design. One set was valued at forty-five dollars. It is really surprising how fashionable this ficelle, or as it is called in English, twine lace, has become. It comes in flounces, and, as I was informed, will undoubtedly be made into complete over-garments before the winter is over. By the time spring comes it will find its way in parasols. The favorite pattern seems to be in guipure, although there are several other styles. One very pretty one displayed bunches of roses. Another was of many wild flowers. Still another was of grasses and leaves. The most fashionable and elegant chandeliers are now made in polished brass and bronze. Being impervious to dampness, in consequence of being thoroughly lacquered, they do not tarnish.

July 25, 1882.

SOCIETY.

Notes and Gossip.

Mrs. Milton S. Latham and son returned to San Francisco on Monday last after a long absence in the East. Miss Fannie Stegman will return from the Yosemite on Saturday next. Samuel Miller returned from the Yosemite on Tuesday last. Major W. A. Stanton, U. S. A., arrived here from the East on Monday last. Charles A. Gunnison returned home on Saturday last. Colonel James M. Barney is in the City of Mexico. Miss Jennie Hooker and Miss Gracie Jones, who have been visiting Mrs. J. H. Carroll in Sacramento, have returned home. Miss Mamie Finlay is visiting Miss Fannie Tyrrell at Sacramento. Professor W. B. Rising and family, of Berkeley, have returned from their summer vacation. Captain Hooper, U. S. N., and family, who have been on an extended visit in the East, have returned to this coast, and are domiciled in Oakland. Miss Eliza Fountain, of Napa, is visiting Miss Mattie Raney in Oakland. Mrs. Butler, of Oakland, is at Anderson's Springs. Mrs. Breckinridge has returned to Monterey, after spending a few days in the city. Mrs. W. W. Crane and Miss Nannie Crane, of Oakland, who have been enjoying themselves at Monterey and Santa Cruz for a month or more, have returned home. Mr. and Mrs. Frank Perkins, of Sacramento, have gone to Tahoe to remain until the middle of August. Mrs. George Taylor, of Sacramento, who has been visiting in this city and Oakland since the first of July, has returned home. Miss Maggie Cunningham, of Sacramento, has gone to Santa Cruz to remain a few weeks. Miss Mamie Alexander, of Oakland, has returned from Santa Cruz. Miss N. Reynolds has gone down to Monterey for a short time. Mrs. William M. Stewart has returned from Monterey. Mr. and Mrs. Fred Birdsall and Miss Lily Carroll, of Sacramento, are at Lake Tahoe. Mr. and Mrs. W. S. Dray and Miss C. Dray, of Sacramento, who have been sojourning a while at Monterey, have returned home. Miss Amy Crocker and Miss Kitty Waters, of Sacramento, are at Idlewild, Lake Tahoe. Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Cook have been spending a few days at the Hotel del Monte; also Miss L. McKinstry, Miss L. Arner, and Miss L. Bodiston. Miss Lillie Hastings and Miss Kelly have returned from Monterey. Mrs. Charles F. Crocker has been spending a few days in Sacramento. L. D. Castello, U. S. N., has returned from Monterey. Miss Wilkins, of Napa, is at Monterey. W. P. Ray, U. S. N., is at the Baldwin. Mrs. E. C. Sessions has returned from Monterey. Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Maynard are in Geneva; also Mr. and Mrs. Elisha Cook, Mrs. and Miss Eddy, and Miss Houston. Mr. and Mrs. George C. Shreve have returned from a short visit to Monterey. Mr. and Mrs. C. P. Huntington and Miss Huntington, who spent several weeks upon the Pacific Coast, during the summer of 1879, arrived here on Sunday last, and are at the Palace. Mr. and Mrs. George S. Ladd went to Monterey on Saturday last, to remain a short time. Miss Pearl Kelton, of Napa, is visiting friends in Oakland. Colonel Fred Crocker returned from Oregon on Monday last. Mr. and Mrs. T. H. Goodman have been spending a short time at Monterey. Mr. and Mrs. H. L. Dodge are now at Monterey. M. W. Philips, U. S. N., is at the Baldwin. Miss Mollie Dodge has returned from San Rafael, and gone to Monterey. Miss Nellie Trowbridge has returned from Lake Tahoe, and is at the Grand. Miss Josephine Hale, who has been in Europe for several years, arrived in New York a few days ago. Mrs. William Lent, Miss Lent, Miss Block, and Eugene Lent went to Monterey on Saturday last. Mr. and Mrs. C. W. Kellogg, of Oakland, are spending a few days at Monterey. Miss E. Bichard has returned from Monterey. Mr. and Mrs. William Collier, who have been sojourning at Clear Lake during the past two months, have returned for the season. Miss Maud Moore, of San José, has gone to Monterey. Mrs. Alvinza Hayward, of San Mateo, and her daughter, Mrs. Andrew Rose Jr., are at Harbin's Springs. On Tuesday evening last the ladies and officers of the Presidio gave a hop, which was well attended, considering that nearly all of the young ladies are still out of town. Mrs. George Hearst is contemplating another Eastern trip. Mr. and Mrs. James Phelan and family have returned from Monterey. Mrs. Mark Sibley Severance returned from Southern California on Monday last. Mrs. L. J. Rose, of Los Angeles, is at the Palace. General and Mrs. Kautz, after a delightful visit to the Yosemite and the Mariposa Grove of Big Trees, have returned again to Angel Island. Mrs. W. S. Keyes revisited Monterey on Saturday last. Mr. Blitz Paxton, son of Mr. and Mrs. John Paxton, of this city, and Miss Bessie Emerson, of Healdsburg, were married at Mrs. Paxton's summer residence, near Healdsburg, on Wednesday last by the Reverend Mr. Burnett, of the latter-named place. Governor and Mrs. F. F. Low and Miss Flora Low are spending a few days at Monterey. Mrs. Colonel Dickinson, after a two months' visit at Santa Cruz and San José, has gone to Napa Soda Springs. Chief Justice Morrison and Mrs. Morrison returned from Monterey on Tuesday last. Mr. and Mrs. S. W. Forman have returned from Paraiso Springs. Mr. and Mrs. J. D. Lucas have returned from the Yosemite. Miss Louise Dearborn has returned to the Palace from Sonoma County, where she has been visiting Mr. and Mrs. Eaton. Commodore Shufeldt will return to San Francisco on the next steamer. Mrs. J. Sinclair and daughter are at Monterey. Mr. and Mrs. J. Freeborn and family went down to Monterey on Saturday to remain a week or two. On Thursday evening, at the residence of the bride's parents, on Turk near Franklin Street, Miss Lillie, daughter of Reverend C. A. Buckbee, was united in marriage to Robert Currey, son of ex-Chief Justice Currey. The wedding was very private, only a few of the most intimate friends being present. The bride looked very lovely in white satin, cut princess, with long tulle veil and orange flowers. The presents were very numerous and costly. Among those present were ex-Chief Justice and Mrs. Currey, ex-Senator Cole, Senator and Mrs. Hittell, Mr. and Mrs. Mason, Major and Mrs. Daniels, Mr. and Mrs. Alex. Baldwin, Mr. and Mrs. Colgate Baker, Mr. and Mrs. Cheesman, Mr. and Mrs. Spafford, Doctor and Mrs. Hammond, the Misses Hittell, Mason, Daniels, Cheesman, Sherman, and Hammond, and Messrs. Roundtree, Belden, Coon, Ahell, and Gore. Mr. and Mrs. Currey left for Lake Tahoe yesterday afternoon. Mr. and Mrs. George Dodge, of San Rafael, are at Monterey. J. L. Chamberlain and C. J. Bailey, U. S. A., and H. S. Waring, U. S. N., have been sojourning a portion of the present week at Monterey. The engagement of Lieutenant La Favere, U. S. N., and Miss Lizzie Collins, which has been announced in this paper heretofore, will culminate in a wedding ceremony in a few days. The Misses Farrier and Tuhs, of Oakland, returned from Monterey on Saturday last. F. R. Webster and F. S. Collins have also returned from Monterey. Mr. and Mrs. W. B. Bourne have returned to the city and taken up their permanent residence at the Grand. Miss Carrie Gwin returned from Menlo on Saturday last. Miss Mamie Grayson has also returned from Menlo. Mrs. A. Halsey has returned to the Lick from the Yosemite. The Misses Norma and Hattie Ryland, of San José, are visiting in this city. The wedding of Mr. E. Saunders and Miss Lois H. Chapman, daughter of F. A. Chapman, took place in this city on Thursday last, the twenty-seventh inst. Dr. and Mrs. W. H. Mays are spending a few weeks in the Sierra Nevada, east of Tuolumne County. Mr. and Mrs. L. F. Curtis, of Bridgeport, Conn., who have been visiting relatives in this city, returned home last week. Mrs. Trieste has returned from the Geysers. Mrs. Dr. Dean is still at Santa Cruz. Lieutenant R. F. Adams, U. S. A., now commandant at Yuma, is seeking rest and recuperation at Santa Monica and Los Angeles at present. General Fremont has returned to Tucson from Sonora. Mr. and Mrs. Whitelaw Reid, who have been visiting San Francisco and Sacramento, have returned to Millbrae. Miss Julia Blake, of Los Angeles, is visiting friends in Oakland. Mr. and Mrs. B. R. Norton, of Alameda, have gone to Monterey. Mrs. J. Q. Adams has returned from Monterey. Captain and Mrs. Nelson are at the Sierra Madre Valley. Mrs. Mills and daughter went to Monterey on Monday last. A party consisting of Miss Hattie Rice, Miss Fay, Miss Whipple, Reverend and Mrs. C. D. Barrows, Mr. and Mrs. John Taylor, the Misses Gussie and Clara Taylor, and W. E. Brown, left here in a special car for Lake Tahoe on Monday last, to be gone six days. Mrs. George H. Rice and Mrs. W. R. A. Johnson, are spending a week or two at Tahoe. Mrs. Governor Pacheco is convalescing at Bloomfield, N. J., where she and her daughter Mahel have been since the first instant. On Saturday afternoon last Miss Jennie Flood entertained a number of her lady friends at Menlo Park, among whom were Miss Flora Low, Miss Florence Atherton, the Misses Maggie and Belle Eyre, and a number of other young ladies. Mr. and Mrs. Charles N. Shaw have been spending a few weeks at Lake Tahoe. Miss Jennie Cox, of Sacramento, has gone to Santa Cruz. Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Guthrie and Mrs. J. W. Guthrie, of Sacramento, have gone to Monterey. Mrs. Judge Hager and family are at Santa Cruz. Mr. and Mrs. Fairfield, and Miss Fairfield, and Mrs. M. P. Taylor, of San José; the Misses E. Boutwell, A. Boutwell, and H. Lindley, of Sacramento, and Mr. and Mrs. D. Nye, of San Rafael, are spending the week at Monterey. W. S. Barnes, John Sedgwick, and George K. Fitch were at Monterey on Monday and Tuesday last. Mr. and Mrs. Albert Jencks will return from Lake Tahoe on or about Wednesday next. Ex-Governor William Irwin and Miss Irwin have been in the city during the week. Miss Bessie Harrold, of this city, is visiting friends in Sacramento. Mrs. Doctor J. D. Whitney and Mrs. Adam Grant returned from Monterey on Monday last. Mrs. Fisher Ames, who has been staying at Monterey for several weeks, returned to the city on Monday last. Mrs. D. W. Dickson has also returned from the seashore. Mrs. Charles Tuttle, Mrs. G. B. Walker, and Miss Hammond returned to the city on Tuesday last. Mr. and Mrs. W. A. Anderson, of Sacramento, are at Lake Tahoe. Doctor and Mrs. Toland left for the Yosemite Valley yesterday. G. Blockinger, U. S. N., has been at the Baldwin most of the week. John Mackay and R. N. Dey are doing the Yosemite. J. R. Wilmer, U. S. N., is at the Hotel del Monte for a few days. Mrs. R. R. Johnston and Miss R. E. Johnston, of Oakland, will arrive from the East to-day. Miss G. Kilbourne has returned from Monterey. Mrs. Marks, after a delightful sojourn at the Geysers of nearly a month, has returned to the Palace. Mrs. Captain W. G. Moor went to Monterey on Tuesday last. G. C. Ide, U. S. N., is recruiting at Monterey. Miss Lizzie Sinton, after summing two months at Blythedale, Marin County, has returned home. Frank M. Bee, son of Consul Bee, is at Etna Springs. Miss Bray, of Fruit Vale, went to Monterey on Tuesday last. J. S. Bacon returns home from the East to-morrow. The many friends of Ben Burling (who was so badly injured during a moonlight frolic near Santa Cruz a short time ago) will be glad to know that he has almost entirely recovered from the injuries sustained upon that nocturnal occasion. It having been stated that Colonel Bodisco, military attaché to the Russian Legation at Peking, and son-in-law of Mrs. Colonel R. H. Savage, had lately been thrown from a horse and severely injured, response to an inquiry confirms the report, but adds that the colonel is in a fair way to recovery. Judges Alexander Campbell and J. B. Southard, of Arizona, are in the city. W. F. Babcock and a party have been seeking the mountain air at Shasta and the McCloud River. A number of French officers, composed of Colonel L. Palla de la Barricade and Captain Lefevre, of the army, and Lieutenants Nicolas and French, of the navy, have been visiting the Geysers, and leave here for New Caledonia on the Zealandia to-morrow afternoon. John S. Sahin returned from Tombstone on Wednesday last. Miss E. H. Skelton, of Sacramento, is staying a few days at Monterey. Miss Carrie Williams, of Santa Cruz, is visiting Mrs. F. A. Chapman, in this city. Mr. and Mrs. H. A. Weaver, of Sacramento, are spending the present week at Santa Cruz. Mrs. B. B. Redding, who has been visiting in the East several months, will leave for home in a few days, and arrive here on or about the eighth of August. We regret to learn that Admiral McDougall is seriously ill at his residence at South Park. James Keene is entertaining Oscar Wilde and Sam Ward at his place at Newport. Mrs. Senator Farley is at Chautauqua Lake. Miss May Crittenden is the "observed of all observers" at Great Barrington, as she dashes through the streets of that place of an evening in a handsome phaeton. Miss Florence Atherton is one of the most accomplished lawn tennis players among our California ladies. Among the Americans attending the Wagner festival now in progress at Baireuth, is Mrs. Samuel D. Mayer and Mrs. Cutting. Rev. C. D. Barrows and Mrs. Barrows leave here for the East on August fourteenth, to remain until the middle of September.

THE DÉBRIS QUESTION.

The following communication explains itself, and the motives we have for its publication. It presents views that are new and well worth considering. The débris question has become a political one. The controversy is no longer confined to the localities affected, but is referred to the people of the State at large for settlement:

Appreciating the ability and independence of the Argonaut in treating public questions, I take the liberty of presenting the débris question from a resident miner's standpoint. If the facts which follow justify the conclusions, I hope that you will, when touching this important question editorially, "thunder" for the rights of miners as well as others. The miners have received but little popular support, greatly due to the fact that since the law patenting mining ground went into effect the mines have rapidly concentrated into the hands of a few corporations. It no longer being necessary to do work on claims to maintain the title, whole mining districts are patented and locked up for speculative purposes. The community interest is being sacrificed to the individual or corporate greed. The great mass of independent miners whose influence was formerly felt throughout California have either emigrated, or now have only a working interest, with wages reduced by Chinese competition, and have thus lost much of their independence as well as enthusiasm. The defense of the mining cause has been assumed entirely by the corporations who, paying the expenses, manipulate the defense, ignoring the resident mining population, and rely for their defense principally on the weight of capital invested and the immense property valuation involved, instead of the true defense—"The right to mine"—not because capital is invested, but because gold is essential to society, and for the reason that a vast population is engaged in its production whose rights are as sacred as those engaged in any other occupation. Because of this state of affairs popular opinion and sympathy has been against us; but I believe it would be reversed if the true defense were made through the rightful channel. Gold production necessitates washing the deposits in which the precious metal is found. Débris results from every process, and dumpage is an essential, a primary right, without which mining is impossible. This right has been recognized and universally sustained. Where direct injury has been done, courts have awarded damages, but never an injunction till now, the right to mine being as fully recognized as the right to farm. The initial and absolutely necessary "right of dumpage" is to mining what the smoke-stack is to the foundry, or plowing is to the farmer. The cañons and rivers are the natural and only dumpage grounds. If miners have a right to dump a barrow load a day, have they not a right to dump a car-load—twenty—fifty—a hundred car-loads a day? Inventions have improved the methods of mining. The hydraulic stream now makes the deposit instead of the barrow or car. But if the right of dumpage exists, who shall dictate the method? The gravel deposit being limited to a narrow channel along the face of the mountain range, it is only a question of time when it will be worked out. It would take ages by primitive methods; but by the present system the labor of years is accomplished in days, and the present generation receives the benefit. Nor is the deposit in the cañons greater than would be made eventually if ages were consumed in extracting the gold. The history of California is well known. The vast army of gold-seekers, finding themselves suddenly wealthy, sought their ideal places of abode, and built homes that were the dreams of their youth, made reality through the generosity of nature in giving to them her golden treasures for the gathering. The effect of California's tribute of gold can be seen throughout the world in elegant mansions, banks of unlimited capital, and blocks of stupendous buildings. It has encouraged art and science, built up commerce, and advanced civilization. It is the stimulant that urges man onward, and places the means in his control to carry out the noble sentiments that stir the souls of those who love God and their fellow men. Yet for each grain of this gold a barrow of dirt has been dumped into the cañons. The natural flow has been gradually dragging it to the plains. For thirty years the water-courses have been busily at work on the débris with which their beds are filled from the mines. While the world has been enriched by some thousands of millions of dollars of California gold, damage has been done to bottom-lands along the rivers by mining débris; but the damage in comparison to the production is as thousands to millions. The gold remaining in the gravel deposits to be taken out is greater in amount than that already extracted. The deposit of débris from working it will be less than from former workings. The blue lead is much richer than the surface gravel, and is the principal deposit remaining to be washed. If gold production has been of importance to the world, and should have been fostered and protected in the past, is it that we have enough gold, or why should it not be encouraged and protected now? Protection can be given to those threatened with overflow, but should the entire burden be thrown upon the present miner to impound the débris deposited by the early miner? The river-beds are already full, and to erect dams to hold future deposits necessitates impounding that now in the channels. The damage is not more threatening now than it has been for years past, yet Judge Temple decrees that mining shall stop until adequate restraining dams are built and accepted. Every effort should be made to impound the débris without delay, but to stop mining till it is done is sealing up the treasure that would do the work. It is suicidal, and a grievous wrong to a great industry; it would deprive a large population of their only means of support. If the damage resulting from mining operations were greater than the product of the mines, it would perhaps be public policy to stop them. But such is not the case. The destruction of the navigable rivers, or the bay of San Francisco, by mining débris is impossible, because there is not enough mining ground to fill the bay if the entire deposits were dumped into it. But the fact is that only the very small percentage of detritus carried in solution ever reaches San Francisco Bay. The remaining gravel to be washed contains but a small percentage of material that can be carried in solution. The great mass of it is rock, which can be moved by water only on steep grades. When this heavy matter reaches the valley, it is permanently deposited near the foothills. The lightest sands, and that portion held in solution only, are carried on with the floods. The light soil of the surrounding plains would naturally be moved by the water's action before the vastly heavier mining débris. When we reflect that hundreds of miles of level plain intervene between the mines and the bay, we realize the absurdity of this bugaboo of destroying the bay. The injury to the navigable rivers is greatly exaggerated, and their destruction is impossible from this cause. It would be as reasonable to assume that the débris from the Missouri River would destroy the Mississippi, as to predict the destruction of the Sacramento River from mining débris. The volume of water is not reduced, but materially increased during the low-water season from the storage lakes of the miners. The actual damage narrows down to a small strip of land lying along the rivers, and even this can be protected without stopping the mines. The shibboleth of the anti-slickens agitators, "that you must so use yours as not to injure others," has done more to influence public opinion than all else; yet if this maxim were enforced society could not exist. Cable-roads could not be run in San Francisco, for they damage individuals with soot and smoke, although a great public convenience. One could not plant shade-trees on his place if they injured his neighbor's garden, or build a house that would obstruct another's view, construct a road, if the dust would injure another's grounds or residence, or invent machinery that would deprive laborers of employment. Throughout society rights conflict, and property is used to the injury of others, without redress. Mining is but a case in point. The miners but use their property lawfully, in strict accordance with custom and necessity, and "he who uses his legal rights injures no one." Sincerely yours,

DUTCH FLAT, July 21, 1882.

The Democracy that claims to be the champion of labor and the friend of the working man, that would secure for him eight hours as a day of labor, in order to catch the gin-mill vote denies him a Sunday law that secures to him one day in seven for rest and recreation. Consistency thou art a jewel—in a pig's nose.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

"Senator Jones of Nevada thinks California will go Republican this fall, and that M. M. Estee will be the Republican candidate for governor." Senator Jones of Florida thinks California will go Democratic this fall, and that General Stoneman will be elected governor.

In the performance of our duty as censor of the press we are again compelled to call attention to the very improper language of the Sacramento Record-Union, and to remind the very worthy gentlemen who edit that journal that unless they reform their conduct we shall be compelled to "stop the paper." We shall refuse to exchange with it, and we shall no longer give it the countenance of our favor. Referring to that very excellent Democratic journal, the San Francisco Examiner, it characterizes its owner as a "disreputable mining sharp," the paper as conducted by "hirelings," who are guilty of "characteristic falsehoods," etc. It calls the first inexactitude of an Examiner editorial the "initial lie," and styles the paper "a mendacious private organ." The next, it designates as "another lie," and varying its very objectionable phraseology, "another reckless falsehood." It sums up the Examiner's character as "the lying private organ of George Hearst," and charges it again with "shameless falsehood," with "wild and utterly irresponsible misrepresentations" by irresponsible scribblers, who make "malignant, false, and foolish attacks by demagogues," and their "unscrupulous tools." Running through these epithets, we may incidentally remark, there is the thread of an argument in reference to the fidelity with which the railroad companies have performed their contracts to the General, State, and municipal governments—an argument that is truthful and logical, and would be effective if it were not shrouded in such a cloud of improper, altogether undignified, and to the last degree unbecoming epithets. We hope we shall not again be compelled to call attention to this improper mode of journalism. We really must insist that the Record-Union, which is in other respects a model journal, shall more earnestly endeavor to imitate the Argonaut in its diction, and in its passionless and judicial mode of treating all public questions. We observe one curious fact: the Record-Union never becomes profanely mad save when defending the railroad companies. When it discusses the English invasion of Egypt, and the other great international and national topics, which it does so learnedly and well, it preserves a marvelous dignity of speech, so becoming to the truly wise and the supremely good.

There comes to the Argonaut from San Buenaventura the letter of a personal friend, reproaching us for not suggesting the name of the Hon. Thomas R. Bard of that county for governor. We did not need this letter to inform us of the character, standing, and very eminent qualifications of Mr. Bard for any office in our State. Although not knowing him personally, we do know that his is among the names of those who have a right to aspire to the first position, and should those delegates who are his friends and neighbors desire for him a gubernatorial nomination, he will be entitled to consideration. In this connection we may observe that the Argonaut has no candidate, and we hope that at the State Convention the matter of a choice may not be decided by the managers of cliques in any part of the State.

At the attempted organization of a Republican club in the seventh ward, on Monday night, there was a terrible scrimmage. The club did not organize. We have the detailed particulars from both sides. That the whole affair was disgraceful both admit. That the other side was wrong each claims. One faction is under the leadership of an Irishman who keeps a grocery and holds a municipal office. The roll-call of his faction sounds like the Banshee's wail. The other faction is largely American, and has firemen in it. Just now there is a deal of prejudice against firemen taking part in politics; but if organized gin-peddlers and associated milkmen may become active, why not firemen? If this Seventh Ward conflict is a Donnybrook between America and Ireland, we are for America. In defense of any foreign invasion, we are for our country, right or wrong. We are in favor of carrying the star-spangled banner into politics. Everything else gets in, then why not the flag? We have the Catholic Church, and the Land-League, lager, sauerkraut, and schweitzer-case, slickens, sand-lot, and Mussel Slough, the Chinese, the railroads, local option, and Sunday law. We have all sorts of nationalities, national questions, and national flags; then why not let Americans have their fling at politics? We have the Irish vote, the German vote, the Jewish vote, the Methodist Church South, the Good Templars, the chivalry, the shovelry—Dave Terry and Dennis Kearney—then why not fling out the banner of the stars, and ask loyal Americans—Americans by birth and adoption—men of intelligence, courage, property, and sense to rally under it against all the foreign-born loafers, law-breakers, mendicants, and criminals, in defense of law and good order? Let the motto of tax-payers and property-owners be, "Thou shalt not steal." If the seventh ward fight is between the Irish and "our boys," we are for the boys; and if among the boys there are some b'hoys, we are for them. If there is no other way for Americans to get into a Republican club than up a ladder and through a window, we would advise them to go up the ladder and through the window, and when they get into the room to stay there. Jam satis.

Peace hath her victories. Politics hath its slain and wounded. Poor Jim Green of the Ninth, once controller, senator, and chairman of the county committee; always in office, and always seeking office, was ambuscaded, killed, and scalped on Monday night. Mitchell Philips, O. F. Willey, Schroder, and other braves are now dancing around the council-fire in feathers and war paint. Dan Bigley of the Eleventh is dead, and masses are now being said for the repose of his political soul. A wake is being held over all that was mortal of Daniel, and he is gathered to his father-in-law. The milkmen lie around him torn and bleeding. Harrington of the Seventh raised the green above the blue, but the sunburst and the harp was too feeble for the Stars and Stripes, and Johnny came limping home badly wounded and much discouraged. Thus, we fear, we have lost three good Irishmen as Republican leaders. But we are reconciled.

A very disgraceful pugilistic encounter was had at the Turn-Verein Hall on Monday evening, between certain foreign bruisers, and we are sorry to say, under the patronage of the police, Captain Douglass being present and sanctioning the beastly exhibition. The names of the participants in this brutal encounter indicate their nationality. We congratulate ourselves that there were no Americans among them. The fight was between Owen Judge and Dan O'Connell. The proceeding commenced by a sharp set-to between Mike O'Brien and Tom McDermott. Tony Benton acted as master of ceremonies in place of Billy Jordan. The other names, as we gather them from the Examiner, were Savage, Stewart, and Jack Abrook, of Liverpool. Mr. Rooney explained the rules. After the fight, Tom McCormack challenged the Pacific Coast, claiming that he was champion middle-weight. To show the beauty of this brutal encounter, we again quote from the Examiner:

O'Connell had the longest reach, and landed the first blow on Judge's face with telling effect. In the second round, Judge knocked O'Connell clean off his feet, with a heavy right-handed blow that scored first blood for Judge. In the third round O'Connell was game, and forced the work with a heavy right-hand blow on Judge's face that made the spectators fairly roar. Judge returned the compliment with a right-hander on O'Connell's stomach, and followed it up with another blow that knocked "Dan" through the ropes and clean out of the ring. In the fourth round O'Connell was so weak that he fairly tottered. Judge, waited for him to lead, and returned his blow with a right-handed hit that sent O'Connell to the floor. Three times O'Connell was knocked down, and once he was forced on the ropes and badly "fished." His condition was pitiable, but he was game clear through, and did not flinch. In the fifth and last round O'Connell was fairly brought to a standstill after a couple of blows. Judge, by the advice of his seconds, used his right hand only, and aimed for the back of O'Connell's head. "Dan" was unable to protect himself, and attempted to cling to Judge's arms to avoid punishment. Judge got clear, and with a terrible blow knocked O'Connell's down in the corner against the iron stake of the ring. This finished O'Connell, but he made a gallant effort to rally, and regained his feet. Judge looked at him half a second, and then aimed a blow at the side of his head, which stretched him senseless on the hard floor of the stage. Judge was declared victor after seventeen minutes and a half of the hardest and roughest fighting that has been seen for many a day, amid the yells of the spectators.

"The spectators," says the Examiner, were "judges, lawyers of eminence, physicians in good standing, two supervisors, three colonels, and majors and captains by the score." It is not recorded that there were any gentlemen in the audience. It is not from tenderness toward the plug-uglies who engage in these tournaments of brawn that we object to them. The English or Irish bruiser does not live whom we would not willingly see engage himself in muscular controversy with a kicking mule, with all our sympathies for the nobler animal with the iron heels. What we do object to is the disgusting exhibition.

"The Board of Education in Alameda has adopted 'White's First Lesson in Greek,' 'Goodwin's Greek Grammar,' and 'White's Zenophon's Anabasis,' as text books in the high school." If there is a school director in Alameda who can himself read and translate a chapter in Zenophon's Anabasis, we will travel a hundred parasangs, and give an hundred oboli to see him. We sincerely hope the little Greeks who attend the Alameda High School will acquire such proficiency in their native tongue that they can speak it without a brogue.

Candidates for governor multiply in the Republican party. Prominently named we have Judge Rhodes, of Santa Clara, for many years Justice of our Supreme Court, a man of clean and honorable life, who would make a good candidate and not a bad governor. Mayor Blake, of San Francisco, is mentioned; a cool, level-headed, honest man, with no nonsense about him; not as well known throughout the State as in the city, and hence not as available a candidate as a less desirable man, better known. He could not aid in his own election, and would not try if he could, but if he became governor would be governor. His inauguration ball would be a failure, but his administration would be a success. As commander-in-chief of our army he would make an awkward appearance on horseback, in regiments with bright buttons, sword, and a cocked hat; but he would be a success in the governor's chair examining hills for approval or veto. Charles Reed, Esquire, of Yolo, or Charley Reed as he is familiarly called, is suggested for the gubernatorial dignity, and when we look over the field we are compelled to admit that the convention might go further and find a worse granger. Mr. Reed is a prominent citizen, and has filled honorable positions. He has large capacity for public affairs, and there might be some enthusiasm created for him in the event of his nomination. If elected, he would not fail in giving an honest administration. He would make a good Railroad Commissioner—in fact he would make a good anything upon the Republican ticket.

"The First National Bank of Alameda has declared a dividend of eight per cent. for the six months ending June thirtieth." There must be something wrong about this institution. Money is loaned in San Francisco at four per cent. per annum. This makes sixteen per cent. seem usurious.

At a late hour, and as we are going to press, the Sandwich Island mail brings us a budget of gossip concerning an article upon island politics which some time ago appeared in the Argonaut. It seems that an individual by the name of Walter M. Gibson has, through a series of curious incidents and tricks of political legerdemain, struggled through a life of strange adventure to become a man of authority among the Kanakas. He is now an official of influence with the Hawaiian king, has accumulated property, and owns a newspaper. In his very eventful, and to us interesting career, as we learn, the border line between crime and romance has been at times indistinct and tortuous. When the hypocrite, politician, and adventurer left off, and the honorable career began, it is difficult to say. When the American—if he is an American; the Mormon—if he was a Mormon—ended, and the Anglo-Hawaiian began, it is impossible to decide. Enough it is to know that now, at the unromantic age of nearly three-score years and ten, he is a pronounced and tireless enemy of American interests in the Sandwich Islands, and in the interest of the English is in constant secret conspiracy against everything and everybody that is American. That such a man as we understand this unprincipled adventurer to be can gain influence over the king, kingdom, and people of the Hawaiian Islands, indicates the place which this fantastic little travesty on government must occupy in the family of nations, and illustrates the character of king and subjects. This group of beautiful and fertile islands is largely settled by Americans. Its business and property is largely in their hands. It has a commercial treaty with our government, from which nearly all its wealth and prosperity comes. It holds such a geographical position to our country that its political domination is a necessity of our national defense. No other country, nor the Hawaiians themselves, will be permitted to antagonize the United States of America. Neither Kanaka politics, English diplomacy, nor gossip little Honolulu factions will cut any considerable figure in the future of this kingdom, commonwealth, or dependency, or whatever it may be; for whether republic, kingdom, or empire; whether ruled by president, king, emperor, kaiser, sultan, khedive, or khan, it will be administered under the direction and in subordination to the best interests of the fifty-two millions of its American neighbors. With those interests no European government is disposed to interfere, and no European government is powerful enough to dare even to attempt to interfere. And if there is any Englishman or other foreigner in Honolulu, or elsewhere, who dreams of the possibility of any different disposition of this island group, or who thinks that any English statesman will ever question the right of the United States Government to control these islands, he is that kind of an ass and fool which no other adjective than English properly qualifies. If this be true, then it is not important who edits the Argonaut, or whether "in his remote editorial den" he obtains the inspiration of his opinions from the Secretary of State at Washington, or from the late Attorney-General of Hawaii. If in all his realm the king of the islands in the Pacific Sea has one true friend, and the Hawaiian people have one intelligent and disinterested person whom they can trust, and in whose friendship king and people may confide, let him inform them of the relations that must inevitably and of necessity exist between the government of Hawaii and that of the United States, and between the people of the island group and those of the American continent. And let the king and people be advised that their future welfare depends upon America and Americans, and not upon English traders, Mormon adventurers, or selfish foreign politicians.

A "Subscriber who has a full file of the Argonaut" asks us:

Can you inform your readers whether or not General Stoneman charged the expense of his trip to Washington and back on Indian matters to the government, while he went and came on a free pass from the railroad?

In reply, we can only say that we have no information touching the subject matter of the inquiry. We have a right to presume that General Stoneman did not charge mileage to the government without giving it credit to the amount of the price of passage given him by the railroad companies. We have a right to presume, and do presume, that General Stoneman has done nothing that a gentleman of highest integrity and nicest sense of honor would not do in his official relations. If this paragraph should arrest the attention of the Democratic candidate for governor, and he should think the matter worthy of his notice, our columns are open for his use.

THE RIVE-KING FAREWELL CONCERTS.

Madame Rivé-King's testimonial concert and matinée, which took place last week at Platt's Hall, were given without orchestral support, and to comparatively small audiences. The interesting programmes presented on these occasions failed therefore to receive the most cordial measure of acknowledgment. Accessories have much to do with the inspiration of popular enthusiasm, and the absence of accompanists, together with the sight of numerous empty seats, were doubtless sources of depression to both listeners and performers. Madame King was assisted at her evening concert by Messrs. Henry Heyman, Julius Hinrichs, and Hugo L. Mansfeldt. The Adagio and Scherzo of the Rubinstein trio in B flat, opus 52, for piano, violin, and 'cello, formed the introductory number of the programme. This eminently characteristic selection was carefully played by Madame King, Mr. Heyman, and Mr. Hinrichs. Later, a 'cello solo, consisting of the beautiful "Elegie," by Fischer, and a bright little Gavotte, by Popper, was given by Mr. Hinrichs, whose tone, otherwise so smooth and true, unfortunately went to pieces on a dangerous note or two, and fell thereafter into sad constraint. With this exception the remaining numbers were contributed by Madame King, assisted only by Mr. Mansfeldt at a second piano in the G minor Saint-Saens Concerto. From every quarter the many excellences of this accomplished lady have already received extended mention. It is scarcely necessary at this time to rehearse them in particular. After repeated hearings her accuracy is unimpeached, and her well-stored memory unexhausted. To attain the position which this implies is the patient task of so many toilsome years, that when it has once been accomplished a pianist would seem to have filled the requirements of his part. That such is not the case, however, is made glaringly manifest in the thousand and one criticisms volunteered by the goodly company of argus-eyed and sharp-eared amateurs, sure to be found at a piano concert of any sort. They thickened the air at the Rivé-King performances—these opinions, wise, foolish, non-committal, and extreme. Many, doubtless, were well-founded, and had their reasons for being.

The matinée programme was not carried out according to its printed order, but was nevertheless enjoyable. No one can have heard it without feeling that Madame King is a talented lady, and a musician of much power. SAN FRANCISCO, July 25, 1882.

VANITY FAIR.

London Society thus details the romance of a prince's cigar: The scene was a first-class carriage on the Great Western Railway. The date need not be mentioned. There were no ladies in the carriages. One of the passengers took out his cigar-case, and giving a look of inquiry, but not making any remark, lit up, and vigorously puffed away. As he progressed toward the end of his cigar, he noticed a look of great irritation on the face of his vis-a-vis. "I am afraid, sir," said the smoker, hurriedly, "that my cigar annoys you." "It does, sir; it annoys me excessively," "I am sure I beg your pardon," said the gentleman, and threw his cigar out of the window. "That's all very well," said his fellow-passenger; "but I mean to give you in charge directly I get to Bath. You were perfectly well aware that this is not a smoking-carriage, and I mean to defend the rights of passengers." "I am really very sorry, sir; but I took it for granted that there was no objection." "I made up my mind, sir," was the dogmatic reproach, "soon after we left Swindon, that I would give you in charge the first opportunity." There was an awkward pause, and presently the offender said, "Perhaps you will take my card? I happen to hold a public position, and should like to avoid any disturbance." "I don't want your card, sir." "But you had better look at it." The aggrieved passenger looked at it contemptuously, but it was the card of a Royal Duke. Things now went on pleasantly; but before he left the carriage the gentleman expressed a hope that H. R. H. would not think that he had acted wrongly. "That is a point which we need not discuss," said H. R. H.

The guests at Baroness Burdett-Coutts's first garden party were treated to a sight of the smallest pony in the world—by name Lady Jumbo. The tiny creature looks like a thoroughbred race-horse seen through the wrong end of an opera glass. The harness thought it for Ashmead, and Barnum couldn't have it if he went down on his knees, and threw in the baby elephant besides. In the language of the circus, Lady Jumbo stands thirteen inches in her shoes, and is only five years old.

A Paris letter to the New York Times says: "As to the fashions for women, all I can say is that it is a thousand pities Sainte-Beuve should have died before the apotheosis of his 'Yellow Rays'—those famous rayons jaunes which brought on his devoted head such an avalanche of railery. Everything now in fashion is yellow—golden yellow, saffron yellow, buttercup yellow, jonquil yellow. In short, there is an invasion of every imaginable shade of yellow, and we may thank the daughters of Alhion for it. They were jeered at when they first came over for their sunflower stuck on everywhere—on their parasols, on their skirts, on their hodies, in their hair. Sunflowers have not yet been definitely adopted, however, being rather large articles for proper display as trimmings, and I rather think they will be ultimately voted in bad taste; but I can vouch for the victory of yellow, notwithstanding the frantic efforts of the impressionists in support of blue, and judge that jonquils will be the favorite flower."

The craze has been revived, says the New York Sun, among professional and fashionable beauties upon whom Nature has bestowed that rarest of all her gifts—a shapely hand and graceful wrist—of having them modeled in the finest Carrara marble, and presenting them to lovers and friends as souvenirs less readily recognizable by the crowd than photographs, and yet more vividly suggestive to those who are familiar with the nervous grasp or "velvet touch" of the living hand they represent. In the great Viennese Exhibition of 1873 there was to be seen an exquisite reproduction of the left hand of the Princess Pauline Bonaparte. She allowed herself to be modeled and painted in every conceivable costume and attitude, and most frequently in no costume at all, exacting only that the studio in which she sat should be well warmed, and thoroughly protected against draughts. The work was attributed to Canova, but the fact that the marble was slightly tinted, the pale flesh-color deepening in the dimpled knuckles and underneath the long, filbert-shaped nails, make this improbable. On the third finger was a wedding-ring, guarded by a brilliant solitaire set in black enamel, and the wrist, which rested on a cushion of black velvet, was encircled by a black enameled bracelet. The effect of the whole was real and life-like beyond anything that chemicals or paint-brush can produce, and the fair ones of the present day are wise in their generation when they seek to revive this most lasting and beautiful method of perpetuating one of their greatest charms. The drawback to it is that, alas! many lovely women have hands which their most sincere adorers would never wish to see copied or reproduced—hands which in England are maliciously termed mutton-fists, and of which the fingers look as if an Indian's hatchet had trimmed their ends.

The concert of Lady Folkestone, for the College of Music fund, given in the Duke of Sutherland's fairy palace, Stafford House, remarks a London journal, distinguished itself from other concerts given for the same purpose, for Lady Folkestone, with her wonted cleverness and energy, brought together elements most likely to draw a big audience. Twenty-two ladies of the greatest names formed a band of strings, a feature quite novel. A whole chorus of ladies, peeresses of the realm, gave their fine voices, their fine dresses, and their fine appearance altogether.

The helle of two seasons, writes the Long Branch correspondent of the New York Times, finds tandem flirtation the most exciting and pleasant. The great difficulty of this lies in letting neither gallant charger of her team know that he is in double harness, and the skill displayed in so adjusting the blinkers that the leader can only see ahead, and the wheeler only look behind, in some cases soars above art and approaches genius. Of course, sometimes a tricky leader, suspicious because of having been there before, will break over the traces, and occasionally a too spirited wheeler will adds to the interest and heightens the charm. Four-in-hand driving is no longer much in vogue with the scientific flirt, except at the opening of the season, or by way of trying the mettle of new acquisitions, for it requires only coolness and strength, and does not call forth the tact and nice judgment needed in tandem. The hudd usually drives single, handling the fairy ribbons with more or less skill, according to her natural qualifications and abilities, but always with a half distrust of her powers, and a sense of danger. The veteran rings the changes on all styles, goes at it with a rush, and is deep in a second before the first affair is even concluded.

Long Branch, observes the Sun, has been in an almost slumberous condition of late, its rainbow-hued cottages, gayly striped awnings, and many-tiered piazzas being absolutely destitute of any signs of life. Mrs. James Barclay's stylish phaeton and Mary Anderson's dainty village cart being the only turnouts worth mentioning. But on the first day of the Monmouth Beach races the whole place seemed to be suddenly transformed into one great railroad terminus, and the crowds that arrived by every train, and spilled out of every stage and hackney carriage, astonished the hotel proprietors themselves. Now the whole place is ablaze with dress and fashion, and the grand stand and club house are thronged on every race day with an assemblage as brilliant and showy, in point of dress and equipage, as anything that Jerome Park has yet displayed. The parasols of the ladies shine like patches of fire in the vivid sunshine, and the scarlet polo cap, which is the latest novelty in head-gear, rests lightly on many a pretty curly head. Although absolutely useless as a protection from wind or sun, these same small caps are wonderfully graceful and becoming, and if slightly suggestive of rapidity, are none the less attractive on that account. But a law as irrevocable as those of the Medes and Persians should be issued, forbidding them to be worn by any woman over whose head more than twenty summers have passed. Their use should be limited to rose-huds—and to rosehuds only. Even the bride of a few months requires a more dignified head-covering; and in the case of mature sirens, such as now sport them on the sands and race-course of Monmouth Beach, the police ought certainly to interfere for their suppression.

Parisian society is now suffering from acute Anglomania. The men and women are Anglicized from head to foot. Even the little milliner girls wear aesthetics puffed at the shoulders. The cafés are taking the names of taverns and bars. The very language is being transformed by an infusion of English elements. The aristocrats give their children English names, and in high society it is considered the right thing to have none but English servants, and to speak to them in English. French novels are abandoned in favor of Thackeray and Dickens, or Herbert Spencer, who is a favorite with the ladies. Dinner is served in the English style. On some tables even English dry sherry has made its appearance. In short, the "chic Anglais" is all the rage, and the Prince of Wales is the modern French exquisite's model of manners and elegance.

The second year, says an Eastern journal, is that in which the widow is really happy. The sombre depths of mourning cast aside, she enters the world again, and reopens her jewel case. Even with a very becoming widow's cap on, life is more or less a blank to a woman if she can not wear her jewels. Now, however, the diamonds, pearls, and opals may reappear, and with what delight are they not worn? Visions of dresses in delicate half tints, pearl grays, soft lavenders, mixtures of white and gray or black and white float before her mind, soon to be realized. Her year's absence from balls and parties and crowded rooms has renewed her beauty, and the same retirement has brightened her eyes and tinged her cheeks with the freshness of enjoyment with which she prepares to reënter the fashionable world. Now, indeed, is the fashionable widow a dangerous and seductive creature. She knows that she is prettier than ever, and the consciousness making her more certain of coming victories, gives a genuine softness to her manner. Beware of widows in their second year! Always dangerous, they are then more so than ever. Light-hearted as a girl, she feels younger every day, and from her own point of view there is no more enviable being to be found than a young, handsome, rich, and lively widow, whose heart is not inconveniently soft, nor her feelings too acute to prevent her going through her life "well pleased and careless," and extracting from it as much of the pleasure and as little of the pain as may fall to the share of any mortal creature.

The rage for dressing up canine pets has long prevailed in France to a much greater extent than on this side of the channel, remarks a writer in the London World, and has assumed extravagant proportions. The Figaro gives some examples of the most notable fashions now to be observed among the fair owners. Almost every variety of dog has its own proper toilet, besides its own special toilet-case, containing the brushes, combs, sponges, and other appliances for enabling it to be washed and dressed. The ornaments suitable for a "houledogue" would be by no means fitting for a "lulu" nor does it at all follow that what would be admired on a "caniche" would be deemed in good taste for a "griffon." The latter, which is a long-haired and curly-haired dog, much prized by all French women, is pitied and despised at this time of year if he is not close shaven over the body, leaving the lion-like mane which looks so particularly ridiculous to the English eye. Smooth terriers, who can not be thus embellished or disfigured, are often adorned with a little plain gold bracelet soldered above the fore-foot and surmounted with a monogram; but it is essential that the leg encircled with this metal should be the left and not the right. Rough terriers have, on the other hand, a collar of bright metal, having a medallion or clasp upon it, sometimes with the photograph of the owner, or of some particular friend of hers, inclosed. The best-hred "hulls," again, ought to wear the collar known as the "officier," with a colored ribbon—red or blue for outdoor show, and white for the drawing-room. Every dog baying any claims to be well cared for must wear cothurnes, or tall boots, when he goes out walking, and these should be of doeskin, fastened with rings of india-rubber.

LITERARY NOTES.

We have received a copy of the "American Yacht List," which is published under the patronage of the New York and Eastern Yacht clubs. It contains a register of the yacht clubs of the United States and Canada, together with descriptions of the vessels, names of owners, etc., and fac-similes, in chromo-lithographs, of the club pennants and private signals of the New York Yacht Club. Published by Niels Olsen, of the N. Y. Y. C.; for sale by C. Beach; price, $2.50.

"Bright Days in the Old Plantation Time," by Mary Ross Banks, is, as its title purports, a chronicle of life among the Southern slaveholders in ante-hellum days. Mrs. Banks is now quite aged, and the volume consists of stories which she first told her children and grandchildren, afterward, at the earnest solicitation of friends, embodied in book form. The successive sketches graphically describe corn-shucking, 'possum-hunts, country rides, negro incidents, and all the other pleasures which went to make up the old Southern elysium. Published by Lee & Shepard, Boston; for sale by Bancroft; price, $1.50.

"In the Harbor" is the last volume of poems by the late Henry W. Longfellow. In it are to be found all those of his pieces which have appeared in the various magazines during the past year, besides several that are posthumous. There will be three more poems given out. Two of them are sonnets, which are to appear in the poet's biography. The third is a dramatic poem, which will appear later on by itself. There have been other poems found in the poet's papers; but those mentioned are all that will be made public. Published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston; for sale by Bancroft; price, $1.

Announcements: "Heart and Science" is the odd title of Wilkie Collins's new novel. It is a story of the present time.—Mr. F. H. Underwood is at work upon a life of J. G. Whittier, and has been gathering facts in the valley of the Merrimac.—A new part of the celebrated German lexicon, Grimm's Dictionary, has just appeared, compiled by Dr. M. Lexer. It comprises the words from Nachtigallstrauch to Narrenwerk.—"Kinley Hollow" is the title of a new American novel which is about to be brought out by Henry Holt & Co. Its author is G. H. Hollister, a person who has had experience as a writer.

The novel by Mrs. Macquoid, which the Putnam's printed last winter under the title of "Esau Runswick," has just appeared in London as "A Faithful Lover."—Rees Welsh & Co., of Philadelphia, have secured the plates of Walt Whitman's "Leaves of Grass," and are about to publish not only an edition of that collection, but an edition of his prose writings.

Miscellany: Lady Lytton has left to her friends, Louisa and Rose Devey, all she had, including her manuscript autobiography, which her son, the earl, will probably promptly purchase and suppress.—The funeral of the poet James Thompson was a painfully sad one. His "City of Dreadful Night" and some of his other writings were considered so atheistical that he was actually refused a resting-place in consecrated ground. There was no burial service, except a few tender words spoken by a friend whose voice, choked with emotion, was nearly inaudible.—Professor Max Muller is quoted as one having once said of Mr. Emerson: "He is neither American nor English—the cast of his mind is Greek. He ought to have lived centuries ago."—French publishers are still taking the lead of the Britons in issuing cheap books. The Messrs. Hachette are bringing out French classics at the amazingly cheap rate of about three cents each.—The house in Cheyne Walk, Chelsea, in which the late Dante Gabriel Rossetti lived, is an historic one. It is the oldest in the walk, and is the one described by Thackeray in "Esmond."

The third number of the "Question of the Day Series" is "Our Merchant Marine," by David A. Wells. This volume consists of a series of papers which originally appeared in the New York World. The author, step by step, traces the origin of the decay of American ship-commerce. While in 1861 we had one-third of the ship tonnage of the world, and a carrying trade that was barely excelled by Great Britain, in 1882 we have sunk so low as to be scarcely deserving of a place on the list, and far below even the most insignificant European powers. This fact is due not so much to the late civil war as to the insane policy of our government. The first reason of our decadence may be set down to the score of the law which prevents the purchase of foreign iron ships; the other causes arise from a variety of evils, among which are the absurd tonnage tax, which is as unnecessary as it is unjust, the consular feeing system, the compulsory pilotage, the three months' extra pay to sailors discharged in foreign ports, and a thousand and one other lesser evils resulting from political greed and blindness. The hook is vigorous and well written, and ought to do much toward remedying a crying shame. Published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York; for sale by Bancroft; price, $1.

Sir John Lubbock is as thorough a student of ethnology and entomology as his father was of astronomy. His latest work is entitled "Ants, Bees, and Wasps." The author has been engaged in closely studying the habits of ant colonies for the last eight years, and his discoveries, in connection with those of other scientists with whom he has been in communication, are most curious. The ant kingdom seems to approach more nearly to the human in characteristics than any other. Their social organizations are wonderfully similar; and while in one hill the form of government will be republican, in the next it will be monarchical, or perhaps oligarchical, although the ants may be of the same genus, and alike in every characteristic. One genus, the Anagrus, exemplify the lengths to which luxury will take an individual. These ants own and trade in slaves, which are of a smaller race. They rely entirely upon their slaves for procuring food, building houses, and doing house-work, and so effete have they become, that when Sir John Lubbock deprived thirty of their slaves for two days, more than one-half of these pampered slaveholders died from starvation, not being able to provide the smallest quantity of food for themselves. These and other wonderful things render the work highly entertaining, and the author's charming style deprives it of much of the dryness which scientific hooks are wont to possess. Published by D. Appleton & Co., New York; for sale by James T. White & Co., 25 Dupont Street.

Harper's Monthly Magazine for August contains a charmingly illustrated paper on "Some Western Resorts." Barnet Phillips's "Cruise of the 'Nameless'" is very amusing. The most interesting of Lathrop's series of "Spanish Vistas" appears under the heading of "Andalusia and the Alhambra."—The Century for August opens with a well-executed engraving of Wagner, the composer. "The Borderlands of Surrey" enunciates the fact that it will be a score of years before our American country-houses will approach the English seats in artistic beauty. "Some English Artists and Their Studios" gives a series of luxurious interiors. The poetry is of unusual merit. The Atlantic for August does not quite come up to its usually high mark. Oliver Wendell Holmes contributes a poem, "At the Summit." Hardy's "Two on a Tower" is continued. W. F. Harris furnishes a paper on Emerson. The number closes with a report of the late party given to Mrs. Stowe, in Boston. The frontispiece engraving of Emerson is of great merit. Lippincott's for August opens with a paper on the "Pueblo Indians." Eleanor Putnam contributes a short story—"Edged Tools." "Closing In" is a poem by Paul H. Hayne. The serial, "Fairy Gold" is continued.—In the North American Review for August the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher writes of "Progress in Religious Thought." T. V. Powderly, the official head of the Knights of Labor, contributes an article on "The Organization of Labor." Archibald Forbes writes of "The United States Army." "The Ethics of Gambling" is by O. B. Frothingham.—The Magazine of Art for August contains two charming engravings from well-known pictures—"Prince Charlie's Parliament" and "The Favorite." Austin Dobson is the author of "The Byways of Book Illustration." Andrew Lang's "The Thames and its Poetry" is well illustrated. "Canterbury Cathedral" portrays many lovely bits of antique carvings and ivied porches.

A DROWNING MAN'S DESPAIR.

How I Lay Down in a Watery Sepulcher, Prepared for Eternity.

You have read the experiences of men who have been hanged, two or three who have been beheaded, and twenty or so who have been suffocated—they having come back from the other world to write their memoirs. I am going to relate the experiences of a drowning man.

A few years ago I was garrisoned in the little village of Dauphine. I had graduated from Saint-Cyr, and my head was filled with more romance than is generally the case after such an education. Byron was greatly the fashion at that time, by reason of his life, his death, and his writings—which the world pretended to understand—and I was possessed with a perfect passion for him in every particular. "Lara," "Manfred," "The Corsair," his devotion to Greece, his exploits as a hoxer and a beau, his defense of Missolonghi, his amours with Miss Lamh and La Guiccioli, were all fuel for the fire of my enthusiasm. But he possessed one accomplishment which charmed me, and which I envied him above all. That was his perfection as a swimmer, in which he was by right unequalled. It was always as floating among the warm, sensuous waves of Ahydos that he appeared to me in my dreams, whenever his restless shadow came to trouble my sleep. In order to decide a closely contested rivalry with the dead poet, I became entirely amphibious, if not quite aquatic. I wished to vie with my hero and surpass him. As it was, I just escaped drowning myself.

The Lake of Paladru is the largest stretch of standing water which the frontiers of France enclose. It is three miles long, I think, by two wide. There is a legend rife among the neighboring inhabitants, that through long vanished centuries its waters have covered a terrible mystery. A once rich and flourishing city sleeps in the depths of its waves, and when it is calm and still the old fishermen never fail to see distinctly the towers, the belfries, and the ramparts of the doomed city.

In the evening, after a good supper, we started out—Captain Torbin, a young sub-lieutenant, and myself. My two companions were furnished with shot-guns, for they hoped to terminate the next day's sport by the assassination of a hare or two. At midnight I waded out into the soft warm waves, and was soon entirely submerged. Then I commenced performing a thousand little feats of strength before the admiring eyes of my companions, who, not being able to swim, kept prudently in the neighborhood of terra firma. At last, tired of all these nautical evolutions, I extended myself gently on my back and gave myself up to the enjoyment of the voluptuous situation. The air was soft and motionless. The sky was exquisitely pure. Innumerable stars of gleaming gold spangled the heavenly arch of limpid azure, untroubled by a breath of shadowy vapor.

I do not think the world contains a more magnificent spectacle than such a perfect night. I have seen a few of them in my life, and I am persuaded that no scene in the whole world of nature can present anything so splendid, cause such profound emotions, awaken thoughts more sublime or further removed from the base trammels of this earth. Around you the illimitable; extend an arm, it rests unshackled by even its own weight. You advance, or recede; nothing can give you one clue to the measurement of the space about you. You have conquered an element. You live a new life. You have aggrandized your world. Above you, unfathomable heights. Below you, unfathomable depths. Raise your eyes, behold Heaven! Rest motionless, behold—Death!

Who was that victorious emperor that, at the end of a dazzling reign of glory and prosperity, throwing a backward glance over a long life of power and pleasure, sought out with scrupulous care his moments of veritable happiness, and found that he had lived three hours? Three hours in seventy years of weariness! Poor captain that I am, when I measure the days of my past, I find myself richer than the great emperor—richer by two hours! Well, one of those hours was my meditation on the Lake of Paladru, floating in indolent rest on the warm, caressing water; cradled voluptuously between heaven and earth without experiencing that harsh contact with solid matter so cruelly awakening to a dreamy soul; of all the grosser senses of our nature retaining only sight and thought; remote from all sound; bearing only the low, sweet murmur of the waves that whispered in my ear to warn me that I floated over an abyss hundreds of feet in depth; to give me that instinct of peril braved and vanquished, which is the half of pleasure to all strong, young souls; to tell me that between me and the voluptuousness of life and the insensibility of death there remained but a moment, a second, a lightning flash. Sublimed and etherealized, my thoughts wandered in the immensity of space where sight was lost. How quickened was my soul! How young, how deep, how swift! Ah, then I caught the hidden meaning of love, glory, warfare, triumph. I understood life, and holdly summed it up at a glance into one sole pleasure and one sole virtue—to love and to be loved! God! how sad and foolish seems the life we fashion; that life of petty ambitions, of loves inspired and incomplete. What a grand, ethereal life I created for myself in the future.

Then the phantoms of the past swam before my eyes in the warm, dreamy peace of the night air; ravishing forms, white, slender, delicate, glimmering under the shadowy arches of a cathedral; fresh, voluptuous faces, laughing, eager, glancing from jealously curtained windows. All the romantic loves of college life, the amours a little more pronounced of the garrison, even laughing common-place women were idealized and impassioned by the beauty of the situation.

I think you will pardon this outburst of romance if you remember that at this moment I lived in a new universe; that my gaze was lost in a heaven without a horizon, where flashed millions of stars; that I neither felt nor perceived anything on earth, and having left the human domain, I should be permitted to travel at my own sweet will in the one I had created.

At last, however, wearied by these sentimental wanderings, I felt the need of repose for both my mind and my arms, which were tired by the hard service that my imagination had exacted from them.

But listen! This is where the tragedy commences. The curtain is rising, and you shall see the drama—the drama of the drowned.

It seems very simple to you, does it not, that from the centre of my lake I could swim easily toward shore where my companions were?

Yes; but where is the shore, if you please? This question, which I here put to you so calmly, I addressed to myself with a terror which shot through my body and my soul like a lightning flash.

The shore! Where is it?

No horizon. The night everywhere. Only the darkness and the stars. The lake black as a glimpse of hell; the grand shadows of the mountains covering everything, and no way to guide me.

Oh, the pain and weariness of my body, and the living, piercing thought of peril! The strength of despair seized me. The lake is not large, I thought. By following a straight line I must infallibly reach the shore. So I struck out, and recovering all the strength of my two-and-twenty years, and all my suppleness as an experienced swimmer, I shot through the water with lightning rapidity. With neck swollen by convulsive efforts, teeth close set, and every nerve strained by the passion of life, I swam for more than a quarter of an hour—a year, a century!

Nothing! No shore! Only beneath are illimitable depths, a dark abyss.

How was it possible in this boundless space to follow a straight line? Perhaps while struggling on in my despairing efforts I had but followed round and round in the same circle. Perhaps I was back at the same point I started from. Hope and strength departed together. I could scarcely float upon the water. I could scarcely draw a breath through my burning chest.

Then I saw that I must die!

I gave, as a last farewell, a cry so terrible that the echoes of the mountains repeated it wonderingly. An answering cry brought also its echoes and re-echoes. But whence was the sound? It was impossible to recognize the direction, and after two or three ineffectual efforts I resigned myself to the inevitable.

Death! Who can comprehend this word in all its terrible significance? Surely he who like myself has rolled it between his lips during an endless hour. Farewell to glory, love, ambition, power, my friends, my dreams, my happy future!

To die!

My arms refused to move. My head could no longer lift itself to the surface of the water. I threw a last glance over the world where life was, and let myself slowly sink into the water. The habit of diving was strong upon me, and I sank for a long minute without breathing. But at last a convulsive movement of my chest suffocated me with a rush of water. It was a moment of horror. A convulsion, involuntary yet intelligent, brought me to the surface for the last time.

The report of a gun hurst forth! With one glance I swept the horizon. A second shot and a flash to guide me. My friends had understood. The courage of despair seized me. A flow of strength and life through my being, and I felt my limbs grow strong and elastic, as though I had but just entered a beautiful reservoir in an English park.

Ten minutes afterward I was on the shore, and a good pull of whisky gave back to our country one of her most devoted sub-lieutenants.—Translated for the Argonaut from the French of Casimir Cordier, by Minnie M. Chamberlain.

The attempted assassination recently, in Ireland, of the Marquis of Clanricarde, recalls an eccentric character to memory—the father of the present peer, Ulick de Burgh, first Marquis. The latter nobleman occupied many important posts in the English diplomatic service. He was at one time Under Secretary of Foreign Affairs, and for some years British Ambassador at the court of the Czar. He received a step in the peerage—advancement from earl to marquis—and the ribbon of St. Patrick for his services. It is, however, not his career in diplomacy which gained him his extraordinary notoriety, but the variety of his mistresses and the number of his illegitimate children. Although very far from a handsome man, his courtly grace and brilliant powers of conversation rendered him almost invincible with women, and many a husband learned to rue the day he introduced the "wicked marquis" to his house. His conquests were not only among the highest ranks of the English aristocracy, but also among the French, and particularly among the Russian noble ladies. In fact, it is whispered that no less a personage than a Romanoff grand duchess became the mother of twins of which Lord Clanricarde was the father. The duo infants in question were constant companions of the old lord in the last years of his life—he died in 1874—and grew into graceful and exceptionally aristocratic young women. His other children he seems to have pensioned off in different directions, and not troubled himself any further as to their future; but with the two girls he was altogether different. He had them very carefully educated, and left them at his death all he could save from the entail of his legitimate heirs and the wreck of his personal fortune. The two young ladies are now in New Zealand. One is married. They are exactly alike. When the late marquis died, over sixty stalwart young fellows swarmed into the office of the family solicitor, and, claiming the late lord as "papa," inquired after spoils, and left disappointed.

The following note in the London Figaro may interest some San Franciscans: Lord Beaumont has at last struck coal on his estate. The borings at West Bank, near Snaith, prove that there is a seam of the best quality extending for miles in the direction of Snaith and Barnsley. This find of coal will make his lordship a few thousand pounds richer per annum; and if the output is at all like that of most of the collieries in the neighborhood, tens of thousands would be nearer the mark.

The following are the startling bead-lines in a recent number of the Cincinnati Enquirer: "The Cross—Before The Crescent Pales—And The World In Shuddering Horror Waits—The Awful Crash Of Arms Between Christian And Mohammedan—When The False Prophet Arrives, Then Indeed May We Look For Hell On The Nile."

CHICAGO NOVELETTES.

"Good-bye, Myrtle."

"So long, McGuire," replied the girl—a tall, lissome beauty, with dark, gleaming eyes and a wealth of auburn tresses that would have been red anywhere outside of a novel. She stood on the veranda that June evening, the honeysuckles clustering in vivid beauty all around her, while he to whom she spoke lingered at the foot of the steps, standing there irresolutely, with the evident hope that the proud beauty, whose four-dollars-per-pair stockings he saw gleaming fitfully in the half-light of the gloaming, would say the word that should bring him back to her side.

"Must I go, sweetheart?" asked Ethelbert, looking up with a wistful, will-it-ever-quit-raining-during-the-race-week expression on his pallid face.

"No, Ice-Cream Charlie," replied Myrtle, using the pet name by which he was known at home; "you had better go away, and try to forget me—try to let the pleasures which men have always at their command sweep away from the horizon of your life the black pall of disappointment that now hangs so heavily athwart its uttermost rim. My faith in you, once so strong and bright, is gone forever, and it is best that we should part now."

"There can be no revocation of this cruel sentence, then?" he asked.

"None whatever," was the girl's reply. "I have twittered, and my chirp admits of no recall."

* * * * *

A year has passed. The winter, which came so suddenly and crept gently along in soft, white snowy robes, had gone. The sweet spring days with perfume hints of rose and woodhine, and fresh emerald leaves, and climbing vines, and bursting blossoms, is here. In the parlors of a stately residence a gay company of young people are assembled. It is the last party of the season, and Myrtle Hathaway, the acknowledged belle of the year, is as usual the centre of attraction. She stands with charming grace beside a marble figure of Psyche that ornaments a recess in the conservatory, and is chatting gayly with Bertie Cecil—"handsome Bertie" the women call him—who has the beauty of an Apollo and the savoir vivre of a hired man. "What has become of Ethelbert McGuire?" Myrtle suddenly asks; "I have not seen him in ever so long."

Bertie looks at her with an astonished expression. "Do you not know, then?" he says.

The girl shakes her head.

"I supposed you had heard," he said. "Ethelbert met with a disappointment about a year ago; the old story, they tell me, of a man's love for a faithless woman. He never speaks of the matter, but God knows he suffers enough. It is not a light grief that will make a man indulge in dissipation until his life is a wreck."

Myrtle's face became pallid. "Is he then so very dissipated?" she asked.

"I should howl," replied Bertie. "He smokes cigarettes every day now."

Myrtle reeled, and would have fallen had not Bertie caught her. "You are ill, Miss Hathaway, he exclaimed in anxious tones. 'Something I have said has caused this.'"

Recovering herself by a mighty effort, Myrtle spoke: "I am better now; it was nothing but the pie."—From "Camille, or the Fate of a Croquet-Player," by Joseph Medill, the Tribune Novelist.

"Twenty years ago, sweetheart."

As Daphne McCarthy spoke these words, she looked into the face of the man she loved so well, and the dimpled arm, whose pearly whiteness and beautiful rounded curves shone so bewitchingly through the soft, fleecy dress that the girl wore, clung more trustingly than ever to that of George W. Simpson. The day was indeed a beautiful one—a symphony of sound, and light, and scent. Up from the maple-trees came the sweet voices of the birds, twittering to each other from newly built nests and houghs that swayed to and fro in the wind, and shook their latest huds into leaf and blossom.

Standing in the centre of the little dell into which the girl was looking was a stately marble shaft, around whose base the violets and pansies were clustering, and showing by their presence that loving hands had placed them there. For an instant Daphne did not speak, but the tears that trickled down her cheeks told all too plainly of the grief that was racking her young breast. Finally she turned to George, and smiling through her tears, placed her hand confidently on his shoulder, and seemed perfectly content.

"Is it not strange, darling," she said, "that I can never look on the grave of my mother—that mother whom I never saw, and who yielded up her young life when I was born—without a sense of bitter grief and desolation? Twenty years ago to-day, sweetheart, she died. It is a long time, dear, is it not?"—and again the girl smiled.

"Yes, my pet," replied George, "Goldsmith Maid was a colt then," and, bending down his shapely head with its coronal of shoe-brush hair, he kissed the little rosebud mouth. "But though your mother be dead, Daphne," he said, "you have still my love to comfort and uphold you. And can you not speak now, darling, here beside that mother's grave, the words that will make me happy for life? Will you not promise me that when the autumn comes you will crown my life with the halo of your love and become my wife?"

For a moment the girl was silent, looking down and twining nervously around her fingers the tendrils of a rose that she had plucked from a bank of the scarlet beauties that blossomed near the grave.

"Will you marry me, Daphne?" asked George again. Still no answer.

"I can not bear this silence, sweetheart, indeed I can not," exclaimed the young man, his pallid face betokening the tense agony from which he suffered.

"You must end this terrible suspense in some way. Tell me truly, Daphne, do you love me?"

Placing her arms about his neck, and looking into his face with eyes from which the glad light of love was streaming, Daphne said to him in tones that thrilled his blood: "I should gasp to gurgles."—From "None," by Joseph Medill, the Tribune Novelist.

PUBLISHERS' NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
Subscription, $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance—postage prepaid. City subscribers served by Carriers at $4.50 per year, or 10 cents per week. Sample copies free. Single copies, 10 cents.
Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as new addresses.
News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 417 Washington Street, to whom all orders from the trade should be addressed.
Persons mailing single copies of the Argonaut must affix a two-cent stamp.
No traveling canvassers employed. Order by mail, or through your local News Dealer.
Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."
A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

ENTERED AT THE SAN FRANCISCO POSTOFFICE AS SECOND CLASS MATTER.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PIXLEY - - - - - Editor

SATURDAY, JULY 29, 1882.

CONTENTS:

Page.	Page.
EDITORIALS:	EDITORIAL NOTES:
The Great Game of Politics and its Players—The Danger to be Expected in the Coming Republican Conventions—Which Voters?—Which the Republicans Desire—Are the Egyptians Right or Wrong?—A Review of the Material for the Governorship of the Descriptive Water Companies of this City and their Various Contests—What Does "Free Water" Mean?—The Bulletin and its Brethren—The Truthfulness of Editorial Schemers—8-9	General Stoneham's Free Pass—The Shameless Course of the Keokuk Union —The Editor Tolerated any Longer in this City?—The Ups and Downs of Ward Politics and Politicians—The Alameda Board of Education and the Dead Languages—Bombshell Cast into the Hawaiian Kingdom.....
ARGONAUT VERSES.....	LITERARY NOTES.....
ANECDOTES OF CELEBRITIES.....	THE LATEST VERSES.....
ANECDOTES OF INFAMOUS MEN.....	CHICAGO NOVELTIES.....
SAN FRANCISCO FASHIONS.....	WHICH WAS THE BETTER SOLDIER.....
SOCIETY NOTES AND GOSSIP.....	AN OLD FAVORITE.....
THE DEBBS QUESTION.....	INDIVIDUALITIES.....
RE-TOUCH CONCERTS.....	THE LATEST VERSES.....
VANITY FAIR.....	BETSY B.'S LETTER.....
	DRAMATIC GOSSIP.....
	STORYTES.....
	THE TUNEFUL LIAR.....

It is surprising how many good people there are who, being otherwise intelligent, yield their independence in political matters, consent to forego their personal opinions, and accept second-hand and ready-made ones provided for them by dealers in those articles. No one who takes pride in his personal appearance will wear second-hand clothing, and most well-dressed people prefer to order their suits in accordance with their purse and taste. But there has grown up a class of people engaged in politics which has not only arrogated to itself the leadership in all matters of opinion, but undertakes the direction and control of all the machinery of elections and government. What with county, State, and National conventions, county, State, Congressional, and National committees, clubs, ward and district organizations, primary elections, municipal, county, State, and general elections, the business of politics has become an extensive industry. It employs an army of operators, and its rewards are commensurate with the importance of the operations. It affords employment in official life to hundreds of thousands of people. Official salaries amount to millions beyond the first hundred, while the direct pay of office expresses but a small percentage of the earnings obtained from supplies, contracts, and the hundreds of employments incident to the management of governmental affairs. When it is considered that no preliminary education is demanded, no capital is required, and no especial qualification asked, it is not surprising that so many of the uneducated and the unfitted should seek this line of employment. Where the standard of moral fitness is so low, it is not surprising that the immoral think themselves good enough for politics; and when so many go unpunished for official stealing, it is not surprising that thieves think themselves honest enough for office. Politics has thus become a special industry, as distinct and as important as commerce, manufactures, or agriculture. It has one distinct and noticeable feature: from all the legitimate pursuits of life young men and old drift into politics; but from politics to legitimate industries rarely, if ever. The laborer, mechanic, or merchant who gets into politics rarely ever gets out. The young man started upon a political career rarely seeks another. When politics is considered from this standpoint, it is not, perhaps, surprising that the higher objects of party organization are lost sight of in the struggle for position. It is not surprising that the larger and the better class of citizens—those who make of politics a life pursuit, and who are engaged in it to make it to them more congenial and profitable, occupy tions—should become indifferent, and neglect public affairs, thus allowing them to be controlled by the political and office-seeking class. To the party managers, and men looking for subordinate positions, the question of "availability" is an ever prominent one. Whenever a State, or county, or general ticket is to be presented, whether it is for the election of a President, Governor, or Mayor, all the lesser following of the party is anxious for an available leader. The first idea is to secure for the leading candidate one who, because favorably known and popular, or unknown, and therefore unobjectionable, will secure the most votes. This secures party success, and either keeps lesser men in office, or enables lesser men to get office. This principle in national politics has sacrificed Clay, Webster, Benton, Chase, Sumner, Seward, Thurman, and other statesmen as presidential candidates. It has sacrificed, and in all the States is continuing to sacrifice, the best, bravest, most experienced, and most honorable men in the nation. It rewards the trimmer, the coward, and the demagogue, while it consigns to private life the gifted and courageous men who had "rather be right than President," rather be right than hold office. The Democratic party of California has illustrated this contemptible policy in its recent State Convention, and the Republican party is liable to do the same cowardly thing when it meets in State Convention. General Stoneman is a Democratic figure-head, nominated for availability. He is an honorable, educated gentleman, dragged unwillingly from private life into the political arena, not because he possesses administrative capacity, not because he is intelligent upon public affairs, not because he will make a good governor, but because he is a good candidate, and will drag the train of lesser and meaner politicians into office, where they can subsist upon the people and eat their taxes. It is the same cowardly and unprincipled tactics that prompts conventions to shirk responsibility in declaring principles. If there is a popular cry, no matter how false or wicked, any clamor that fills the ears of the popular ass, the party convention seizes upon it, formulates it into the party platform, pledges the party candidate to carry it out, and appeals to the people through their prejudices for their votes. If there is a question of right, one involving some vital interest for the welfare of all, it is ignored, because there is danger to the party if it shall dare to do what is right—danger that it will lose the votes of men who are confessedly in the wrong.

This condition of things will be present in the coming Republican Convention. There is danger that the nominees will come from intrigue and combination. The great question, the great moral question, the one that involves the highest consideration of political economy, of social order, of obedience to law, of reduced taxation, of labor interests, and the highest interest of religion and civilization, is the Sunday law. Every person who pays taxes, every wife and mother, every American who respects the law, and every working man who would rest one day in seven recognizes the propriety of a law that gives a day of rest and cessation from toil. All Christian men and women who believe in the Bible as the inspiration of God, and who pay anything more than lip homage to their Creator; every Roman Catholic who goes to morning mass or evening prayer on Sunday; every Protestant who professes the Christian faith; every Good Templar and good temperance man, and every moderate drinker who recognizes the curse of gin, and is not blind to the fact that nearly all of the crime, poverty, taxation, sin, misery, and shame of modern society is directly traceable to alcoholic drink, will favor a Sunday law—perhaps not this Sunday law in all its provisions, but a Sunday law that sets apart one day in seven for rest, recreation, worship, and relief from toil. And yet there is danger that the Republican party will not have the courage to embody that provision in its platform. Nine-tenths of its members will admit that it is right, and one-tenth, with noisy declamation, with frothy and lying eloquence, will declare that such a resolution is a restriction of personal liberty; that it limits freedom of conscience, and denies freedom of worship, and that it will lose votes to the Republican party, and the chances are even that the convention will refuse to face the music. When all this lying declamation is stripped of its hypocritical cunning, and when these orators of rum are smoked out of their hiding-places; when the whole thing is panned out, it will be found that it is defeated through a pusillanimous and cowardly fear of the distillery, brewery, corner-grocery, lager-beer saloon, and whisky-drinking interest. It will be through fear of losing the vote of that League of Freedom conspiracy that has unlawfully combined to defeat an existing law. It will be through a fear of losing that part of the German vote which loves beer better than it does the law; which regards the license of Sunday beer-drinking as of higher importance than any other privilege of American citizenship, and which would sacrifice patriotism to its belly and good government to its stomach. This is not a libel against the Germans, for it is not true of a majority of Germans, and we believe but a limited minority will leave the Republican party upon this issue. As to the Irish saloon and grocery-keeper, the Republican party never had his vote, never wanted it, and if it has any of that kind, desires to part company with it. Of the Germans, the Republican party has now, and will retain, the better part; of the Irish, it has now, and will retain, the respectable few: and if the party in convention dare not come up to the level of openly declaring its position upon this Sunday law, it will be, and ought to be, defeated. It had better be in the minority of right than in the majority of wrong. In such minority it could do more good to the State, and to such a minority it would be honorable to belong. The Republican party in State Convention must meet this issue, and must not dodge it. If it will meet it courageously, and on all questions of right act boldly, and be bravely American, it will achieve a victory. If it deserves victory, and fails, it will even then have preserved its self-respect, and that is what the Democracy has not done in its nominations, and will not do in any triumph which it may achieve for its sham candidates upon a cowardly platform.

If the English government entered upon its late Egyptian programme for the purpose of collecting interest on Egyptian bonds for its English bond-holders, we are afraid the cost of collection may exceed the commission, and perhaps if it is about to result in a long and expensive war, England had better have assumed the debt. If England intended, by her fleets and armies, to secure a safer route to and from India, and a stronger grip upon the Suez Canal, it is likely to prove both a hazardous and costly experiment. If England desires to gobble up Egypt, and annex it as a dependency to the British crown, or to hold it as security for both Egyptian and Turkish debts, it is quite possible that the attempt will come to grief. As yet there is no assurance that France will further coöperate than to aid in protecting the Suez Canal as the world's commercial highway. Italy, Germany, Austria, and Russia have not, as yet, given any very emphatic assurance of national aid. The position of Arabi Bey, the strong and seemingly almost unanimous feeling of the Egyptian people toward the English and all foreigners, the military strength already displayed by the rebel chieftain, the threatened position of Alexandria, the occupation of Cairo, the unwillingness of the Sultan to send troops to Egypt, the physical character of the Egyptian country as a field of operations for English soldiers—all indicate that if England shall unaided undertake the subjugation of Egypt it will prove a most Herculean labor. Considering also the past history of the Mohammedan races, their fierce valor, their fanaticism, and their immense numbers, the contest becomes a formidable one. There is a large party in England that has not approved this Egyptian business, and though now silenced by patriotic feeling, when troops are being sent to the battle-field, do not approve of it. John Bright does not stand alone in his strong protest against this war, and is not unsupported in his opposition to a policy of which Disraeli was the exponent when he was premier, and Gladstone was not when he entered office. We do not feel much alarm at the idea of a "holy war." We are not at all doubtful of the result of a conflict between England and Egypt. If no civilized power becomes England's ally, none will become the ally of Egypt, and as between fanaticism, dead prophets, Mecca, Koran, and hanging coffins, with flint-locks for rifles, and smooth-bored for cannon on one side, and on the other iron-turreted and iron-clad ships with eighty-ton guns, small arms of precision in the hands of English soldiers, and behind an English army the wealth of English treasure and the guidance of English intelligence, there can be but one outcome. It may cost blood and treasure, but England will triumph over Egypt. We shall not moralize upon the causes that have led to this unhappy conflict, and our sympathies may not be rightly placed; but after all, right or wrong, England is to us England. She is our motherland; and when her sons are fighting under the shadow of the pyramids, against foes that murder women and children, and fly flags of truce for strategy of war, we feel toward her as we would have her people feel toward us when on our frontiers our pioneers are defending themselves against Indian massacres. We, too, have wronged a race, and yet we would not that English sympathy should go out to the race we have wronged as against us of their lineage and blood. The judgment of history is not to be formed till this conflict with Arabi Bey is ended, and the causes which have led to it are better understood.

One of the writer's earliest recollections of San Francisco is a water controversy that occurred in 1850. The waterworks of that period consisted of an Italian, a mule with ten-gallon casks upon his back, and a sheep that constantly followed mule and master, as they supplied the town with water. Between the Italian and a Spanish woman upon Telegraph Hill, on a Sunday morning, there was a lively war of words and Spanish oaths over the chalk-marks of pailful scored upon the Spanish woman's barrel. From words came blows. The señora's barrel was overturned in the melee, the mule ran off with open faucets, the sheep followed in bleating terror, the Italian pursued, the woman cried, and the war ended. The woman, however, got no more water. The next San Francisco water-works were two-wheeled carts with great water-barrels, with horse, man, and pail, supplying families at so much per gallon from artesian wells at the corner of Market and Second Streets, where the Grand Hotel now is. After that came the enterprise of Colonel William G. Wood and his associates, to bring in the water of Mountain Lake by tunneling the Presidio hills. It failed for want of funds, after wrecking a handsome fortune. Miles of brick and cement aqueduct still remain to mark the early effort to supply San Francisco with water. Then came the Benchley enterprise, which brought the water of Lobos Creek in a wooden flume to North Beach, where it was pumped up for distribution. Then came the Spring Valley Water Company, the enterprise of George H. Ensign to distribute the waters of a spring which bubbled up in a depression near the present residence of J. B. Haggin, and made a trickling rivulet to the bay at North Beach. Benchley and Spring Valley were consolidated, and out of them grew to its present extensive proportions the Spring Valley Water Company's property. We are not attempting a history of San Francisco water projects, or the troubles that from the beginning beset the enterprises. But there has been a conflict from the day when the Italian man, the Spanish woman, the mule, and the sheep had the Sunday scrimmage on the hill. Every water enterprise has been in litigation. If all the money that has been expended by water companies in law and politics, for lawyers and lobbyists, in compromises and controversies, to legislatures and boards of aldermen, to newspapers, referees, and commissioners, to buy off rivals and silence threatened opposition, to avoid lawsuits, to enemies for blackmail and friends for friendly aid, had been invested in savings banks as a water fund, it would equal the present value of the Spring Valley Water Company's property. During all this time numerous water schemes have been projected, surveyed, talked about, and abandoned. We recall the Hoadley scheme to introduce certain streams from the Santa Cruz Mountains, the Tahoe project of Von Schmidt, the Blue Lakes, the El Dorado Springs, the waters of Russian River, of Clear Lake, of the San Joaquin, of Putah Creek, of a duck marsh in Contra Costa County, of the valley of the Calaveras, and ever so many others. All of these schemes were purely speculative; their projectors had no money; all depended upon the city; and all, save the proposition of Mayor Bryant to distribute the waters of a lake within the city limits, were chimerical and devoid of practical sense. During all this time, steadily intent upon a legitimate enterprise, the Spring Valley Water Company has been maturing and developing its water supply, extending its works, and keeping pace with the rapid growth of the city. Going beyond the boundaries of the county of San Francisco, it has purchased thousands of acres of grass lands in the hills of San Mateo; has acquired control of mountain springs and running streams, and has dammed up natural valleys for catchment, dug tunnels, laid miles of pipe, created artificial lakes capable of holding thousands of millions of gallons, built reservoirs for storage in country and town, and laid mains and distributing pipes. It has purchased the Valley of Calaveras, with its immense watershed, and the riparian rights connected with the stream that leads to the ocean, at a cost of a million dollars, in anticipation of the coming demands of an increased population. It has purchased riparian rights upon the borders of Lake Merced, where it has established great pumping works, with a capacity of seven million gallons, to be used in event of scarcity or accident occurring to the larger system, and as a reserve against the possible contingency of a water famine.

During all this time there has been no great conflagration. There has been no time when water was not abundant to fight fire. During all this time our streets have been sprinkled, our sewers flushed, our parks watered, our public buildings provided, and our city, to the top of its highest hill and to its remotest boundaries, supplied with clear, fresh, sweet, spring and cloud-caught water. During all this time we have had no serious epidemic, and during all this time our property has been insurable at minimum rates. All this has been done at reasonable cost, when we consider the constant opposition which this company has encountered. And it has all been done at the expense of less than one-fifteenth part of the people. It has all been done at the cost of those persons who in their industries or in their families have been compelled to consume water, or who, to adorn their grounds and beautify their places of residence, have been compelled to pay for it. The real estate speculator who buys land to hold and not to improve, has not paid a dollar to this business. The great warehouse that holds millions of personal property, where the great merchant who carries millions of stock has his values insured for less than one per cent, without a sufficient water supply he would have to pay six, or he altogether uninsurable, pays for a single water-closet or faucet where clerks and porters may wash their hands. The non-rich millionaire pays nothing. The resident millionaire, rich in houses and stores to let, compels his tenants to pay his water-bills. These rich men ride over park drives sprinkled at the expense of householders who indulge in the luxury of bath-tubs, and drive their swell spans in comfort provided by toiling draymen and poor men who drive express-wagons. And all this because it is demanded that real estate and personal property shall not be subject to a water-tax. "The city must have free water." There is no such thing as free water. Free water is impossible. "Free water" is the gag of demagogues. "Free water" means that the whole burden of the supply to this city should be paid for by those consumers who are compelled to have it, and the great bulk of wealthy men who own real estate and merchandise shall go free and untaxed. Free water is a bumbug. It is a crime. It is a crime by means of which the wealthy escape their just burdens and wrongfully impose them on the class that can not escape the position of water consumers. There be land-rats and water-rats; there are land-thieves and water-thieves. These water-thieves are the criminal rich men and property-owners who escape the payment of a just tax that ought to be imposed for the flushing of sewers, the extinguishment of fires, sprinkling streets and parks, for supplying fountains and public buildings at the cost of the city, and chargeable upon the tax-roll of all its property.

The criminal advocate and apologist for these water thieves is the Bulletin, with the Call acting the part of associate counsel. The opposition of this copartnership of criminal advocates has outlived the desire of their retainers, for there are now very few, even of the most selfish of our wealthy class, who have not been convinced of the injustice and tyranny of the Bulletin's free-water argument. As business men, they know that the Spring Valley Water Company is compelled to earn from somebody interest, dividends, and expenses on the capital invested. They know that this capital is measured not by what the water-works have cost, but by what the stock will sell for in the market; not what the land cost, for it has advanced in value; not what pipe is worth as iron, but what it will earn in distributing water. The pretense that this company should pay only on its actual disbursements for construction, and not be entitled to the advanced value of its property, is a dishonest one. It would be just as absurd to declare by law that the Bulletin publishing company should only earn the interest payable on government bonds for the value of its type, presses, material, and labor employed in its production, making no allowance for the time of its establishment, the good-will resulting from its long life of usefulness, and the immense talent employed in its daily make-up. This company took the risk of a large expenditure. It is the growth of years. When the enterprise took form San Francisco was an experimental village. It is now a great city. This stock has advanced from thirty to one hundred and fifteen. It has been a natural growth, and its stockholders are justly entitled to the increase. Its stockholders are innocent purchasers, most of them new holders, most of them non-residents. To scale the profits of a stock costing one hundred and fifteen to interest on an estimated value of half that amount is simple roguery, and the man or journal that advocates it is either knave or fool. To talk about watered stock to a buyer in the open market, or to attempt to hold him responsible for antecedent frauds, or mistakes, or crimes, is arrant nonsense. To talk about an original contract to supply free water to a city of three hundred thousand inhabitants, made with a city of forty thousand; to supply free water to parks that at that time did not exist—for at the period referred to Portsmouth, Washington, and Union Squares had not a tree or shrub upon them, and Golden Gate Park had not been thought of—and to give free water to streets, sewers, and institutions that had not been created, is unadulterated hosh. It is to be remembered also that these early contracts have been changed by new legislation, have been modified by new laws, and have finally been altogether overturned by the adoption of a new constitution. This is the act of the people, and is a new departure so far as the Spring Valley Water Company is concerned. Under this new constitution the Supreme Court of the State has rightfully and finally decided that the city must pay for its water. Three boards of Supervisors have fixed rates. The people have acquiesced, and everybody except the Bulletin accepts the situation, and submits to the law. The Bulletin clamors for more litigation, and says the decision of the courts and the act of the board imposes an additional burden of two hundred and forty thousand dollars per annum, which two hundred and forty thousand dollars per annum is equal to four million dollars of six per cent. bonds. In this connection it talks about furniture, sewing-machines, kitchen utensils, pianos, and personal property being hurried by a debt of one million dollars, and real estate being burdened by three additional millions. The Bulletin knows, and the woman who runs a sewing-machine or wash-tub knows, and every consumer knows, that they are being relieved of a burden, and that this burden is being distributed equally to all property, where it belongs. There is not an intelligent and honest property-holder in San Francisco who does not recognize that fact, and there is no good citizen who will not willingly submit to it. "This property has advanced from eighty-five cents on the dollar to one hundred and fifteen," says the Bulletin, as though this advance indicated something wrong. The writer recalls the time when a one hundred-vara lot, where the Palace Hotel now stands, sold for a Spanish ounce. The new river water company in London, the par value of which was one hundred pounds, is now worth thirty thousand pounds. Time was when the Bulletin was a hazardous experiment, and not worth the cost of its type; it is now a valuable property. Looking back over the long line of its dead owners, and back through the long list of Spring Valley Water Company's stock owners, the advanced value of both properties may be attributed to time, to the growth of a prosperous city, to well-invested money, and the well-directed efforts of wise and intelligent men; and there can be no better reason why the Spring Valley Water Company should furnish the city of San Francisco with free water than that the Bulletin publishing company should supply its hotels, barber-shops, street-cars, City Hall, public buildings, and reading-rooms with free Bulletins, and make its private subscribers pay the cost. The illustration is a good one. If in the early days James King of William had thus contracted, and had charged his subscribers fifty cents a week in consideration that all these public places should have free Bulletins, would Mr. Fitch think himself bound to keep up his price and give free papers to the public? In the face of the rivalry of other journals, and their reduced price, in the event of changed laws, and a decision of the Supreme Court that the public places were not entitled to free papers, would Mr. Fitch be anxious for a new bearing, as he professes to be over this decision denying free water to San Francisco?

A peculiar feature of this long and interminable controversy waged by the Bulletin against the Spring Valley Company is the fact that in the opinion of the editors of that journal everybody is wrong but themselves. Every one who entertains an opinion not in accord with them is controlled by some improper motive. The journal that differs is a Spring Valley organ. The judge or court who decides the law as they would not have it, is corrupt. The politicians who will not take pledges prescribed by them are criminals. The Supervisors who fix rates different from their estimate are dishonest officials. Three boards in succession have been denounced as dishonest. In the present board there are eleven corrupt men. Supreme judges are held up and named as guilty of corruption in office, and it would seem as if there were left but one honest and efficient officer in the municipal government, and that one is the city attorney, who refuses to do the bidding of the municipal government, and who is in active alliance with the Bulletin and Call that this vexatious, expensive, and useless litigation shall not cease. We congratulate our citizens that this controversy draws to an end; that our water-rates will be reduced; that new improvements will be added, additional water supply provided, and larger and more extended mains be laid, and that this long and vexatious wrangle draws to an end. If it had never begun, San Francisco would to-day have owned its water-works, as all other cities do and should do, and our city would have been supplied with abundant water at rates largely reduced from the present cost. The time has been when the city might have purchased this property for eight million dollars. The property would have paid a large and remunerative profit upon that sum. The Bulletin then saw a fraud in the proposed purchase, and opposed it. It was then worth not more than four million dollars in that journal's estimate. It denounced the attempted purchase. When the property advanced to ten million dollars the Bulletin thought it worth but five; and so on, as in spite of all its opposition, all its detraction and abuse, it went steadily upward in value to sixteen million dollars. The Bulletin would perhaps now consent that the purchaser obtain it at half that sum. It will still advance. As our city grows in population, as its wealth increases, and its manufacturing industries multiply, this property will grow with it, till the sixteen million dollars of value to-day will be doubled in the future. That our city does not own its own water-works and that it has no near prospect of acquiring any water supply, except at a most extravagant price, we may thank the meddling malevolence of the Bulletin and Call.

We do not look with alarm upon the passage of forty thousand Chinese across our continent. We would not regard it as an irreparable calamity if all these Mongolians should stop in Boston, establish themselves in the shoe business at Lynn, or form a colony in New York or Chicago. We look with complacency upon the opium dens now opening in Eastern cities. We hope in time to see the pious maiden ladies, and the soft-headed brothers of the evangelical denominations, advance in column upon these heathen with Sunday-school and prayer-meeting efforts for the salvation of their souls. We recognize that the East has to go through the experience of the West, and then we for sensible and healthful legislation in the direct

WHICH WAS THE BETTER SOLDIER?

A Study of the Civil War.

"A Union Veteran" contributes the following remarkable paper to a late number of Our Continent: No unprejudiced person can deny that in the war between the States the Confederate soldier was worth more, man for man, than the Federal volunteer. In proof of this need only be instanced the fact that the army of Northern Virginia, though constantly overmatched in numbers, always having an adversary lavishly supplied with material, though twice checked in its purposes was never defeated until the siege of Petersburg had depleted its ranks, and the near approach of Sherman had increased the disproportion of numbers to a limit that left no hope of success. On the other hand, this overmatched army had administered at least three crushing and overwhelming defeats upon its adversary. The aristocracy of the South furnished from the outset a most admirable corps of line and staff officers. They were just near enough to their men to permit familiarity and receive respect, and far enough from them to prevent insubordination. Coming from the same vicinage, every man knew his officer. Even where the officer was not personally known to his men, he represented a class whom they were accustomed to follow. It has been the fashion among both officers and men of the North to sneer at the discipline of the Confederate army. It is true that in non-essentials they very greatly excelled them. To the very last the drill of the Southern regiments was slack, dribbling, and uneven. In the essentials of discipline, however, they far excelled us. For neglect of duty their men were punished and punished speedily and severely. In trivialities, the Southern soldier was generally a slouch with impunity; but when it came to a real neglect of duty, straggling, pillaging, cowardice, and desertion, the terror of swift and terrible punishment was ever before his eyes. "What is that?" the writer once asked a Confederate prisoner as we looked down upon the camp of his division and saw a body of troops paraded and from the center shoot up a puff of white smoke. "Wal," was the cool reply, "I reckon it's ole Bragg a-startin' a new graveyard; 'tother must be nigh about full." Bragg was not a very successful general. He seemed to lack all power of adaptation to circumstances. But it was the army thus trained to obedience that, under General Joe Johnston, made the wonderful backward movement from Resaca to Atlanta—a movement not equalled in brilliancy, completeness, and difficulty by any other upon either side during the war, unless it be the death-grapple around Petersburg. The Southern soldier believed most devoutly in the martial superiority of the Southron, and it gave him a confidence in the outcome of the struggle which greatly enhanced his prowess. This was the very means of all others likely to make such troops effective. By constant employment and repeated victories he transformed them into veterans before they had fairly learned the movements from line into column and their reversals. But this was only half the advantage derived from this belief. The Northern soldier and the Northern leaders believed it also. To the Northern mind the Southerner was a being especially delighting in blood and war. The superiority of the Southern volunteer forces was at the outset directly or indirectly conceded by all. As ample proof of this state of mind it is necessary only to recall the abject terror that was produced throughout all the land by what was known as the "Black Horse Cavalry"—a legion by no means formidable in numbers nor remarkable for actual feats of arms. During the first year of the Confederacy's existence, however, the bare name of this death's-head-and-bloody-bones corps was worth more to her cause than ten thousand of the best trained soldiery on earth could have been. The Southern soldier went into battle confident of his own prowess, and despising his foe. The Northern soldier entered the conflict determined to do his best, not shrinking from his duty, but overestimating his adversary and underestimating himself. This disparity of spirit—not of soldierly qualities—was greatly enhanced by the issue of the first general engagement, and the accession of the over-cautious McClellan to the command, with his confidence in pipe-clay and dress-parade, and his overwhelming dread of General Lee and Southern impetuosity. The secret of Grant's success lay in the fact that he did not believe in these. He considered the Northern volunteer as fully a match for his Southern adversary, and did not hesitate to attack whenever he believed himself to have the advantage in numbers or position. He appreciated the fact that the quickest way to make a recruit a veteran was to let him share the sweets of victory. Instead of opposing the enemy with "time and tactics," he threw his columns against them, and taught his men their tactics under fire. These conditions can never be paralleled again. They do not adhere in the people of either section. They were purely temporary and fortuitous. The South had no real advantage in the familiarity of its people with firearms. It is doubtful even if as large a proportion of their armies as of our Northern regiments were accustomed to arms of precision. So, too, their horsemanship was a thing more fanciful than real, at least in its results. In the actual soldierly qualities of the people of the two sections there is probably but little difference. All the talk about the impetuosity, reckless daring, and joy of battle which is said to characterize the South in contrast with the North is mere twaddle. The charge at Mission Ridge, when the army of Grant outran his orders, and went to the summit instead of intrenching at the foot of the slope, was the great miracle of impetuosity of the whole war. On the other hand, the claim of greater staunchness, of stubborn, bulldog grip on the part of the North is equally nonsense. Petersburg is an eternal monument of the power of the South to stand punishment. The man who could boast of the superior staying power of the North with the fact of that marvelous defense before him exceeds in assurance the traditional government mule. The truth would seem to be that in mere soldierly qualities the men of the sections are very fairly balanced. The South has a better general preparation for camp life, while the North has more ingenuity, and is better able to supply deficiencies of equipment and the like. The North has more intelligence, but the South has more homogeneity.

AN OLD FAVORITE.

Euphrosyne; or the Prospect.
 "Freed from its tenement of clay,"
 (So the prophetic legend ran),
 "As pure as dew, as bright as day,
 Shall rise the soul of Man."
 I read; and in the shade by me
 Sat golden-haired Euphrosyne.
 Above our shaded orchard-seat
 The houghs stirred, scented in the light,
 And on the grass beneath our feet
 Lay blossoms pink and white;
 I held the hook upon my knee,
 Translating to Euphrosyne.
 'Twas an old melancholy rune,
 Writ by a Norseman long ago—
 Sad with the sense of stars and moon,
 Sea-wash, and frost, and snow—
 A vision of futurity!
 And wide-eyed heard Euphrosyne.
 "Stately and slow the heart shall beat
 To the low thro' of Time's soft tide,
 While shaded from the solar heat
 The Shapes walk heavenly-eyed."
 All round us hurt the starry lea,
 And warmly sighed Euphrosyne.
 "All shall be innocent and fair;
 Dim as a dream the days shall pass;
 No weed of shame shall blossom there,
 No snake crawl on the grass."
 "How happy such a world will he!"
 Sighed beautiful Euphrosyne.
 "Flesh shall be fled, sense shall be still,
 The old gray earth hurried and dead;
 The wicked world, with all things ill—
 Stone, rock, and tree—he fled."
 "No earth, no world!" softly sighed she,
 The little maid, Euphrosyne.
 She clasped her hands, she cast her eyes
 Over the landscape bright with May—
 Scented and sweet, with cloudless skies,
 Smiled the green world that day—
 Loud sang the thrush, low hummed the bee,
 And softly sighed Euphrosyne.
 "Sickness shall perish, grief and pain
 Be hurried with the hurried life;
 The aching heart, the weary brain,
 At last shall cease their strife."
 The gray toe trembled on my knee,
 But happy sat Euphrosyne.
 "The luminous house wherein we dwell,
 The haunted house of shame and lust,
 The callow spirit's fleshly shell,
 Shall crumble into dust;
 The flower shall fade, the scent fly free."
 She trembled now, Euphrosyne.
 Her warm, white bosom heaved with sighs;
 I felt her light breath come and go;
 She drank, with glorious lips and eyes,
 The summer's golden glow;
 She felt her life, and sighed "Ah me!"
 The flower of maids Euphrosyne.
 "And with the flower of flesh shall fade
 The venomous bloom of earthly love;
 No passion trance of man and maid
 Shall taint the life above;
 Flesh shall be fled, sex shall not be!"
 I paused, and watched Euphrosyne.
 Her hands were folded round her knees,
 Her eyes were fixed in a half dream;
 She shared the flame of flowers and trees,
 And drank the summer gleam;
 "Kiss sweet, kiss sweet!" upon the tree
 The thrush sang to Euphrosyne.
 A little maid of seventeen Mays,
 A happy child with golden hair,
 What should she know of Love's wild ways,
 Its hope, its pain, and prayer?
 "No love in heaven?—how strange 'twill be!"
 Still musing, sighed Euphrosyne.
 "No thoughts of perishable mould
 Shall break the rule of heavenly rest,
 But larger light, more still, more cold,
 More beautiful and blest."
 Her heart was fluttering close to me,
 And quickly breathed Euphrosyne.
 "There shall be no more love!"—but here
 I paused, for from my side she sprang,
 And in her bird's voice loud and clear,
 Of love's young dream she sang—
 "Oh close the foolish book!" cried she,
 The happy maid, Euphrosyne.
 I closed the book, and from my hold
 She took it with her fingers white,
 Then down the path of green-and-gold
 She tripped with laughter light—
 "The book, not the glad world, shall be Deep-buried," said Euphrosyne.
 Within an elm tree's hollow hole,
 Into the darkness damp and green,
 She thrust it, closing up the hole
 With sprays of lilac sheen—
 Then all the radiant flush of glee
 Fast faded from Euphrosyne.
 Pensively in the summer shine
 Her blue eyes filled with tears of bliss,
 She held her little mouth to mine
 In one long, heavenly kiss—
 "I love the earth, and life, and thee!"
 She whispered, my Euphrosyne.
 Sleep, Book, within thy burial-place,
 With flowers and fruits for epitaph!
 Kind Heaven, stoop down thy sunny face
 To hear the earth's glad laugh!
 Smile up your glorious eyes on me,
 Oh child of joy! Euphrosyne!
 —Robert Buchanan.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Mrs. Langtry is to receive five hundred dollars a night, and all expenses for herself and maid, for one hundred nights in America.

The Queen is said to be displeased because Albert is not one of the leading names of her great-grandson, Prince Frederick William Victor.

Tennyson sees no one without an appointment, especially in the American tourist season, when he retreats from the Isle of Wight to a secluded nook of Hampshire.

The death is announced, at the age of seventy-eight, of Joseph Aloysius Hansom, the inventor of the famous cabs that bear his name, and one of the prominent architects of London.

Mrs. Mackay's threatened removal from Paris to New York, it is said, has struck terror to the hearts of the Parisians, hundreds of whom have fattened upon her lavish expenditures.

Having enjoyed such a remarkable bit of good fortune in the sale of his little Meissonier, Mr. Ruskin now proposes to sell ten of his Turners under the hammer. This, too, after his vigorous denunciation of picture-jobbing.

Bartholdi, designer of the statue of "Liberty Enlightening the World," to be placed in New York harbor, is a man of great wealth, and has given twenty thousand dollars of his own fortune to defray the expenses of constructing the huge monument.

Austin Dobson could not sing with Beranger the praises of a garret. He lives in one of the prettiest of modern English houses where, among many attractive objects of art and nature, there are none more beautiful than his nine well-behaved olive-branches.

King Louis has just bestowed on his dear Wagner the two well-trained swans which have often drawn the small boat, containing Louis habited as Lohengrin, on the blue and moon-lit waters of the lake in the neighborhood of the royal castle of Hohenswansgard.

Mrs. Julia Ward Howe says that there is no truth in the report that her daughter and Mr. Oscar Wilde are engaged to be married. She adds that they have no sympathy in common. This is a fact wherein Miss Maude Howe is certainly to be congratulated.

Magnificent are the presents sent by King Alfonso to the members of the commission that took the Order of the Garter to Madrid last year. The Prince of Wales received tapestries worth more than thirty thousand dollars. To the others are sent some superb specimens of Toledo arms, richly encrusted with gold.

Captain Lord Charles Beresford, of the war vessel Condor, which did such good work in the recent bombardment of Alexandria, is brother to the Marquis of Waterford. His age is thirty-six, and he is a favorite of the Prince of Wales. His brother William has the Victoria Cross for gallantry. Lord Charles has rescued many men from drowning.

The senior soldier in the German army is Emperor William, who is its head. In March he entered in his eighty-sixth year. The youngest soldier in the same army is the son of Duke Paul Frederick of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, who is scarcely yet a month old, and who has just been enrolled by the veteran Emperor in the Seventeenth Regiment of Mecklenburg Dragoons.

Few men have had a more interesting experience of the "late unpleasantness" than Major Wilmer McLean, who died a few days since in Alexandria, Virginia. He literally saw the beginning and the end of the war. It was on his farm that the battle of Bull Run was fought, and General Lee surrendered on his farm at Appomattox, to which he had moved with his family.

The Princess Victoria, of Hesse, runs her maiden aunt, Beatrice, pretty close in accomplishments, not to say good looks. She is said to be a gifted piece of royalty, painting, modelling, beside being a fine musician, and a very charming and interesting girl in the bosom of her family. Beatrice has a high nose and a temper that matches it, and is as proud as Lucifer himself. Both young women are in the market.

Since the downfall of the Southern Confederacy, Mr. Judah P. Benjamin, "the brains of the rebel government," has enjoyed great prosperity as a lawyer in England. Recently, in looking over his list of cases, he found that it included just half of all the suits from the entire realm that were before the House of Lords on appeal. His wife and daughter now live in Paris, the latter having married a French army officer.

Probably the wealthiest sexton in the world is the one who every Sunday ushers to their seats the congregation of St. James's Chapel, Elberon, N. J. He is a rather short, stout man, with a round, full face, beaming with contentment and benevolence. He lives near by in a seventy-thousand-dollar cottage, has a bank account of several millions, and is known to the world as G. W. Childs, proprietor of the Philadelphia Ledger.

John Brown, the Queen's favorite servant, has about the best time in the spring, as the Queen's salmon fishing on the Dee is at his disposal, and her majesty's stretch, which extends from Invercauld Bridge to Balmoral Bridge, is one of the finest on the river, and contains many excellent pools. John Brown has enjoyed excellent sport during the last month, the river having been in capital order. One day he landed fourteen fine clean salmon.

Meissonier recompensed the physician who brought him safely out of his recent illness by presenting him with his (the painter's) own portrait, finely executed in water-colors. The great artist represents himself in it full length, clad in a long red dressing-gown, his sick-room garb. This, with picturesque head and flowing beard, gives him the appearance of some old Doge of Venice. The picture is reckoned by connoisseurs to be worth ten thousand dollars.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

A German One.

A curious form of German humor appears in a book published at Berlin, under the title, "Schultze and Muller in London." Here is a passage: "At 5:45 we went to the great postoffice. The squeeze was tremendous round the newspaper-box, where the newspapers are thrust in in hales, and it is, indeed, on a grand scale, since the Times alone has sixteen million subscribers. I warned Schultze not to go so near the crush, but he did not hear me. As he was standing there came a great shock of newspaper boys running with hales of newspapers, and throwing them in at the window. A hale of newspapers hits Schultze on the head; he loses his balance and tips head-forward into the bureau. Half a dozen officials immediately seize him, stamp him in the stomach, and the unhappy Schultze is despatched in an unpaid news-package to the provinces. At this moment the box is closed with a snap. I rush against it, and cry: 'Schultze! Schultze!' But it is too late; your unhappy son-in-law was already packed in the post-cart. I ran into the bureau of the post-master, and demanded back your son-in-law. 'Is your friend addressed?' he asks. 'No,' I answered. 'Very well,' says the Englishman, 'M. Schultze will remain for six months in the bureau, and if no one applies for him, he will be hurned as a dead letter.'

Rules for Riding.

In mounting, face the near side of the horse. The near side is the side nearest yourself. If you stand on the right side of the horse, which is the wrong side, when you mount you will face the crupper. Then everybody will know that your name is Johann Gottlieb Ernstgefolger. If you can not mount from the ground, lead the horse to high a fence, say "whoa" two or three times, and jump over the horse's ears. You will light somewhere on his neck, and will have plenty of time to adjust yourself while the horse is running away. Another method of mounting, largely practiced by young gentlemen from the city, is to balance yourself on one foot on the fence, and point the other leg at the horse in the general direction of the saddle, saying "whoa" all the time. The horse, after this gesture has been repeated a few times, backs away, pulls the alleged rider off the fence, and walks up and down the lane with him at a rapid gallop. This gives the rider, in about ten minutes, all the exercise he will want for a week. If by some miracle you manage to get into the saddle, hold on with both hands, and say "whoa." The faster the horse goes, the tighter you must hold on, and the louder you must "holler." If you are from New York or Philadelphia, you will shorten the stirrups until your knees are on a level with your chin. Then as you ride you will rise to your feet and stand in the attitude of a man peering over a fence to look for his dog, and then suddenly fall in the saddle like a man who has stepped on a banana peel. This is the English school. It is hard on the horse, but it is considered very graceful. A man can not wear false teeth, however, and ride in this manner.—Burdette.

The Bad Boy Again.

"When is your ma coming back?" asked the groceryman of the bad boy, as he found him standing on the sidewalk when the grocery was opened in the morning, taking some pieces of brick out of his coat-tail pockets. "Oh, she got back at midnight last night," said the boy, as he ate a few blueberries out of a case. "That's what makes me up so early. Pa has been kicking at these pieces of brick with his bare feet, and when I came away he had his toes in his hand and was trying to go back up the stairs on one foot. Pa haint got no sense." "I am afraid you are a terror," said the grocery man, as he looked at the innocent face of the boy. "You are always making your parents some trouble, and it is a wonder to me that they don't send you to the reform school. What devilry was you up to last night to get kicked this morning?" "No devilry, just a little fun. You see, ma went to Chicago to stay a week, and she got tired, and telegraphed she would be home last night; and pa was down town, and I forgot to give him the dispatch. And after he went to bed, me and a chum of mine thought we would have a Fourth of July. You see, my chum has got a big sister, and we hooked some of her clothes, and after pa got to snoring we put them in his room. Oh, you'd a laughed. We put a pair of number one slippers, with blue stockings, down in front of the rocking-chair beside pa's boots, and a red corset on a chair, and my chum's sister's best black silk dress on another chair, and a hat with a white feather on the bureau, and some frizzes on the gas-bracket, and everything we could find that belonged to a girl in my chum's sister's room. Oh, we got a red parasol, too, and left it right in the middle of the floor. Well, when I looked at the lay-out, and heard pa snoring, I thought I should die. You see, ma is easily excited. My chum slept with me that night, and when we heard the door-bell ring I stuffed a pillow in my mouth. There was nobody to meet ma at the depot, and she hired a hack and came right up. Nobody heard the bell but me, and I had to go down and let ma in. She was pretty angry, you bet, at not being met at the depot. 'Where's your father?' said she, as she began to go up-stairs. I told her I guessed pa had gone to sleep by this time, that he'd gone to bed an hour ago. Then I slipped up stairs, and looked over the banisters. Ma said something about heavens and earth, and where is the huzzy, and a lot of things I couldn't hear; and pa swore, and said it's no such thing, and the door slammed, and they talked for two hours. I s'pose they finally laid it to me, as they always do, 'cause pa called me very early this morning, and when I come down stairs he hurt my feelings. I see they had my chum's sister's clothes all pinned up in a newspaper, and I s'pose when I go back I shall have to carry them home, and then she'll be down on me too. I'll tell you what, I have got a good notion to take some shoemaker's wax and stick my chum on my back, and travel with a circus, as a double-headed boy from Borneo. A fellow could have more fun, and not get kicked all the time." And the boy sampled some strawberries in a case in front of the store, and went down the street whistling for his chum, who was looking out of an alley to see if the coast was clear.—Peck's Sun.

The peculiar costume of the dweller in Arizona is thus graphically described by a "tenderfoot": "In ordinary weather he wears a belt with pistols in it. When it grows chilly he puts on another belt with pistols in it, and when it becomes really cold he throws a Winchester rifle over his shoulder."

THE LATEST VERSE.

Cupid's Kiss.

'Twas as she slept that Cupid came,
His bow and arrows taking,
That she might feel his power in dreams
Who scorned his weapons waking.

As o'er her sleeping form he poised
The shaft that oft had missed her,
Her beauty touched his roguish heart—
He only stooped and kissed her.

Since when, upon her fair, soft cheek,
Love's amorous imprint keeping,
A charming dimple marks the place
Where Cupid kissed her, sleeping.
—Walter Learned in August Century.

In Sanctuary.

While pale with rage the wild surf springs
Athwart the harbor bar,
The safe ships fold their snowy wings
Beneath the evening star.
In this calm haven rocked to sleep,
All night they swing and sway,
Till mantles o'er the morning deep
The golden blush of day.

Here, safe from all the storms of fate,
From worldly rage and scorn,
Thus let me hold my hands and wait
The coming of the morn;
While all night long o'er moon-lit turf
The wind brings in from far
The moaning of the baffled surf
Athwart the harbor bar.
—William Winter in August Harper.

Homesick.

This were a miracle, if it could be!
If, never loitering since the prime of day,
Since kissing the cool lips of Northern May,
This drowsy wind at evening brought to me
The fragrant spirit of the apple-tree;
Or, if so far sweet sounds could make their way,
That I should hear the robin's twilight lay
Float o'er a thousand leagues of foamy sea!
Now, save I know those eyes exchange no beams
With yonder star, (so curves the earth between,) I'd say:
My friend doth from his casement lean,
And charge Canopus, by his pilot-gleams,
To bear love to my port and lovely dreams
Of homeward slopes new clothed with summer green.
—Edith M. Thomas in August Century.

The Gods Said Love is Blind.

The gods said Love is blind. The earth was young:
With foolish, youthful laughter, when it heard,
It caught and spoke the letter of the word;
And from that time till now has said and sung,
"Oh, Love is blind. The falsest face or tongue
Can cheat him, once his passion's thrill is stirred;
He is so blind, poor Love!"

Strange none demurred
At this, nor saw how hollow false it rung,
When all men know that sightless men can tell
Unnumbered things which vision can not find.
Powers of the air are leagued to guide them well;
And things invisible weave clew and spell,
By which all labyrinths they safely wind.
Ah, we were lost, if Love had not been blind!
—H. H. in the August Atlantic.

Elegiac Verse.

Peradventure of old, some hard in Ionian Islands,
Walking alone by the sea, hearing the wash of the waves,
Learned the secret from them of the beautiful verse
elegiac,
Breathing into his song motion and sound of the sea.
For as a wave of the sea, upheaving in long undulations,
Plunges loud on the sands, pauses, and turns, and retreats,
So the Hexameter, rising and sinking, with cadence
sonorous,
Falls; and in reflux rhythm hack the Pentameter flows.
Not in his youth alone, but in age, may the heart of the poet
Bloom into song, as the gorse blossoms in autumn and spring.
Not in tenderness wanting, yet rough are the rhymes
of our poet;
Though it be Jacob's voice, Esau's, alas! are the hands.
Let us be grateful to writers for what is left in the inkstand;
When to leave off is an art only attained by the few.
How can the Three be One? you ask me; I answer
by asking,
Hail, and snow, and rain, are they not three, and yet one?
By the mirage uplifted the land floats vague in the ether,
Ships and the shadows of ships hang in the motionless air;
So by the art of the poet our common life is uplifted,
So, transfigured, the world floats in a luminous haze.
Like a French poem is life; being only perfect in structure.
When with the masculine rhymes mingled the feminine are.
Down from the mountain descends the brooklet, rejoicing in freedom;
Little it dreams of the mill hid in the valley below;
Glad with the joy of existence, the child goes singing and laughing,
Little dreaming what toils lie in the future concealed.
As the ink from our pen, so flow our thoughts and our feelings
When we begin to write, however sluggish before.
Like the Kingdom of Heaven, the Fountain of Youth is within us;
If we seek it elsewhere, old shall we grow in the search.
If you would hit the mark, you must aim a little above it;
Every arrow that flies feels the attraction of earth.
Wisely the Hebrews admit no Present tense in their language;
While we are speaking the word, it is already the Past.
In the twilight of age all things seem strange and phantasmal,
As between daylight and dark ghost-like the landscape appears.
Great is the art of beginning, but greater the art is
of ending;
Many a poem is marred by a superfluous verse.
—From Longfellow's Posthumous Volume of Poems.

TO HOUSEKEEPERS.

If you wish to use good full weight and absolute purity, see your grocer supplies you with

KINGSFORD'S
OSWEGO
STARCH.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER.

WALTER BAKER & CO.'S
CHOCOLATE.

SMITH
BROTHERS'
PACKAGE
BORAX.

WM. T. COLEMAN & CO.
AGENTS,
121 and 123 Market Street,
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

THE LATEST NEW BOOK,

And the One which will have the largest sale.

NASBY IN EXILE

By D. R. LOCKE, (PETROLEUM V. NASBY).

WILL BE READY

FOR DELIVERY TO SUBSCRIBERS ABOUT JULY 22D.

"I shal make my way to Paris to wunst, and it will go hard with me if I can't establish myself ther in some way. I turn my back upon the Corners hawtily, only too glad to leave a ongrateful people wich hezn't enuff appreshashun uv greatinis to furnish the triflin means to keep it alive among em. Boston alluz paid Webster's debts, while the Corners eggshles me!"

"Be it so. I go, never to return."
PETROLEUM V. NASBY, (Eggsile.)"

"NASBY IN EXILE" is at once serious and humorous. The subjects are treated in the peculiar vein that has made "Nasby" famous wherever the English language is spoken, the humor being illustrative of ideas, and the satire healthful and wholesome.

The chapters on London give the reader a better idea of the great metropolis than can be found in any book published, and in no other publication are the other countries so conscientiously and carefully described. Mr. Locke set out with the idea of getting at things as they actually are, and that he succeeded those who read his letters as they appeared will bear testimony.

Concerning Ireland and the Irish, it is conceded that no such a presentation of facts about Ireland was ever put on paper.

Seven hundred pages. Two hundred illustrations. Well printed and well bound. Price, in cloth, $4; or in leather, $5. Sold by subscription only.

SAMUEL CARSON

AGENT FOR THE LOCKE PUBLISHING CO.,

120 Sutter Street,

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

AGENTS WANTED.

A copy will be sent by mail post-paid on receipt of price.

GEORGE MORROW.

GEORGE MORROW & CO.

(Established 1854.)

Commission Merchants

DEALERS IN HAY AND GRAIN.

SHIPPING ORDERS A SPECIALTY. CONSIGN-
MENTS SOLICITED.

39 Clay Street,

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

C. ADOLPHE LOW & CO.
Commission Merchants,
SAN FRANCISCO.

OFFICE IN NEW YORK, 42 CEDAR
Street
Liberal advances made on consignments.

S. & G. GUMP,
581 and 583 Market Street, S. F.,
Manufacturers
Mirrors, Cornices, Hardwood Mantles, Picture
Frames, and Bric-a-Brac.

IMPORTERS of GOUPI'S ENGRAVINGS, CHRO-
MOS, PHOTOGRAPHS, ETC.

CALIFORNIA SUGAR REFINERY.
OFFICE, 325 Market St.
WORKS, Eighth and Brannan Sts.

C. SPRECKELS, President,
J. D. SPRECKELS, Vice-President,
A. B. SPRECKELS, Secretary.

PACIFIC ROLLING MILL CO.

San Francisco, Cal., Manufacturers of
RAILROAD and MERCHANT IRON

Car and Locomotive Axles and Frames, and Hammered
Iron of every description. Rolled Beams, 3" x 12" Channel, and T Iron, Bridge, and Machine Bolts, Nuts, Washers, etc. Steamboat Shafts, Crank Pins, Pistons, ing Rods, etc., etc. Highest price paid.

OFFICE, 1202 MARKET

The paragraphers say that the throne was shaken to its centre the other day, when the Princess of Wales shook hands with an actress. The touch of the royal hand was no accolade to Mrs. Bancroft, who is a queen in her own especial realm. Yet the hand-shake was a gracious act on the part of the pretty princess, who is always a bit of a Bohemian, and ready ever to extend the right hand of fellowship in the aristocracy of talent. People born in the purple have always a fondness for the theatre, as indeed they should have, since it is one of the choicest refinements of civilization, and it is curious to watch how steadily and surely all the great dramatic talent of the world has drifted to London, where royal patronage may shine upon it. It is a singular fact that on the Fourth of July of this year almost every artist who stands in the very front rank of the drama was in London. We, on this outer edge of the world, have driven them away from us when they came to us. As surely as water finds its level, the taste of the San Francisco public has asserted itself. An artist may go away empty-handed and disappointed. This public wants nothing but negro minstrels and tumblers. It does not like its tumblers in canvas tents, nor its negro minstrels in crude theatres. It wants them both served up with red plush and mise en scene, a Sybaritic touch of fancy, which, strange as it may, yet remains intact among the crumbling ruins of taste and discernment of this once hypercritical city. But it wants negroes and tumblers, and nothing more. They say "The Banker's Daughter" is coming out with the Union Square people.

There is a patrician ring to the very name of the play which handicaps it, and unless "The Banker's Daughter" introduce an olio somewhere or somehow during the play, it will be doomed. Once the coming of a Union Square company would have been something to anticipate with delight, but unless Sarah Jewett can dance a clog dance, or Maud Harrison can give a clever imitation of Pat Rooney, there is really not very much sense in their coming to California. Not that these two ladies are likely to come in any case. Their quick instinct will warn them from the frontier; but the Union Square Company always means intelligence and artistic finish, and some must be coming who stand as proxies for this choice brace of actresses. Actress! The word has actually grown unfamiliar, as unfamiliar as the fascinating magnetic creature herself. One reads of them in hooks nowadays, but who ever hears of one in actual life any more? A gentle sensation used to pervade the entire town when one of those radiant creatures came overland with a big bundle of plays, and boxes full of wonderful toilets. Within three days her beautiful face, transfixed by the California sun, flashed from every shop window. She was the theme of conversation everywhere, whether in the drawing-room or the club. Controversies arose, and mimic war was waged. From the crown of her head to the sole of her foot her points were discussed; the glance of her eye, the curl of her lip, the turn of her head. Fancy going to the theatre now, and discussing the glance of Billy Rice's eye, the curl of his lip, the turn of his head. And yet he is all that is given us to take the place of the fleeting and unreal creature who yet gave us something to talk, and think, and have an opinion about in commonplace, everyday chat. It was quite like a breath from the olden time when I read the other day that Ellen Terry goes to rehearsal in a soft wolver dress of robin's-egg-blue, with a swinging silver chateleine, and missal at her side; and that she has a hammock swung somewhere in the flies in which she lies to study her lines. One can easily conjure up a picture of this lithe and supple aesthete thus arrayed and thus swinging. It is like one of those quaint Abbey illustrations to a Herrick poem. Whatever she may be as an actress, the woman has a downright genius for departing from the commonplace, and such genius is not to be scorned. I can fancy that even in her night-gown—and the night-gown is the mighty lever in the matter of costume—she might be picturesque. Indeed, come to think of it, there are aesthetic night-gowns as well as day-ropes, and it will only be when Ellen Terry shall be lured to the seaside, and induced to hire one of the stock blue flannel costumes bound with white tape, that she will lose her rare perfection in the peculiar. Fancy this London darling, who has re-created Juliet and Ophelia in the artistic eye, prancing up and down the Monterey heath in blue flannel, and it becomes easy to realize how dependent we all are upon our affections for our individuality. And yet how we all prize our individuality. "I wish I were he or she," we say carelessly, a thousand and a thousand times again, and yet, if by a miracle such change were possible, is there not a deep, deep place of self, hidden we know not where, which we would not exchange for the gold of all the Indies, the beauty of all the Circes, the brains of all the academics? And is not this little distinctive piece of self our individuality—that which moves us to our own special range of thoughts, feelings, opinions, desires, habits, principles, even dress? For is it not a curious thing that no matter how vast a throng one may find one's self in, one never sees any two people dressed exactly alike? Even in the much-maligned gentlemen's evening dress are there not points of difference, even as there are subtle points of difference when worn in the uniforms of a public institution where perfect uniform is rigorously enforced?

I saw two sisters in the street-car the other day, and as one followed the other in I thought I had at last found an absolute double. There were two black velvet hats, of similar shape, hristling with hearse-like plumes of similar gravity. There were two sets of thick black mantles in a similar state of gumminess. There were two black velvet dresses, in a similar stage of decay, embellished with waves of guileful lace, similarly freshened up. There were two work-collars, identical, stitch for stitch. There were two pairs of Louis Quinze heels appended to guileful boots of equal tightness. Both pairs of feet were crossed, and cocked up at an equal angle—an angle which no woman wearing new shoes seems to have any difficulty in finding. The difference had to come somewhere, and it broke out in the parasol handles, for the one was tipped with a leering pug's head, and the other with an unassuming twist of wood. I started out fancifully to build up a difference of character upon this—so little does it take to set one a-thinking—but I shall never know whether I read aright, as I shall never know many more and greater things which puzzle. If we were not all constrained by circumstances and coin, or rather the lack of it, we should all manifest in these outward ways far more variously than we do, our different individualities. For it is not every one who can follow his bent, though one man becomes a blacksmith by choice, even as another becomes a stringer of rhymes. What a happy dispensation it is that we all think and wish so differently.

True—to come back to the theatres by a circuitous route—that just now we all seem to be afflicted with a penchant toward the lowest rung of dramatic entertainment; but "behind the clouds there is light still shining"; and perhaps a reaction will bring a resurrection of taste. What if by some strange chance our first families should make "The Banker's Daughter" the fashion, and we should be restored once more to the normal atmosphere of drawing-rooms and dimly lit conservatories, fashionable badinage, dress, beauty, and acting, and this awful specialism should become a dully-remembered nightmare with the apotheosis of "my daughter Claribel" as a fitting curtain, for there really are left some plays and some actors over the way. We have not yet had "Odette," with the graceful, gliding Modjeska. And Octave Feuillet has written a new thing—a charming trifle, barren of plot and rich in wit. That most delightful story, "Far from the Madding Crowd," has been dramatized, and is running rivalry in London to its own unacknowledged twin, "The Squire," and all the upper Bohemia is at the feet again of the triumphant Sims, whose "Romany Rye" is the sensation of the hour, albeit he has made the gentleman a villain, and the gypsy a gentleman. But the English Zola may do as he likes, and an admiring throng will cry: "Whatever is right," and he tosses the foothall of success at his will. This list, taken from a recent London journal, which includes only one-half of the leading theatres, will show what a constellation of talent is in London just now:

At the Royal Italian Opera Madame Adeline Patti, Madame Pauline Lucca, Madame Albani, and Madame Sembrich have successively appeared in their most popular characters. The German Opera Company at Drury Lane added on Tuesday evening Weber's opera of "Euryanthe" to their attractive repertory. At Her Majesty's Theatre Signor Rossi, the Italian tragedian, played King Lear on Monday night in his native language, uttering only one line of the English text, and supported in the other characters by an English company. "Odette" is continued at the Haymarket. The final representations of "Taken from Life" are announced at the Adelphi. At the Lyceum the revival of "Romeo and Juliet" is now on the verge of its hundredth representation. At the Princess's has been produced, with elaborate scenic effects, Mr. G. R. Sims' peculiarly realistic new drama, in five acts, called "Romany Rye." With this week Madame Sarah Bernhard has closed her engagement at the Gaiety, and the season of French plays will now be continued for a fortnight by M. Coquelin and other members of the Comédie Française.

We were talking, a lot of us the other day, as a lot of people always are talking, about what we should do with the money, if fabulous millions should suddenly descend upon us—a not unreasonable proposition, for fabulous millions do so descend in California—and a certain one was good enough to say that it would be his especial delight to contribute as handsomely as a European government to the support of the theatre and grand opera in San Francisco. Unfortunately the speaker was as poor as a rat, with a shining chance that he always will be so, and the outlook for the dramatic art is quite as gloomy as before he spoke. One may observe that these magnificent propositions are usually made by people without ducats.

The son and namesake of the late William Vincent Wallace, the composer, has published a personal card in a New York journal explaining how his father sold the copyright of "Lurline," and how he parted with the copyright of "Maritana"—each literally "for a song." The card ends thus (after praising the French law of copyright): "Had Vincent Wallace been a Frenchman, his widow, in her old age, would not have been left in her need without a helping hand, nor would his son have been under the necessity of making a painful position public."

Monsieur Coquelin, the famous French actor, has made a great hit in London in his impersonation of Don Annihal, the disreputable sot, in "L'Aventurieri." In his acting the nature of the drunken rascal is forcibly indicated. The cunning twinkle of the eyes; the swagger, so ready to vanish at the first symptom of danger; the insolence, which can so soon turn to servility, are all shown, and before Annihal has been upon the stage ten minutes his whole character is as apparent as if a volume had been written to describe it.

The value of an original idea for the stage is illustrated by The Lone Fisherman in the burlesque, "Evangeline." The piece was a failure when first produced. On the second night, however, when the character of the silent and ever-present fisherman was introduced, success resulted, and for five years the play has been in constant and profitable performance. The Lone Fisherman has now been stolen for the burlesque "Sindbad," at the Royalty Theatre, London, where he becomes The Old Man of the Sea.

On Thursday evening Billy Rice, of Haverly's Mastodon Minstrels, had a grand benefit at the California Theatre. The entire minstrel force of the city turned out to support him, and the house was crowded with an enthusiastic audience. The "Broker's Daughter," in which the beneficiary took the leading rôle, with Pete Mack as the "daughter," was exceedingly laughable.

At Haverly's California Theatre the Mastodon Minstrels will continue to play next week. The Hanlon's on Monday evening begin their third week at the Baldwin.

Mr. William Warren, the actor, has just completed the thirty-fifth year of his unbroken connection with the Boston Museum.

The Annual Mechanics' Fair will open on the 15th of August next, at the new building of the Association.

DRAMATIC GOSSIP.

Henry Irving the English actor, has two young sons who are following in his footsteps with bright promise of success. They recently appeared on the amateur stage at a fancy fair, Master Harry playing Joseph Surface, and Master Lawrence Charles Surface, in the screen scene from "The School for Scandal," and according to the London papers, acquitted themselves excellently well.

It is announced in a dispatch from London that Mr. J. H. Haverly has sold his right, title, and interest in his colored minstrel troupe for twelve thousand dollars cash to Mr. Charles Frohman, and that the troupe, which has been in England for some time past, will be brought back to this country and consolidated with Callender's Minstrels, a company organized last year by Messrs. Charles and Gus Frohman.

In 1844 Fanny Kemble, now resting quietly at Buttersville, near Philadelphia, got up a benefit at the St. James Theatre, London, for the distressed peasantry of Scotland and Ireland, which is notable in the annals of the drama. The play was "The Hunchback," Vandenhoff (the elder) playing Master Walter, Fanny Kemble Julia, and Henry Greville (dead) and Sir Henry de Bothe (still living,) two celebrated amateurs, playing Modus and Tinsel. In the front row sat the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Duke of Wellington, and Rachel, who was then making her first professional visit to London.

Wagner has snubbed the Parisians. He has written a letter to the Renaissance Musicale announcing that he will not permit "Lohengrin" to be performed in Paris—first, because "Lohengrin" has gone round the world and can dispense with the honor, and next because it is impossible to represent it in French, and Parisians would not care to hear it in German. "My works," he writes, "are essentially German, and those who care to hear them should hear them in the original." Wagner can not be blamed very much when it is remembered that Victor Hugo has repeatedly expressed contempt for everything German, and that Sarah Bernhard refused to act in Berlin.

It is well that the age of famous and charming actresses should be made known as approximately as politeness will allow. The senior actress of the French stage, the doyenne, is Farguelli, who was born in 1819. Then follow in order Marie Laurent, born in 1826; Mialan-Carvalho, 1827; Favart, 1833; Madeleine Brohan, 1833; Pasca, 1835; Theresa, 1837; Roussel, 1841; Blanche Pierson, 1842; Adeline Patti, 1843; Celine Montaland, 1843; Sarah Bernhardt, 1844 (?); Leonide Leblanc, 1846; Croizette, 1847; Broast, 1848; Céline Chautmont, 1848; Sangalli, 1849; Judic, 1850; Théo, 1852; Jeanne Granier, 1852; Reichemborg, 1854; Baretta, 1856; Samary, 1857.

Abbey has finally concluded his arrangements with the great English actor, and Henry Irving will come to America, under Mr. Abbey's management, for the season of 1882-4, beginning October 29th. The engagement includes Miss Ellen Terry and the whole Lyceum Company. The complete scenery and properties of the theatre will be shipped to America. Irving will appear in six plays, including "Hamlet," "Charles I.," "The Bells," "Louis XI.," and "The Lyons Mail." A New York Tribune reporter is informed by W. W. Tillotson, Abbey's agent, that they had intended to get either Bernhardt, Patti, or Irving, and had succeeded in the latter instance; also, that Edwin Booth will probably play with Irving in the American season of 1884.

About twenty years ago "Our American Cousin" was acted without the permission of the author, and when a suit was brought, the defendants swore that they had obtained the drama by memorizing it during regular performances. The Supreme Court of Massachusetts decided that, in the case of an uncopyrighted play, the owner had no legal defense against such a proceeding. Under this ruling, the most valuable of foreign plays have been at the mercy of thieves, and managers who bought the American privilege could have no protection, except so far as business honor prevailed. Lately "The World" was memorized by two actors, named Byron and Mora, and the play thus obtained was produced at Halleck's Alhambra, Boston. As Tompkins & Hill had bought the right for Boston, they applied for an injunction. This was refused, the old view of the law being upheld; but on an appeal to the General Term, the court has decided that the decision in the "Our American Cousin" case was erroneous. "A ticket of admission," says Judge Devens, "is a license to witness the play, but can not be treated as a license to the spectator to represent the drama if he can by memory recollect it. In whatever mode the copy is obtained, it is the use of it for representation, which operates to deprive the author of his rights."

It seems that the French stage is not in a much better condition than our own. M. Sardou says he will only write five or six more pieces, and then he will retire for good. "I have made up my mind," said he, "not to undertake in my old age a fatiguing struggle with the cosmopolitan public of Paris. The public we have now is not the public we had when I made my debut. Until 1870 the five or six first performances of a piece were given before audiences of Parisians, people of taste and education, who went to hear as well as to see. Nowadays the houses on the nights of premieries are made up of Egyptians, Tunisians, Turks, harharians in fezes and blue jackets with gold buttons, who do not understand French, and are not amused unless they are shown a lot of naked women on the stage. This perversion of the public taste is without any remedy. In ten years there will no longer be any comedy played anywhere but at the Théâtre Français. Everywhere else there will be fine scenery, in the midst of which women will come on and undress themselves, to the great delight of the barbarians. With this prospect before them, dramatic authors will have to give way, and leave the stage to the inventors of tricks and to animals—it will be exhibitions in the place of comedies. Moreover, the coarseness of the public has spoiled all the actors. One no longer has any comedians. There are nothing but bad operette tenorini. I know plenty of dramas and comedies which cannot be played for the want of tragedians and comedians. I prefer not to have my pieces played at all, than to have them ridiculously interpreted. It is because I foresee that it will soon be impossible to form a new troupe that I am getting ready to retire."

The following, from London Truth, is probably the most extraordinary "diamond sentence" ever arranged:

I am now sure lists unlike gallium chloride,
gastaldite,
potassium,
glaucothane,
glycolygnose,
glycodyslin,
tolylycocene,
diphenylbenzene,
dichethylphospine,
diacetylenbenzene,
dimethylanthracene,
diarsenthetamide,
silicoorthoropionate,
dimintraquinone,
tetrachlorophenylbenzene,
trichlorophenylacetamide,
benzidiazoyldiamine,
tetranitrosulphobenzide,
trimethylphenylammonium,
phenylglyceryltrihomylidrin,
tetramethyldiamidobenzophenone,
tetramethyldiamidobenzophenone,
trihomomethylphenylbenzene,
tetraphenylphosphonitridisulphide, diphenylmethylenetetralsulphide,
tetrahomocolliphthaline,
thiocarbonyldithiodithiethy,
chlorodimethylresorcinol,
phenyldicaryldiazine,
tetrahomofluorescein,
thalliumisocyanilide,
trihenzolebenzene,
resorcedaldehyde,
telluriumpotassium,
polyhydrosulphide,
methylenebromide,
vinyltoluidine,
staphisagrine,
sternbergite,
haemoglobin,
polydymite,
omphacite,
obsidian,
guarana,
cannot score.
Then win
do
I

— IN A NICE THREE-STORY FRONT BRICK, painted in black and gold, No. 114 Sutter Street, inside clean and spacious, with abundant room for tables with clean linen, an American bill of fare, printed in English, with colored American waiters in clean white aprons, with boutonniers of flowers, courteous and polite as colored Americans always are, Mr. Charles L. Bird and E. R. Perrin have established a restaurant for ladies and gentlemen, which they have named

"THE QUAKER DAIRY."

Upon the walls of the room are hung engravings of American farm and cattle scenes, instead of vulgar pictures in chromo and color. There is no bar, nor wine, nor lager-beer, nor gin. There are no flies—neither living flies upon tables, nor dead flies in the syrup and butter. The butter is hard and cool. The syrup is maple—not maple from the Sandwich Islands, but the sweet crystallization of the maple grove, as we have tapped, and gathered, and boiled, and waxed it upon snow, upon our father's farm; as we have pulled it with farmers' girls in the old time, and as we like it now on pancakes, fresh-buttered and hot. With the pancakes, milk—not milk from a pump, nor swill milk—but milk from a cow, a farmer's grassed-fed cow; not blue, but white; not made with chalk, but real, actual milk. And for this we paid twenty cents. It is as cheap as lager and hood-pudding and Limburger cheese, and ever so much healthier, and nicer. All around us sat ladies and gentlemen—several lady artists from the studios, several nice-looking girls from the shops, clerks, merchants, business and professional men—and everything was plain, and sweet, and cheap, and clean. We looked over the hill fare, and we said to ourselves we will again visit

NO. 114 SUTTER STREET.

Mush with pure milk, all sorts of griddle-cakes, pancakes, and flap-jacks; hot cakes, buckwheat cakes, corn, flannel, and batter. We took flannel. Toast, "milk," "buttered," and "dry"; bread, "hot corn," "brown," "milk," "French," and "Graham." Eggs in any form, and fresh. Fried pork and fish-halls. Strawberries and peaches, and all fruits in season with "cream." Melons in their season. Tea, coffee, and chocolate. Fricassee chicken on Sundays, with cream gravy and strawberry short-cake. We have always pitied the man or woman who was compelled to a restaurant life; for our idea of the cheap restaurant was associated with all sorts of incongruous things. The old adage of a peck of dirt as every one's inheritance obtruded itself at every spoonful, and we were afraid that the one who spent his life in thus grubbing was being imposed upon. Our views of restaurant life were modified by the good society, good attendance, and good fare of the Quaker Dairy, and we resolved to do our duty to San Francisco people by recommending them to visit and patronize THE QUAKER DAIRY AT NO. 114 SUTTER STREET.

Alice Oates is to be married again this fall. The man doesn't know anything about it, but when it's Alice's time to have another husband, somebody has to come.

— HEADQUARTERS FOR ELECTRIC BELTS, and appliances for the cure of nervous, painful, and debilitating diseases. Pamphlets, with full particulars, free. Address PULVERMACHER GALVANIC COMPANY, 513 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal.

Next to cigar-makers, according to the London Medical Times and Gazette, printers are more numerous in New York lunatic asylums than men of any other trade.

— MORSE HAS THE FINEST GALLERY IN THE world, 826 Market Street, (Phelan Block).

CCXXXIX.—Bill of Fare for Six Persons.

Sunday, July 30th.
Green Pea Soup.
Cantaloupe.
Chicken Fillets, larded and breaded.
Lyonnaise Potatoes. Boiled Smoked Tongue.
Egg Plant. Lima Beans.
Roast Pork.
Apple Sauce. Lettuce.
Jelly Omelet, Lady Fingers, Peaches, Apples, Grapes, Gages, Apricots, Pears, Figs, Plums, Nectarines.
GREEN PEA SOUP.—Cover a quart of green peas with hot water, and boil with an onion until they will mash easily. (The time will depend upon the age of the peas, but will be from twenty to thirty minutes.) Mash, and add a pint of stock or water. Cook together two tablespoonsful of butter and one of flour until smooth, but not brown. Add to the peas, and then add a cupful of cream and one of milk.
Season with salt and pepper, and let it boil up over. Strain, and serve. A cupful of whipped cream at the last moment is an improvement.
CHICKEN FILLETS.—Lard the fillets, having four fine strips of pork for each, and season with salt and pepper.
Dip in beaten egg and in fine bread crumbs. Fry ten minutes in boiling fat. Serve on a hot dish with a spoonful of Tartare sauce on each. (Tartare sauce, see No.
CLXXXVIII.)

A WHOLESOME INFLUENCE.

The proprietors of the New England Baking Powder have not only supplied the demand for a pure powder, but have done more to enlighten consumers as to the baking powder business than all the other manufacturers put together. Their belief that Californians are willing to pay for an unadulterated, home-made article, is being strengthened daily by orders from all portions of the coast. Sensible, intelligent people are not deceived by articles in favor of certain baking powders, purporting to be in the interest of science. They question bare statements of purity, even if these are pretended to be fortified by endorsements from Congress, legislatures, boards of health, and fictitious government officials. Claims of this kind only show weakness. Such bodies have enough to do without going out of their way to advertise baking powders. What the public demands is a statement from manufacturers of all the ingredients their powder contains, and proof of this by full reports of reputable chemists. The proprietors of the New England Baking Powder are the first to meet this demand. They state openly that nothing is used but the highest grades of refined cream tartar and bi-carbonate of soda, and give undisputed testimony to prove all they claim.

A youth of Grand Rapids married the girl who was betrothed to his father. The pair returned to the bridegroom's parent for forgiveness, and got it, but it was not particularly hearty.

"OUR HOMES IN DANGER"

Is the subject of an address to be given by Mrs. Emily P. Stevens, in Children's Hall, corner of Pacific and Sansome streets, on Sunday evening, July 30. The reputation of Mrs. Stevens as an earnest worker in the temperance cause is as wide as the boundaries of this coast, and her extensive knowledge of the homes of California fully qualifies her to speak intelligently from her standpoint as to the danger which menaces the American home.

At Alton, Illinois, a preacher asked all Sunday-school children to stand up who intended to visit the wicked, soul-destroying circus. All but a lame girl stood up.—Independent.

—THE CELEBRATED MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE Club is about to bid farewell to California, departing at an early date for the East. Before leaving, the members have resolved to give a final series of concerts at Platt's Hall. The first will take place on next Monday evening, the 31st inst., the second and third occurring successively on the evenings of August third and fourth. They will be assisted by the talented singer, Miss Cora R. Miller. As a special feature of these concerts there will be performed three entire quartettes by Beethoven, consisting of two of the beautiful Rassoumofsky set, and the exquisite Harp quartette. This club has met with unquestioned success both on this coast and in Australia, and without doubt all the music lovers in the city will avail themselves of this last opportunity to listen to its faultless performances.

An Arkansas bridegroom caught the bride in his arms, at the conclusion of the ceremony, and dislocated two of her ribs with a violent hug.

—RUSSIA SALVE IS THE UNIVERSAL REMEDY for burns, scalds, cuts, bruises, and flesh wounds.

The three graces—at breakfast, dinner, and supper.—Philadelphia Bulletin.

—IT IS WONDERFUL THAT A SUTLE Miasmatic poison should produce that peculiar condition of the system which prevails when alternate chills and burning heat freeze and scorch the body at regular intervals, and it is no less wonderful that medical skill has been able to reach and expel this poison from the system, as Ayer's Ague Cure always does.

Pericles used to say it was best for women to be seen and not heard. He evidently preferred the halloo to the circus.—Boston Post.

—MR. A. J. KELLEHER DESIRES TO INFORM HIS pupils that he will resume tuition on July 10th. Apply at Gray's music store, 117 Post, or at his residence, 2324 Clay Street.

The American men-of-war at Alexandria have done nobly. Every one of them kept out of range with the utmost success.—Chicago Tribune.

—LADY READERS OF THE ARGONAUT WILL remember that the place to buy colognes, perfumery, toilet soaps, brushes, sponges, cosmetics, etc., is at the elegant and well-stocked store of James G. Steele & Co., Chemists and Apothecaries, 635 Market Street, Palace Hotel, San Francisco.

—Dr. E. O. COCHRANE, DENTIST, 850 MARKET cor. Stockton (over drug store.) Office hours, 9 to 5.

—Go to Bradley & Rulofson's, 429 Montgomery.

JNO. LEVY & CO.MANUFACTURING JEWELERS,*Importers of DIAMONDS and other PRECIOUS STONES, WATCHES, CLOCKS, and SILVERWARE,118 SUTTER STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.(Of the late Firm of BRAVERMAN & LEVY.)*HOUSEKEEPERS!

DO NOT SACRIFICE YOUR GOODS AT AUCTION, but STORE THEM with H. WINDEL & CO., NO. 310 STOCKTON STREET. Furniture, Pianos, Household Goods, Paintings, Trunks, etc., well taken care of. We have three large, airy, brick buildings, and no rent to pay, and can store goods very moderate. Money advanced on goods at one per cent. per month. We guarantee against damage and moths, and can give references dating back 20 years.

Specimen of Our Artist's Humor.(The Music Lesson.)

HUNDREDS OF DELIGHTED ONE'S see for the first time in their lives the JAPANESE ARTIST and EMBROIDERERS at work in their native costume at ICHI BAN, 22 and 24 Geary Street.

The Argonaut is printed with Shattuck & Fletcher's Ink.

PLATT'S HALL.FAREWELL TO CALIFORNIA!

Monday Evening, July 31st, and Thursday and Friday Evenings, Aug. 3d and 4th.

.....THE.....

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTECLUB OF BOSTON,

Assisted by

MISS CORA R. MILLER.

Among the special attractions to be presented at these Concerts will be three entire quartettes by Beethoven, including two of the celebrated Rassoumofsky Set, and the famous Harp Quartette.

AdmissionOne Dollar

No extra charge for Reserved Seats. Boxes $5 and $7. Box-sheet open at Gray's Music Store.

JENNIE E. MacGOWAN,Dress and Cloak Maker.

428 Sutter Street.

Original designs, perfect work, and reasonable prices.

PERRIN'S QUAKER DAIRY114 SUTTER STREET,

Between Kearny & Montgomery, San Francisco
CHAS. L. BIRD and E. R. PERRIN, Props.

J. R. COWEN.

J. W. PORTER.

COWEN & PORTER,FUNERAL DIRECTORS,*118 Geary Street, San Francisco.*OPPOSITE STARR-KING CHURCH.*PAYOT, UPHAM & CO*STATIONERS, BOOKSELLERS,*Commercial Printers,*and Blank Book Manufacturers*204 Sansome Street, near Pine.*CHARLES R. ALLEN

Wholesale and Retail in COAL Order for House or Office by Dealer in Telephone 308.

Agent Pittsburg Coal Mining Company.

118 and 120 Beale Street, S. F.

"DRESS REFORM" CORSET.
Specialty for Stout Figures, by mail, $3.00. Send waist, hip, and bust measure. Also, Shoulder Braces, Union Under Flannels, Ladies' and Children's Comfort Waists, Bustles, Hose Supporters, etc.
Send for Circular. The only Depot for these Goods.

Mrs. M. H. OBER & CO.
Boston
Dress Reform,
326
Sutter St.,
SAN FRANCISCO.

An Elegant Corset to Order for $4.PEBBLE SPECTACLES!*MULLER'S OPTICAL DEPOT*135 Montgomery St., nr. Bush,

Opposite Occidental Hotel.

Specialty Thirty-two Years.COMPOUND ASTIGMATIC LENSES*Mounted to Order. Two Hours Notice.

The most complicated cases of defective vision thoroughly diagnosed, free of charge.

OUR BEST REWARD.

WINSTON, FORSYTHE Co., N. C., March 15, 1880.
GENTS—I desire to express to you my thanks for your wonderful Hop Bitters. I was troubled with dyspepsia for five years previous to commencing the use of your Hop Bitters some six months ago. My cure has been wonderful. I am pastor of the First Methodist Church of this place, and my whole congregation can testify to the great virtue of your bitters. Very respectfully, Rev. H. FERRIS.

Bay City, Mich., Feb. 3, 1880.
Hop Bitters Co.—I think my duty to send you a recommendation for the benefit of any person wishing to know whether Hop Bitters are good or not. I know they are good for general debility and indigestion, strengthen the nervous system and make new life. I recommend my patients to use them.

DR. A. "BART" TROTTER of Chronic Diseases.
Send for Circulars of Testimonials, to HOP BITTERS MANUFACTURING CO.
Rochester, N. Y., Toronto, Ont., or London, Eng.

DO NOT SACRIFICE YOUR FURNITURE, PIANOS, and HOUSEHOLD GOODS, at auction sales, while you are boarding or out of the city, but

STORE THEM,

As well as your Trunks and Paintings, with

J. H. MOTT & CO.,647 Market St.,

Nucleus Block, Second Floor.
Large, airy brick building, with elevator. MONEY LOANED on valuable goods. Terms moderate.

WEST'S NEW ELECTRIC BELT.—C. N. West's Electro-Medical Belts always have excelled all other electrical appliances. They have taken the premiums at all State Fairs. This new Belt excels every other that has been invented. Cures

all diseases without medicine. Price from $5.00 to $20.00. Warranted ten years. Patronized by the representative men and leading families of this and other States. Address or call on C. N. WEST, 652 Market Street, San Francisco.

WILLIAMS, DIMOND & CO.SHIPPING AND*COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Union Building, Junction Market and Pine Streets, San Francisco.

AGENTS FOR PACIFIC MAIL S. S.

Co.; Pacific Steam Navigation Co.; The Cunard Royal Mail S. S. Co.; The Hawaiian Line; The China Traders' Insurance Co., Limited; The Marine Insurance Co. of London; The Baldwin Locomotive Works; The Glasgow Iron Co.; Nich. Ashton & Son's Salt

COMPOUND OXYGEN

NEW TREATMENT BY INHALATION, for Consumption, Asthma, Bronchitis, Dyspepsia, Catarrh, Headache, Debility, Rheumatism, Neuritis, and all Chronic and Nervous Disorders. Prepared by DR. STARKEY & PALEN, Philadelphia, Pa. Package contains all the apparatus and is easily sent by express, ready for USE AT HOME. H. E. MATHEWS, Forwarding Agent, 606 Montgomery street, San Francisco, Cal. Send for Free Pamphlet.

TABER, HARKER & Co.,IMPORTERS AND WHOLESALE

GROCERS, 108 and 110 California St., San Francisco

RUPTURE Cured. Greatest Invention of the age. PIERCE & SON 704 Sac St., San Fran. Cal.

DODGE BROS.

STATIONERS,
Formerly 116 POST ST.,
REMOVED TO

No. 32 GEARY ST

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

At a dinner-party Archbishop Whately called out suddenly to the host: "Mr. Brown!" There was silence. "Mr. Brown, what is the proper female companion of this John Dory?" After the usual number of guesses an answer came, "Anne Chovy."

Miss Hope-Edwardes, in her little book, "Eau-de-Nil," gives in one little anecdote a curious side glimpse into Egyptian character. When she once complained to a certain government official, as to a superior person, "Everybody seems to want back-sheesh," the great man replied, gravely and unhesitatingly: "Certainly—I also."

"I remember," says Labouchere in Truth, "being on intimate terms with a sculptor in Italy. 'I can not understand,' some one said to him, 'how it is that the legs of your nymphs and Venuses are so abnormally thin.' 'I have,' he replied, 'a wife, as you know. She is jealous, and she regards her own legs as perfection. Were I to give my female statues proper legs, my domestic bliss would cease.'"

Bishop Horne had his dignity considerably taken down when he arrived to take possession of the episcopal palace at Norwich in 1791. Being amazed at the number of spectators on the occasion, he turned round upon the steps and exclaimed: "Bless us, bless us! what a concourse of people." "Oh, my lord," said a bystander, "this is a mere nothing to the crowd last Friday to see a man hanged."

It is related of Siebenkees, an eminent German scholar, that having finished reading one of his beautiful imaginings to his wife, who appeared to be listening with bated breath and eyelids cast down, he closed the book with inward satisfaction at the completion of his labors, only to hear the sharer of his joys exclaim: "My dear, pray don't put on your left stocking to-morrow—there is a hole in it."

The butler of a certain Scottish laird, who had been in the family a number of years, at last resigned his situation because his lordship's wife was always scolding him. "Oh!" exclaimed his master, "if that be all, ye've very little to complain of." "Perhaps so," replied the butler, "but I've decided in my own mind to put up with it no longer." "Go, then," said his lordship, "and be thankful for the rest of your life that ye're not married to her."

"It is always less embarrassing to make your toilet in the inner compartment," says the Detroit Free Press French correspondent, writing about the bathing-machines at a watering-place. "I was one day engaged in towel science when the door opened, and a couple of laughing young ladies, in brilliant stripes, came tripping up the steps. Happily the door of the inner compartment was nearly closed, and I kicked it shut with a suddenness that I expected would surmise the charming couple. Such was not the case, however. In the sweetest of English voices one said: 'Never mind, Lizzie, it's Belle and I, you know.' 'That's all right,' I said, from within. 'But if you and Belle will call about ten minutes later, I'll be happy to meet you. I'm not at home just now.' They did not linger."

Captain Farrow, of Isleboro, Maine, tells a good story at his own expense. The captain was trading in a small vessel along the coast, and at Tampa Bay he purchased twenty dozen chickens, paying four dollars a dozen for them. They were of all ages and sizes, some being ready for the pot and others scarcely done with their shells. At Key West a hotel-keeper came alongside, and asked the price of the chickens. The captain answered: "If you pick them out I shall charge you six dollars a dozen; but if you will let me pick them out you can have them for three dollars a dozen." "All right," said the hotel man, "you pick them out." The captain selected several dozens of the fledglings, expecting every moment to hear the purchaser cry "enough." But still he said, "go on." The captain saw the point at last; but he stuck to his bargain, and "selected" the entire lot, at a net loss to himself of twenty dollars.

During Hepworth Dixon's editorship of the Athenaeum, the independent outspokenness of its reviews of new books was the dominant feature of the periodical. Whether such hard-hitting was always discreet on the part of the assailant, or deserved by the victim, may be doubted. Now, although Dixon earned no end of approbrium in consequence of the severity of the strictures passed by his staff on books committed to their notice, be it said to his credit that these seldom existed a body of men who were allowed more of their own way. They wrote practically untrammelled. The scathing notice of Alexander Smith's poems which appeared in the Athenaeum was the work of two brother bards, both of whom, by the way, are living. When Mr. Gerald Massey joined the staff, at Dixon's request, his "instructions" were sent by the editor with the first batch of books he was commissioned to review. The inspiration ran as follows: "Be just; be generous; but if you do meet with a deadly ass, sling him up."

"I give the following anecdote," says the editor of the London Figaro, "on the authority of an eminent judge. Time was when jurymen were by law obliged to receive the Holy Communion before they were impanelled to try a criminal on capital charges. A well known 'blood' of the day, whose acquaintance with the ceremonies of the church was of the limited kind, happened to be chosen as a jurymen in a trial for murder. The 'blood' in question knew that he had to receive the Holy Communion, but had not the remotest notion how he was to receive it. On applying to a friend for advice, he was told that all he had to do was to go to church and do as he saw others doing about him. He went to church. Suddenly a lady, who was sitting next to him, rose, left her pew, and knelt at the altar steps. The gentleman in question followed her, and did likewise. The astonished clergyman was perhaps so astonished that he went on with the service. In due course the lady returned to her pew, and so did her companion, who was doubtless not a whit the wiser when he was informed that he was the only man who had ever been 'churched.'"

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

A Seaside Sigh.

O you blue bathers,
Timorous twinelets,
Coying with Neptune,
Give me a grip of
Your dimple-dot knuckles,
Lo, I will lead you
Into deep water,
Over your banglets,
Out where the currents
Merge and entangle,
Out where old Ocean
Heaves his broad bosom,
Bare to the south wind,
Out where the sea-spray
Out-dazzles the sunlight,
Out where no waiter,
Waiter Teutonic,
Fly-specked promiscuous
As to his bald-spot,
Pauper of fancy,
Solid for business,
Waits with his checklet,
Dreadfully intent,
"Vier Limonaden,
Halfe-a-dollar!" —H. C. Bunner.

Poet and Milkmaid.

The poet says a lovelier star
Than you ne'er bloomed in summer heavens;
But he is wrong—your pedals are Elevens.
The poet meets you in the wood,
And sees you skip in manner youthful,
And that inspires him; but he should Be truthful.
He shouldn't call you Juno in
The breezy meadow, daisy-speckled;
Your neck's not swan-like, and your chin
Is freckled.
You carol like no feathered bard
When April blooms the garden glamour;
You screech, and with no great regard
For grammar.
You always wear a gingham hood,
And clothes whose beauty Worth might question;
You're large and healthy, with a good Digestion.
You lift great bags of meal, and far
You carry them, in manner airy;
And yet rapt poets say you are
A fairy.
Oh, when about your dainty lips
In high-flown figures sings the poet,
The while he sits and idly sips
His Meot.
Forth, then, by law he should be led,
In swallow-tail and hat of silk made,
And be compelled yourself to wed,
Oh, milkmaid.
And live with you in vine-clad cot,
With dandelions round it burning,
And spend his days, though cold or hot,
At churning.
'Twould make him weep to see you run
The bridle-cow in manner frantic;
In army shoon he'd find you un-
Romantic,
And quite forget the manner grand
In which he poetized your carriage;
Likewise regret his verses and
His marriage.

The milkmaid may be grace'ul, tall,
A primrose with large feet untainted;
She may be fawn-like, sweet, and all
She's painted.
But for my part I'd rather win
A so-called mindless, doll-faced, pretty
And languid flower, nurtured in
The city. —Puck.

The Masher.

"What is that, mother?"
"A masher, dear;
You will always find it standing here,
Posed on the corner of the street,
Proudly displaying its tiny feet,
Twirling its little ten-cent cane
And stupefying its tender brain
With the smoke of a paper cigarette,
Don't touch it, dear, it was raised a pet."
"Will it bite, mother?"
"Well, I should shout;
It will bite a free-lunch for all that's out."
—Unknown Liar.

Qui?

Who was the first in this broad land
To grip me firmly by the hand,
And introduce me to her band?
My Boarding Mam!
Who pierced me with her cruel eyes?
Who looked upon with least surprise
When in my soup I captured flies?
My Boarding Mam!
Who had a most obliging daughter,
Who gave to me diluted butter,
Which she called "tea," had'n't oughter?
My Boarding Mam!
Who made the weakest coffee seen?
Who bought the strongest "oilymargarine?"
Who made much soup from chicken leen?
My Boarding Mam!
Who filled me to the brim with hash?
Who each week relieved me of my cash?
Who liked her beer and "sour mash?"
My Boarding Mam!
Who fed me on most antique lamb,
And salted leather, which she called ham?
Who gave me lard to use as jam?
My Boarding Mam!
—The Judge.

Arabian Daze.

I am dying, Egypt, dying; or at least I ought to be;
I wish your biggest pyramid would settle down on me.
I'm all broke up—indeed I am. This business doesn't pay;
And now I'm off—I'm going west. Yours,
—Indianapolis Journal.

RUHL BROTHERS

AGENTS FOR THE PACIFIC COAST

522 Montgomery Street,
SAN FRANCISCO.

ASSESSMENTS AND DIVIDENDS.

OPHIR SILVER MINING COMPANY

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 21st day of July, 1882, an assessment (No. 42) of One Dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 16, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 24th day of August, 1882, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on Thursday, the 14th day of September, 1882, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with the costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

C. L. MCCOY, Secretary.

Office—Room 16, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

BEST AND BELCHER SILVER

Mining Company—Location of works, Virginia City, Storey County, Nevada. Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 20th day of July, 1882, an assessment (No. 24) of Fifty (50) Cents per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately, in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 29, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 24th day of August, 1882, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on Monday, the 18th day of September, 1882, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

WILLIAM WILLIS, Secretary.
Office—Room 29 Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

CHOLLAR MINING COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 17th day of July, 1882, an assessment (No. 9) of Twenty-five Cents per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately, in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 79, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the twenty-second day of August, 1882, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on Tuesday, the 12th day of September, 1882, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

W. E. DEAN, Secretary.
Office—Room 79 Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal.

DIVIDEND NOTICE—OFFICE OF

the Eureka Consolidated Mining Company, Nevada Block, Room 37.—San Francisco, July 15, 1882.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named Company, held this day, a Dividend (No. 75) of 25 Cents per share was declared on the capital stock of the company, payable on Thursday, the 27th day of July, 1882. Transfer books close with the 28th instant.

P. JACOBUS, Sec'y pro tem.

J. C. MERRILL & CO.,

Shipping and Commission Merchants

204 and 206 California Street,

SAN FRANCISCO.

The Regular Dispatch line of Packets to Honolulu, H. I.

ALLEN, MCGARY & CO.,

IMPORTERS AND WHOLESALE

Liquor Dealers, 322-324 FRONT STREET

SAN FRANCISCO.

LEGAL NOTICES.

SHERIFF'S SALE.

ELISABETH VON HASSEL,
Plaintiff,
vs.
HENRY VON HASSEL,
FREDERICK M. HUSTED,
HENRY N. CLEMENT,
Defendants.

Superior Court.
Department No. 7.
No. 4767.
Order of Sale and Decree of Distribution.

UNDER AND BY VIRTUE OF AN

Order of Sale and Decree of Distribution issued out of the Superior Court, Department No. 7, of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on the 1st day of July, A. D. 1882, in the above-entitled action, wherein Elisabeth Von Hassel, the above-named plaintiff, obtained a Judgment and Decree of Distribution against Henry Von Hassel, Frederick M. Husted, Henry N. Clement, defendants, on the 28th day of April, A. D. 1882, which said Judgment and Decree was, on the 29th day of April, A. D. 1882, recorded in Judgment Book One of said Court, at page 645, I am commanded to sell all that certain lot, piece, or parcel of land, situate, lying, and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the northerly line of Dorland Street, distant one hundred and ninety (190) feet westerly from the westerly line of Church Street; thence westerly along Dorland Street twenty-four (24) feet; thence northerly one hundred and twenty-four (124) feet, more or less, to a point one hundred (100) feet southerly from the southerly line of Corbett Street, and also being distant twenty-five (25) feet westerly from the north-westerly corner of Williams' fence; thence easterly twenty-five (25) feet to said corner, and thence westerly along Williams' westerly line one hundred and twenty-four (124) feet, more or less, to the place of beginning; being part of Mission Block No. 94.

Public notice is hereby given that on Monday, the 14th day of August, A. D. 1882, at 12 o'clock, noon, of that day, in front of the Old City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, I will, in obedience to said order of sale and decree of distribution, sell the above-described property, or so much thereof as may be necessary to raise sufficient to satisfy said judgment, with interest, and costs, etc., to the highest and best bidder, for lawful money of the United States.

San Francisco, July 22, 1882.

JOHN SEDGWICK, Sheriff.
WM. MATHEWS, Attorney for Plaintiff.
July 22, 29, August 5 and 12.

SHERIFF'S SALE.

ANTHONY WADDY,
Plaintiff,
vs.
JAMES JONES,
Defendant.

Superior Court.
No. 5571.
Department No. 3.
Execution for Deficiency
after Sale.

UNDER AND BY VIRTUE OF AN

Execution for Deficiency after Foreclosure Sale, issued out of the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, duly attested on the twenty-third day of May, A. D. 1882, in the above-entitled action, wherein Anthony Waddy, the above-named plaintiff, obtained a judgment against James Jones, defendant, on the sixth day of March, A. D. 1882, for the sum of 1,173 dollars, U. S. gold coin, with interest thereon so much thereof as may be necessary to raise sufficient to satisfy said judgment, with interest, and costs, etc., to the highest and best bidder, for lawful money of the United States. Pursuant to said judgment and decree I have levied upon all the right, title, and interest which the said defendant, James Jones, has on the sixteenth day of May, 1882, the day on which said judgment was docketed, or which he may have subsequently acquired in and to the hereinafter-described property, situate, lying, and being in the city and county of San Francisco, State of California, standing of record in the office of the County Recorder of said city and county in the name of James Jones, and bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the southerly line of Pleasant (formerly Riley) Street, distant twenty-two feet and nine inches easterly from the southeasterly corner of Jones and Pleasant Streets, and running thence easterly upon the southerly line of Pleasant Street, twenty-two feet and nine inches; thence southerly, at right angles, to Pleasant Street, sixty feet; thence westerly, and parallel with Pleasant Street, twenty-two feet nine inches; thence northerly sixty feet to place of beginning; being portion of fifty-vara lot No. 825, as shown on the official map of San Francisco.

Public notice is hereby given that on MONDAY, THE SEVENTH DAY OF AUGUST, A. D. 1882, at twelve o'clock, noon, of that day, in front of the Old City Hall, in the city and county of San Francisco, I will sell all the right, title, and interest which the said defendant, James Jones, had on the sixteenth day of May, 1882, the day on which said judgment was docketed, as aforesaid, or which he may have subsequently acquired in and to the above-described property, to the highest and best bidder for gold coin of the United States.

San Francisco, July 15, 1882.

JOHN SEDGWICK, Sheriff.
B. B. NEWMAN, Attorney for Plaintiff.
July 15, 22, 29, and August 5.

AYER'S AGUE CURE,

FOR THE SPEEDY RELIEF OF

Fever and Ague, Intermittent Fever, Chill Fever, Remittent Fever, Dumb Ague, Periodic or Bilious Fever, &c., and indeed all the affections which arise from malarious, marsh, or miasmatic poisons.

Has been widely used during the last twenty-five years, in the treatment of these distressing diseases, and with such unvarying success that it has gained the reputation of being infallible. The shakes, or chills, once broken by it, do not return, until the disease is contracted again. This has made it an accepted remedy, and the Chills and Fever of the West, and Ayer's Ague Cure eradicates the noxious poison from the system, and leaves the patient as well as before the attack. It thoroughly expels the disease, so that no Liver Complaints, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Dysentery, or Debility follow the cure. Indeed, where Disorders of the Liver and Bowels have occurred from Miasmatic Poison, it removes the cause of them, and they disappear. Not only is it an effectual cure, but, if taken occasionally by patients exposed to malaria, it will expel the poison and protect them from attack. Travelers and temporary residents in Fever and Ague localities are thus enabled to avoid the disease. The General Debility which is so apt to ensue from continued exposure to Malaria and Miasm, has no speedier remedy.

For Liver Complaints, it is an excellent remedy.

PREPARED BY

DR. J. C. AYER & CO., Lowell, Mass.,

PRACTICAL AND ANALYTICAL CHEMISTS.

Sold by all Druggists and Dealers in Medicines.

$5 TO $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. Address STINSON & Co., Portland, Me.

R. H. McDonald,
President,
San Francisco,
Cal.

PACIFIC BANK
Established
1863.
Capital Stock
$1,000,000.00
Surplus 460,800.70

San Francisco, Cal., July 1, 1892.

We take pleasure in presenting for your consideration the following Thirty-eight Semi-Annual Statement of the condition of this Bank:

RESOURCES.
Bank Premises.....	$150,000 00
Other Real Estate.....	12,825 35
United States Bonds.....	629,507 60
Land Association Stock.....	15,121 55
Loans and Discounts.....	1,785,000 20
Due from Banks.....	537,279 09
Money on hand.....	632,365 34
	$3,752,099 09
LIABILITIES.
Capital paid up.....	$1,600,000 00
Surplus.....	460,800 70
Due Depositors.....	1,855,472 80
Due Banks.....	337,494 09
Dividends unpaid.....	134 54
	$3,752,099 09

This Bank has special facilities for doing all kinds of banking business.

NEW ENGLAND BAKING POWDER

NO Alum
Flour
Starch
Ammonia
Phosphates
Tartaric Acid

Cream Tartar and Bi-Carb. Soda

NOTHING ELSE

Newton Bros. & Co.

SAN FRANCISCO

ROEDERER CHAMPAGNE.

NOTICE—THE TRADE AND THE
Public are informed that we receive the Genuine
LOUIS ROEDERER CARTE BLANCHE CHAM-
PAGNE direct from Mr. Louis Roederer, Reims, over his signature and Consular invoice. Each case is marked upon the side, "Macondray & Co., San Francisco," and each bottle bears the label, "Macondray & Co., Sole Agents for
the Pacific Coast."

MACONDRA & CO.
Sole Agents for the Pacific Coast.

S. P. COLLINS & CO.

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL
dealers in Old London Dock Brandy, Port Wine,
Sherry, and all the choicest brands Champagne, Apple
Jack, Pisco, Arrack, Cordials, Liquors, etc. 329 MONT-GOMERY, and 511 CALIFORNIA STREETS, S. F.

LOUIS BRAVERMAN & CO.

(Successors to BRAVERMAN & LEVY.)

Manufacturers of FINE JEWELRY, and Importers of WATCHES,
DIAMONDS, and other PRECIOUS STONES, STERLING SILVER-
WARE, and FRENCH CLOCKS.

Keep the best assortment and sell at LOWER PRICES than any house in this city.

119 MONTGOMERY STREET.

Apollinaris

"THE QUEEN OF TABLE WATERS."

British Medical Journal.

"Pure, Wholesome, Pleasant, and Effervescent."

Prof. T. L. Brunton, M.D., F.R.S., London, Eng.

ANNUAL SALE, 10 MILLIONS.

Of all Grocers, Druggists, and Mineral Water Dealers.

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

FOR SALE BY RUHL BROTHERS,

522 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal.

HENRY F. MILLER

PIANOS, OF BOSTON,

Are pronounced the BEST by the leading artists of the present time, and are used by them in public and private.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES mailed to any address.

WOODWORTH, SCHELL & CO.,

Sole Agents, 105 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

FIREMAN'S FUND

INSURANCE COMPANY

OF CALIFORNIA.

CAPITAL, $750,000
ASSETS, DECEMBER 31, 1881, $1,240,000

D. J. STAPLES, President.
ALPHEUS BULL, Vice-President.

WILLIAM J. DUTTON, Secretary.
E. W. CARPENTER, Asst. Secretary.

AGENTS IN ALL PRINCIPAL LOCALITIES.

E. DETRICK & CO.

Importers, Manufacturers, and Dealers in BAGS AND BURLAPS, all kinds, BAG-TWINES, HYDRAULIC HOSE. Sole Agents for MOUNT
VERNON CO.'S DUCK, all widths, Russell Man'g Co.'s COTTON BELT-
ING, Russell Man'g Co.'s SEAMLESS LINEN HOSE. Tower's Celebrated
OILED CLOTHING.

TENTS, HAMMOCKS, CAMP COTS, CHAIRS,
STOOLS, AND CAMPERS' OUTFITS.

Tents let by the Week or Month. AMERICAN FLAGS, BUNTING.

5, 7 AND 9 CALIFORNIA, AND 108, 110 AND 112 MARKET STS.

C. P. SHEFFIELD. N. W. SPAULDING. J. PATTERSON

Importers of All Kinds of Paper.

JOHN TAYLOR & CO.

118 and 120 Market Street, and 15 and 17 California Street.
ASSAYERS' MATERIALS, MINE
Mill Supplies; also Druggists Glassware

PRICE REDUCED

FOR

SEATTLE COAL

ALL DEALERS KEEP IT.

MAIN OFFICE:

210 BATTERY STREET,
San Francisco.

DEPOTS:

Beale Street Wharf, San Francisco.
Foster's Wharf - Oakland.

NATURAL CHAMPAGNE
DRY AND EXTRA DRY

When ordering Wine, don't call for "California Champagne," merely, but state the brand, "EXTRA DRY," EXTRA DRY, or the brand's name. We are the only producers of NATURAL SPARKLING WINES on this Coast.

Arpad Haraszthy & Co.
530 WASHINGTON ST. S.F. CAL.

N. B.—Examine the cork.

"Nasby in Exile"

The Best
Selling Book
Ever Published

Agents Wanted.
First Come
First Served

This Book will be the most rapid selling of any that has been published for years. It will be an elegant volume of 672 large pages, profusely illustrated, printed upon the finest paper, bound in an elegant and attractive style, being at once a humorous and truthful description of the countries of Europe, and making the most entertaining book of the kind ever printed. No writer is better known than its author,
Mr. D. R. LOCKE, whose name is known to PETROLEUM
V. NASBY, is known wherever the English language is spoken. Send for circulars.

SAMUEL CARSON,
Agent for the Locke Publishing Company,
120 SUTTER STREET,
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

THE
AMERICAN SUGAR REFINERY
SAN FRANCISCO.

MANUFACTURERS OF ALL
Classes of Refined Sugars, including Loaf Sugar
for export.

C. ADOLPHE LOW, President.
Office—208 California Street.

IRA P. RANKIN. A. F. BRAYTON

PACIFIC IRON WORKS

RANKIN, BRAYTON & CO.,
127 to 132 First Street,
San Francisco.

Mining Machinery of all kinds, Sugar Mills, Engines—
both Marine and Stationary, Boilers, etc., etc.

J. M. LITCHFIELD & CO.

MERCHANT TAILORS,
And Dealers in Gent's Furnishing Goods,
415 MONTGOMERY STREET,
Bet. California and Sacramento San Francisco

ART-PAINTED, PLAIN AND GLAZED

TILES

For Decorations.

W. W. MONTAGUE & CO.
110 to 118 Battery Street.

DRINK FALK'S MILWAUKEE BEER.

The Argonaut.

VOL. XI. NO. 6.

SAN FRANCISCO, AUGUST 5, 1882.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

BRET HARTE'S NEW STORY.

"Flip"—A California Romance.

PART IV.—CHAPTER VI.

The wind charged down upon them, slamming the door at their backs, extinguishing the broad shaft of light that had momentarily shot out into the darkness, and swept them a dozen yards away. Gaining the lee of a madroño tree Lance opened his blanketed arms, enfolded the girl, and felt her for one brief moment tremble and nestle in his bosom like some frightened animal.

"Well," he said, gayly, "what next?"

Flip recovered herself.

"You're safe now anywhere outside the bouse. But did you expect them to-night?"

Lance shrugged his shoulders. "Why not?"

"Hush!" returned the girl; "they are coming this way."

The four flickering, scattered lights presently dropped into line. The trail had been found; they were coming nearer. Flip breathed quickly; the spiced aroma of her presence filled the blanket as he drew her tightly beside him. He had forgotten the storm that raged around them, the mysterious foe that was approaching, until Flip caught his sleeve with a slight laugh.

"Why, it's Kennedy and Bijah!"

"Who's Kennedy and Bijah?" asked Lance, curiously.

"Kennedy's the postmaster, and Bijah's the butcher."

"What do they want?" continued Lance.

"Me," said Flip, cooly.

"You?"

"Yes; let's run away."

Half leading, half dragging her friend, Flip made her way with unerring woodcraft down the ravine. The sound of voices, and even the tumult of the storm became fainter; an acrid smell of burning green wood smarted Lance's lips and eyes. In the midst of the darkness beneath him gradually a faint, gigantic nimbus, like a lurid eye, glowed and sank, quivered and faded with the spent breath of the gale, as it penetrated their retreat.

"The pit," whispered Flip. "It's safe on the other side," she added, cautiously skirting the orbit of the great eye, and leading him to a sheltered nest of bark and sawdust. It was warm and odorless. Nevertheless, they both deemed it necessary to enwrap themselves in the single blanket. The eye heaved fitfully upon them. Occasionally a wave of lambent tremulousness passed across it. Its weirdness was an excuse for their drawing nearer each other in playful terror.

"Flip."

"Well?"

"What did the other two want?—to see you, too?"

"Likely," said Flip, without the least trace of coquetry.

"There's been a lot of strangers yer, off and on."

"Perhaps you'd like to go back and see them?"

"Do you want me to?"

Lance's reply was a kiss. Nevertheless he was vaguely uneasy. "Looks a little as if I were running away, don't it?" he suggested.

"No," said Flip; "they think you're only a squaw. It's me they're after."

Lance smarted a little at this infelicitous speech. A strange and irritating sensation had been creeping over him—it was his first experience of shame and remorse. "I reckon I'll go back and see," he said, rising abruptly.

Flip was silent. She was thinking. Believing that the men were seeking her only, she knew that their attention would be directed from her companion when it was found out he was no longer with her, and she dreaded to meet them in his irritable presence.

"Go," she said; "tell dad something's gone wrong in the diamond pit, and say I'm watching it for him here."

"And you?"

"I'll go there and wait for him. If he can't get rid of them, and they follow him, then I'll come back here, and meet you. Anyhow, I'll manage to have dad wait there a spell."

She took his hand, and led him back by a different path to the trail. He was surprised to find that the cabin, its window glowing from the fire, was only a hundred yards away.

"Go in the back way, by the shed. Don't go in the room, nor near the light if you can. Don't talk inside, but call or beckon to dad. Remember," she said, with a laugh, "you're keeping watch of me for him. Pull your hair down on your eyes, so." This operation, like most feminine embellishments of the masculine toilet, was attended by a kiss, and Flip, stepping back into the shadow, vanished in the storm.

Lance's first movements were inconsistent with his assumed sex. He picked up his dragged skirt, and drew a hovey knife from his hoot. From his bosom he took a revolver, turning the chambers noiselessly as he felt the caps. He then crept toward the cabin softly, and gained the shed. It was quite dark but for a pencil of light piercing a crack of the rude ill-fitting door that opened on the sitting-room. A single voice, not unfamiliar to him, raised in half-brutal triumph, greeted his ears. A name was mentioned—his own! His angry hand was on the latch. One moment more and he would have burst the door, but in that instant another name was uttered—a name that dropped his hand from the latch and the blood from his cheeks. He staggered backward, passed his hand swiftly across his forehead, recovered himself with a gesture of mingled rage and despair, and sinking on his knees beside the door, pressed his hot temples against the crack.

"Do I know Lance Harriott?" said the voice. "Do I know the d—d ruffian? Didn't I bunt him a year ago into the brush three miles from the Crossing? Didn't we lose sight of him the very day he turned up yer at this ranch, and got smuggled over into Monterey? Ain't it the same man as killed Arkansas Bob—Boh Ridley—the name he went hy in Sonora? And who was Bob Ridley, eh? Why, you d—d old fool, it was Boh Fairley—YOUR SON!"

The old man's voice rose querulous and indistinct.

"What are ye talkin' about?" interrupted the first speaker.

"I tell you I know. Look at these pictures; I found 'em on his body. Look at 'em. Pictures of you and your girl. Praps you'll deny them. Praps you'll tell me I lie when I tell you he told me he was your son; told me how he ran away from you, how you were livin' somewhere in the mountains makin' gold or suthin' else outen charcoal. He told me who he was as a secret. He never let on he told it to any one else. And when I found that the man who killed him, Lance Harriott, had been hidin' here, had been sendin' spies all around to find out all about your son, had been foolin' you, and tryin' to ruin your gal as he had killed your boy, I knew that he knew it too."

"LIAR!"

The door fell in with a crash. There was the sudden apparition of a demoniac face, still half hidden by the long, trailing black locks of hair that curled like Medusa's around it. A cry of terror filled the room. Three of the men dashed from the door, and fled precipitately. The man who had spoken sprang toward his rifle in the chimney corner. But the movement was his last; a blinding flash and shattering report interposed between him and his weapon. The impulse carried him forward headlong into the fire, that hissed and spluttered with his blood, and Lance Harriott, with his smoking pistol, strode past him to the door. Already far down the trail there were hurried voices, the crack and crackling of impending branches growing fainter and fainter in the distance. Lance turned back to the solitary living figure—the old man.

Yet he might have been dead too, he sat so rigid and motionless, his fixed eyes staring vacantly at the body on the hearth. Before him on the table lay the cheap photographs, one evidently of himself, taken in some remote epoch of complexion, one of a child, which Lance recognized as Flip.

"Tell me," said Lance, hoarsely, laying his quivering hand on the table, "was Bob Ridley your son?"

"My son," echoed the old man, in a strange, far-off voice, without turning his eyes from the corpse—"My son—is—is there!" pointing to the dead man. "Hush! Didn't he tell you so? Didn't you bear him say it? Dead—dead—shot dead!"

"Silence! Are you crazy, man?" repeated Lance, tremblingly; "that is not Bob Ridley, but a dog, a coward, a liar, gone to his reckoning. If your son was Boh Ridley, I swear to God I never knew it, now or—then. Do you hear me? Tell me! Do you believe me? Speak! You shall speak."

He laid his hand almost menacingly on the old man's shoulder. Fairley slowly raised his head. Lance fell back with a groan of horror. The weak lips were wreathed with a feeble, imploring smile, but the eyes wherein the fretful, peevish, suspicious spirit had dwelt were blank and tenantless; the flickering intellect that had lit them was blown out and vanished.

Lance walked toward the door, and remained motionless for a moment, gazing into the night. When he turned back again toward the fire his face was as colorless as the dead man's on the hearth; the fire of passion was gone from his beaten eyes; his step was hesitating and slow. He went up to the table.

"I say, old man," he said, with a strange smile and an odd, premature suggestion of the infinite weariness of death in his voice, "you wouldn't mind giving me this, would you?" and he took up the picture of Flip. The old man nodded repeatedly.

"Thank you," said Lance.

He went to the door, paused a moment, and returned. "Good-bye, old man," he said, holding out his hand. Fairley took it with a childish smile.

"He's dead," said the old man, softly, holding Lance's hand, but pointing to the hearth.

"Yes," said Lance, with the faintest of smiles on the palest of faces. "You feel sorry for any one that's dead, don't you?"

Fairley nodded again. Lance looked at him with eyes as remote as his own, shook his head, and turned away. When he reached the door, he laid his revolver carefully, and indeed somewhat ostentatiously, upon a chair. But when he stepped from the threshold, he stopped a moment in the light of the open door to examine the lock of a small derringer which he drew from his pocket. He then shut the door carefully, and with the same slow, hesitating step, felt his way into the night.

He had but one idea in his mind—to find some lonely spot; some spot where the footsteps of man would never penetrate; some spot that would yield him rest, sleep, obliteration, forgetfulness, and above all, where he would be forgotten. He had seen such places—surely there were many—where bones were picked up of dead men who had faded from the earth and had left no other record. If he could only keep his senses now he might find such a spot. But he must be careful, for her little feet went everywhere, and she must never see him again, alive or dead. And in the midst of his thoughts, and the darkness, and the storm, he heard a voice at his side:

"Lance, how long you have been here!"

Left to himself, the old man again fell into a vacant contemplation of the dead body before him, until a stronger blast swept down like an avalanche upon the cabin, burst through the ill-fastened door and broken chimney, and, dashing the ashes and living embers over the floor, filled the room with blinding smoke and flame. Fairley rose with a feeble cry, and then, as if acted upon by some dominant memory, groped under the bed until he found his huckskin bag and his precious crystal, and fled precipitately from the room. Lifted by this second shock from his apathy, he returned to the fixed idea of his life—the discovery and creation of the diamond—and forgot all else. The feeble grasp that his shaken intellect kept of the events of the night relaxed, the disguised Lance, the story of his son, the murder, slipped into nothingness; there remained only the one idea—his nightly watch by the diamond pit. The instinct of long habit was stronger than the darkness or the onset of the storm, and he kept his tottering way over the stream and fallen timber until he reached the spot. A sudden tremor seemed to shake the lambent flame that had lured him on. He thought he heard the sound of voices; there were signs of recent disturbance—footprints in the sawdust! With a cry of rage and suspicion, Fairley slipped into the pit, and sprang toward the nearest opening. To his frenzied fancy it had been tampered with, his secret discovered, the fruit of his long labors stolen from him that very night. With superhuman strength he began to open the pit, scattering the half-charged logs right and left, and giving free vent to the suffocating gases that rose from the now incandescent charcoal. At times the fury of the gale would drive it back and hold it against the sides of the pit, leaving the opening free; at times, following the blind instinct of babit, the demented man would fall upon his face, and bury his nose and mouth in the wet bark and sawdust. At last, the paroxysm past, he sank back again in his old apathetic attitude of watching, the attitude he had so often kept beside his sylvan crucible. In this attitude, and in silence, he waited for the dawn.

It came with a hush in the storm; it came with blue openings in the broken up and tumbled heavens; it came with stars that glistened first and then paled, and at last sank, drowning in those deep cerulean lakes; it came with those cerulean lakes broadening into vaster seas, whose shores expanded at last into one illimitable ocean, cerulean no more, but flecked with crimson and opal dyes. It came with the lightly lifted, misty curtain of the day, torn and rent on crag and pine top, but always lifting, lifting. It came with the sparkle of emerald in the grasses, and the flash of diamonds in every spray, with a whisper in the awakening woods, and voices in the traveled roads and trails.

The sound of these voices stopped before the pit, and seemed to interrogate the old man. He came, and putting his finger on his lips, made a sign of caution. When three or four men had descended, he bade them follow him, saying, weakly and disjointedly, but persistently: "My boy . . . my son Robert . . . came home . . . came home at last . . . here with Flip . . . both of them . . . Come and see."

He had reached a little niche or nest in the hillside, and stopped, and suddenly drew aside a blanket. Beneath it, side by side, lay Flip and Lance, dead, with their cold hands clasped in each other's.

"Suffocated!" said two or three, turning with horror toward the broken-up and still smouldering pit.

"Asleep!" said the old man. "Asleep! I've seen 'em lying that way when they were habies together. Don't tell me. Don't say I don't know my own flesh and blood! So, so! my pretty ones!" He stooped and kissed them. Then drawing the blanket over them gently, he rose, and said softly, "Good-night!"

[THE END.]

King Louis of Bavaria has had trouble with his chief secretary, Herr Ziegler, who struck work because the king always turns night into day, that is to say, gets up when the sun sets and goes to bed at sunrise; thus business is always transacted during the night. Poor Ziegler used constantly, therefore, to be deprived of his natural rest. All the State business passed through his hands, as the ministers have always declined to read their different reports personally to the king, who would only listen to them lying in bed, and concealed behind a screen. After long parleying, Ziegler consented to resume work, but under conditions. The principal of which is that he is to be allowed to go to bed at six o'clock in the evening, and not to be disturbed the next morning.

THE UNITED STATES ARMY.

By Archibald Forbes.

Of no nation which maintains a standing army are the troops so little en evidence as are those of the United States. Probably two-thirds of the population of the republic never saw so much of its army as a company of line infantry. The lodging of no war department in the world can compare for spacious splendor with that palace over against the White House in which the American Secretary of War and the American General of the Army have their official headquarters. There is a district of that beautiful metropolis in which it seems that almost every second building is occupied by some branch or other of military, or quasi-military administration. But the Chicago headquarters of General Sheridan's command, that stretches from the lakes to the gulf, and covers an area larger than the Continent of Europe, are located in the rented second floor of a mercantile building. The superficial observer remembers that its annual cost to the country amounts to some forty million dollars, and reflects that on an annual expenditure of only twelve and a half millions more Germany maintains a standing army of four hundred and twenty thousand men, with the machinery for increasing that strength to a million within a single week. And the conclusion is forced upon him that there must be an American army somewhere, if only he can find it. By far the larger portion of the American army is on service westward of the Missouri River. At Fort Leavenworth the explorer will find a general officer in command, whose personal experiences have been widely varied, and whose accumulated wealth of information on military topics in the Far West is equaled only by his courteous readiness to communicate that information. He will find also a school of instruction for officers that bids fair, as it develops—at present it is only in its first youth—to take rank as a staff college of a high order; and he will find, too, a military prison which will furnish the investigator with some curious material for comparison and contrast with those of other countries. The pay of the American soldier is thirteen dollars a month at the outset, fourteen dollars in his third year of service, fifteen in his fourth, and sixteen in his fifth. His rations, to the foreigner, is startling in its fullness and variety, with its "twelve ounces pork or bacon, or one and a quarter pounds salt or fresh beef, one pound six ounces soft bread or flour, or one pound hard bread, or one and a quarter pounds corn meal; and to each one hundred rations, fifteen pounds beans or peas, and ten pounds rice, ten pounds green coffee, or six pounds roasted and ground coffee, or one pound eight ounces tea, fifteen pounds sugar, four quarts vinegar, one and a quarter pounds candles, four pounds soap, three and three-quarter pounds salt, four ounces pepper, thirty pounds potatoes, one quart molasses." There is "working pay" for him to earn, at the rate of twenty-five cents a day for unskilled, fifty cents a day for skilled labor. He enlists for the moderate term of five years; so that if he dislikes the service his release is in the not far off future. When after that term he is discharged without discredit, he stands entitled to one hundred and sixty acres of government land, which holding becomes his absolute property on a residence thereon for one year. If, again, he elects to make the army his profession, he may reenlist for successive terms of five years, while his physique holds good, receiving the pay of eighteen dollars a month from his first reenlistment. He may become a non-commissioned officer, with a maximum of twenty-seven dollars a month pay in the line, or thirty-nine dollars in the engineers, ordnance, and signal corps. And if he aspires to commissioned rank, there is nothing utopian in such hope. The "enlisted man" of the American army may attain any rank in that arm. The present Adjutant-General began his military career in this capacity, earning his promotion therefrom by gallantry in the Mexican war. It is the common belief in Europe that all officers of the American regular army are graduates of West Point; but this is quite an error. Take the cavalry arm, containing four hundred and thirty-two officers. Of this number thirty-eight have been enlisted men, commissioned directly from the lower ranks of the regular army. But this in nowise represents the proportion of officers who have begun their military career as "enlisted men." Eighty first joined the army as private soldiers of volunteer regiments employed during the civil war. Thus of the four hundred and thirty-two cavalry officers in the American army, there are no fewer than one hundred and eighteen "rankers," as officers who have risen from the ranks are called in the British army. These American "rankers" do not people the lower grades, as is mostly the case with the British "ranker." A second lieutenant in the American infantry commences on an annual income of fourteen hundred dollars, increasing by ten per cent. annually for each five years' service in the same grade, until an increase of forty per cent. has been reached. The corresponding pay in the British army is less than five hundred dollars a year—barely enough to pay the mess bill. A captain in the American army enjoys an income of two thousand dollars a year, increasing ten per cent. for each five years' service in that rank. A colonel in the American service draws an annual revenue of three thousand five hundred dollars, rising by quinquennial installments to four thousand four hundred and eighty dollars. A major-general has seven thousand five hundred dollars. All these incomes are exclusive of quarters, fuel, and forage, on at least as liberal a scale as that in effect in the British army. A second lieutenant, invalided already during the first five years of his service, receives as "retired pay" for the rest of his life one thousand and fifty dollars a year. A major, in similar conditions, receives a life pension of two thousand two hundred and fifty dollars a year; if he has "put in" twenty years' service in that grade, his pension is three thousand dollars a year. I do not ask the British boy-subaltern, his health permanently shattered by a campaign in Ashantee or Afghanistan, to fancy himself the life-possessor of a pension of two hundred and ten pounds a year; or the grizzled major, worn out by long and hard soldiering, to receive his retirement on the comfortable income of six hundred pounds a year. But if Uncle Sam is a good paymaster, he in no wise believes in throwing his money away. He has his fair day's work for his fair day's wages. He employs no more hands than he can utilize; and when a man is no more fit for work he has to accept his retirement, with its decorous allowance. He considers that he pays a man well enough to do his duty; he holds that duty includes the best and fullest the man can do. If the man fails therein, he gets scant indulgence. Uncle Sam does not spend much time in inventing excuses for short-comings. In all this he differs utterly from his cousin, Dame Britannia. Her army is not a business profession; and so she can deal with it on business principles. She must stand by her failures; she must not own to herself that they are failures. The story of the Crimean war is studded thick with failures who were left unheeded because of unbusiness-like tenderness for men belonging to a profession which is not conducted on business-like principles. On Lord Chelmsford rested the responsibility of the mismanagement that resulted in the catastrophe of Isandula, and that officer owned his incompetence to undertake the responsibility of subsequent operations, and prayed to be relieved therefrom; but even such an appeal as this was overruled, and he was retained in command to prolong and leave unfinished a business of which his incapacity is the most abiding memory. Contrast such things with certain episodes of the American civil war. McClellan indeed got a long rope; but how short was the rope accorded to Pope, who came East with a meritorious record earned in the West, and against whose chances of success before Washington a concourse of circumstances combined. A single battle, which was simply not a success, sufficed to roll Hooker's head in the saw-dust. Again, command to a British officer, whether he achieves failure or success, invariably results in something advantageous. He is never disgraced; he frequently is promoted; he always is decorated. Chelmsford was made a G. C. B., and his friends were chagrined that he was not made a lieutenant-general. Peacock, who marched three miles in as many months, was made a C. M. G., rather a feeble testimonial of merit, and nevertheless a compliment. Pope I find to-day a brigadier-general in substantive rank; he was a major-general by brevet twenty years ago. Meade, who won Gettysburg, the most momentous battle of modern times, and who technically commanded the Army of the Potomac when Lee surrendered to it, died a major-general. Compare with Meade's scantiness of reward, and with Hancock's simple major-general's command of to-day, the honors heaped on Sir Garnet Wolseley for the Ashantee expedition—a creditable affair, doubtless, but pace the British Lion, scarcely comparable with Gettysburg. Gilmore nineteen years ago was in independent command, with the rank of major-general, of operations against Charleston; and the reduction of Fort Wagner, Morris Island, and Sumter ranks in intrinsic magnitude above any military operation in which Great Britain has been engaged since the Crimean War, if Lucknow and Delhi be excepted; yet Gilmore to-day is serving as a lieutenant-colonel of engineers. America sent as its military attaché to the Russian army for the campaign of '77-'78, a young engineer lieutenant. That officer had to struggle against the disadvantages incident to the inferiority of his rank. But he did honor to his country and its army by writing the standard history of the Russo-Turkish war, a work of so great merit that the Russian general staff has adopted it as an obligatory study for its aspirants—a work that has become the text-book of that war to every student of the art military. To-day this officer is plodding along in the rank he held before the American subaltern took rank among the military historians of the world. The Russian Emperor had conferred on him not a few medals and decorations, some in appreciation of his knowledge of his profession, others in compliment to that personal courage of which his constant presence in the forefront of operations was fruitful in occasions for the proof. But these, in its austerity, the nation through its Congress has denied him the privilege of wearing. England also had a military attaché with the Russians—an officer whose rank was that of captain and lieutenant-colonel in the Guards. He wrote no history of the war; but his services were rewarded with a full colonelcy in the army, overstepping one hundred and twenty seniors; an appointment as aide-de-camp to the Queen; the position of first secretary to the Vienna embassy, and permission to wear the order conferred on him by the Russian Emperor. At the first glance, an English cavalry officer, accustomed to the polish and trimness of his own command, might be excused for standing aghast in horror at the aspect of such a squadron of horsemen as that which I saw on parade at Camp Cumming, ready in every item for active service. The horses were stout, hard, active, and wiry, accustomed to endure hardship, and to graze, and stand quiet when picketed. The saddles were of the McClellan pattern—light, saving of the horses' backs, and easy for the rider. The kit—carried in small, peodulous saddlebags slung behind the cantle—was cut down to actual necessities, but no necessities for sensible campaigning were lacking. The arms were essentially practical—no sabre, a Smith and Wesson revolver, a Hotchkiss magazine carbine, (seven cartridges,) sighted to fourteen hundred yards, and carried conveniently on the saddle. Ammunition for the carbine, (sixty rounds,) carried in a most useful and accessible waist-belt, something like a bandolier; the revolver, ammunition, (thirty-six rounds,) carried in a less satisfactory waist-belt that might usefully be replaced by breast receptacles on the Circassian plan. Men, lean, wiry, tough-looking fellows, wearing clothes there could be no fear of spoiling, adepts by training in the rough border-skirmish work that constitutes warfare in the Territories, individually and collectively self-reliant. Supplies for thirteen days accompany the column, on mules, reserves following on wagons. A detachment of American cavalry on march might, to the European conversant with standing armies, bear a suspicious resemblance to banditti; but it is carefully equipped for the kind of service on which it is employed, and possesses a practical adaptability that would probably occasion some astonishment in another kind of warfare, on the part of more conventional cavalry fresh from the harrack-yard. To the infantry, mutatis mutandis, applies much that has been said of the cavalry. It marches light, unincumbered by knapsacks; it carries the ammunition purposefully in the waist-belt; it does not hither with the hayooet incumbrance. It is armed with the Springfield rifle—a strong-shooting, far-carrying weapon. It wears neither stock nor standing collar. It has the helmet for hot weather; and its boots are susceptible of improvement.—North American Review for August.

CHICAGO NOVELETTES.

Morning at Mahaffeyville.

The tremulous boughs of the waving trees were raining down shadows that fell cool and fair upon Lurline Perkins' beautiful face as she stood silent and alone near the woodshed. The murmurous sighing of the summer breeze was borne to her by the tranced air, and ever and anon there came up from the meadows the sound of the farmer's ax, as he felled the sturdy asparagus that was soon to delight the palates of the rich people in the city who could pay for it. Away to the eastward, mirroring back the azure dome of the sky, lay the lake, and the swell of its silver foam but served to make the silence deeper.

The girl stood for several minutes as if entranced by the scene. Then, turning sadly away, she exclaimed in low, bitter tones: "I suppose I shall have to milk that dratted cow, and the sooner I get at it the better."—From "Spring," by Joseph Medill, the Tribune Novelist.

"Give me the child."

As Beryl McCloskey spoke these words she looked into the face of Vivian Fairhope, the man to whom two years ago she had given the most precious treasure of a woman's life, her love, and in the delicate lines of her lovely face there was an expression that told more plainly than could words of a deep resolve the woman had taken.

Little Beatrice had been uneasy all the day, and now that the summer day was drawing to a close, and the long lines of rosy light that streamed up from below the western horizon seemed to rest like a benediction upon the heated earth, she was crying in the querulous, impatient way that brings alarm to a mother's heart.

Vivian handed the child to Beryl. "What are you going to do, darling?" he said.

Looking at him with deep brown eyes from which gleamed a passionate love-light, Beryl said, in tones of thrilling tenderness:

"I am going to spank it, dizzy."—From "Beryl's Baby," by Joseph Medill, the Tribune Novelist.

"Give me the pie."

Out upon the lawn of the Castle McMurtry stood a young girl just in the springtime of youth. The scarlet roses that swung lazily to and fro in the breath of a June morning were not more beautiful than those which bloomed so brightly in the peachy cheeks of the Lady Constance McMurtry, and her slight but faultlessly molded figure, set off to perfection by a plain morning-dress of white muslin, had in its movements more of grace and beauty than those of the grayhound which lay silently at the feet of his mistress, watching her every movement with intelligent and loving eyes. The girl's rippling golden hair was simply tied with a blue ribbon; the lovely, half-childish face was a poem complete in itself. It was a face that changed with every thought—one moment gay and bright, in another thoughtful and sad. As she spoke the words with which this chapter opens there was a wistful look upon the pretty face, and the deep-brown eyes shot forth a yearning, will-I-ever-find-the-hairbrush glance that was pitiful in its sad beauty.

For an instant Lord Wyverne did not reply. Then, placing his hand on the girl's shoulder, and looking into her eyes with a grave tenderness that told bow the ghastly horror of the scene was pressing upon him, he said, in tones that were almost a sob: "You must be brave, my child; must nerve yourself to bear a great grief."

"My God!" exclaimed the girl. "Tell me what has happened. It surely can not be that there is no pie?"

"No, my darling," replied the earl; "it is not so bad as that. Your mother is dead."

"Ah!" said Constance, "how you frightened me. I thought surely it was the pie."—From "The Earl's Daughter," by Joseph Medill, the Tribune Novelist.

"My darling papa!"

As she spoke these words to her father, the only father she had in all the wide, wide world, Myrtle Hathaway placed about his neck a pair of dimpled white arms, and looked into the bearded face with a trusting, I-would-bet-seven-to-three-on-you look, that told more eloquently than could any words of the deep love she bore him.

Bending over his daughter, and kissing her tenderly where the Bloom of Youth was thinnest, Mr. Hathaway seated himself on a fauteuil, the girl kneeling by his side.

"Do you love me very much, papa?" she asked, smoothing with her soft white hands the bronzed forehead over which the furrows of time were beginning to spread.

"Why, what a foolish question for my little one to ask," was the reply, and a kiss stopped the prattle of the pretty lips. "You know, my darling," the father continued, "that my whole life is wrapped up in yours; that your happiness is my joy, your disappointments my bitterest woes."

"And would you do anything to please me, papa?"

"Of course I would, my child. Why do you ask such a foolish question?"

"Then," said the girl slowly, every word telling by its pathos of the earnestness with which it was spoken, "take me to the races to-morrow."

Reaching silently around to his pistol-pocket, Mr. Hathaway drew forth a quarter-stretch badge and placed it in his daughter's hand. The girl looked at it eagerly, gave a little cry of joy, and kissed her father again.

Rising from the fauteuil, Mr. Hathaway went to the window, and looked out upon the night. "God help me," he said in husky tones, choking down a sob that was welling up from his supper, "I shall be broke to-morrow night, for there are two pacing-races and a free-for-all trot on the programme."—From "The Deacon's Daughter," by Joseph Medill, the Tribune Novelist.

In Naples a kind of wife market is held every year. All the marriageable girls assemble in a room, to which young men of good character have access. Offer of marriage on the part of any young man is conveyed by allowing his handkerchief to drop before the object of his choice as he passes by. If the girl takes it up, she thereby signifies her acceptance, but her refusal, if she allows it to remain.

ECHOES FROM EVERYWHERE.

I do not believe in economy. Still, once in a while I practice it. Yet always to regret it, for it is a delusion and a snare.

Videlicet:

One day last week I was to take the afternoon train of the North Pacific Coast. There was a package at the Palace which I wanted sent to my residence. It was necessary that it should reach there before I left, as I had to take it with me. Behold, an exposition of economy came o'er me. I said to myself, "I will have this done by the Ten Cent Parcel Delivery. Thus shall I save fifteen cents." Ordinarily I use the messenger service of the District Telegraph Company, which I have always found expeditious and trustworthy. This time I did not. I saved my fifteen cents; but I repented it in dust and ashes.

This is the time-table: At 10:15 I gave the order to the ten-cent company. They said they would call at 11. They didn't call at 11. At 12, feeling much pleased with myself at my economy, I went to Marchand's and had an excellent luncheon. Having saved fifteen cents, I felt that I could afford it.

MENU.
Slice of cold filet de bœuf, with a little mayonnaise sauce.	A rognon sauté, very good.
Some consommé with an egg in it.	An omelette aux fines herbes.
Café.	Vin à discretion.

Price, $1.25.

Time, 12:55. Train to go at 1:35.

Returned to my residence. No parcel. Hired a coupé. Drove to Palace. N. P. Swore. Drove to Ten-cent Company. Parcel calmly reposing on shelf. Swore again. Sleepy person in charge evidently shocked. Swore at him. Bounced into coupé, drove furiously to boat, just caught it. Cigar-case empty, whisky-flask empty. Doubts entertained regarding steamboat whisky and cigars. Did not fill either. Results of economy may be tabulated thus:

To coupé hire.....	$2 00	By cash saved through economical operations of said Ten-cent company.....	$0 15
To luncheon at Marchand's, superinduced by pleasurable glow caused by economy.....	1 25
To imperfect and unsatisfactory digestion of aforesaid luncheon.....	2 50
To physical anguish caused by said imperfect digestion.....	5 00
To mental anguish owing to chances of salvation imperilled by violent, repeated, and blasphemous language concerning said Ten-cent company (about).....	50 00
Total.....	$60 75	Total.....	$0 15

I have been camping out. As a rule, I object to the country. Or no—not exactly the country, but the natives and the fare. But this time we camped in the mountains, far from the gentle native, and the fare was good.

It was a very jolly party. First, there was Gourmet, chief of the party and chef of the cuisine; profoundly versed in viands, deeply learned in the lore of cates, dainties, and good cheer; a jolly fellow, whose only bar at Saint Peter's gate will be that he snores loudly, gloomily, and in a minor key.

Then there was the Little Giant, most indefatigable of workers; a youth who is so dainty about his make-up that even in the heart of the redwoods he wore a polka-dot cravat, and carried a blue silk kerchief in the pocket of his overshirt.

Next on the list comes the Clam Fiend. This individual devoted himself incessantly to the consumption of clams, raw. When we arose in the morning the figure of the Clam Fiend would be outlined against the sky, engaged in his fascinating pursuit. The last thing at night he would eat a dozen by way of a nightcap. He carried them with him continually, and whenever we wanted him it was only necessary to track him down by his trail of clam-shells.

Then there was Mahlistick, the artist. This person set up his easel in an opening in the redwoods, stretched his canvasses, arranged his color tubes upon a prostrate tree, and then lay upon his back, smoked, and stared at the sky. When interrogated as to his occupation, he would reply that he was "making studies." If he made any they are still in embryo, for he painted not. Mahlistick was very regular at meals.

Another member was the General, a retired veteran, whose military training had given him the habit of command. This habitude the remainder of the party resented, and devoted themselves assiduously to sitting upon the General.

Two darkeys to cook and wait rendered life easier.

Then there was Myself. I will not dwell upon my many merits.

Our mission was this: We had come as the advance guard of that host of "good fellows who yearly repair to the forest to have their annual "jinks"; to forget for a brief space the carking cares and the wearisome tread-mill of life, to sing, to feast, to make merry, and there, in the heart of the forest, under the giant trees, to solemnly cremate the body of Care.

Our duties were many. We had to provide sleeping and eating quarters for a hundred and fifty men; we had to erect a bathing-platform and spring-boards on the shores of a miniature lake formed by an embouchure of the Russian River; we had to prepare a speaker's stand under the trees, to drape it with flags and festoon it with lanterns; we had to erect a frame-work of wood, that the weary wayfarer might slake his thirst in the conventional, American, and perpendicular manner. We had to do all this, I say, and we had further to jointly and severally abuse Mahlistick because he was lazy. As for myself, I worked so hard endeavoring to do a very little and convince the others that I was doing a great deal, that I am still fatigued.

In lieu of tents we erected cabins made of board frameworks, with boughs nailed to them. These edifices were by no means close, but on the contrary extremely light and airy. Their only drawback was that if a man rolled out of bed he was apt to roll through the side of the house. Then, too, in walking around the camp after dark one was in danger of walking through his domicile without knowing it.

But under the redwoods in summer time tents and cabins are needless. I slept one night under our brush roofs, but the cacophonous concert of snores drove me away. I took up my bed and walked. In the centre of a circle of trees I made my couch of straw. Then, wrapping the blanket drape of that couch about me, I laid me down to pleasant dreams. I will wager I slept better than Flood. Besides, the walls of my bed-room were two hundred feet high—much higher than his—and the moon came and looked down at me through the leafy ceiling far overhead, and bade me good-night ere I sunk to sleep.

There is something solemn about a redwood grove. I abominate Wordsworth with a strong abomination, but he said a poetic thing when he wrote of "silent spires whose fingers point to heaven." And if a church steeple, made of common boards and by commoner carpenters, be impressive, how much the more one of these mighty trees, made by a mighty Hand, and pointing to heaven through countless ages.

[Mem.—Théophile Gautier once ran across this line of Wordsworth's in an impure French novel. It so impressed him that he immediately sat down and wrote a beautiful poem, the refrain of which is a translation of Wordsworth's line—"clochers silencieux montrant du doigt le ciel."]

Never can one wake from a sweeter sleep, in a balmier air, to a brighter day, than in these California mountains, when the sun sends his long lines of light through the tops of the trees, and the birds call from the boughs above you. I am a battered denizen of the city, yet it moves me almost to poetry.

Do not fear—almost, but not quite.

In this mountain seclusion, then, we passed five peaceful, sylvan days. At the expiration of that time we were invaded by a hundred and fifty men bearing offensive traces of civilization. They insulted the forest by their toothpick shoes and crutch canes; they desecrated the river by going in swimming in bric-à-brac bathing-suits; they defiled the forest aisles with the tin-foil wrappings of costly cigars and champagne bottles; the moan of the trees was drowned by the chorus of songs.

It was sacrilegious.

Yet there was a spark of manliness left in them. One individual had dared to wear a plug-hat in the face of nature. This hideous thing—this blot upon the landscape—was seized, confiscated, secreted, and ultimately sent skyward on the top of a large rocket. I hope it is going yet.

By way of breaking these sybarites in, we had arranged a little ramble for them—a trifling walk of a mile and a half before they had dinner. Along the road we had placed placards to cheer them on their weary way. Little facetiae such as "Are you tired?" "Are you real tired?" "Would you like to have a drink?" "It's only three miles more!" "Don't get weary, children!" and so forth. Just before they got into camp a large placard upon a tree informed them that they were "just half-way." At this point many expressed a desire to lie down and die. But they lived—lived to wish it again next day.

After a dinner which was eaten with an appetite many never had before, all repaired to the grove where the "jinks" was to be held. It was a scene of wondrous beauty. About four hundred Japanese lanterns were suspended from the trees, a complete circle some hundreds of yards in circumference being made around the central space where stood the speakers' stand. Another line of light led to the "wine-room." Still another avenue of lanterns showed the way to the camp where the cabins were. Near the speakers' stand burned an immense bonfire, the effect of the light from which, shooting up into the dark branches far above, was most peculiar. Around the circle, standing, seated on logs, and lying down, were grouped the Bohemians. In the background stood the persons indigenous to the country, both the male and female of the species, contemplating the scene with that determined nil admirari which is so characteristic of the bumptious provincial.

The natives, by the way, look upon us with a mixture of pity and benevolent contempt. They regard us as a race of well-meaning and profitable lunatics.

Perhaps they are right.

After the usual quota of song, and speech, and story, there filed into the circle of light a band of huntsmen, with horn, and baldrick, and jerkins of green. Can these be Robin Hood and his merry men?—Friar Tuck and Little John? Nay, not so, for they seat themselves at a rustic table, and fall to on a sylvan banquet. We are in the Forest of Arden, for there is the Banished Duke attended by the melancholy Jaques and my Lord of Amiens. A chorus bursts forth—"Under the greenwood tree"—and presently there file from out the forest yet others, escorting the successful huntsman, and the song changes—'tis "What shall he have who killed the Deer?" But look—here comes Orlando; he bids them pause, and presently old Adam enters, an-hungered and a-thirsting, and he is bidden to the board.

All things have an end—except eternity and a woman's tongue—and so the scenes soon cease. Into the dark the huntsmen troop, singing "Blow, blow, thou winter wind," and as they wind through the forest aisles the sobbing horns blend with the virile voices in a manner which one can not forget. "Virile"—I use the word advisedly. It means to me that which is pre-eminently masculine. It is the opposite of "effeminate" rather than of "feminine." [Compare English "male" and French "mâle."] There is to me no finer music than that made by the human voice; there is to me no finer chorus than a chorus of men's voices.

I shall always remember those scenes from "As You Like It" under the redwood trees.

But here comes a new procession. Filing out through the trees are black-robed and hooded figures, bearing a sombre catafalque. To the strains of a melancholy dirge they wind their way through the trees, to the place where has been reared a funeral pyre. It is the body of Care—enclosed now, to be cremated anon. A prayer is said; all good Bohemians are adjured to cast their load of care into the flames. The flare of flashing torches lights up the scene; the prayer is done; the torch applied; rockets stream into the night; and the forked flames leap up toward heaven bearing with them, let us hope, at least some Bohemian burdens.

But the set programme is now over, and all abandon themselves to less formal fun. The banqueting table of the Banished Duke is taken to the "wine-room"; candles stuck in empty champagne bottles furnish light; an impromptu "low jinks" takes place, which lasts far into the night, until the moon has lain herself down in the couch of fog which broods far out over the ocean, and the dissipated stars wink sleepily, and say "Good-morning."

At this stage it became necessary to find the way to the cabins. The grounds were laid out about in this fashion;

A represents the "wine-room"; B the speakers' stand; C the circle of lanterns surrounding the central space; D, the line of lanterns leading to the "wine-room"; E, the line of lanterns leading to the sleeping camp; F, the camp.

Some of the lanterns by this time had gone out. There were little gaps here and there. This was notably the case at D and E, where the lines intersected. The scene was so much changed that even those who had been there for days and arranged the grounds had difficulty in finding their way. To the new-comers, as may be imagined, it was a perfect labyrinth. One of them distrusted his ability to find the camp. Let us call him John. He sought another—a man with a lantern—a man named Henry. Quoth John:

"Henry, dear boy, you have a lantern. Will you show me the way to the camp?"

"Aye," said Henry, "with my little lantern even to the camp grounds will I gladly guide you."

They started. They went from A to D.

"We have only to follow the lanterns" said Henry, cheerfully.

They went to C, thence to B, thence to E, thence to D, thence to A.

"Henry, dear boy," said John, "it seems to me we were here before."

"It looks familiar," said Henry, something chopfallen.

They started out again.

This time they went to D, thence to E, thence to B, thence to C, thence to D, thence to A. They stared at each other. They were at the place they had started from.

"Henry," said John, "this is the most extraordinary piece of circumlocution I ever saw."

"Circumlocution—how so?"

"Circumlocution is derived from the Latin circum, 'around,' and cute, 'smart'—hence, 'a smart way of getting around a thing.' Ha, ha!"

Henry glared gloomily into the dark, and spake no word. The night waxed on apace. There were now collected others who wanted to go home.

"Don't try it," said Henry, "the place is bewitched."

Having no confidence in Henry as a guide, the party chartered a servant with a lantern, who professed to know the way. Four times did the unhappy menial lead the party around the circle until they were discovered by a good Samaritan, (with a lantern,) who directed them into Avenue E, which led to their palatial cabins.

I was the Good Samaritan.

The wanderings of Mahlistick, the Clam Fiend, and two others from the trail, on their return to camp; their sudden disappearance in a stump-hole; their extrication therefrom by the Good Samaritan, using their legs as handles; the mishap of a Son of Mars, who rolled through the side of his cabin, to escape the waking-up brigade, and who suddenly rolled back again, of two evils choosing the lesser; the unfortunate adventure of the man who got up toward the third hour of the morning and went outside, to find on his return that he might much better have stayed in—are not all these in the unwritten chronicles of Bohemia? Aye, verily, my children.

But who could record the countless tricks that were played during those two days of jollity?—the amusing mishaps, the little adventures, the fantastic pranks of a hundred and fifty keen-witted men turned school-boys for the nonce? They will furnish food for reminiscence for a twelvemonth. And to their credit be it said, not a harsh word, not a jest was ill received, not a thing was done of which a man could regret. Even the elders whose senses were disturbed by the more frolicsome younger ones of drums and blowing of horns—even the elders took up the raveled sleeve of sleep again without a word of anger. And some of them even turned out and assisted the marauders in their disturbing of the peace.

Well, well, it is all over. Back to the city have we come, and become staid citizens once more. All the way down on our special train mirth reigned supreme. But when the hoat was reached, and we were amidst the humdrum crowd that filled it, with the city in sight, we insensibly became starchy. When we touched the wharf we were as decorous and as dull as every good citizen ought to be.

I met Gourmet on the street to-day, and his sleek vestments made me smile when I hethought me of the dungaree garments he affected in the woods. And coming out of the theatre last night I ran against a natty youth with light-topped toothpick shoes, a hoh-tail coat, a pancake hat, and an absurd cane. When I last had seen him he was attired in a blue flannel shirt, a pair of grimy trousers, and a polo cap.

It was the Clam Fiend.

ZULANO.

A Number of Weddings.

There have been a number of weddings celebrated during the present week, conspicuous among which was that of Lieutenant Frederick Huhert Lefavor, of the U. S. Steamship Ranger, and Miss Lizzie Story Collins, a niece of Mr. and Mrs. J. G. Goldsmith, of this city. The ceremony of marriage took place at Saint John's Presbyterian Church on Wednesday last, August second, and was celebrated by the Rev. Dr. Scott at a quarter to one o'clock. The church had been very tastefully and elaborately ornamented with flowers and evergreens, among which was a floral craft of exquisite design and make, and was largely filled with the friends of the parties, among whom were a perceptible sprinkling of army and navy officers and their ladies. The bride was dressed in a short traveling costume, and after partaking of a wedding breakfast at Mr. and Mrs. Goldsmith's, on First Street, with a few very intimate friends, Mr. and Mrs. Lefavor departed for the East on the 3:30 train. Lieutenant Ray, of the Ranger, acted as best man. The groom is noted as being one of the handsomest and best young fellows of the navy. Lefavor was born in Maine, but was appointed in the navy from Ohio, which State he claims as a residence. He entered the service on June 27, 1866.

At eight o'clock on the same evening, (Wednesday, August second,) at the residence of the bride, on California Street, Lieutenant Richard H. Townley, of the United States steamer Alert, was married to Miss Lillie Gerke, one of the daughters of the late Henry Gerke, long and extensively known as one of our leading and successful men. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. Dr. Platt, in the presence of a few intimate friends. Lieutenant and Mrs. Townley leave for Nebraska in a few days, where the groom has relatives, and will then go to New York, where Mrs. Townley has a married sister. The groom was born in Ohio, but was appointed from Nebraska on the twentieth of June, 1870.

The marriage of Mr. Bliz H. Paxton and Miss Bessie Emerson, of Rochester, New York, took place at the residence of the bride's sister, Mrs. R. H. Harfield, on Wednesday, the twenty-sixth ultimo. Only the families of the bride and groom and a few friends were present. A reception was held in the afternoon, at which time an elegant lunch was served. The bride was the recipient of numerous valuable presents. Mr. and Mrs. Paxton are on a tour through the southern part of the State. Upon their return they will reside for the coming fall and winter at the Grand Hotel.

At one o'clock on Thursday last, the third instant, Mr. George W. Reed, of San Francisco, was married, at the Episcopal church in Berkeley, to Miss Lillie L. Bonte, daughter of Rev. Dr. J. H. C. Bonte, secretary of the State University.

Among the reported engagements is that of Mr. Peder Sather, of Oakland, to Miss Hutchinson, a resident of the East at present; and a further report that the marriage will take place at an early date.

There is also an engagement of marriage between Major Whitney, U. S. A., and Miss Hattie Myrick, and the wedding is set for next month.

The Grand Army of the Republic give a grand excursion to Santa Cruz next Saturday. This is a charity; the best and sweetest charity. The money is to go to the widows and orphans of dead soldiers. Let us recall those times when our country was in its death struggle, and remember the loved ones of the war who died to save it. Every one who has leisure and money ought to go to Santa Cruz; every one who has money and no leisure ought to purchase a ticket and stay at home. The soldiers of the Grand Army deserve a good time; the widows and orphans deserve a good benefit. A romantic journey through a picturesque region, fun, feasting, frolicking, dancing, a seaside excursion, and all for three dollars, the three dollars going for charity.

On Tuesday evening, at the store of H. S. Crocker, on Bush Street near Sansome, an exhibition of the new Edison incandescent electric lights was given. It was conducted by the Pacific Coast owner of the patent, Mr. George S. Ladd, and was most successful. The lights proved to be entirely devoid of that bluish pallor peculiar to the Brush lights now in our streets. They burn with a pure, light-yellowish flame, which is steadier and far more agreeable than gas.

A Philadelphia correspondent of a Western paper says in regard to the exodus of fashionable Philadelphians: "I happen to know a lady who objects, on social principles, to going on Chestnut Street after the first of July. And really it is a fact that a well-dressed woman who ventures on a walk down Chestnut Street is stared at as a phenomenon."

Last week, at one of the Newport halls, Miss Maude Howe, daughter of Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, was, upon her entrance into the hall-room, presented with a pure white lily by a prominent New York society man. Has this any reference to the Mediaeval Poet?

The party which recently went to Alaska, including Sir Thomas Hesketh, Jules Tavernier, the artist, Fred Sharon, and others, has returned.

AN OLD FAVORITE.

Count Gismond.
AIX IN PROVENCE.

Christ God, who savest men, save most
Of men Count Gismond who saved me!
Count Gauthier, when he chose his post,
Chose time and place and company
To suit it; when he struck at length
My honor, 'twas with all his strength.

And doubtless ere that he could draw
All points to one, he must have schemed!
That miserable morning saw
Few half so happy as I seemed,
While being dressed in queen's array
To give our Tourney prize away.

I thought they loved me, did me grace
To please themselves; 'twas all their deed;
God makes or fair or foul our face;
If showing mine so caused to bleed
My cousins' hearts, they should have dropped
A word, and straight the play had stopped.

They, too, so heauteous! Each a queen
By virtue of her brow and breast;
Not needing to be crowned, I mean,
As I do. 'E'en when I was dressed,
Had either of them spoke, instead
Of glancing sideways with still head.

But no; they let me laugh, and sing
My birth-day song quite through, adjust
The last rose in my garland, fling
A last look on the mirror, trust
My arms to each an arm of theirs,
And so descend the castle stairs.

And they could let me take my state
And foolish throne amid applause
Of all come there to celebrate
My Queen's day—Oh, I think the cause
Of much was, they forgot no crowd
Makes up for parents in their shroud!

How'er that be, all eyes were bent
Upon me, when my cousins cast
Theirs down; 'twas time I should present
The victor's crown, but... there, 'twill last
No long time... the old mist again
Blinds me as then it did. How vain!

See! Gismond's at the gate, in talk
With his two boys: I can proceed.
Well, at that moment, who should stalk
Forth boldly (to my face, indeed,)—
But Gauthier, and he thundered "Stay!"
And all stayed. "Bring no crowns, I say!"

"Bring torches! Wind the penance sheet
About her! Let her shun the chaste,
Or lay herself before their feet!
Shall she, whose hody I embraced
A night long, queen it in the day?
For honor's sake no crowns, I say!"

I? What I answered? As I live,
I never fancied such a thing
As answer possible to give.
What says the torture-engine's whole
Strength on it? No more says the soul.

Till out strode Gismond; then I knew
That I was saved. I never met
His face before, but at first view
I felt quite sure that God had set Himself to Satan; who would spend
A minute's mistrust on the end?

He strode to Gauthier; in his throat
Gave him the lie, then struck his mouth
With one back-handed blow that wrote
In blood men's verdict there. North, South, East, West, I looked. The lie was dead
And damned, and truth stood up instead.

This glads me most, that I enjoyed
The heart of the joy, with my content
In watching Gismond, unalloyed
By any doubt of the event.
God took that on him—I was hid
Watch Gismond for my part. I did.

Did I not watch him while he let
His armourer just brace his greaves,
Rivet his hauberk, on the fret
The while! His foot... my memory leaves
No least stamp out nor how anon
He pulled his ringing gauntlets on.

And e'en before the trumpet's sound
Was finished, prone lay the false knight,
Prone as his lie, upon the ground;
Gismond flew at him, used no sleight
Of sword, but open-breasted drove,
Cleaving till out the truth he clove.

Which done, he dragged him to my feet,
And said, "Here die, but end thy breath
In full confession, lest thou fleet
From my first, to God's second death!
Say, hast thou lied?" And "I have lied
To God and her," he said, and died.

Then Gismond, kneeling to me, asked—
"What safe my heart holds, tho' no word
Could I repeat now, if I tasked
My powers forever, to a third
Dear even as you are. Pass the rest,
Until I sank upon his breast.

Over my head his arm he flung
Against the world; and scarce I felt
His sword, that dripped by me and swung,
A little shifted in its belt—
For he began to say the while
How south our home lay many a mile.

So 'mid the shouting multitude
We two walked forth to nevermore
Return. My cousins have pursued
Their life untroubled as before
I vexed them. Gauthier's dwelling-place
God lighten! May his soul find grace!

Our elder boy has got the clear,
Great brow; though when his brother's black
Full eye shows scorn, it... Gismond here?
And have you brought my tercel back?
I just was telling Adela
How many birds it struck since May.

—Robert Browning.

SOCIETY.

Notes and Gossip.

Mrs. J. T. Thompson and Miss Thompson, of Napa, went down to Monterey a few days ago to enjoy the charms of the seashore. Mrs. D. Ferris, of Sacramento, is visiting friends in this city. Mr. and Mrs. W. S. Keyes have been spending a few days at Monterey. Mr. and Mrs. H. N. Cook have also been spending a few days at Monterey. Miss Florence Perrine, of Sacramento, is visiting in this city. Miss Lida Church, of Sacramento, left that city a few days ago, accompanied by her mother, to enter the New England Conservatory of Music. Mrs. J. H. Carroll and her daughters, the Misses Flora and Minnie Carroll, of Sacramento, have gone to Howell Mountain, Napa County, to remain until November. Mrs. J. O. Broadhead and Miss Broadhead, of St. Louis, have been visiting Monterey, but are now at the Palace. General Beale came up from his ranch in Kern County on Wednesday last, and is at the Palace. Miss Etta Tracy, who has been staying at Monterey for several weeks, returned to the city last Monday. Captain Henry Metcalf, U. S. A., and Mrs. Metcalf, and J. W. Summerhayes, U. S. N., and Mrs. Summerhayes, have been at the Occidental during the week. Lieutenant-Commander O'Neil, U. S. N., who has been in the city with his family for a couple of weeks, sailed on Tuesday last for China. Hon. Newton Booth is spending the week in the city. Lieutenant-Commander Folger, U. S. N., and Paymaster Martin, of the Alert, went East on Tuesday last. Mrs. Henry Hazard, of Los Angeles, who has been visiting friends in this city, returned home on Wednesday last. Mrs. Nichols, of Benicia, is visiting friends here. G. H. Stafford and A. S. McCrea, U. S. N., are at the Occidental. Miss Watkins, of San Rafael, is at the Grand. J. M. Ingalls, U. S. A., is at the Palace. Miss Nonie Smith has returned home, and her sister, Miss Quica, is at Monterey. Mrs. W. M. Stewart is contemplating an Eastern tour. The engagement is announced of Miss Lillie Hastings, youngest daughter of Judge S. C. Hastings, to Dr. J. D. de Castello, of the U. S. N., late surgeon of the Rodgers. The doctor has gone East to seek a year's leave of absence, and the wedding will take place as soon after his return as possible. Miss Lillie is the sister of Mrs. Colonel Catherwood and Mrs. W. S. Keyes. Mr. and Mrs. C. P. Huntington and Miss Huntington and Miss Stoddard, of New York, accompanied by E. H. Pardee, also of New York, have been spending a portion of the present week at Monterey. Mr. and Mrs. S. F. Thorn have returned from Sonoma County. Harry Durrow, Charles Cole, George H. Redding, Frank P. Wilson, and Leon D. Smith, who went to Shasta and McCloud River two weeks ago, and who were upset in a coach and all bruised or otherwise hurt, have all returned and claimed that they have had a good time, notwithstanding the episode not put down in the programme. Mrs. Shreve has again gone to Monterey. J. H. Jewett and N. D. Rideout and family, of Marysville, have returned from Monterey. Mr. and Mrs. A. N. Towne and Mrs. I. N. Requa returned from the Yosemite Valley on Thursday last. Doctor and Mrs. E. T. Wilkins, of Napa, who have been visiting Monterey, and also friends in this city, have departed for home. Mrs. Senator John F. Miller and Miss Dora Miller leave London for New York in a few days. Mr. and Mrs. George F. Wheaton, of Oakland, are at Monterey. Mrs. Captain W. M. Moor returned from Monterey on Monday last. Mr. and Mrs. E. M. Hunt, Mr. and Mrs. Henry L. Dodge, and Miss Mollie Dodge have returned to the Palace from Monterey. C. F. Fargo and the Misses M. and F. Fargo, returned from Monterey on Monday. Mr. and Mrs. Schmiedell and daughter returned to the Palace from San Rafael a few days ago. Charles McLaughlin returned from the Yosemite on Thursday last. Mr. and Mrs. A. Jenckes returned from Lake Tahoe to the Grand a few days ago. Mrs. A. H. Rutherford and family and Miss Jennie Hanchett returned from Monterey on Monday last. The Misses Roberts, who have been living at Tuhbs's Hotel, Oakland, have taken up their permanent residence at the Grand. Mr. and Mrs. W. E. Dean, Mr. and Mrs. W. A. Bray, and Miss Bray returned from the sea-shore on Monday last. Mrs. H. C. Hooker returned from Monterey during the week. Mrs. Delehanty, wife of Lieutenant Delehanty, U. S. N., has returned to the Grand. Mrs. Greeley, wife of Lieutenant Greeley, of Arctic exploring fame, has returned from Clear Lake, and is visiting Mr. and Mrs. Collier, on Van Ness Avenue. Mr. Mackay returned from the Yosemite on Saturday last. Mrs. George H. Rice is at Lake Tahoe. Mrs. James Phelan and Miss Mollie Phelan, her daughter, have arrived in Brooklyn, N. Y., where Mrs. Phelan has a sister, who visited San Francisco and Santa Cruz last summer. Mrs. S. D. Hovey is spending a few days at Monterey. Mr. and Mrs. George S. Ladd have also been visiting Monterey. Captain N. T. Smith and wife, of Menlo Park, have returned from Monterey. Mrs. F. G. Berry, Miss M. F. Berry, and Miss M. S. Berry went to Monterey on Saturday last. Mrs. M. D. Boruck has been visiting Sacramento. Miss Jennie Morgan, of Sacramento, is visiting in this city. Mrs. S. M. Bostwick, of Sacramento, has gone to Shasta to remain until October. Mr. and Mrs. John Boggs, of Colusa, have been visiting Monterey. Mrs. E. J. Bowen has returned from Monterey. Mr. Barron and family, of Santa Clara County, have taken up their residence at the Palace. Mr. and Mrs. Knight, of Marysville, have gone to Santa Cruz to remain a few weeks. Miss Hattie Rice has returned from Tahoe. Mrs. George K. Fitch has been spending a few days at Monterey. Colonel and Mrs. J. H. Dickinson have been the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Wetherbee, at Fruit Vale, during the present week. General Stoneman has returned to Los Angeles; Mrs. Stoneman is at San Rafael. Truxton Beale has returned from Tejon. Mrs. T. E. Rowan, of Los Angeles, accompanied by her son and Miss Rowan, is visiting in this city. Mrs. W. M. Siddons and her two daughters, the Misses Nellie and Daisy, went to Monterey on Tuesday last. The Misses Mary and Bertie Stanton, of Sacramento, are visiting friends in Alameda the present week. Albert Castle is at present staying in Paris. Mrs. J. G. Hoyt and child and Mrs. A. E. Hoyt, of Oakland, are spending a few days in Santa Cruz. Mr. and Mrs. O. F. Willey took their departure on August 1st for Lake Tahoe, for an extended trip.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

In answer to the question as to whether General Stoneman drew mileage while traveling in government employment on a journey for which he was provided with a pass by the Central Pacific Railroad Company, we have received the following:

PRESIDIO, July 29, 1882.—General George Stoneman is a colonel, U. S. A., retired. Being a retired officer, he could not draw mileage for any journey that he might perform. Respectfully,
GEORGE P. ANDREWS, Lieutenant-Colonel First Artillery.

As this is not in accord with the statement made by General Stoneman to a personal friend of the editor of the Argonaut, we reserve to ourselves the privilege of hoping that the general will deem it appropriate for himself to state the facts concerning the matter. The law allows him the freedom of all railroads in this State while in performance of his duties as Railroad Commissioner. If under any other circumstances he has availed himself of free railroad passes to travel to the East and back with his family, on a trip of pleasure or of business connected with any other employment, then we may be permitted to remark that his attitude of hostility to corporations is not as pronounced as the political orators of his party would have us believe. That he has traveled on free passes during the past four years, and that by means of one he came and returned from the State Convention, where he was nominated as an anti-railroad candidate, we believe to be a fact. If General Stoneman can reconcile his acceptance of railroad favors with his attitude of political hostility, our columns are open for his explanation.

Lord Dundreary's story of the tail wagging the dog has its application in the Republican party of California. There are more independent than machine votes in it. The independent tail can always wag the party dog, whenever it undertakes the task. It may bark, and whine, and attempt to bite; but it must wag all the same. There is no safety in attempting to cut off the tail, for just as likely as not it will happen that the tail will be cut off so near the ears that it will look as though the party had lost its head.

If the accounts in the daily papers may be relied upon in reference to the proceedings of Mr. R. G. Sneath and the defunct bank of which he was president, then Mr. Sneath's conduct is especially reprehensible. We take it that a man who is honest, and has nothing to hide in the settlement of business accounts, is never called upon to play the bully or the blackguard. We take it also that when a brave man feels that he is in the right, and does undertake either rôle, he is not restrained by the presentation of a pocket-pistol. There are divers morals to be drawn from these oft-recurring scimmages among business men and merchants, and one is that in the exhibition of temper and use of bad language they are not upon a much higher plane than the seventh ward politicians. If this had been a political ward meeting, and R. G. Sneath had been a boss in the minority, some stalwart would doubtless have taken him by the slack of his trousers with a pair of tongs and dropped him out of the window. Sneath is unfortunate in his intercourse with business men. He is always in a quarrel, but curiously enough, in all the controversies and contentions that have distinguished his career he has always been in the right, and everybody else in the wrong. He is the amiable twelfth juror with whom the obstinate eleven refuse to agree.

Mrs. Pitts-Stevens is gaining a reputation for eloquence and marked ability in her field of temperance labor. Her recent lecture at Children's Hall, in this city, was largely attended by an intellectual and appreciative audience, all of whom agreed in bearing testimony to her ability as an orator, and her zeal in the temperance cause.

We commend to our readers a careful perusal of the communication on the débris question in this issue of the Argonaut. It is an able presentation of an important question—a question that is destined to become a leading political issue. If there is any answer that can be made to the agricultural and commercial side of this débris argument, we have yet to hear it. In our opinion, one agricultural township is of more real value to the world than all the gravel mines in the Sierra. The valley lands of the Sacramento are worth more than all the mines of the Sierra. When Judge Temple suggested impounding débris, as a compromise with the law, he made a mistake. It was his duty to announce the law, and let the consequences take care of themselves. Brush dams, or any kind of dams, is a delusion. When the mines are exhausted there will be no one interested to maintain them, floods will destroy them, and the accumulated débris will be a continued source of future injury to the valley lands, navigable streams, and the harbor of San Francisco. Gravel mining should be arrested.

The Board of Supervisors has authorized a sign-painter to enclose the Lotta fountain for three weeks with a high board fence, which he may use for advertisements. Some of our journals complain. Not so we. It would suit us if the Lotta fountain could be perpetually hidden from sight, for a more absurd piece of cheap iron was never set up in a city to commemorate the parsimony and vanity of a very common-place actress. It is an offense to good taste, and ought to be taken down.

At a recent temperance meeting held at St. Paul, Minnesota, by "The National Roman Catholic Total Abstinence Union," Bishop Ireland in his oration said: "The woes of the people of Ireland are mostly brought about by intemperance, and if they could be made temperate and kept so for fifteen years, they could buy out the entire island with the money they would otherwise spend for strong drink." We wish the Ireland Irish would make an effort in this direction, and if the American Irish would stop drinking whisky, save their money, and send it to Ireland, the whole business would be done in ten years. If the Pope's American Irish would let our politics alone, give up their Land-League meetings, and stop drinking whisky, we will agree on our part to abstain from calling attention to their ignorance and bigotry, and encourage them to purchase Ireland, so that they may all go home. This would make a millennium in America and a Donnybrook in Ireland. We thank Bishop Ireland for the happy suggestion. In this connection let us be just enough to say that the earnest efforts of the Roman Church in the direction of temperance reform might be profitably imitated by our Protestant clergy.

Egyptian affairs have not materially changed within the week. The English are actively preparing for war. Arabi Bey is seemingly gaining popular strength, and has improved his military position. The Turk is making ready to invade Egypt with a stronger force than the English think desirable, hence they are evidencing a lack of faith in the sincerity of the Sultan. There is a curious and not very well authenticated rumor of a large host of Bedouins from the Soudan approaching Cairo under the leadership of a new prophet, who claims, as all Moslem prophets do, that he is a lineal descendant of Mahomet. The only skirmish that has taken place between the English and Egyptians is an admitted English defeat. The news comes through English sources. Cairo, the principal city of Egypt, is loyal to Arabi Bey. A serious war is now probable, with England to have the laboring oar.

Major McQuiddy, of Mussel Slough fame, is suggested by the Post as an appropriate candidate for governor for the Greenback wing of the Democracy. As indicated by his portrait, he is a handsome man, about twenty-eight years of age, with classic, clear-cut features of the Roman type; glossy, coal-black hair, and flowing beard. He was a hero in the civil war, and patriot on the Southern side. He served under Jackson and Price in Missouri; made Kansas bleed; and is a Christian gentleman of the Campbellite persuasion. In politics he is a consistent Democrat, and is grand-master of the Settlers' League. He is under indictment for crime, and has for some years successfully evaded service of a writ of arrest by the courts. The Post thinks the major would make a good anti-monopoly candidate for governor; and we agree with the Post, that any man who could attain distinction in the rebellion by service with Quantrel or Price, and can successfully evade the writ of a United States court for years, and successfully maintain possession of land he does not own, and has not paid for, is a very good type of Democrat, and one whom the non-rent-paying, Land-League Irish, the law-breaking members of the "League of Freedom," the rioters of the Sand-Lot, the tramps, and the party camp-followers could consistently and enthusiastically support. The only trouble about the major is that he could not well stump the State for fear of arrest; but the moment he became governor he could pardon himself.

Mr. Adolph Sutro is just now getting a little cheap advertising and undeserved notoriety by an article going the rounds of the newspapers that he is going to build a costly palatial sea-side hotel in San Francisco. Mr. Sutro has spent a few hundred dollars in grading a hill-top near the ocean, and planting trees upon it. He has left the State for a prolonged absence in Europe, and has no immediate, or at any time well-defined, intention of building a hotel at all. All the newspaper compliments to his enterprise and public spirit are simply journalistic rot. Sutro is a land-speculator in the suburbs of our city, bolder land for other men's enterprise to give value to; just one of the kind of non-resident land-speculators the less of whom we have the better.

The movement of one county in instructing its delegates at the State Convention to vote for the Hon. James McM. Sbafter for governor, is an indication of a movement in the right direction. Delegates instructed for such men as Sbafter of Marin, Russ of Humboldt, Rhodes of Santa Clara, Reed of Yolo, Blake or Swift of San Francisco, Felton of San Mateo, Bard of San Buenaventura, Mansfield of Los Angeles, or ex-Senator Booth of Sacramento, could easily compromise and agree. With either of these gentlemen as a candidate, and with an open and manly declaration of right principles as a platform, the Republican party can carry this State. With a machine candidate "straddling the blind," and nominated by the worthless party camp-followers who pursue politics for loot, party plunder, and under promises of patronage to every political loafer who may do dirty work for him, the chances of Republican success are slim. Remember the Gorham campaign, for sometimes history repeats itself.

That branch of the Workingmen's party which meets at Metropolitan Temple, and is under the direction of Dr. Kalloch, is right in declaring that the Chinese question is not a dead issue, and that a governor should be chosen who would enforce proper quarantine laws, and a mayor for San Francisco who would enforce municipal ordinances to restrain Chinese nuisances within legal bounds. The Chinese question will become a very live issue unless the authorities, in the utmost good faith, endeavor to carry into effect all laws restricting Chinese immigration, and refrain from passing any laws or ordinances that shall unduly encourage the Chinese to remain among us. The Metropolitan branch of the Workingmen's party is wise in bolder itself as a political reserve to wield the balance of power in favor of the party that takes the most advanced position upon all labor questions.

The Democratic orators are endeavoring to ignore the Sunday law issue. They are determined to evade it. In all their speeches they omit allusion to it. This is all very well, and will do for tactics until the Republican platform is made, candidates nominated, and the party artillery placed in position. They will then be compelled to face the music. The Examiner, in its issue of Wednesday, August sixth, in the fourth column of the first page, says: "This outcry against the repeal of the Sunday law is a tempest in a teapot, gotten up by a few Pharisees, Puritan fanatics, and demagogues. THIS LAW IS ESSENTIALLY EVIL, AND SHOULD BE ABOLISHED. * * * This law brings contempt on all other laws so long as it defaces the statute book. IT IS A DEAD LETTER AND A REPROACH." The Examiner is the organ of the party. Will the stump-speakers please paste this extract in their hats, and answer it?

VANITY FAIR.

It was something of a disappointment at a fashionable Philadelphia garden, when the favors, dainty satin jewel-cases, each supposed to contain an artistic gold bracelet, were opened, and all found to be empty. Some thief had managed in an inexplicable way to steal all the pretty portebonheurs just before the dance begun.

Newport ladies go on yachting parties and boating excursions as elegantly and elaborately dressed as if for a reception or high tea in the midst of the winter season. Mr. Howells will therefore have to costume his future heroines in some other dress than the dainty blue flannel which the heroine of "The Lady of Aroostook" wore, and which was so unknowingly appropriate for a voyage on the "blue and vasty deep."

Some of the girls at the Eastern watering-places are using for parasols Japanese umbrellas, coated with a dazzling glaze, says the Philadelphia Progress. When the dear creatures lay these charming inventions over their shoulders and whirl them carelessly about, the sun's rays are sent frolicking into the eyes of everybody within a good many yards, and the effect, if not pleasing, is astonishing. The small boy with a piece of looking-glass is suspected of the trick, but for once the small boy is innocent. These umbrellas, be it understood, are usually owned by girls who have advanced beyond their twenties.

It is the thing for smooth terriers to be adorned with a little plain gold bracelet soldered above the fore foot, and surmounted with a monogram, says the London Globe. Rough terriers, on the other hand, must wear a collar having a medallion or clasp, sometimes containing a photograph of the owner or of some particular friend of hers. What a delicate compliment to a dear friend to let your pet dog wear her picture around its neck! It is also ordained in swell society for every dog having any claims to be well cared for to wear tail boots when he goes out walking, and these must be made of doe-skin, with rubber rings.

"Kadsura," a perfume extracted from a Japanese blossom of subtle fragrance, is just now the perfume par excellence of Parisian society, and looked upon as an indispensable item of toilet. The contents of the wardrobe and lace corbeille are sprinkled with a few drops of Kadsura. Handkerchief and glove-boxes have a little roll of Kadsura-steeped wadding inserted between the linings. Sachets have Kadsura powder plentifully sprinkled between the folds of painted satin or costly embroideries. Kadsura soap and cream has the first place on the dressing-table, and even the writing and work-table, what-not, and print or picture-easels breathe Kadsura.

A very pretty novelty in jewelry has made its appearance East within the last few weeks. It consists of leaves in diamonds, the foliage of some flowering plant, such as a rose, a lily-of-the-valley, a violet, etc. In the centre of the spray a small gold socket is arranged to hold a real or an artificial flower of the same plant as are the diamond leaves. The effect is exceedingly pretty, though some skill is needed to set the blossom aright amid its glittering foliage. The lily-of-the-valley lends itself admirably to this combination, the long, narrow leaf in diamonds forming a charming background for the delicate white bells of the flower. A spray of diamond rose-leaves surrounding a splendid crimson natural rose is also very handsome.

The jeweled garter craze has reached St. Louis. A jeweler there said to a reporter: "We are executing several large orders in diamonds this month, one of them being a particularly handsome pair of garter clasps for the wife of a Texas railroad manager. There is a growing demand for garter clasps for presents to ladies, and I expect to see them the craze during the holidays. These clasps are made up very elaborately, with monograms and jewels, and all that sort of thing, and must look very handsome when worn. You'd be surprised if I told you how many we had made for ladies whose names are quite familiar. They are generally ordered by the men for birthday and wedding gifts, and it is really quite the thing to make a present of that kind. Why, one of the most popular hotel men in the city was inquiring into the matter a day or two ago, with a view of having a pair made to send to some young lady friend." Query—What degree of relationship, outside of matrimony, warrants the presentation of a pair of garters to a lady?

"There is hardly any change," says Clara Belle, "in the styles of bathing dresses. Most of these garments are blue flannel, and shapeless, as of yore. Indeed, to put on anything that fits at all, or is jaunty in cut, is to invite uncomplimentary attention. It is wise to hide one's identity in a broad-brimmed straw hat and a flannel bag of a garment when in the surf. About the only departure from this that a modest woman may make is to shape the blouse into her waist, without belting, and to shorten the skirt to half way between the knee and the hip; but to do that, unless in the case of a very thin woman, a corset must be worn. Bright colors for trimming are glaring and conspicuous in the sunlight, and should be avoided. So should bare arms, not only because they look too nude in the daytime, but that a single hour in the sun will tan their white skin to brown, ruining them for exposure in evening full dress for a time. A notable attempt at style in bathing was made by a woman at Coney Island who, when you came to look under the shade of her tied-down hat, was revealed as forty, at least; but she was smoothly rounded, pliant, and graceful, and spectators generally mistook her for a young girl. Her blouse of gray flannel fitted her closely from neck to hips, and the skirt was too short to sit on. The trousers were by no means as loose as a sultana's, and ended just below the knees. Gray silk stockings and canvas slippers completed the toilet. Her arms were bare to the tops of her shoulders, and she made a point of flinging them about; but, even more than these attractive members, a profusion of broad, red braided costume served to fix all eyes upon her."

THE STORY OF A HUMAN HAND.

The Gallic Idea of a Scotch Lover's Ruse.

When I tell you that in my story there is a broken wheel and a storm, perhaps you will accuse me of romancing; but I did not break the wheel or cause the rain, and as my narrative is true, I assure you that the wheel of Lord Fergus's carriage broke opposite the door of an inn; also that there was a terrific storm in the mountains.

Lord Fergus was not an ordinary man. That he was a gentleman was evident. Aside from that, however, it would have been difficult to decide whether he were young or old, good or bad, handsome or otherwise. Sometimes brusque, his manners at other times were of captivating gentleness.

Occasionally, without apparent cause, he had sudden accessions of wild gayety or rapturous meditation. At such times all that was obscure and strange about this incomprehensible being was revealed, and seemed to concentrate, as in a double focus, in his eyes, intense, unfathomable, and majestic. His gaze exercised such a mesmeric influence over the gentler sex, that the noble lord always took the precaution of putting on green glasses when he desired to be loved for himself.

It is needless to add that he was generally regarded as a magnetizer. In vain did he contradict this explanation with great sincerity that it was not by magnetism at all, but by irradiation, sympathetic projection, that he sometimes quite involuntarily exercised a sort of fascination over some refined natures. No one believed it, so persistent are the vulgar in wishing to have explained by ordinary methods effects of which they can not comprehend the cause.

Be that as it may. After Lord Fergus had been sufficiently discussed, they all agreed it to be impossible to understand the man. The secret of his power lay entirely in the expression of his eye.

Lord Fergus was dreaming in the large waiting-room of the inn. The rolling of a carriage and the cracking of whips suddenly disturbed his reverie. Curious and idle as are all travelers, he hurried to the balcony, and saw a young lady descend from a four-horse carriage, who, as well as he could judge from so great a distance, appeared to be marvelously beautiful. The lady proved to be the Princess Gelsomina Cordileone. At that moment a heavy roll of thunder shook the house and made every window rattle. The princess, deathly pale and with clasped hands, hurried toward Lord Fergus, exclaiming:

"In heaven's name close all the doors and windows, and remain with me!"

In the midst of the frightful tumult of the elements they were imprisoned for two long hours. Every time Lord Fergus attempted to speak the princess, with a gesture of terror, entreated him to be silent. But if speech were denied them, their eyes were eloquent, and when the last crash of thunder had passed away, their destinies were more indissolubly united than if their acquaintance had extended over a period of years. 'Tis true, they had not spoken, but silent love is the most vehement.

"Milord," then said the princess, "I thank you for the service which you have rendered me. Now if you will be so kind as to order the carriage, my gratitude will be complete."

Lord Fergus with lightning rapidity went to do her bidding, and returning immediately, announced the carriage. The princess bestowed a gracious smile upon Lord Fergus, who bowed profoundly as she passed. But at that moment an expression of pain distorted the face of the princess. She stopped, pressed her hand to her left cheek, and exclaimed, with a suggestion of tears in her voice:

"Oh, how I suffer!" As she spoke she sank into a chair.

Lord Fergus felt no surprise. He had watched her preparations for departure with imperturbable calmness, but understood the language of love too well to suppose an adventure happening to two such powers as this lady and himself could end thus abruptly. I say two powers, for if Lord Fergus had a magnetic gaze, the princess possessed a voice of wonderful sweetness. The human ear has never heard anything comparable to its music. Clear, rich, and vibrant, it ruled, caressed, and inspired. At the first word she uttered Lord Fergus thought: "It is incontestable that if that voice commanded the sacrifice of my life, I should obey without hesitation." Therefore, in response to the lady's plaint he approached her, and having contemplated her with his supernatural regard, asked:

"Are you ill, princess?" and his intense look seemed to add: "Do you think I will permit you to suffer?"

The princess raised her fine eyes confidently to his face—eyes doubly beautiful from the tears of pain glistening like diamonds in their depths. "Yes, suffering intensely from neuralgia," she responded. "Oh, if some one could help me!"

"I will relieve you immediately," said Lord Fergus. "Lift up your head, and look at me." As he spoke he laid the point of his index finger between her eyes. Omnipotence of irradiation and sympathetic projection! The princess, without the slightest hesitation, with no embarrassment whatever, lifted up her head at once, and the operator passed his finger lightly along the right eyebrow. This prelude was so assured, so grave, that the most captious mind could not have refused to recognize in it a power sure of itself and of its infallibility. The princess felt it instantly, and all the sympathetic currents of her nature seemed to concentrate beneath that lovely brow which the light fingers of the operator were caressing. What followed, human language has no words to describe. The whole soul of Lord Fergus had passed into his fingers, and seemed to emanate in waves of electricity from their every extremity. He began by passing his hand over the forehead and cheeks of the princess, scarcely grazing them, causing the delicate skin to tremble as if brushed by a soft zephyr. Returning afterward to the junction of the two eyebrows, he followed the contour of the delicate arches with his thumb, swept, going back, the cheeks, and upward to the inner canthus of the eye, to touch lightly the nose, glide along the upper lip, linger a moment at the corner of the mouth, and reach at length the centre of the chin, where he stopped.

Lord Fergus, as an experienced operator, had reasons for stopping thus at this first phase—preliminary phase, in fact—for in starting anew from the chin, the operator became more energetic and animated. He had sometimes encountered caprice and resistance from the sick who were unable to hear his irradiations. He hesitated, then, to observe the result of his efforts. But in this case the expectant and completely resigned expression of the lady left him in no doubt; and after remaining a moment with head thrown back and eyes closed, in order to collect his powers, he resumed his magnetic manipulations. Having laid both thumbs upon the chin, he described a fan with the fingers of each hand, enclosing the cheeks of the princess within it, moved his hands gently over all the surface of the face, slowly raising them to the temples, and lowering them until they glided below the ear to the back of the neck, and met in the fine, soft hair. He then requested the princess to move her head gently, that he might advantageously press and rub the cervical articulations and muscles. This movement had also the advantage of permitting the fingers to be thrust more deeply into the capillary mass, which is preëminently adapted for the transmission of electricity, as every one knows. The fingers of Lord Fergus executed then, in the perfumed tresses where they were buried, a series of passes exquisitely delicate. It was, in fact, the decisive moment of the operation, for the cure entirely depended upon the perfect correspondence between the fullness of the rachidian bulb, situated at the base of the brain, and the depletion of the nervous ganglions of the zygomatic arch, whose plethora occasioned the neuralgia in question. This finished, he undertook the third and last part of the operation, by far the most beautiful of all. His face expressed an inspiration truly august. As his hands fluttered over the surface of this almost divine face, he resembled an artist designing an angel's face, or a sculptor modelling the head of a goddess. He, with beating heart, and cheeks red with enthusiasm, seemed like Pygmalion animating his statue. At last, in a transport of power and triumph, placing the index finger of his right hand between the eyebrows of the princess, he said, with the air of a conqueror:

"You are cured."

The lady, lifting her magnificent eyes to his face, and taking his hand, replied in her melodious voice:

"It is true. I thank you."

And rising, she went to the stairway leaning upon the arm of the lord. He conducted her in perfect silence to her carriage. The postilion was already in the saddle. She stepped into the post-chaise, offered her hand to Lord Fergus, who kissed it respectfully, and said:

"Drive on."

"Princess," observed Lord Fergus, "the hand which has rested on your face shall never touch anything else. I dedicate it to you." And before she could reply he made the signal of departure to the postilion, and howed deeply; after which he reëntered the inn, and remained dreaming before the fire until a late hour of the night.

* * * * *

Eight days later the Princess Gelsomina was established in a little secluded village of Tyrol. A man on horseback, who claimed to have come from Berne by easy journeys, was inquiring for her. Riding up to the door of the inn, he leaned from his saddle, called for the inn-keeper, and asked:

"Is the Princess Gelsomina Cordileone here?"

"She is."

"Is she in her room?"

"Yes."

He dismounted, went upstairs, was introduced, and drawing a small case of white wood from a game-bag which he carried, presented it to the amazed lady, saying:

"This is from Lord Fergus Mac-Forlar."

Giving her no time to ask any particulars, he hastily descended the stairs, leaped upon his horse, and set off at a gallop. The princess, greatly agitated, ordered her servant to open the box. Having taken off the cover with many precautions, he informed her that it contained a package. The princess immediately dismissed him. As soon as she found herself alone she feverishly lifted from the case an object enveloped in white cambric. The cambric removed displayed an envelope of violet satin, with the arms of the princess and another person embroidered in silver upon it. Under the folds of satin something hard and angular was delineated. The lady unfolded the satin, and a silver box exquisitely chased, shaped like an Egyptian sarcophagus, appeared before her eyes. A tiny golden key hung from one of its feet. The princess took it off, inserted it in the lock, and opened it.

Upon a crimson velvet cushion bordered with a fringe of fine pearls, lay a human hand. The hand bore upon the little finger a ring, whose setting was a magnificent bezel stone. The princess gazed a moment spell-bound, then carefully reclosing the sarcophagus, and concealing the key in her bosom, she shrieked aloud. After which she threw herself upon a couch, arranged the folds of her dress, rang for her maid, and fainted. That hand was the right hand of Lord Fergus; that bezel, was the ring of Lord Fergus! In two hours she left the village, and was never seen there more.

We will not attempt to depict the state of maddening love in which this fantastic and surgical gift had plunged the unfortunate Gelsomina Cordileone. Never before did horror, astonishment, gratitude, and pity so blend in a woman's heart. Many a man had offered her his hand, but to have it amputated and present it to her upon a velvet cushion fringed with pearls, was indeed a novelty. In regarding herself in her mirror, she could truly say that no other woman in the world had ever been the object of such adoration. And then, as the hand was perfectly embalmed, she must needs take it often from its concealment to caress it, fancying this the best way to fulfill the wishes of the testator who had willed it to her.

Many months rolled away. The princess, overcome more and more with passionate regret, reproached herself for every imaginable wrong. She had masses said for the repose of the hand of Lord Fergus—prayers that it might grow again. At last she became frantic. Every effort that she made to find Lord Fergus was of no avail; the detectives of Europe, America, and Australia could not discover his retreat.

In the meantime what was the eccentric lord doing? He had bribed all the attendants of the princess; just as soon as she arrived at a hotel he controlled that house; and during all this time he had watched her unceasingly, being concealed night and day in some one of her rooms. From such secret observatories he watched the progress of the malady which he had sown in that poor heart, until one day, deeming the time at last propitious, he stole from his hiding-place during his beloved's absence. Upon her return, the innkeeper announced to her with exceeding candor the arrival of an unknown gentleman. She had a presentiment as to his identity, as may be imagined. Hurrying to her dressing-room, she arrayed herself in the deepest mourning, after which she descended immediately to the salon, opened the door, and perceiving Lord Fergus, advanced a few steps toward him. He with great nonchalance pointed with his left hand to his right sleeve, which hung flat and empty at the end. The princess opened her arms.

But when Lord Fergus sprang forward in a transport of love easy to imagine, she recoiled, and with a cry of horror hid her face in her hands.

"I can not," sobbed she. "I will never be able to."

Then falling upon her knees before the dismayed lord, she explained to him with tears that her gratitude toward him was boundless; that she had passed days and nights thinking only of him; was distracted for being the cause of his mutilation. Since that fatal day she had suffered the tortments of the lost; she had kissed the hand a hundred times a day; had twenty thousand masses said for his repose; prayers in every church and convent in the universe that a new hand might grow. She loved Lord Fergus; adored him; but his mutilation inspired her with repugnance and horror absolutely unconquerable. She would die of it, but she could never be his wife.

Lord Fergus listened attentively. He slowly raised his hand, gazed at the princess as if he would read her soul, and said:

"But you love me. And if my hand had not been amputated you would not have loved me."

The princess made a gesture which signified assent.

"And if my hand were not cut off, you would render me happy?"

The princess assented.

"Will you swear it?"

"I swear it."

"Upon my lost hand."

"Upon your lost hand," responded the weeping princess.

"Very well," said Lord Fergus, solemnly; "dry your tears, and be happy. God has answered your prayers, and performed a miracle. Behold!"

And throwing out his right arm, as a swimmer makes a stroke, Lord Fergus thrust from his sleeve a hand full of life and vigor.

* * * * *

They were sitting in a boat upon the Lake of Como, and as they drifted were enjoying the light breeze perfumed with the sweet scents of jasmine, violet, and orange blossom. As they idly floated they were talking about their courtship. Lord Fergus, with adorable fatuity, explained how he had won her.

"The hand I sent you, my love," said he, "I purchased from a thrifty nurse in the hospital at Beane; a skillful embalmer prepared it for me. The rest you know."

The princess looked at him, and struck him on the lips with a rose she wore in her hand.

"False, false!" cried she. "How could an unsophisticated woman resist such a diabolical ruse? But you remember our first meeting?"

"Yes."

"When I had the neuralgia?"

"Yes."

The princess laughed merrily as she exposed two rows of perfect pearly teeth. "Well, my love, I never had the neuralgia in my life."—Translated for the Argonaut from the French by Mrs. May A. Halsey.

Joseph Sadoc, C. P., Archbishop of San Francisco, makes an appeal to the clergy and laity of his diocese for the establishment of a theological seminary for the education of Romish priests at the old Mission of San José. He announces that "after prudent advice, chiefly from eminent 'directors of Rome, we have secured the precious services of 'learned and holy professors to conduct the institution," and for this purpose he directs an annual collection. Whereupon the Catholic family journal "devoted to the propagation," etc., says: "Woe to those Catholic parents who rob their children 'of their religious rights by sending them to Beelzebub's battle-ground—the public school—when they have Catholic 'schools convenient to their residences. Such parents 'wantonly fly in the face of God by so doing," etc. "The 'Pope commands Catholic parents to send their children 'to Catholic schools. The hishops have all exhorted 'parents to the same end. The pastors in every see in the 'Union have spoken to the people from God's altar to save 'their children to the faith of their fathers by means of 'Catholic education." The church organ admonishes parents that they imperil the souls of their children by allowing them to attend the godless public schools, and advises them to withdraw their children, and send them to private and parish schools, taught by Jesuit fathers and Christian brothers, and by Sisters of Presentation, Mercy, Charity, Notre Dame, Holy Names, Sacred Heart, Saint Ursula, etc. If our public schools are such propagandas of the devil as this slanderous and lying organ of the Romish Church declares them to be, why does not the church, through its pope and prelates, its archbishops and priests, its editors and politicians, recommend Catholics to vacate their positions as school superintendents, teachers, janitors, carpenters, etc.? Why permit good Romanists to live upon the earnings of place in our public-school system, if it is such a wicked thing? Why peril the souls of Catholic school-marms by exposing them on Beelzebub's battle-field? Why are good Catholics so anxious to be elected to our Board of Education? Why is a certain Irish Democratic Roman Catholic schoolmaster so persistent in his endeavor to become superintendent of the common schools of San Francisco? If the "Catholic family journal, devoted to the propagation," etc., is not too busy, we hope it will answer these conundrums.

TWO MAIDENS AT TAHOE.

An Intercepted Letter, Telling of their Sketching and Sauntering.

DEAR MEL: Taf and I are sketching up here in this delightful eyrie world. You poor creatures, groping down there in the fog, wind, and dust, are blind to the joys of liberty, else you would pack up and steal away, as we did on the Eastern-bound train. I am disposed to pity, with a sort of superior, self-satisfied feeling, all the unfortunates who can not come up and breathe Tahoe air. Taf, you know, is one of those jolly little people who slip through life, and make friends; so, owing to her amiability and our combined artistic abilities, we have had the entire world, metaphorically speaking, at our feet. We have tramped alone and in company until we have earned the name of "the tramps," and our appearance, after a day's hard work in the mountains, renders the name not inappropriate. If you had seen us on one of our trips to Emerald Bay, you might, if you were clever, describe it, but as for me, being quite the contrary, I fear I shall find it hopeless.

We started off at what lazy people here call an unearthly hour—six o'clock—being taken in tow by a jolly crowd of fishermen, who promised to deposit us in a convenient spot, and call for us in the evening. With spread umbrellas, and all sails—colors I might say—set, with a last cheery call to our fisher friends, who providentially or otherwise kept the lunch, we began work. But the giants of the Sierra were laughing at our puny efforts to depict their rock-bound castles, and in their merriment resorted to their ten-pin rolling to frighten us. The echoes of their goblin laughter floated down from the cañons on the rising wind, and the thunder of their balls, reverberated from every mountain, and seemed crashing through the walls of stone and floors of granite. Presently the rain descended, and we were drenched. The boatmen came disconsolately in with a string of fish to the fire which we had lighted of pine cones and branches. The thunder peals grew less and less frequent, the wind subsided, the sheet of emerald at our feet resumed its liquid glancing in the sunshine, the broiling trout sizzled on the coals, and we crept out from our leafy shelters to gather hungrily about the well-spread lunch, and in the popping of corks and merry jests we forgot our bedraggled condition, and laughed, and sang, and smoked a friendly cigarette—we may be Bohemian here, and not shock the proprieties; but all too soon, for the clouds closed dark above again, and we rowed home in a dripping condition.

Nothing, however, damps our spirits. We have been crushed by numerous parties, but, like india-rubber balls, we rise again when released from pressure. So long as we confine ourselves to legitimate business we get on smoothly. It is only when we undertake trout-fishing in the brooks at daylight that we come to grief. Two blooming fishermen—who, out of charity alone, shall remain nameless—inveigled innocent Taf and I into this new trouble. They fired us with ambition to land the "speckled beauties," and got us up at four in the morning. We went out, daintily shod in French boots and the last Parisian hosiery. We walked through a meadow, (let me mention in single file,) the gentlemen leading—you will understand why from the inclosed hasty sketch of Taf. You may imagine my own lovely appearance. Pen could not tell it. We left our friends on the banks of Squaw Creek, vowing in stentorian tones that they were looking straight into the water. I suppose they were, but we heard a chuckle far over that meadow. When we go fishing now, we wear gum boots, and go alone.

Sketching at Tahoe has its disadvantages, but we have managed to outlive them all. There are pleasanter occupations than sitting hours in the broiling sun, opposite a dazzling cascade, with an umbrella three sizes too small, or carrying twenty pounds of color-box and canvas three miles on a stony road—like the road to Jordan—only to find yourself at the beginning of the trail to your objective point, which lies over boulders and crags, straight up the mountain side a mile. It takes an enthusiast to endure patiently the bruises, the scratches, the sunburn, and the ants (with a big A). Each night we tenderly anoint our bruised bodies with mustang liniment and St. Jacob's oil, saturate faces, hands, and emphatically noses with glycerine and other soothing remedies, and rise with the lark as good as new. In turn we have visited all the points of interest. Cascade Lake nestles in the heart of the great mountains, and being more than a hundred feet above Tahoe, rushes into it pell-mell, out through a raging brook, over rocks and logs, and all obstacles. Above the lake are the falls, which are probably the prettiest of any; though at every place one is tempted into saying, "This is the finest thing we have seen." Fallen Leaf Lake is much nearer, being but two miles from the hotel; but when we walked it a day or so ago, in the middle of the afternoon, we estimated the distance at a good fifteen miles. It would be useless for me to attempt a pen-and-ink description of these lovely lakes and bays. At every turn there is a new revelation of beauty. The reflections of great snow-capped mountains repeat themselves in every pond and pool. All along the river banks and lake shores lie the long cool shadows where the sunlight rarely comes, or only glistens with a dancing light which makes the shadows blacker. The bluest of blue skies bends above us with now and then fleecy clouds, which pile themselves up only to retain the sunset glows of tender mellow color, and give us new beauties to admire. Before us always gleams the lake with its ever-varying colors changing from silvery whiteness to azure, then to a deep emerald flecked with gold. Then again it will catch the rosy glow of the sunset, and blaze like a sea of fire, until one's eyes, wearied of the gorgeous color, turn with relief back to the shady grove which fringes the shore. In every crevice in the rocks bloom wild roses, where their subtle sweetness fills all the air. Along the streams great white day lilies, red-throated columbine, and spotted tiger-bells strew the banks with their floral riches. Even the unsightly sage-brush puts on its dainty yellow dress, and vies with the sunflower in the endeavor to make the world aesthetic. It is an embarrassment of riches for an artist where every glance reveals a picture in which one is bewildered by hazy-purplish distances, brilliant bits of foliage, and sleeping pond-lilies for foregrounds, and scarce knows where to choose. One could write on interminably about the drives to nooks and corners, and walks to shady lookouts, but you never would know half their charms unless you came yourself to see them.

I have questioned the natives regarding the legendary lore of the region, but it is wanting to complete the perfect loveliness of the picture. Tahoe translated has the unromantic signification of "Big sheet of clear water," which is a trifle better than Mark Twain's rendering as "Grasshopper soup." "Fallen Leaf" takes its name from one of the warlike braves who led his people to war with the Piutes and other tribes many summers ago. These Indians, who are of the most degraded type, are thoroughly impregnated with superstitions. Many years ago several of them were drowned off the point at the entrance to Emerald Bay, and not an Indian has since ever stood on that point. Strange to say they have no canoes, and never go at all upon the lake in boats, believing that if they should do so they would be instantly devoured by a monstrous fish, which they suppose inhabits these waters, and which they call the "Capitane." They have a great antipathy to having pictures made of them, and when I interviewed one of the squaws as to the possibility of getting her to sit long enough to make a drawing of her, she said: "Oh, white woman maky picture taky way off San Francisco, maky ki-iy Indian go die." What "ki-iy" means I have failed to discover. At any rate, I failed to get a model.

When fishing gets monotonous we always have providentially some other excitement to meet the exigencies of the case. A few evenings since a distracted father came rushing frantically in upon our quiet game of whist, inquiring for a lost boy. We listened with a helpless sympathy to his hurried story of how the child wandered away at dusk. We could not help him, for the night was dark, and any attempt to traverse these trackless mountains would have resulted only in new misfortunes; so we drew heart-rending pictures of the mother's agony, and surmised as to whether or no he was drowned. At daybreak the next morning the masculine portion of the community went forth to assist in the search, only to meet the news that the child was found. He accounted for himself by saying that he went out to pick gum, and the moon saw him and went along, and they—the moon and himself—stayed together until he got tired, and went to sleep. When he woke it was morning, and he started home, still clinging to the hat-full of pine gum the moon helped him to pick. When a boy will not get lost to accommodate us we find other less harrowing centres of interest. We have unearthed a thorough-going violinist, who is a most amusing genius. He insists that we do not know how to dance the Lancers in San Francisco, and proposed to teach us, getting frightfully cross and scolding roundly when we did not dance to suit him. He later developed, beside his proficiency in the art of teaching dancing, a talent for negro melodies, and so our impromptu bops wind up with "The Stuckin' o' the Corn" and "Ole Dan Tucker."

This altitude, six thousand feet above the sea level—please remember the height—develops amiability. I have never seen so thoroughly kind and accommodating people. From the distinguished judge, who is here, to the colored porter who cleans our boots, one and all have a smile and a pleasant word for everybody. Even the boatmen and the cooks, who are proverbially cross, here escape the character of their races, and share the general sunny tempers.

Society wings its way to other nests, and has thus far, except for slight and easily repulsed onslaughts, left us in peace. We have had here only jolly, unconventional people, who came to have a good time, and had it. It has not been a criminal offense to go without crimps and crinoline; style does not count, and we are consequently at peace with all the world, and with each other—neither scandal nor dress. It is Arcadia, and we are shepherds and shepherdesses.

I have climbed the rocks and mountains, clambered up to hear the near thunder of the cascades, ridden, boated, fished, sketched, bathed in the limpid waters, lolled on the cool clean grass, told stories around the great bonfire, listened to sweet nothings in shady corners, sung in the moonlight upon the still waters, and yet Tahoe has not palled upon me. With the world and care going by on the other side, we are happy. TUFFY.

Mr. Wolf, formerly United States Consul-General to Egypt, speaks very highly of Arabi Pasha. In Mr. Wolf's opinion he is an honest, and certainly from an Egyptian standpoint, a highly educated and intelligent man. Mr. Wolf, when bidding him good-bye upon leaving Egypt, said: "I hope, your Excellency, that when I return I shall find you well and Egypt happy." "Happy? bappy?" he responded. "One of our sheiks, who had a bad wife, once preached in the mosque, saying 'All who love God and fear their wives stand up.' All stood up except one. Surprised, after the service the sheik approached the man and said: 'You heard what I said?' 'Yes.' 'You did not stand up.' 'No.' 'You must be happy then? Tell me your secret; how do you get along with your wife?' And he responded: 'Who tells you I am happy? You are happier than I. My wife gave me such a drubbing to-day that I can not stand up.' Europe," Arabi added, "can at least stand up, but poor Egypt has a broken back."

It is well known that for several years before his death Emerson's memory was very untrustworthy. But it was with a fine sense of humor that he appreciated the little difficulties caused him by this weakness. One day his daughter saw him diligently searching for something, and would have aided him, but he could not tell what he wanted. His treacherous memory had let slip the name of the article. At last he turned to her with merry inspiration twinkling in his eyes, and said: "It is the thing that people take away." She at once brought him his umbrella, and all was right.

It is proposed to honor the memory of Garibaldi by changing the name of his old home from Isola di Caprera to Isola di Garibaldi, and by building there a hospital for invalid soldiers, who shall be the guardians of his tomb, and a lofty lighthouse, which all mariners on the Mediterranean would know forever as the Garibaldi beacon.

ATTIC SALT.

E. P. Whipple: Wherever you find humor you find pathos close by its side.

John Bunyan: Some things are of that nature as to make one's fancy chuckle while his heart doth ache.

Disraeli: We are now in want of an art to teach how books are to be read, rather than to read them. Such an art is practicable.

Smollett: One wit, like a knuckle of ham in soup, gives a zest and flavor to the dish, but more than one serves only to spoil the pottage.

Haliburton: Fun has no limits. It is like the human race and face: there is a family likeness among all the species, but they all differ.

Sir William d'Avenant: I've search'd records, and can not find that Magua Charta does allow a subject to live by his wits; there is no statute for it.

Lord Bacon: Libraries are as the shrines where all the relics of saints, full of true virtue, and that without delusion or imposture, are preserved and reposed.

James Dyer: Libraries are the wardrobes of literature, whence men, properly informed, might bring forth something for ornament, as much for curiosity, and more for use.

Sheridan: Wit loses its respect with the good when seen in company with malice; and to smile at a jest which plants a thorn in another's breast is to become a principal in the mischief.

W. M. Thackeray: I dare say I made a gaby of myself to the world; pray, my good friend, hast thou never done likewise? If thou hast never been a fool, be sure thou wilt never be a wise man.

Fuller: He that will lose his friend for a jest deserves to die a beggar by the bargain. Such let thy jests be that they may not grind the credit of thy friend, and make not jests so long till thou becomest one.

Charles Lamb: I love to lose myself in other men's minds. When I am not walking I am reading. I can not sit and think; books think for me. I have no repugnances. Shaftesbury is not too genteel for me, nor Jonathan Wild too low.

Anon: A good jest in time of misfortune is food and drink. It is strength to the arm, digestion to the stomach, and courage to the heart. A prosperous man can afford to be melancholy; but if the miserable are so, they are worse than dead—it is sure to kill them.

Sydney Smith: No enjoyment, however inconsiderable, is confined to the present moment. A man is the happier for life from having made once an agreeable tour, or lived for any length of time with pleasant people, or enjoyed any considerable interval of innocent pleasure.

Horace Smith: A library! What laborious days, what watchings by the midnight lamp, what rackings of the brain, what hopes and fears, what long lives of laborious study are here sublimized into print, and condensed into the narrow compass of these surrounding shelves!

Goethe: There are three classes of readers: some enjoy without judgment; others judge without enjoyment; and some there are who judge while they enjoy, and enjoy while they judge. The latter class reproduces the work of art on which it is engaged. Its numbers are very small.

Sydney Smith: Genuine and innocent wit is surely the flavor of the mind. Man could not direct his way by plain reason, and support his life by tasteless food; but God has given us wit, and flavor, and brightness, and laughter, and perfumes, to enliven the days of man's pilgrimage, and to charm his pained steps over the burning marl.

W. M. Thackeray: A great number of my best witticisms have been a little late in making their appearance in the world. If we could but hear the unspoken jokes, bow we should all laugh! If we could speak them how witty we should be. When you have left the room you have no notion what clever things I was going to say, when you balked me by going away.

Ralph Waldo Emerson: A man is like a bit of Labrador spar, which has no lustre as you turn it in your hand, until you come to a particular angle; then it shows deep and beautiful colors. There is no adaptation or universal applicability in men, but each has his special talent; and the mastery of successful men consists in adroitly keeping themselves where and when that turn shall be oftenest to be practiced.

Leigh Hunt: The golden line is drawn between winter and summer. Behind all is blackness, and darkness, and dissolution. Before is hope, and soft airs, and the flowers, and the sweet season of hay; and people will cross the fields, reading or walking with one another; and instead of the rain that soaks death into the heart of green things will be the rain which they drink with delight; and there will be sleep on the grass at mid-day, and early rising in the morning, and long moonlight evenings.

Ralph Waldo Emerson: Consider what you have in the smallest chosen library. A company of the wisest and wittiest men that could be picked out of all civil countries in a thousand years, have set in best order the results of their learning and wisdom. The men themselves were hid and inaccessible, solitary, impatient of interruption, fenced by etiquette; but the thought which they did not uncover to their bosom friend is here written out in transparent words to us, the strangers of another age.

Coleridge: The first class of readers may be compared to an hour-glass, their reading being as the sand; it runs in and runs out, and leaves not a vestige behind. A second class resembles a sponge, which imbibes everything, and returns it in nearly the same state, only a little dirtier. A third class is like a jelly-bag, which allows all that is pure to pass away, and retains only the refuse and dregs. The fourth class may be compared to the slave of Golconda, who, casting aside all that is worthless, preserves only the gems,

PUBLISHERS' NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Subscription, $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance—postage prepaid. City subscribers served by carriers at $4.50 per year, or 10 cents per week. Sample copies free. Single copies, 10 cents.
 The American News Company, New York, and branches, are Agents for the Eastern trade. The Argonaut can be ordered from any News Dealer in the United States or Europe.
 Persons mailing single copies of the Argonaut must affix a two-cent stamp.
 No traveling canvassers employed. Order by mail, or through your local News Dealer.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."
 A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

ENTERED AT THE SAN FRANCISCO POSTOFFICE AS SECOND CLASS MATTER.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PIXLEY - - - - - Editor.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 5, 1882.

CONTENTS:

Page.	Page.
EDITORIALS:	EDITORIAL NOTES:
The Three Great Evils that Endeavor to Defy Law and Order	The Admirable Suggestion of a Roman Catholic Bishop—The English and Egyptian War—The Manner in which the Democrats Ignore the Sunday-law Topic—The Lotus Fountain Nuisance
Good which Prohibition has Wrought in other States, and the Prospects of its Adoption Here—A Lady who Calls the Argonaut to Account for Strong Language—The Dying Gasp of the Bulletin on the Water Question—Are we to have any End to its Ceaseless Vapors?	THE STORY OF A HUMAN HAND
"Flip": Part IV	TWO MAIDENS AT TAHOE
THE UNITED STATES ARMY	ATTIC SALT
CHICAGO NOVELTIES	THE DEBRIS QUESTION AGAIN
ECHOES FROM EVERYWHERE	LITERARY NOTES
OLD FAVORITES	THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS
SOCIETY NOTES AND GOSSIP	THE LATEST VERSE
EDITORIAL NOTES	MUSICAL NOTES
VANITY FAIR	DRAMA:
	Betsy B.'s Letter—London Theatrical Clubs
	INNER MAN
	THE TUNEFUL LIAR

The principle underlying our form of government, that there shall be freedom of conscience and liberty of religious worship, is undoubtedly dear to every intelligent citizen. There was a period in the world's history when this declaration carried with it the assertion of a personal prerogative essential to the enjoyment of personal liberty. This sentiment, recognized by every American as covering an inviolable right, is just now being invoked on all sides for the encouragement of vice and protection of crime. As bedbugs and other vermin breed beneath the wings of hats, so do all sorts of sbams, false pretenses, follies, and crimes hide themselves to breed under the wings of our American bird of freedom. Freedom of conscience and the right to follow it in the exercise of religious worship embodied a doctrine that carried with it a declaration of war against the most outrageous of tyrannies. It was a rebellion against abuses which had long existed. It was the first step to the emancipation of the human intellect from superstitions. It was the first challenge of war against the despotism of the church and the tyranny of the State. It was the first act in the direction of divorce between church and State. It is to be preserved, and its meaning, within a rightful interpretation, must not be restricted. But it must be rightfully interpreted, and liberty to worship God must not be so defined that it will become a license to commit crime and freedom to serve the devil. Just recently a class of very questionable persons, who are guilty of very questionable practices, have petitioned our Board of Supervisors that they may be permitted to play their tricks of legerdemain, table-tipping, rapping, slate-writing, materializations, mind-readings, fortune-telling, disease-curing, and the other humbug tricks which they carry on under the guise of spirit manifestations, without a license, because they say it is their religion. It is undoubtedly their religion to impose upon and cheat their fellow-citizens for coin; but, although this business may involve a question of conscience, it is not an act of worship. The prestidigitator who practices sleight-of-hand, the professional juggler or wizard who imposes his tricks upon a paying audience, the fortune-teller by palmistry or cards, the mountebank of ropes and corded knots, and the vender of quack-medicines, have all the same right to become exempt from paying taxes or license as the class that plays its tricks and practices its lying artifices under the name of Spiritualism. All the religions of earth have been charged with their guiles, and some have flourished upon their well-maintained delusions; but we had hoped the age had passed when a new religion was to be imposed upon the world that had its birth in the cracking toe-joints of the Rochester knaves. It is a church without a church, whose priests are knockers, and whose worshippers are fools. But, after all, the Spiritualists are not altogether without excuse, because there are many curious phenomena that have puzzled the scientific wise-acres, and, while we have just a little bit of indulgence toward the ignorant and foolish, who think they catch glimpses through the gates ajar, we have no patience with the money-making rogue who pretends that he or she can draw aside the black drapery that hangs at the entrance of the tomb, and through all ages has so guarded the mysteries that lie beyond that no human intelligence has caught an insight thereof. Perhaps, after all, the most marvelous demonstration in this direction is by the Democratic party, in its endeavor to catch the vote of the lager-drinking Dutchman, by allowing him to drink beer upon a Sunday, and the whisky-drinking Irishman to keep open his alcoholic hell under the pretense of "freedom of conscience and liberty to worship God according to the dictates thereof." We have beard of libations to the beathen gods—to Bacchus, the wine god, and to the old demi-god, Silenus, bald, flat-nosed, and drunk, riding on a broad-backed ass; and we know that in the earlier days in India, Greece, and Rome mythology gives us the idea of a religion based upon the vine; but it was reserved for Dave Terry and the Democracy to found a political party upon the juice of corn and harley, which in the assertion of its own religious freedom to get drunk on a Sunday, should set at defiance the opinions of all those who for conscience' sake would keep holy the Sabbath day, and for conscience' sake would not get drunk at all. To the Democracy of California was reserved the privilege of declaring in State Convention that the right to sell and drink whisky in an open and licensed saloon on Sunday was a matter of conscience and religious worship—a right guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States; that the right to manufacture drunkards, to desolate homes, to promote crime, to increase poverty, and to multiply taxes, is one of those inalienable privileges so dear to the Democrat in the pursuit of votes—so invaluable and inviolate that organized society, in the performance of its governmental functions, shall have no power to interfere with it, or arrest it, even for one day in the week. Mormonism is our last illustration of vermin that breed under the wing of our American eagle. A class composed mostly of aliens, credulous of the fantastic story that there were found metallic plates with cabalistic letters which dissolved under the inspired interpretation of a sham prophet; gathered from the very ignorant of the world; forming in our West a political colony, with leaders in whom developed the ambition to establish a hierarchy. Driven through crime and treason to the valley of the great Salt Lake, this people have endeavored, in defiance of our civilization and our laws, to give religious sanction to a crime, and to cover polygamic lust with the constitutional protection that secures freedom of conscience to any crime, and liberty to cover any vile practice with the mantle of religion. In defiance of civilization, in opposition to Congress, in contempt of law, and against the direct decisions of our supreme tribunal, this polygamous colony has undertaken to defy the authority of the United States in the practice of a crime under the pretense of religious liberty, and, strangely enough, there were found Democrats in Congress who had the shameless audacity to give ear to this mendacious and hypocritical plea. If the time shall ever come when Spiritualists, Sunday-law breakers, and Mormons can practice their follies and their crimes unrestrained by law because it will interfere with their conscience, we may look confidently forward to the period when incest and child-murder shall have the sanction of law; when the Sutte of India shall be recognized, and human sacrifices be allowed; when the crime of a Guiteau shall have thrown over it the protecting shield of conscience, and all guilt, sin, and violence shall find excuse in the liberty of a religious exercise. There is no crime or folly, there is no human passion, that has not found its indulgence sanctioned by some religion in some era of the world's history. The conscience that finds apology for crime, and the religion that would sanction the overthrow of law, order, and good government, or interfere with and destroy the personal rights of others, must, in the interest of society and good government, be directed and restrained. Hence we say to the Board of Supervisors: make the spiritualists, preachers, doctors, fortune-tellers, and trick-players pay for licenses to bumbug the people. To the people of the State: prevent Dave Terry, the League of Freedom, and the Democracy from repealing the Sunday law. And to the Congress of the United States: enforce the law, and punish the crime of polygamy in Utah as you would enforce the law and punish crime elsewhere; and let these criminals find such consolation as they may in suffering for conscience' sake, and in being martyrs to their religious opinions.

The temperance movement, which has been so long agitated and which has accomplished such unsatisfactory results, has taken a new and more practical direction, and one from which real and permanent reforms may be fairly anticipated. We regard the experiments now being made in Kansas and Iowa as of the utmost importance, involving questions of political and social economy that embody the most serious considerations. Civilization presents no more important question than is involved in the solution of the problem concerning alcoholic drink as a social beverage. To enumerate the evil consequences that flow from the use of ardent spirits is to catalogue nearly all the ills to which human flesh is heir, and nearly all the crimes and casualties which occur to the human family. It is a misfortune that heretofore this question has not been treated as one of practical importance—has not been considered in its consequences by statesmen, but has been left to the control of individuals, and has somehow been driven out of broad politics, and been relegated to the church, the Sunday-school, and the temperance society. Total abstinence people are very good people, and total abstinence societies are undoubtedly useful in their way; but they are altogether ineffectual to resist or remedy the evils that flow from the use of alcoholic drink. The distillery, and drinking traffic, and the immense commerce in liquors laugh at the bodkin thrusts of women and temperance people; sneer at the prayers of the pious, and treat with contemptuous indifference the tears of women and the unorganized efforts of men. Six hundred million dollars in value of alcohol is annually consumed in the United States, and increasing at the rate of a hundred millions in a decade. With its vast millions of capital, and its manufacturers, venders, and drinkers. It comprises an innumerable army of formidable strength. Against such an interest nothing can prevail. Against such a force nothing can attempt successful resistance, except it be a class with greater wealth, and an army of greater numbers, and with an interest as direct and powerful as that embraced in the alcoholic army. This class exists. For every soldier in the army of rum there are ten volunteers standing ready to enlist against him. For every hundred millions of wealth there are a thousand millions of capital willing to be employed in opposition. It rests upon the tax-payers of America. Whenever the men and women who own the property of the nation, and who pay its taxes, shall realize that upon them falls all the burdens of the traffic in rum; that they are compelled to pay this six hundred millions annually for the benefit of distillers, brewers, and saloon-keepers; that the expenses of government, municipal, State, and general, are multiplied a hundred times over by the traffic in alcohol, and that the evil and the expense is on the increase—when they once realize these facts, and once consider them as they consider any other political or economical question, then they will organize. The temperance question will then become a political question. It will be carried into the politics of the country, and when it is, the rum interest will go to the wall. This condition of things is now being brought about. Temperance questions are being considered not altogether in their moral or religious aspect. In England the licensed victualers have been strong enough so far to control Parliament; but the enemy grows stronger year by year. Sir Wilfred Lawson finds powerful allies gathered around him, and the time has already come when the alcoholic interests are content to accept compromises for the modification of existing laws. In the United States the temperance movement grows stronger and stronger year by year. It embraces those who use stimulants in moderation, and those who can not govern their own appetites. But its strength of recruits is coming from the tax-payers, who are unwilling longer to pay for the support of paupers and the punishment of criminals made by alcoholic indulgence. The experiment is in the new and growing States of Kansas and Iowa. The local-option movement everywhere is a new departure. In the States named "prohibition" is sanctioned by the organic law. It is embodied in the constitution, and supported by a public opinion that will elect judges and furnish jurors. It is a grand experiment in the direction of a civilization that for centuries has been under the beel of a ruinous and destructive traffic. We hope it may succeed; and look to it, if successful—as we have no doubt it will be—as a departure in the direction of the grandest reform that has been inaugurated in centuries of time. If the temperance movement succeeds in Iowa and Kansas, it will spread to the neighboring States; it will reach California, and become an issue here. Ours is a vine-growing and wine-making State, and prohibition may not be attempted if control and regulation may be found to answer the purpose. But it is a mistake, which the Democratic party has made in its eagerness to secure the whisky vote. It was a fearful mistake when, in bidding for that vote, it undertook, in alliance with an avowed law-breaking organization—the "League of Freedom"—to trample under foot the Sunday law. It was a declaration to society that its best interests and its most honored traditions must be sacrificed so that the alcoholic trade might profit and prosper. This has aroused men who have heretofore taken no part in the temperance movement. It has alarmed good citizens and tax-payers to ask the question, "Where will the exactions of this traffic stop?" Men and property-owners who are not professors of religion, who do not attend church on Sunday, who have not taken temperance pledges, and who do not believe in blue-laws, are aroused to the fact that the conflict exists, and that, in their own interest, and in the protection of their property, they are compelled to take sides.

If the manufacturers and dealers in alcohol are wise, they will not challenge the tax-payers to this combat, for they have but one place to go. It has now become a political issue in this State as to whether the drinking-saloon shall be favored over all other industries, and be permitted in defiance of law to sell its poisons on Sunday. To do this, to catch the vote of the conscienceless maker and the vile and unprincipled mob of whisky-venders, the Democratic party has resolved to repeal the Sunday law. The Republican party will, we think and hope, meet this issue squarely, and go to the people upon it. It is a practical one, and involves considerations of the greatest importance to all classes of society. When the Republican party shall lose the moral courage to dare to do the right thing in politics, declare the right principles in its platform, and put the right men in nomination for office, it will deserve defeat. To close gin-mills, whisky-saloons, and all kinds of drinking doggeries on Sunday is the duty of all civilized and Christian communities.

From Lexington, Massachusetts, from a lady's correspondence to a relative, and not designed for publication, we make the following extract :

MY DEAR FATHER : I can't help writing you a few words to ask you to tell me what the real feeling in California is on this Chinese question. I know how you and Emeline felt when I was there ; but I want to know what you think now. It seems as if the heads of the Argonaut have been turned. They talk in the wildest way about everybody who thinks our treaty with China should be respected, and they talk in a real Kearney style about Massachusetts and her senators. Even if they can't think as the President and some other wise people do, I should not think they would use the kind of language they have so denounced in Kearney. You see I have no way of knowing anything about the California feeling except what I get from the papers, and that is one side. Do write me what you, and the people you talk with, think about it, and if there is much excitement about it there. When I was there you used to be threatened if you employed Chinamen. Are you now? I have always admired the free, bold way in which the Argonaut attacked the evils of the day. But the language its editor uses in the paper of April 8th I think is beneath any gentleman.

Your daughter,

LIZZIE.

In reply to our friend's daughter Lizzie, we confess and apologize for our bad language in our paper of April 8th ; not to the senators of Massachusetts, nor to the other Republican politicians who forfeited their honor and violated their pledges upon the Chinese question, and who, in senatorial action, repudiated the obligations they entered into at Chicago ; not to the pietists and sentimentalists of New England, who, in their desire to save the souls of the heathen Chinese, would bring them to America for missionary effort, and thereby endanger American youth by bringing them in contact with the vices of this most miserable race, and enable them to acquire habits that destroy soul and body—crimes and vices that feed our penitentiaries, asylums, and mad-houses with the victims of gambling, opium, and syphilis ; not to the merchants and railroad magnates, who, for the gain of commerce and the greed of profit, would sink this country to that depth of social degradation that characterizes the condition of this most abominable of Oriental nations—a country in which if our friend's daughter had had the misfortune to be born, and born of poor parents, she might have been put in a basket of ozier twigs, and sent down the Yank-tze-Kiang to the ocean, as food for fish, or have been reared and sold as a prostitute and slave to ply her vocation in San Francisco at the bidding of some nasty hag ; not to the men of broad acres or manufacturing industries who think wealth the only barometer of a nation's progress, and cheap labor the solution of all questions of political economy—our apologies are not made to these, nor to any one who does not believe that the progress of American civilization and the preservation of American republican government depends upon an intelligent, homogeneous people, capable of becoming citizens and performing the responsible duties of citizenship. To such of our citizens who do not know how the senior senator from Massachusetts spells his name, we apologize. We are not prepared to admit that upon this question the president has shown himself over-wise, and we think that all the world and all the people in it who do not agree with us upon the Chinese question are wrong. Our language in discussing this topic was "plain," and if it at times was almost "profane," our friend's daughter will permit us to remind her that there are certain questions where other than strong language will not do the subject justice. We recall the instance of the deacon who drove oxen ; of the good clergyman with a load of winter apples, going up-hill, when the tail-board of his wagon dropped off ; of the emigrant who met with family difficulties a mile from water, and of the very excellent lady who, coming late to the train, found a profane gentleman imprecating his luck at being left, and thanked him for expressing her sentiments. So we used strong and wicked language upon the Chinese question against Hoar of Massachusetts and others to satisfy those good people who are wicked enough to "think swear," but lack the moral courage to swear out loud with good round oaths of denunciation against the political, puritanical, and commercial villains who would imperil the country for sentiment, hypocrisy, or coin. We beg leave to assure Miss Lizzie, of Lexington, Massachusetts, that we in California think that Chinese immigration should be restricted and discouraged, and that this is the unanimous opinion of all honest, disinterested, and intelligent people. This does not include certain manufacturers and railroad-builders who are making money out of the Chinese, or certain preachers who think they can fool Saint Peter, and steal into Abraham's bosom with a false check for deeds of sham piety and lip hypocrisy.

The Bulletin drowns hard, but we believe it has now gone under water for the last time. It looks very much to us as if it had realized Mr. Mantalini's gloomy apprehension, and become a "demonition moist body." It has fought the Spring Valley Water Company long and persistently. We do not expect to witness any more of its convulsive kickings or struggles against the inevitable. The Board of Supervisors, the Supreme Court, and the public have put it in a bag, tied a stone around it, and thrown it into deep water, from whence not even the thunderings of its own clamor will be able to bring it to the surface. But the dead carcass always generates a gas, and this comes to the surface in air bubbles. It is so with cats. It is so with newspapers. One of the gaseous air bubbles came to the surface in Tuesday's editorial, and reads thus : "There is a streak of communism in the 'business that may yet assume immense proportions. If 'property is to bear some of the expense of the water supplied consumers, it may soon be asked, why not all? The 'stockholders of the Water Company are large property owners. This is the 'poisoned chalice' that may yet be 'applied to their lips. Indeed, one of the Supervisors 'engaged in this business threatened that if the present demand were not conceded the larger one to which 'reference has been made would soon be insisted 'upon. But all this time the persons who are threatened seem to sleep sounder than Epimenides." Epimenides was a poet who flourished some seven centuries anterior to the birth of Christ. He slept, and slept soundly, fifty-seven years. He wrote a poem on the argonautic expedition, which we are sorry to say is lost, as we would be glad to reprint it as an "Old Favorite." Epimenides is also dead. There is a streak of communism in the final disposition of the water question, for the decision of the Supreme Court places the burden of water supply where it properly belongs—upon real property, personal property, and consumers, upon non-resident and resident property owners, upon the owners of improved and unimproved property ; and if the owners of Spring Valley Water Company's stock are compelled to pay their just quota of supplying this city with water by a tax upon their property, we see no objection to it. If the alternative is presented, that consumers shall pay for all water, or property pay for all water, we favor placing the tax upon property, and then water consumers would pay a very large proportion of the whole amount, because they are large owners of property. The practical rule as now applied, is this : Tenants make their landlords pay the water rate as an almost universal rule, and thus the water burden falls upon a few property owners, while the larger and wealthier owners of real estate escape, and the owners of personal property pay nothing. To illustrate the dishonesty of the Bulletin's argument, let us call the reader's attention to this fact, and let him follow the reasoning to its conclusion, and see where this water logic will land him. The Bulletin insists that the Spring Valley Water Company shall furnish free water for streets, sewers, parks, public buildings, for extinguishing fires, and for all other municipal uses, and that the consumers shall pay all that is necessary to maintain the company, pay interest on capital, make repairs, and for maintenance of extension of system. At the same time the Bulletin argues that any other corporation has the right to introduce water from any other source, and not be subject to any of these public duties, because the new corporation or company will not have contracted so to do. Any company or individual may bore an artesian well, build water-tanks, use the streets for mains and distributing pipes, and sell the water to customers without becoming subject to any liability for free water. The Chinese may establish a water company for their own locality, and all these new concerns, corporations, companies, or individuals may not be compelled to establish fire-hydrants, or to use their water for sprinkling streets and parks, flushing sewers, or extinguishing fires, or otherwise contribute water for any public necessity. Carry this principle out till the town is thus provided with water, and the whole private consumption would be furnished from these private sources. The Spring Valley Water Company would still, under the Bulletin's interpretation of its contract, be compelled to maintain its works for the sole purpose of furnishing "free water to the public." All the water demanded by the public for the health of the community, for the comfort of the people, for beautifying parks, for extinguishing fires, and for supplying the public buildings and fountains would be drawn from the Spring Valley Company's mains for nothing, while all the water that should be paid for for private use would come from private individuals and companies. Spring Valley would thus be compelled to protect the city from conflagrations, and to supply water for public use without a dollar of revenue. Does the Bulletin so far presume upon the ignorance of the public, or upon its selfishness, as to believe that it desires anything of the kind? The Bulletin knows, and every intelligent man knows, that unless the Spring Valley Water Company can maintain its revenue it can not maintain its water service. When the money fails, the water will fail. When the income of the company no longer justifies its existence and the maintenance of its reservoirs, mains, distributing pipes, and hydrants, it will shut down its gates and retire from business ; and as this water supply is in another county, and out of the jurisdiction of the municipal government of San Francisco, there is no judicial mandate that can compel it to bring water to San Francisco. It is a plain and simple business proposition that this company will supply our city with water just so long as it pays, and no longer. It is equally plain that all property benefited by the water should pay for its use. To advocate artesian wells, or water from any source of supply, and not exact from the individuals or companies owning them the same exactions as apply to Spring Valley, is neither reasonable nor honest. When this controversy ends, and the Spring Valley Water Works Company can get out of law, out of politics, and out from under the lash of its enemies, then, and not till then, can we hope for reductions in the cost of water, and for such extensions of the system as the wants of a growing city demand. When the water company is placed upon the same footing with all others dealing in this water commodity, and fairly paid by the city for the water it uses, then it will be able to enter into a fair competition with all water-merchants. If this is communism, we are communists. It certainly is not agrarianism. It does not declare that water is not property which anybody may take without compensation ; or if water is property, it does not declare that "property is theft," which any demagogue, political vagabond, lobbyist, or blackmailer may steal or confiscate. It would be just as equitable—for it involves the identical principle—to say that a gas company should light streets, parks, and public places for nothing, for the privilege of supplying private individuals with light for their dwellings or places of business. This would compel the personal consumer to pay for a commodity that is used by the municipal government for the advantage of all. Gas-light is a convenience to all ; it is a police agent for the prevention of crime ; it adds to the comfort and safety of all our citizens ; it is used in public buildings by the people's servants. So much of it as is thus used is a charge upon the general fund, and rightfully so. It is a tax upon all property, and this is recognized as just and fair. To impose all this burden upon the few who reside in San Francisco and use gas, would be unjust and altogether inequitable. We must close this argument, lest our heavy canonading should bring the dead corpse of the Bulletin to the surface again, and God knows we are tired of this kind of literature. We have endured it now for some fifteen years in the Bulletin and Call, and if, like Epimenides, they will go to sleep over the Spring Valley water question for fifty-seven years, we shall hope ere then to have reached those golden clouds where water is pure and abundant, where water controversies are no longer heard, and we shall be content to allow the Bulletin and Call's editors and proprietors to constitute themselves free-water advocates, and pursue their controversy in that other and hotter place where the water question is a more important one than we regard it here.

The editor of the Argonaut is an independent Republican, with enough of pride to think, inasmuch as he is not desirous of political preferment, that the party needs his services and support more than he needs the support of the party. The Republican party can not exist without the aid of its independent voters. Independent voters will not follow the lead of professional politicians. When a candidate for governor makes use of these hirelings to force a nomination which he would not otherwise attain, and to which he is not entitled, the independent voter is absolved from his party allegiance, and permitted to do as he pleases. Application : The editor of the Argonaut has lived twenty-eight years in the same house and in the same ward, and in order to serve his party is ambitious to go as a delegate to the State Convention. A candidate for governor, claiming residence in another county, comes to San Francisco and engages a gang of professional ward strikers to go into the writer's precinct, and, by fraudulent practices, defeat him. This the gubernatorial candidate has a right to do. But it allows the defeated delegate to get into the convention the best way he can ; to defeat the candidate's nomination, if he can, by exposing his associates, his character, and his practices ; and, in the event of the gubernatorial candidate's nomination, justifies the writer in opposing his election by all the efforts which an honorable partisan may put forth. And when the thing is over, it is for fair-minded and intelligent Republicans to say which is the bolter, the candidate for delegate or the candidate for governor ; which the sore-head, the beaten delegate or the beaten governor.

On the Oostonaula River, in Georgia, a catfish twenty-five feet long swallowed a three-year-old calf, and both died. At San José, in California, the Democratic party swallowed General Stoneman. They are now struggling in deep water. We are looking on from the bank in great anxiety. Sympathy is with the calf.

Having given space last week to an article presenting the miners' side of this question, we now print the following communication, giving the farmers' side:

EDITORS ARGONAUT: As you opened your columns last week to a communication on the debris question from Mr. E. L. McClure, of Dutch Flat, written "from a resident miner's standpoint," I venture to hope that you will find space for a reply from the standpoint of a resident of the Valley. It may be dangerous for the Argonaut to invite communications on this topic, as, if it gave place to them all, its columns might become as much choked with debris literature as are the channels of the rivers with debris. The question is one that admits of such a wide range of discussion that it is difficult to deal with it in a circumscribed space.

Mr. McClure's defense of the hydraulic mining side of this question rests upon two main points: first, that the hydraulic miners have the right to prosecute their destructive industry as they have been doing, and second, it is expedient that they should be allowed to so prosecute it.

And first, as to the question of right. Mr. McClure begins by asserting the right to mine, which nobody denies. Dumpage being necessary in all mining operations, he makes the question-begging deduction that the right to mine includes the "right of dumpage." Upon the basis of this assumed right of dumpage he makes it appear that the hydraulic miners are entirely justified in discharging their debris into the rivers. This portion of his argument is based upon a confusion of terms. It is true that all mining necessitates dumping, but the necessity of dumping and the right to dump are two entirely different and distinct propositions. It does not follow because mining can not be carried on without a place of deposit for the resulting debris, that the miner has a right to dump his debris where he pleases. So long as he dumps the debris upon his own ground, and restrains it from flowing upon the ground of others, he is exercising a natural right. But this is precisely what the hydraulic miner does not do. He discharges the debris from his own land in such a way that the streams deposit it upon the land of others, to their manifest injury.

It is, in fact, but reopening a settled question to discuss this point of "right." To the trial of the Gold Rush suit every fact and every argument that some of the best legal minds in the State could bring forward on this point was submitted and reviewed. And with what result? Judge Temple, after a long and laborious consultation of all the authorities cited, says in his decision "that the defendant has not acquired any right to the use of the bed of the American River, or of the Sacramento River, as places of deposit for its mining tailings." He also finds "that the said acts of defendant constitute a public nuisance, in that they are an obstruction of the free use by a considerable number of the citizens of the State of their said lands situated along the banks of said river, so as to interfere with the comfortable enjoyment thereof, and in that they unlawfully obstruct the free passage and use in the customary manner of the said Sacramento River." Clearly these quotations dispose of that pretence of right which the miners set up. It was only the other day that a convention of hydraulic miners at Nevada City formally endorsed Judge Temple's decision. Is it not idle, then, for anyone to assert this "right to dump"?

And now to the question of expediency. Mr. McClure's argument is that hydraulic mining has done little damage; that its continuance could do little damage; that the industry should be protected on the ground that gold is needed to commerce; that the damage caused by hydraulic mining is insignificant compared to the wealth it has produced; and, finally, that the benefits to be derived from the continuance of the industry far outweigh any damages to which its continuance could possibly give rise.

The damages resulting from hydraulic mining may be divided into direct and indirect. Some of the direct damages have been set forth in a pamphlet written by Doctor M. M. Chipman. His researches into the sources of malaria led him to visit this section, and he was so impressed with the evidences that he saw of the destructiveness of mining debris, that he spent two weeks in traveling through what may be termed the debris districts, gathering facts and figures in relation to the damage done. The actual depreciation and ruin directly caused by mining debris, so far as he was able to obtain data, amounted to fifteen million nine hundred and forty-four thousand seven hundred and thirty-nine dollars; there having been forty thousand and fifty acres of rice fruit and garden land ruined, and two hundred and seventy thousand nine hundred and ninety-one acres of other valuable land damaged and lessened in value.

Mr. McClure, it has been shown, is very wide of the mark in saying that "the actual damage carrows down to small strips of land lying along the rivers, and even this can be protected without stopping the mines." The fact is that most of the bottom lands along the rivers, claimed as their own by the hydraulic miners, were long ago buried under debris. Fifteen thousand acres of as good land as ever the sun shone on are covered ten feet deep with debris from the Yuba River. The natural bed of the Yuba was long since filled up, and now the river wanders at will over the bottom lands. The "high" land of the plains is in many places below the low-water place of the river, which is prevented from leaving the bottom lands only by immense levees, whose construction has entailed an enormous outlay. The cost of the repairs and additions annually made to these levees keeps poor the farmers of this district. The same burden of levee-building rests upon the farmers of Butte, Sutter, Yolo, Sacramento, and Placer, as well as those living on the banks of the debris-laden tributaries of the San Joaquin.

In regard to the indirect damages from hydraulic mining, whole pages of the Argonaut might be filled, and yet the subject would seem to demand further extension. In the nature of the case these indirect damages do not admit of anything approaching to an exact estimate. Had it not been for hydraulic mining, who can say what would not be the value of the fat lands ruined, and what the value of their annual products? Who can say what industries would have sprung up in this valley, and what its population and wealth would be? G. G. Briggs, who planted the first orchard in Northern California, has stoutly maintained that hydraulic mining, directly and indirectly, has damaged California to the extent of five hundred million dollars. The famous orchard which he planted, now buried out of sight in debris, would, in the judgment of fruit-growers, to-day be worth at least half a million dollars had hydraulic mining ever been. Who can estimate the mental suffering that has resulted from the destruction of scores of bappy homes? Mining debris has made homeless tramps of men once prosperous, and has sent other men to the workhouse broken-hearted to untimely graves. These are not fanciful sufferings. Witness the case of James Keyes, the plaintiff in the first debris suit, dying in poverty, of grief at the destruction of his home and farm.

All the evil that hydraulic mining has so far inflicted is as nothing to the evil that threatens to follow from its continuance. Should the filling continue in that section of the Yuba River which flows through the plain, the river will inevitably, in some time of flood, sweep across of Yuba County to the Feather River, and on through Sutter County to the Sacramento. Through the new channel thus formed the united streams would flow, and no power on earth could turn them back. Nothing but the restraints of levees prevented this threatened calamity from occurring last winter. Such a catastrophe would inevitably ruin the greater portion of these two counties, and would occasion a serious disturbance to the drainage of the whole valley.

Mr. McClure may ignore the power of gravitation, and the power of running water to transfer its motion. These forces nevertheless exist. They are steadily filling with debris from hydraulic mines the bed of the Sacramento River, and the bay into which it empties. It is needless to go over ground that has often been traversed, and give facts and figures in relation to the filling up of the Sacramento River. A mass of evidence in relation to this point was submitted during the trial of the Gold Run case. Nothing but ignorance or mendacity can explain a denial of the oft-proved fact that the Sacramento River is steadily filling up. In 1875 State Engineer Hall found the maximum filling in front of Sacramento to be twenty-five feet, and the average fifteen feet. Colonel Mendell reported to the War Department, in January, 1882, that the level of the beds of the Yuba and the Bear has risen "to an extent of several feet above the banks. These instances," he adds,

"may be taken to illustrate the ultimate condition of the Sacramento and Feather rivers under a continuance of the influences to which they are subjected. The abandonment of existing channels is a consequence to be apprehended." Colonel Mendell is certainly a competent engineer, and he has never been suspected of hostility to hydraulic mining. And yet Mr. McClure says "the destruction of the navigable rivers is impossible!"

Now for a few facts in regard to the hay. The following quotations are from Colonel Mendell's report: "The surveys (San Pablo Bay) of 1863 and 1878 are distinguished by a deposit of 76,025,000 cubic yards, made to the interval. The depth of deposit averaged over the area of comparison, 2 1/2 square miles, would be 3.1 feet. . . . The mean reduction in width of channel, . . . is 2,820 feet, which is twenty-two per cent. of the mean width of 1855. A comparison of maps of three and one-half miles on the Sacramento, near its mouth, and one mile at the mouth of the San Joaquin, shows a deposit of two million cubic yards in the Sacramento, and five hundred thousand in the San Joaquin, between 1867 and 1878." "A comparison of charts of Carquinez Straits during different dates indicates the formation of large deposits in recent years." (This report was made January 1, 1882.) Enough has been said to show that there is danger of the destruction of the river system of the Sacramento Valley, and of serious injury to the hay. The far-reaching consequences of such destruction must be left to the reader's imagination.

The argument that hydraulic mining should be protected because of the importance of gold to the world's commerce, is not founded upon a very careful study of political economy. Gold is not wealth in any true sense, and its value is simply that of a convenient "counter" of wealth. If all the gold were swept out of the world to-morrow, the world would be scarcely one whit poorer in all that makes actual wealth. Individual loss, and great and general obstruction of business would be inevitable, but in a comparatively short time the commerce of the world would adjust itself to the new conditions, and business might ultimately go on without gold as well as it ever had with it. This point need not be dwelt upon.

The comparison of the damages caused by hydraulic mining with the wealth it has produced, or rather the profit realized on its gold production, can be made only in a general way. Mr. McClure makes some wild statements in regard to the gold production of the State. Nothing but "thousands of millions" will content him, whereas the data of Garnett, Raymond, and Valentine, accepted as authoritative, give an aggregate of about $1,780,000,000 as the total gold production of California since 1847. Hydraulic mining did not begin until 1855, and was not of much importance until 1860. The average gold production of California for the twenty years between 1860 and 1880, was about $25,000,000 a year, as shown by Mr. Valentine's tables. Of this amount the hydraulic mines probably did not contribute more than an average of $10,000,000 annually, between 1870 and 1880, and not more than an average of $5,000,000 annually, between 1860 and 1870. We have then a total yield of $750,000,000 from the hydraulic mines. It must be remembered that this is product, not profit. The distinction is important. Ten men that have lost heavily in hydraulic mining can be found for one that has made a dollar out of the business. It is notorious that there has been far more profit in selling hydraulic mines at inflated prices than in working them. Some of the hydraulic mines that have a tremendous output of debris have never paid a cent in dividends, and probably never will. Many of the hydraulic mines have levied numerous assessments, and have never paid a dividend. But, conceding that the industry pays, it may be assumed that ten per cent. of the total yield of one hundred and fifty million dollars above estimated represents profit. This gives fifteen million dollars of profit. When the estimated total profits of the hydraulic mines (fifteen million dollars) is set opposite the estimated total loss in the valley (five hundred million dollars,) it is seen that the comparison is one that the hydraulic miners should not invite. And when it is considered that the land ruined is ruined probably for centuries to come, the value of what might have been the products of that once fertile land during centuries of cultivation must be taken into account.

The future of the Sacramento Valley can not be described in terms too gloomy if the hydraulic mines are to be permitted to continue discharging their debris into the river. A vast desert without adequate drainage, and incapable of cultivation, the best portion of it would in ten years become. The damage that has already been done is as nothing to the damage which in that event may be expected. Just enough mischief has so far been done to bring the whole of the best portion of the valley, its towns and cities, to the verge of complete and final destruction. Marysville is in jeopardy, and the situation of Sacramento will ultimately be worse than that of Marysville now. The construction of dams in the Yuba may for a time postpone, but can not prevent, the calamity that awaits Marysville if hydraulic mining is to go on. The miners have never claimed that dams would hold back more than sixty per cent. of the debris put into the river above the dams, and thirty per cent. of what may be put into the Yuba annually hereafter would be enough to complete the work of destruction in the valley. The use of the electric light has practically doubled the duty of each inch of water flowing to the hydraulic mines. The amount of debris entering the Yuba from the hydraulic mines was in 1880 about twenty million cubic yards. The introduction of the electric light must have given rise to a large increase in the flow of mining debris. Mr. McClure is quite right in saying "that the remaining gravel to be washed contains but a small per centage of material that can be carried in solution." But if by "solution" he means suspension, he is entirely wrong. Debris is not carried in solution; it is carried in suspension. Only a comparatively small portion of the "top gravel" has been worked off in the hydraulic mines, as a whole. "Gravel mine" is a misnomer. The debris from the hydraulic mines is mainly sand and pipe-clay. Colonel Mendell estimates that there are six hundred million cubic yards of "gravel" workable by the hydraulic process lying yet untouched in the Yuba River claims—a quantity of which could probably not be worked out in less than twenty years.

Colonel Mendell's estimate of the quantity of debris annually discharged by hydraulic mines into the Yuba River is nineteen million four hundred thousand cubic yards. A very simple calculation will show that this quantity of debris would fill Market Street in San Francisco to a depth of seventy-five feet for a length of eleven miles, taking the width of the street to be forty yards. The statement seems incredible, but it will be found correct. The quantity of debris discharged into the Yuba has been estimated by various engineers with substantially the same result. This illustration should convey to your readers some idea of the gigantic nature of the evil that the people of the Sacramento Valley have to contend with.

The Yuba River furnishes the worst example of the flow of mining debris, but there are many other streams bearing detritus to the Valley. These are Dry and Butte creeks, Dry Creek No. 2, and the Feather, Bear, American, Cosumnes, Mokelumne, Calaveras, Stanislaus, and Tuolumne rivers, with Dry Creek No. 3, which with Mule, Sutter, and Jackson creeks, are all pouring their quota of hydraulic mining debris into the basins of the Sacramento and the San Joaquin. In 1880 all these rivers and creeks, the Yuba included, were transporting over forty million cubic yards of debris into the one great interior valley of the State.

There is another point of importance to be considered. There is already enough debris in the Yuba, Bear, American, and Sacramento rivers, below all sites for dams, to constitute a source of danger. Filling to a greater or less extent the river channels, the presence of these deposits raises the flood level. If the dumping of debris into the rivers should cease, the water, being no longer burdened with debris from the mines, would attack these deposits and gradually carry them down to the sea. So long as the head-waters are kept charged with detritus, however, there can be no scouring action in the channels, and such scouring appears to be the natural solution of the debris problem.

There are many other aspects of this question upon which I should like to touch, but I feel that I have already transgressed too much upon your space. It should be understood, however, that the people of the valley make no war upon drift and quartz mining. Those methods of mining do them no harm, and that they fully understand. Enough has been said to show that there is good reason for getting "slinkens" into politics. Slinkens is the paramount issue in this section of the State, and it is hoped that all public-spirited citizens in California will make common cause with the people of the valley, whose homes and whose lives are imperilled by the lawless operations of the hydraulic miners.

MARYSVILLE, Cal., July 30, 1882.

WM. A. LAWSON.

LITERARY NOTES.

Edmund W. Gosse is the author of a life of "Thomas Gray," in the "English Men of Letters" series. Mr. Gosse states in the preface that this volume differs from its biographical predecessors in that expansion instead of compression has been the method employed in writing it. In fact the only other life of the poet which had any pretensions to a biography would fill about thirty pages of Mr. Gosse's book. Gray's life was rather uneventful, one of its chief interests being the poet's friendship with Horace Walpole. The present biographer has, however, made it one of the most attractive of the series. Published by Harper & Brothers; for sale by Bancroft; price, seventy-five cents.

The third "Catalogue of the San Francisco Free Library" is just out. It has been prepared with great care, and reflects much credit upon its compilers. Since November, 1880, there have been sixteen thousand new volumes added to the library. These have been catalogued in eight separate lists: A list of all the English books added since 1880; all novels, and all the juvenile works; the remaining lists contain successively all German, French, Spanish, Swedish, Latin, and the works in other languages. These lists are prepared by single alphabet, including authors' names, titles, and subjects; so that any one who remembers either the author of a work, or its title, or else what it is about, can find by the catalogue whether the book is in the library. Price, seventy-five cents.

Announcements: The forthcoming Round-Robin novel is entitled "Leone," and is a chronicle of modern Italy, written by an Italian. The demand for Miss Edith Simcox's "Episodes in the Lives of Men, Women, and Lovers," has been great enough to justify the printing of an American edition by J. R. Osgood & Co. A new Christmas publication, with a page double the size of that of Harper's Weekly, and wholly unprecedented in the matter of its illustrations, will be published this year by Messrs. Harper & Brothers. Its title will be "Harper's Christmas Pictures and Papers, done by the Title Club and its Literary Friends." A single engraving of a picture by Elihu Vedder, which is being executed for it by Cole, is thirty-three inches by twenty-one in size. "The Life of Ole Bull," which Mrs. Ole Bull is writing, will contain, beside a steel portrait of the great violinist, several engravings from photographs, showing Mr. Bull's method of holding the violin. Mr. Frank Cushing, the adopted Zuni, will exhibit his literary metal in the September Atlantic in a paper on a "Saddle Trip to the Country of the Havasupai." A book which promises to be one full of picturesque interest is "Social Life in the Reign of Queen Anne," by John Ashton. It is taken from original sources, and is to be handsomely illustrated. It is now going through the press in London. J. R. Osgood & Co. have imported a limited edition of Professor von Schiefner's "Tibetan Tales"—specimens of the folk-lore of Central Asia, collected from several volumes of the "Memoirs" of the Academy of St. Petersburg. London, it is reported, is to have a rival to The Century in the shape of a revised and improved edition of The Burlington.

Three new additions have been made to the "Trans-Atlantic Novels." "Lady Beauty," by Allan Muir, whose "Harold Saxon" is perhaps his best known novel in this country, is a rather pleasantly written and chatty English story, with not much plot, but with a graceful heroine. The second novel is a translation by E. H. Hazen from the French of Ludovic Halévy's "Abbé Constantine." Halévy has done some bright work, and every page of his varied stories and librettos gleams with sparkling wit. Any one who has followed the librettos of "La Belle Helene," "Orphée aux Enfers," or "La Grande Duchesse" will realize this. Many of his stories, although cleverly written, are possessed of most dubious morals, while, on the contrary, many are characterized by the greatest purity. Two years ago Halévy sent a copy of a charming and pathetic story, which he had just published, to his little niece, who in a convent near Tours. The Mother Superior of the convent took pains to read the story. So much was she delighted with its religious tendencies that she straightway sent to Paris for a full edition of Halévy's works for the convent library. The books arrived, and were distributed throughout the institution with pious injunctions to read these literary models for edification. The good mother was highly gratified to find that these books were more sought after than anything else in the library. She realized the reason when, two days after, a scandalized sister brought for her perusal the classic book of stories which includes "Madame et Monsieur Cardinal," "Abbé Constantine," the present story, is charming in its style, and irreproachable in its morals. It will greatly interest Americans from the fact that it involves the Mackay family in Paris. The author has clothed the rich American and his family in a rosy tinsel of romance. Mrs. Mackay could ask for no more delicate flattery than the few sketch which Halévy has made of her under the name of "Mrs. Scott." The third novel of this series is by Annie Edwards, and is entitled "At the Eleventh Hour." Miss Edwards will be remembered chiefly by her popular story, "Ought We to Visit Her?" "At the Eleventh Hour" is an English society novel, with a rather striking plot and strong action. The style is frequently too profuse, and with tendency toward the exaggerated emotional. Published by G. P. Putnam's Sons; for sale by Bancroft; price of each, sixty cents.

Miscellany: The Californian for August contains a well-written article by Miss Heath, on the "Society of Decorative Art of California." Leonard Kip's story, "Thaloe," is continued. Edward Kirkpatrick begins a series of interesting papers on "The Basques." A pretty Japanese love story is by H. C. Liddell. "Intellect versus Influence," is by C. T. Hopkins. The usual variety of stories, sketches, reviews, and editorials. R. Worthington, of New York, announces for immediate publication Theodore Tilton's new book entitled "Swabian Stories," consisting of eighteen tales, legendary, historical, and fanciful, some tragic and others humorous, done in various metres and all in rhyme; also Algernon Swinburne's new book, which contains some of the finest poems and sonnets he has ever written, entitled "Tristram of Lyonesse," and other poems.—Mr. T. B. Aldrich, the editor of the Atlantic, is now in Europe. He will visit the Northern countries, possibly Russia, and return in the fall.—That clever satire on the modern advanced woman, "The Revolt of Man," is the work of Mr. Walter Besant, the novelist and essayist.—The two literary brothers De Goncourt propose to found a new academy, of which all the ten members are to be prose writers, and each is to receive a life pension of twelve hundred dollars. An annual prize of one thousand dollars will be given for the best work of the year, to be chosen by the academy. This scheme was arranged twenty years ago, and the fortune of the brothers is to serve as the foundation. The ten members are to be named in the will of Edmond de Goncourt, and as vacancies occur they will be filled by election. Among the first ten to be Alphonse Daudet and Messieurs Zola and Vuilleum.—At an extra meeting of the Brown-Jog Society, held in London the other day, the entertainment consisted of recitations, readings, and music, the words of the songs executed being of course those of the author of "Sordello." Mr. Stanford's settings of the "Cavalier Tunes" are said to have been the most successful.—Mr. Swinburne's new volume, "Tristram of Lyonesse," is dedicated in a touching sonnet to Theodore Watts, the critic. It was written on the third anniversary of the day when the two went to live together at Putney.—Two hundred copies of a remarkable book, "Le Livre de Marco Polo," have just been printed in Stockholm. The original MS.—a relic of the fourteenth century—was taken from the library of Charles V. of France, and is a valuable account of the travels of the celebrated Venetian. Professor Nordenskjöld has written a preface for the book.—Mr. Edmund C. Stedman is at present varying the delights of floating down the Venetian lagoons by what to so true a literary man is as great a pleasure—hard work with his pen.—Ouida complains that the greatest injury to the modern novel is its appearance in serial form, preceding publication as a whole. It compels the writer to sacrifice form and harmony to the object of attaining an exciting climax for each division of his work.—About seven thousand decorations have been given to distinguished persons in France during the past twelve years. It is surprising to find that contemporary French poets have had little share in this shower of honors. Only three lyrical poets, François Coppee, Sully-Prudhomme, and André Theuriot, have been decorated.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

"Handsome?" said the Louisville man; "why, handsome's no name for the girls of our town!" And when a Boston man agreed with him, and said it wasn't, the Louisville man hauled out a revolver.—Boston Post.

"Which is the first and most important sacrament?" asked an Austin Sunday-school teacher of a little girl in his class. "Marriage," was the prompt response. "Oh, no; baptism is the first and most important sacrament," replied the teacher. "It may be in some families, but marriage always comes first in our family. We are respectable people, we are."—Texas Siftings.

"Jack," said an affectionate mother of Stapleton, the other morning, "you really must come home earlier nights. Do you suppose Esmeralda likes to have you stay so late?" "I'll tell you how it was," replied Jack. "You see, she was sitting on my hat, and I felt a little delicate about mentioning the fact." "Very well, I'll give you a bit of advice. The next time don't hold the hat in your lap."—Staten Island Gazette.

Fred Flasher and Miss Florentia Flounce were discussing the mental power of controlling thought. Said Flasher: "I will give you a pair of gloves if you can think of positively nothing for five minutes, and still be awake." "Done," she responded. Five minutes passed. "I've won the gloves," she exclaimed. "How did you manage to think of nothing for the whole five minutes?" he asked, eagerly. "I fastened my mind on your moustache, and kept it there," she replied, triumphantly. The referee awarded her the gloves.—Detroit Free Press.

Colonel Smiketon, one of our prominent railroad officials, was detained at home the other morning by the arrival of a little stranger. When he came down to the office, finally, the clerks all looked up expectantly. Finally one ventured to ask: "Everything all right?" Colonel S.—"Yes." "Glad things went smoothly," said another. "Thank you," said the colonel. "How much does it weigh?" asked a third. "Ten pounds." "What is it, a boy or a girl?" said the first party. Colonel Smiketon (with a look of surprise)—"Really, my son, I forgot to ask."—The Bohemian.

Monselet and Jundt were dining at a table d'hôte in Switzerland a few years ago. Before them sat a party of hated Teutons, who were served with a splendid mountain trout while they merely got a stale pastry. The two Frenchmen gazed anxiously at the fish, while their vis-a-vis as gloatingly eyed the pastry. A happy idea suddenly flashed across Jundt. Cutting the pie in two, he set to work upon his share and devoured it, uttering the while loud encomiums upon its composition, flavor, etc. Passing the second half to Monselet, he said to the latter, sotto voce: "Eat it." "But it is a month old," objected Monselet. "Never mind. Don't you see the Prussians are dying for it? Eat it—out of patriotism." Monselet no longer hesitated, and swallowed the unsavory food with every appearance of relish.—Le Figaro.

"Now, boys," said the teacher, "I need not tell you anything further of the duty of cultivating a kindly disposition; but I will tell you a little story about two dogs. George had a nice little dog, that was as gentle as a lamb. He would sit by George's side quietly for an hour at a time. He would not bark at the passers-by, nor at strange dogs, and would never bite anybody or anything. Thomas's dog, on the contrary, was always fighting other dogs, and would sometimes tear them quite cruelly. He would also fly at the hens and cats in the neighborhood, and on several occasions he had been known to seize a cow by the nostrils and throw her. He barked at all the strange men who came along, and would bite them unless somebody interfered. Now, boys, which was the dog you would like to own, George's or Thomas's?" "Instantly came the answer in one eager shout, 'Thomas's!'"—Boston Transcript.

At one of the Thomas concerts at Chicago the other evening the electric lights suddenly went out, leaving the audience in perfect darkness for a few minutes. This was thought glorious by some of the young couples present, and over in the southeast corner of Section B some one was heard to say, in a suppressed undertone: "Jewbillikens, Susie, what the deuce have you got in your mouth?" Just then the light blazed up again, and a young man was noticed holding his hand over his mouth. A stream of blood was trickling through his fingers, and the expression on his face touched the observer's heart. His girl took something out of her mouth, and put it in her pocket, looking pained and guilty. She led him quietly to the door, and they passed out. Young ladies should not wear their hairpins in their mouths. It is not the place for them, and a wound in the side of the jaw made by coming suddenly and painfully in contact with a cruel two-pointed hairpin at a time when his heart is set on a moment of ecstatic bliss, might result in a coolness on the part of the young man which would be heart-rending.—Peck's Sun.

The other day a hanker at Liège was giving a little dinner-party to which ten guests had been hidden beside himself and his wife, when in dropped a friend from the antipodes, and invited himself to dinner, making the fatal thirteenth. The banker, to conjure ill-luck, rushed down stairs to his office, found the cashier just about to leave for the evening, dragged him upstairs, fitted him with a dress-coat, and led him triumphantly into the drawing-room, amid the applause of the relieved guests, three of whom declared that they would not sit down to the best dinner ever served if there were thirteen at table. At that moment the hell rang, and a note was brought from one of the guests, whose wife had suddenly fallen ill, and who, consequently, was unable to be present. Thirteen again! Gloom and despair; and the cashier, finding himself the Jonah of the evening, volunteered to depart. The banker sees him down stairs, and is expressing his regrets when—joy!—the family doctor heaves in sight. Him the host secures, and happy in being able to offer the hospitalities of his table to his kind-hearted and sorely tried employee, returns to the drawing-room. Dinner is ordered to be placed upon the table, and, just as all is ready, the hostess, who is in delicate health, and who has been unduly excited by all the untoward events, faints dead away, and has to be put to bed. Thirteen again! This time there is nothing for the cashier but to go and dine with what appetite he may at the corner restaurant.—New York World.

THE LATEST VERSE.

The Ball-Room Rainbow.
Fold away my rainbow,
In its stripes most fair;
Keep its fragile beauty
From the western glare.
In my heaven no longer
Storm and sunshine meet;
And those hues so brilliant
Seal no promise sweet.

These are robes transfigured,
Which I wore in days
When youth's trenchant prism
Carved the solar rays.
Quietly dismiss them;
Fold them each to each,
In harmonious blending,
Eloquent as speech.

Hunting-green most royal,
With an edge of gold;
I, a maiden huntress,
Chased through fancy's world,
Beautiful companions,
Quarries to be hit,
Snared them with my splendor,
Pierced them with my wit.

Here's imperial purple
For a brimming heart;
Only two could taste what
Neither knew apart.
Raise the lofty goblet!
Ring the jocund horn!
Time has swept the banquet
For which this was worn.

Here is rosy redness;
Such a blush wore I,
When the youth I dreamed of
Praised me, passing nigh.
Spread it in the sunset,
Hide it in the rose;
My pink day is over,
Shadows veil its close.

In this blue, men saw me
Like a turquoise bright,
With a charm of childhood
In my dewy light.
Summer skies may wave it
O'er a sapphire sea,
No more need to save it
For my pageantry.

Youth's sharp prism sunders:
Age unites in one
Silvery web, that whitens
In the winter's sun.
Fold away my rainbow
In its silken rest;
I of Truth's far glory
An immortal guest.
—Julia Ward Howe.

Caprera.

Upon thy granite peaks—not in the depths
Of royal palaces—I feel the breath
Of liberty—O my lone isle, Caprera!
Thy bushes are my park—and unadorned
But safe alodgment thy imposing mass
Gives me, untainted by the servile crowd.
Thy few inhabitants are rough and rude
As the stern rocks that form thy darkling crown,
And like them, proud—disdain to bend the knee.
The rushing hurricane in this retreat,
Where slave nor tyrant finds a resting-place,
Is my sole concert. Horrid are thy paths,
But by the rolling wheel of insolence
I am not crushed, neither is my pure brow
Splashed by vile mud. Far from all lies, I here
Th' infinite contemplate; and when my eye—
Forever by thought—circles the spaces vast,
To the recesses of this azure dome
That worlds encloses, to the infinite
Intelligence I turn with deepening sense
Of gratitude. . . . (illegible).
For it bestowed upon me th' immortal spark
Which makes me ever kin to the Eternal.
—Translated from a Posthumous Poem of Giuseppe Garibaldi.

Possibilities.

Where are the poets unto whom belong
The Olympian heights; whose singing shafts
Were sent
Straight to the mark, and not from hows half hent,
But with the utmost tension of the thong?

Where are the stately argosies of song,
Whose rushing keels made music as they went
Sailing in search of some new continent,
With all sail set, and steady winds and strong?

Perhaps there lives some dreary hoy, untaught
In schools, some graduate of the field or street,
Who shall become a master of the art,
An admiral sailing the high seas of thought,
Fearless, and first, and steering with his fleet
For lands not yet laid down in any chart.
—From Longfellow's Posthumous Volume of Poems.

Eyes.

(After the French of Sully-Prudhomme.)
Bright eyes innumerable—dark or blue,
All loved, all beautiful—have seen the dawn;
The tombs forever hide them from our view;
And yet from heaven the sun is not withdrawn.
Nights magical, and sweeter than the days,
For eyes unnumbered have enchantment made;
The stars in violet depths forever blaze—
Those eyes are filled with sempiternal shade!

O do not tell me they are sightless now!
It can't be! No; they have only turned Somewhere away from us—we know not how—Toward that Unseen whose name no man has learned.

Even as the astral fires that flame above
Vanish by day, yet never leave the sky;
So for the sweeter light of eyes we love
There is a setting—but they never die!

Eyes blue or dark—loved eyes whose lids we close,
Ye do not die!—ye see athwart the gloom!
Ye ope again to view the awful Rose
Of some vast-deepening dawn beyond the tomb.
—Lafcadio Hearn.

TO HOUSEKEEPERS.

If you wish to use goods of full weight and absolute purity, see your grocer supplies you with

KINGSFORD'S
OSWEGO
STARCH.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER.

WALTER BAKER & CO.'S
CHOCOLATE.

SMITH
BROTHERS'
PACKAGE
BORAX.

WM. T. COLEMAN & CO.
AGENTS,
121 and 123 Market Street,
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

PRIVATE ASYLUM;
For the Care and Treatment of Mental and Nervous Diseases.

THE PROPRIETARY INSTITUTION
called THE PACIFIC ASYLUM, where the insane of the State of Nevada have been kept for several years, will be opened as a PRIVATE ASYLUM for the care and treatment of Mental and Nervous Diseases, on the 10th of August, 1888, the Nevada patients having been removed to the new State Asylum at Reno. The buildings are capacious and comfortable, having been constructed for the accommodation of over two hundred patients, and they are pleasantly situated in the suburbs of Stockton, and are surrounded by attractive grounds of forty acres in extent, with cultivated gardens and pleasant walks. Its advantages over public institutions in facility of admission and in procuring extra accommodations if required, are obvious. For terms and other particulars apply to the Proprietor and Superintendent, DR. ASA CLARK, Pacific Asylum, Stockton, Cal.
ASA CLARK, M. D.
References—Dr. L. C. Lane, San Francisco,
Dr. G. A. Shurtleff, Stockton,
Sup't State Insane Asylum.

GEORGE MORROW.

GEORGE MORROW & CO.
(Established 1854.)

Commission Merchants

DEALERS IN HAY AND GRAIN.
SHIPPING ORDERS A SPECIALTY. CONSIGNMENTS SOLICITED.

39 Clay Street,
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

C. ADOLPHE LOW & CO.
Commission Merchants,
SAN FRANCISCO.

OFFICE IN NEW YORK, 42 CEDAR Street
Liberal advances made on consignments.

S. & G. GUMP,
581 and 583 Market Street, S. F.,
Manufacturers
Mirrors, Crystals, Hardwood Mantles, Picture Frames, and Bric-a-Brac.

IMPORTERS OF GOUPIL'S ENGRAVINGS, CHROMOS, PHOTOGRAPHS, ETC.

CALIFORNIA SUGAR REFINERY.
OFFICE, 325 Market St.
WORKS, Eighth and Brannan Sts.

C. SPRECKELS, President,
J. D. SPRECKELS, Vice-President,
A. B. SPRECKELS, Secretary.

PACIFIC ROLLING MILL CO.

San Francisco, Cal., Manufacturers of

RAILROAD AND MERCHANT IRON

Car and Locomotive Axles and Frames, and Hammered Iron of every description. Rolled Beams, Angle, Channel, and T Iron, Bridge, and Machine Bolts, Lag Screws, Nuts, Washers, etc. Steamboat Shafts, Cranks, Pistons, Connecting Rods, etc. Highest price paid for Scrap Iron.

OFFICE, 202 MARKET STREET.

THE
AMERICAN SUGAR REFINERY

SAN FRANCISCO,

MANUFACTURERS OF ALL
Classes of Refined Sugars, including Loaf Sugar for export.

C. ADOLPHE LOW, President.
Office—208 California Street.

IRA P. RANKIN. A. F. BRAYTON

PACIFIC IRON WORKS

RANKIN, BRAYTON & CO.,

127 to 132 First Street, San Francisco.
Mining Machinery of all kinds, Sugar Mills, Engines—both Marine and Stationary, Boilers, etc., etc.

CHARLES R. ALLEN

Wholesale and Retail Dealer in COAL or Office by Telephone 308.

Agent Pittsburg Coal Mining Company.
118 and 120 Beale Street, S. F.

J. C. MERRILL & CO.,

Shipping and Commission Merchants

204 and 206 California Street,

SAN FRANCISCO.

The Regular Dispatch line of Packets to Honolulu, H. I.

PAYOT, UPHAM & CO

STATIONERS, BOOKSELLERS,
Commercial Printers.

and Blank Book Manufacturers

204 Sansome Street, near Pine.

TABER, HARKER & Co.,
IMPORTERS AND WHOLESALE
GROCERS, 108 and 110 California St.

IN THE STREET-CARS.

"Betsy," said Jack, the other day, "put on your toggery, and let us go take a ride in the street-cars." I know very well what he wants. Jack likes to discuss the human species from this point of vantage, and it is just about the hour when people are beginning to go home.

"Jack," I say, "should you not like to hear the human species discussing us as we so often discuss them?"

But Jack hoots at the idea, and crushes me to silence.

"Betsy," he said, "this superstructure of ideas which you have built upon my fondness for riding in the street-cars is arrant nonsense. I do not go to study life. I go for the air; and I choose the street-car partly because its motion is easier than that of a carriage, and principally because it is very much cheaper. I do not consider that we are a sufficiently peculiar looking pair to invite the discussion of our car companions, and," he continued, with something like a listless drawl, "I have never observed anything markedly peculiar among them."

So saying, he assisted me into the car, and I promptly proceeded to stumble over a basket containing two white geese, which were constraining their necks to look with pink-eyed amazement upon the outside world. Their destinies were presided over by a nervous old woman upon whom the rude hand of toil had left its bard mark. One would have known her to be a peasant from over the seas as surely as if one had met her clattering along a Holland road in wooden sabots. The noise of the streets and the atmosphere of the city bewildered her. Her plain skirts, her comfortable jumper, her green-gingham apron, her red bead-kerchief belonged in country ways and by-places. She was ill at ease, uncomfortable, uncertain, and discovered at the end of the block, after a curiously hybrid discussion with the conductor, that she was in the wrong car; whereat she and the geese were turned loose into the seething throng of Kearny Street, and they became swallowed in the crowd. Remembering Jack's last remark, I stole a glance at him, but he declined to meet my eye, and directed his attention instead to the inevitable two in the corner, who were enlarging upon the chances of the gubernatorial contest. They put their hats upon the back of their heads, clasped their hands around their knees, tossed off considerable information for the benefit of whom it might concern regarding political manipulators, and came to as if out of a state of stupefaction when the conductor stopped to "punch in the presence of the passengere." Each plunged wildly into his pocket, drew out a handful of coin, and fished around in it for a small piece. The one who found it first handed it over, the other gave a brief grunt of thanks, and in a second more they were giving each other the political history of Estee, Stoneman & Co.

As the conductor passed down the line four ladies, who bad gotten in together, and who were chattering away like birds, passed up each her little five-cent piece, and closed each her little porte-monnaie with a snap. Jack smiled in an amused manner.

"Betsy," said he, "is there any generic name for that sort of thing among your sex?"

"Yes," I said, "we call it the Boston treat, or going snacks, and we like it."

"My dear," quoth Jack, "could you bring your strong intelligence to bear upon the matter, and tell me, in a disinterested way, why women are stingy?"

Jack likes to note the points of difference between men and women; but he argues always from the lofty pedestal upon which nature placed him when it made him a man, while he expects me to take a perfectly neutral position. I become in truth the German "it" in our discourses, and must take a bird's-eye view of the strengths and foibles of my sex from an imaginary peak of isolation. I remind myself irresistibly of Charles Lamb, who, among the absurd images which he had a special faculty for seeing, evoked once an elephant in a coach-office coming gravely to have his trunk booked, and a mermaid over a fish-kettle cooking her own tail. I mention the mermaid to Jack, who quietly declines to see the humor of the situation, and repeats his question. So I answer somewhat dogmatically: "Women are not stingy; women are economical."

"Call it what you like," says Jack; "but how do you account for it?"

"Why, easily enough, if it comes to that," I retort, as the conversation drops into short sentences; "easily enough. They have not the segregation of the funds. You do not know," I continue, "what an admiration we have for the magnificent way in which a man draws money out of his pocket, or the rooted antipathy we all have to seeing a little purse in a man's hand. It suggests such glorious abundance, when the twenties and the tens, with a sprinkling of half-dollars, come sociably together at a clutch. It is like a perpetual game of grab-bag."

"Should you call that economy?" asked Jack, glancing at a small boy on the opposite seat. The boy has grown out of knickerbockers a year ago, but he has a round, well-turned leg, and fond mothers with boys legged like this keep them in knickerbockers as long as they can. He wears sturdy, strong-soled shoes and thick-ribbed stockings, and upon the knee of each trouser leg is laid in the most workmanlike manner a patch of stout leather.

"Indeed, I do," I said; "I call it an economy of time, patience, cloth, and temper. This is no poor man's child, and that is no makeshift of poverty to preserve a shred of cloth. I will engage that this boy is the son of a well-conditioned man and an ingenious woman, who are determined to give him all the pleasure that can be gotten out of boyhood, without any of the small worries about patching, and mending, and keeping clean, which make it a misery. I regard those leather patches as dispensers of human happiness, as well as a stroke of ingenuity and a master stroke of economy, and I don't see anything stingy about them." I perorate, somewhat defiantly.

"Why, neither do I," said Jack, amazed. "We got off that subject long ago, and I agree with you perfectly in every particular."

I can not see that we had much of an argument, after all, and this is a man's easiest and favorite way of getting through a loophole.

At this the car began to grow crowded. "Now, Betsy, I am not going to give up my seat unless some one comes in whom I know, and you will observe that the first man who rises to give up his seat will be the humblest individual in the car. The lady who accepts it will smile her thanks as sweetly as if he were a howling swell, and he will cast a look of conscious extenuation around the car which will seem to say 'heartless rascals, you see what true gentlemanly instinct a ragged coat may cover.' This will be all affectation, Betsy, for although this ragged-coat philosophy is greatly overdone, it still has its day, and the smiling lady will affect a democracy of spirit which she does not feel. They say that the increase of education disinclines the human mind to religion. It reveals many shams as well; and among other things teaches how very unnecessary it is to be polite to a lot of people whom one will never see again. I shall coldly and grimly retain my seat, and the man in the ragged coat will tell some one that a well-dressed brute sat still in the car while poor, tired he gave up his seat like a gentleman. Ah! here comes my poor little schoolmistress," cried Jack, suddenly, "I must give her a seat." But some one further down the line was equally courteous a little sooner than Jack, and he resumed his place.

"How did you know that lady was a schoolmistress?" I asked.

"Well," he answered, "to say truth I am not sure of it, but I often ride in the cars with her, and I see that she is a gentlewoman, and that she carries her luncheon with her; also, she has tried a round dozen of ways to make that luncheon look like an innocent parcel of something else. Sometimes it is in a bag, sometimes in a box, sometimes in an ordinary paper of white brown; but I always know instinctively that it is something edible. I know that the ordinary householder does not carry her luncheon about town with her, and that a lady who earns her bread may not carry her mid-day meal in a tin-pail, like a road-maker. Hence I conclude that she is either in the Mint or the schools, and without rhyme or reason I have settled upon the schools."

"You are a gentleman of rare perspicacity and discernment," I remark.

Jack hates to be showered with syllables; but I am spared his retort, for three strangers enter who are strangers indeed. What is that indefinable something which tells us, even in the thronged mart of a city, that people are not of our own burg, even though they have no identifying mark of having come from the Rocky Mountains? These are rather distinguished-looking strangers, and Jack immediately assumes that they are army people. Being pressed to tell why, he does not know, and promptly abandons his opinion. Upon reflection I am convinced that they are theatrical people, and being asked why I think so, I give Jack two reasons.

"To begin with," I say, "both of the ladies' dresses are very stylishly made out of very little material—a trick which actresses alone know."

"The female detective," speaks Jack, oracularly, to the air.

"Secondly," I say, "their faces, all three, have that mobility of expression which grows upon the stage-face with using. If you meet a musician, even not knowing that he is one, you will observe the suppleness of his hands, and that his fingers seem to be lightly hung at the joints. In a trained player's face you will see the muscles couchants, as it were, and ready to spring into action at the touch of fancy. Sometimes I imagine their features enlarge with time, and that the whole face takes on that curious look of use, which is indescribable, and which one finds only in the faces of those who have lived much and deeply, or those who have played the passions in mimic lives."

"Whoa, Betsy!" cries Jack at this juncture. "My dearest girl, when you get launched forth upon that sort of thing you do acquit yourself of more 'dog-gasted' nonsense, to quote from my esteemed Spooendyke, than one could find in the funny papers for a month. Do you mean to tell me that a mere glance at three innocent-looking, well-dressed travelers has primed you with all this?"

But I retreat into dignified silence, and will say no more.

"Betsy," says Jack, insinuatingly, as the car begins to empty, and we near the terminus, "the conductor looks to me like a man with a rooted sorrow. Couldn't you give me a pointer on it?"

But I am not to be drawn out again after being sat upon, and we are well upon our homeward way in a long silence, which Jack breaks at last with:

"I say, Betsy, those Jewett and the Union Square people, after all, for I see that despite your gloomy prophesy, both Sara Jewett and Maud Harrison are to open at the California."

But they were not the Union Square people, and yet I was right. Still, having introduced the Union Square subject, we jogged home quite peaceably, for, with a long dramatic season of seven weeks in store for us, with countless arguments ahead, what was left to quarrel about? BETSY B.

This evening is the last performance of "Le Voyage en Suisse," by the Hanlons at the Baldwin Theatre. On next Monday evening they commence a season of comic pantomime, which will be preceded each evening by the laughable comedy in two acts, "Milk-white." The Mastodon Minstrels at Haverly's California give their farewell performance this evening. On next Monday evening this theatre will be occupied by the New York Union Square Company in "The Banker's Daughter." The Standard and Bush Street theatres are still closed. The benefit performance given on Thursday evening by the Hanlons to Mr. Thomas Maguire was very successful, and netted a large sum. On last evening Messrs. Mayer and McConnell received a benefit from the Mastodon Minstrels, assisted by a number of local artists, at Haverly's California Theatre. The house was crowded by the tens of the two beneficiaries, and the performance was a financial success.

THE THEATRICAL CLUBS OF LONDON.

A writer in the August number of Lippincott's Magazine gives the following description of three English dramatic clubs: Of the three London clubs—the Green Room, the Junior Garrick, and the Savage—the first-named is the most directly representative of the drama and the stage. The Savage and the Junior Garrick each in its time has held the pride of place, but the Green Room holds it now, by virtue of its closer adherence to the "qualification" test. Some years ago the Savage was the club to visit if you wished to witness a notable gathering of actors and journalists. Then came the Junior Garrick, which, in the intention of its founders, was to be, truly and purely, the actors' club; and so it was for a few years. Nearly every person you met there was connected with the stage—dramatic author, dramatic critic, or mimic. It was John Oxenford's favorite club, and William Brough and Andrew Halliday were regular in their attendance. These three men—the memory of whom is cherished by all who knew them—have joined another club, the qualification for which is death. While they lived, the Junior Garrick flourished; but gradually, as with most other similar institutions, the foundation was sapped by a continually swelling stream of members having no connection whatever with the stage. The Junior Garrick would very likely have become a thing of the past had it not been for Mr. Thomas Mowbray, who offered to pay off the liabilities, and carry on the club as usual, on condition of its being transferred to him. The members were in a quandary; they clamored within, while the creditors clamored without. A stormy general meeting was held, and Mr. Mowbray's offer was accepted by a somewhat narrow majority, if I recollect aright, and thenceforward the Junior Garrick was a proprietary club. It is now prospering, has upon its books nearly five hundred members—a larger number than either the Savage or the Green Room possesses; but they are a mixed lot, and the actors are few and far between. Before it became proprietary, the Junior Garrick was, in addition to the names of those I have already mentioned, a favorite resort of J. L. Toole, David James, Thomas Thorne, James Fernandez, and other notable actors and managers, who were to be seen pretty regularly at the supper tables; but upon the establishment of the Green Room, these gentlemen, especially Messrs. Toole, James, and Thorne, transferred their allegiance, and worked hard to make the new club a success. At the yearly dinner of the Junior Garrick, Lord Alfred Paget generally occupies the chair. He is not the president of the club, as the Duke of Beaufort is of the Green Room, but he is a friend of Mr. Mowbray, and takes great interest in the club and in theatrical matters generally. Whether this kind of patronage on the part of distinguished aristocratic personages is of advantage to art clubs is an open question. Some fastidious persons I know resent it, but they are in a minority. The subject is apropos of the forthcoming visit of the Prince of Wales to the Savage Club, concerning which a great variety of opinion has been, and will continue to be, expressed. It is understood that the prince, having heard that at the regular Saturday dinner of the Savages an entertainment, to which the term unique might be applied, was generally given by the members—a species of olla-podrida not to be met with in any other club-room in London—had a curiosity just to "drop in," as Paul Pry expresses it, in a friendly way, to see what sort of an affair it is. It is a thousand pities that the Savages have resolved to entertain the Prince at Willis's rooms, instead of at their own club, for this is certainly not what their royal visitor desired. The excuse is that the club premises were not large enough to accommodate all the members who were anxious to attend, and that there would have been a rub, a scramble, and a squeeze. Financially, the club is now in a better position than it has been since its formation; it has a balance at the bank which is likely to grow larger. There is a positive danger in this deplorable fact—for the Savage is, or should be, essentially a Bohemian club. In this aspect, and because its modest rooms were frequented by men lean in purse and full in brain-power—Bohemian free-lances, whose wit was keen, and bright, and sharp, not disdaining fortune, but making light of empty pockets, better contented with pipe and pewter than they are now with cigars and champagne—in this aspect lay the great charm of the club in its palmy days. It was this which made it so fascinating to Artemus Ward. There, night after night, did he meet with kindred souls, between whom and himself was forged a stronger link than can be fashioned out of twenty-two-carat gold. He was idolized there, and old members speak of him invariably with affectionate admiration and regret. The Savage Club was a republic of intellect, and to be one of the band was a higher distinction than could be conferred by an Order of the Bath. There was safety in poverty and Bohemianism; there is peril in swallow-tails and a large balance at the bank.

MUSICAL NOTES.

The Mendelssohn Quintette Concert.

The distinguishing feature of the three farewell concerts given by the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, has been the presentation at each of a Beethoven quartette. At the first concert of the series, which took place on Monday evening last, the Eighth Quartette, in E minor, Op. 59, (No. 2 of the famous Rasoumofsky set,) was played with much thoughtfulness and care. The four movements of this beautiful composition consist of an allegro, an adagio, an allegretto, and the finale. All were rendered with great delicacy of feeling and expression, the adagio being particularly enjoyable. The allegretto was less smoothly played than any one of the other movements; but the number, as a whole, was of the utmost interest. Beethoven's quartette music is indeed "a new world, full of sublime conceptions and revelations," and this second Rasoumofsky quartette is an outcome of the master's ripest genius. The allegro vivace of the Mendelssohn Quintette in B flat, Op. 87; the adagio "God Save the Emperor," and variations from Haydn's Quartette, No. 67; and a gavotte by Silas, were the remaining concerted numbers of the programme, and were all warmly received. Miss Miller was in excellent voice, and sang her caratina from "Lucia," "Regnava nel Silenzio," to the satisfaction of an audience lavish in commendation. She was recalled, and obligingly gave a light little setting of "I Love the Merry, Merry Sunshine." The song was well enough in its way; but its way was very small indeed, and Miss Miller does not satisfy in ballads. Her second song was Clay's "She wandered down the mountain side." A flute solo by Mr. Schade consisted of a fantasia on an air by Abt, and was executed with his usual wonderful facility. In response to an encore, Mr. Schade gave elaborate variations on a melody from "Sonnambula." Mr. Giese's selection (played with never-failing and always contagious enthusiasm) was a composition by Servais, "O Cara Memoria." But to Mr. Schnitzler, on this occasion, belong the honors of the evening. His solo on themes from "Faust," by Wieniawski, was a performance full of fire and genius, and his encore was equally admirable. The concert, altogether, was one of the best ever given here by the Quintette. SAN FRANCISCO, August 3, 1882. F. A.

Mr. Albert Friedenthal, an artist who enjoys an excellent reputation in Europe, and who up to the time of his departure held the position of teacher of piano at the Berlin Conservatoire of Music, is at present in this city. He is a pupil of Franz Liszt and Professor Kullack, and beside being a virtuoso on the piano is a composer of songs and concertos which have elicited highly flattering criticisms from the musical world.

Obscure Intimations.

"Success Without Money or Beauty"—M. L. T., Bellota.—Declined.
"This Devilish"—S. S.—Declined.
"Manitou Springs"—F. S.—Declined.
"The Cause of the Unmarried"—W. H. R.—Accepted.

The London press is particularly hard upon Ehen Plympton, and he has been badly slated. The Morning Post concludes its notice by simply remarking of Mr. Plympton that "the gentleman who tried to play De Mauprat has mistaken his vocation."

The exhibition of the Mechanics' Institute, beginning the 15th instant, at its pavilion, promises, according to the managers, to be one of the finest efforts in that direction ever made in this city.

—AMMONIA-DRUGGED AND STARCH-LOADED BAKING POWDERS.—It is an established fact that the New ENGLAND BAKING POWDER evolves 74-70 inches of gas to the ounce, but it is not so well known that this is the highest degree of strength which can be attained by a proper combination of cream of tartar and bi-carbonate of soda, and that in order to attain this, both of these ingredients must be of exceptional purity. In the face of this, and assuming that these facts are not generally known by the public, some baking powder manufacturers have had the effrontery to publish tests of their product, together with a list of others which are still poorer, for comparison. The test of their powder is so much lower than 74-70 inches that they really give themselves away, as the cause of the difference is plainly owing to adulterants. The eyes of the public are opening to this, and the day is not far distant when they will refuse to buy or use a baking powder the ingredients of which are not known to be cream of tartar and bi-carbonate of soda in correct proportions and nothing else, as the New ENGLAND is. The ammonia-drugged and starch-loaded powders will then take their proper place among the alum, phosphate, and short-weight powders, which the manufacturers of the first so vigorously decry.

GEO. C. SHREVE & CO.

MANUFACTURERS OF

FINE JEWELRY,

Offer better inducements to purchasers of DIAMONDS, WATCHES, JEWELRY, SILVERWARE, CLOCKS, etc., than any other house in San Francisco. They have the Largest Stock, the Finest Assortment, and sell at Closer Prices.

DIAMOND WORK and any other kind of Jewelry made to order at very low rates.

All Goods marked in plain figures, and no deviation in price.

110 MONTGOMERY STREET.

— NEARLY EVERYBODY THAT PASSES THE WINDOW of the Diamond Palace, stops to examine the beautiful jewels of the dome of the Pantheon, done in mosaic of gold and golden quartz. This ought to be sent to the exposition at Denver. So we just stepped in and asked Colonel Andrews why he did not do this thing. The colonel remarked that it was altogether too costly and valuable to be entrusted on such a journey, and that while it embraced specimens of all our gold ledges, they were selected rather for their colors, their susceptibility of polish, and their fineness, rather than to demonstrate their value as gold-bearing veins; and that it was intended to illustrate the jeweler's art in California rather than its mineral resources. While we were thus conversing, a lady remarked that this jewel had attracted her attention, not only for its rare beauty and exquisite finish and value, but because, as a gem of art, it was altogether unique and original. She had visited all the cities of Europe, and with a taste for everything that was admirable in art, and especially rich and tasteful in the line of jewelry, she had seen nothing at all comparable to this. She concluded by saying: "You will excuse me, Colonel Andrews, for the suggestion, but I can tell you what you ought to do with this jewel." The colonel politely expressing his desire to hear the suggestion, she said: "Mr. Mackay ought to purchase it, send it to Paris, and place it in his elegant salon, where it would be seen and admired by all the best people of Europe. It would be exceedingly appropriate for him as a miner, and would be such a recognition of his former employment as would indicate that the king of mines had no sensitiveness to the fact that his vast wealth was acquired from the gold and silver mines of the Sierra, in which himself had worked, and I am sure Mrs. Mackay would take pride in pointing to the golden link that had united her fortunes with a toiling miner in their early lives. This jewel," said the lady, "would be especially appropriate among the crown jewels, and in the royal treasury of the king of the Comstock." We all assented. It is always a rare distinction to have a work of art more valuable than any thing of its kind original, and that can not be duplicated.

— EVENING DRESS SUITS FOR SPECIAL OCCASIONS can be had at J. COOPER'S Tailoring Establishment, No. 24 New Montgomery Street, Palace Hotel block. Also black frock-coat suits for funerals, etc.

— IT IS A WISE PRECAUTION TO PROVIDE against emergencies that are liable to arise in every family. A cold may be a dangerous thing or not, depending on the means at hand to combat it. In sudden attacks of cold, croup, asthma, etc., Ayer's Cherry Pectoral will prove the quickest and most effective cure, and your best friend.

— RUSSIA SALVE IS UNRIVALED FOR ITS SPEEDY healing qualities. Ask your druggist for it. 25 cts.

A case of surgical instruments was lately found at Pompeii.

— LADY READERS OF THE ARGONAUT will remember that the place to buy colognes, perfumery, toilet soaps, brushes, sponges, cosmetics, etc., is at the elegant and well-stocked store of James G. Steele & Co., Chemists and Apothecaries, 635 Market Street, Palace Hotel, San Francisco.

— Dr. E. O. COCHRANE, DENTIST, 850 MARKET, cor. Stockton (over drug store.) Office hours, 9 to 5.

Sheep placed on Key West Island lose their wool in the second year.

— Go to Bradley & Rulofson's, 429 Montgomery.

— HEADQUARTERS FOR ELECTRIC BELTS, and appliances for the cure of nervous, painful, and debilitating diseases. Pamphlets, with full particulars, free. Address PULVERMACHER GALVANIC COMPANY, 513 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal.

— MORSE HAS THE FINEST GALLERY IN THE world, 826 Market Street, (Phelan Block).

JNO. LEVY & CO.

MANUFACTURING JEWELERS,

Importers of DIAMONDS and other PRECIOUS STONES, WATCHES, CLOCKS, and SILVERWARE,

118 SUTTER STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.

(Of the late Firm of BRAVERMAN & LEVY.)

HOUSEKEEPERS!

DO NOT SACRIFICE YOUR GOODS AT AUCTION, but STORE THEM with H. WINDEL & CO., NO. 310 STOCKTON STREET. Furniture, Pianos, Household Goods, Paintings, Trunks, etc., well taken care of. We have three large, airy, brick buildings, and no rent to pay, and can store goods very moderate. Money advanced on goods at one per cent. per month. We guarantee against damage and moths, and can give references dating back 20 years.

SONGS, One Cent Each

- | | | |
|--------------------------------------|---------------------------------------|--|
| 1 Baby Mine. | 121 Kiss Me, Kiss Your Darling. | 223 Love Among the Roses. |
| 2 The Old Cabin Home. | 122 A Flower from Mother's Grave. | 224 Old Arm Chair (as sung by Barry.) |
| 3 The Little Ones at Home. | 123 The Old Log Cabin on the Hill. | 225 The Sailor's Grave, In the Garden. |
| 4 See That My Grave's Kept Green. | 124 Coming Thro' the Rye. | 226 Farmer's Daughter, or Chickens. |
| 5 Grandfather's Clock. | 125 Must We, Then, Meet as Strangers. | 227 Oh! Dem Golden Slippers. |
| 6 Where Was Moses when the Light. | 126 The Kiss Behind the Door. | 228 Poor Out a Gentleman Still. |
| 7 Sweet By and By. (Went Out.) | 127 I'll Remember You, Love, in My. | 229 Nobody's Darling but Mine. |
| 8 When you and I were Young. | 128 I'll Remember You, Love, in My. | 230 Put My Little Shoes Away. |
| 9 When I Saw Sweet Nellie Home. | 129 I'll Remember You, Love, in My. | 231 Darling Nellie Gray. |
| 10 Take This Letter to My Mother. | 130 I'll Remember You, Love, in My. | 232 Little Brown J. J. |
| 11 A Model Love Letter.—Comic. | 131 I'll Remember You, Love, in My. | 233 Ben Bolt. |
| 12 Wife's Commandments.—Comic. | 132 I'll Remember You, Love, in My. | 234 Good-Bye Sweetheart. |
| 13 Husband's Commandments.— | 133 I'll Remember You, Love, in My. | 235 Sadie Ray. |
| 14 Little Old Log Cabin in the Lane. | 134 I'll Remember You, Love, in My. | 236 Tim Pinigan's Wake. |
| 15 Marching Through Georgia. | 135 I'll Remember You, Love, in My. | 237 The Hat My Father Wore. |
| 16 Widow in the Cottage by the Sea. | 136 I'll Remember You, Love, in My. | 238 I've Only Been Down to the Club. |
| 17 The Minstrel Boy. | 137 I'll Remember You, Love, in My. | 239 The Vacant Chair. |
| 18 Take Back the Heart. | 138 I'll Remember You, Love, in My. | 240 The Sweet Sunny South. |
| 19 The Faded Coat of Arms. (Night.) | 139 I'll Remember You, Love, in My. | 241 Come Home Father. |
| 20 Listen to the Mocking Bird. | 140 I'll Remember You, Love, in My. | 242 Little Maggie May. |
| 21 My Bright Smile Hints Me Still. | 141 I'll Remember You, Love, in My. | 243 Molly Bawn. |
| 22 I'll be all Smiles to Night Love. | 142 I'll Remember You, Love, in My. | 244 I'll Remember You, Love, in My. |
| 23 Sunday Night when the Parlor's | 143 I'll Remember You, Love, in My. | 245 Broken Down. |
| 24 The Upper's Warning. (Full.) | 144 I'll Remember You, Love, in My. | 246 Four Old Nods. |
| 25 Tis But a Little Flower. | 145 I'll Remember You, Love, in My. | 247 My Little One's Waiting for Me. |
| 26 The Girl I Left Behind Me. | 146 I'll Remember You, Love, in My. | 248 I'll Go Back to My Old Love Again. |
| 27 Little Buttercup. | 147 I'll Remember You, Love, in My. | 249 The Butcher Boy. |
| 28 Carry Me Back to Old Virginia. | 148 I'll Remember You, Love, in My. | 250 I've Gotten Back to Dixie. |
| 29 The Old Man's Drunk Again. | 149 I'll Remember You, Love, in My. | 251 Where is My Boy To-Night. |
| 30 I Am Wailing, Esie Dear. | 150 I'll Remember You, Love, in My. | 252 The Five Cent Shave. |
| 31 Take Me Back to Home & Mother | 151 I'll Remember You, Love, in My. | 253 Linger. No. 2. |
| 32 Come, Sit by My Side, Darling. | 152 I'll Remember You, Love, in My. | 254 Dancing in the Sunlight. |

We will send by mail, post-paid, any ten of these songs for 10 cents; any twenty-five songs for 15 cents; any fifty for 25 cents. Or we will send all the above one hundred songs, post-paid for 40 cents. Remember, we will not send less than ten songs. Order songs by number only. Send one cent. Send one cent. Send one cent. Catalogue Free. Mention this paper. WORLD MANUFACTURING CO., 122 Nassau Street, New York.

BALDWIN THEATRE.

POSITIVELY LAST WEEK

....OF THE....

HANLONS.

ENTIRE CHANGE OF PROGRAMME.

EVERYTHING NEW.

The Grand Comic Pantomime in One Act, entitled

THE MISCHIEVOUS PARROTS.

The evening's performance will commence with the Two-Act

Comedy of

MILK-WHITE.

KNABE PIANOS!

A LARGE INVOICE JUST RECEIVED. CALL and see these magnificent instruments before purchasing elsewhere.

A. L. BANCROFT & CO.,
721 Market Street.

J. R. COWEN. J. W. PORTER.
COWEN & PORTER,
FUNERAL DIRECTORS,
118 Geary Street. San Francisco.
OPPOSITE STARR-KING CHURCH.

C. N. WEST'S
ELECTRO-MEDICAL BELT
WEST'S NEW ELECTRIC BELT.—C. N. West's Electro-Medical Belts always have excelled all other electrical appliances. They have taken the premiums at all State Fairs. This new Belt excels every other that he has invented. Cures all diseases without medicine. Price, from $5.00 to $50.00. Warranted ten years. Patented by the representative men and leading ladies of this and other States. Address or call on C. N. WEST, 652 Market Street, San Francisco.

MECHANICS' INSTITUTE FAIR, at the PAVILION, LARKIN ST., near MARKET, opens TUESDAY, AUGUST 15th.

RUPTURE Cured. Greatest Invention of the age. PIERCE & SON, 704 Sac. St., San Francisco.

(Department No. 7.)
SHERIFF'S SALE—EXECUTION.

A. F. BENJAMIN, Plaintiff,
vs.
JACOB LEVY, Defendant.

UNDER AND BY VIRTUE OF AN

Execution issued out of the Superior Court, of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, duly attested, on the 2d day of August, A. D. 1882, in the above-entitled action, wherein A. F. Benjamin, the above-named plaintiff, obtained a Judgment against Jacob Levy, defendant, on the 1st day of August, A. D. 1882, for the sum of $2,327.97—100 U. S. Gold Coin, with interest thereon and costs, etc., I have levied upon all the right, title, and interest which the said defendant, Jacob Levy, had on the 1st day of August, 1882, the day on which said judgment was docketed, or which he may have subsequently acquired in and to the hereafter described property, situate, lying, and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, standing of record in the office of the County Recorder of said City and County in the name of Jacob Levy, and bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point in the northerly line of Tyler Street, distant 165 feet westerly from the west line of Franklin Street, running thence westerly along said north line of Tyler Street 27 6-12 feet; thence at right-angles northerly 120 feet; thence at right-angles easterly 27 6-12 feet; and thence at right-angles northerly 120 feet to the point of commencement. Together with the dwelling house thereon and its appurtenances.

Public notice is hereby given that on Monday, the 28th day of August, A. D. 1882, at 12 o'clock, noon, of that day, in front of the Old City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, I will sell all the right, title, and interest which the said defendant, Jacob Levy, had on the first day of August, 1882, the day on which said judgment was docketed as aforesaid, or which he may have subsequently acquired in and to the above-described property, to the highest and best bidder for lawful money of the United States.

San Francisco, August 5, 1882.
JOHN SEDGWICK, Sheriff.
J. B. L. BRANDT, Attorney for Plaintiff.
August 5, 12, 19, 26.

THE "DRESS REFORM"
CORSET.
Specialty for Stout
Figures, by mail,
$3.00. Send waist,
bust, and bust measure. Also, Shoulder
Braces, Union
Under Flannels,
Ladies' and Children's Comfor
Waists, Bustles,
Hose Supporters,
etc.
Send for Circular.
The only Depot
for these Goods.
Mrs. M. H.
OBER & CO.
Boston
Dress Reform,
326
Sutter St.,
SAN FRANCISCO.

An Elegant Corset to Order for $4.
PRICE REDUCED

FOR

SEATTLE COAL

ALL DEALERS KEEP IT.

MAIN OFFICE:

210 BATTERY STREET,
San Francisco.

DEPOTS:

Beale Street Wharf, San Francisco.
Foster's Wharf - Oakland.

[Department No. 7.]

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT,
City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

EMMA J. FAIRBAIRN,
Plaintiff,
vs.
NICHOLAS H. FAIRBAIRN
Defendant.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF

California send Greeting to NICHOLAS H. FAIRBAIRN, Defendant. You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named plaintiff, in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this county; or if served elsewhere, within thirty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said Complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds of defendant's willful desertion, and failure to provide plaintiff with the common necessities of life; and awarding the custody of the child of the parties hereto to plaintiff. Also, requiring defendant to pay such sums as the Court may deem proper for the support of plaintiff and her child, and costs of suit, together with general relief. Reference to the complaint is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said Complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and seal of the said Superior Court, at the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, this 3d day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty two.
(Seal.) DAVID WILDER, Clerk.
By J. D. RUGGLES, Deputy Clerk.

DO NOT SACRIFICE YOUR FURNITURE, PIANOS, and HOUSEHOLD GOODS, at auction sales, while you are boarding or out of the city, but

STORE THEM,

As well as your Trunks and Paintings, with
J. H. MOTT & CO.,
647 Market St.,

Nucleus Block, Second Floor.
Large, airy brick building, with elevator. MONEY LOANED on valuable goods. Terms moderate.

COMPOUND OXYGEN.
NEW TREATMENT BY INHALATION for Consumption, Asthma, Bronchitis, Dyspepsia, Catarrh, Headache, Debility, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, and all Chronic and Nervous Disorders. Prepared by DR. STANLEY, Philadelphia, Pa. Package contains full directions, and is easily sent by express, ready for USE AT HOME. H. E. MATTHEWS, Forwarding Agent, 606 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal. Send for Free Pamphlet.

DIVIDEND NOTICE—OFFICE OF
The Standard Consolidated Mining Company, San Francisco, August 2, 1882.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named Company, held this day, dividend No. 44, of Seventy-five cents per share was declared, payable on Saturday, August 12, 1882, at the office in this city, or at the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company in New York. WM. WILLIS, Secretary.
Office—Room No. 29, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal.

DODGE BROS.

STATIONERS,
Formerly 116 POST ST.,
REMOVED TO

NO. 32

GEARY ST.

Original designs, perfect work, and reasonable prices.

THE INNER MAN.

In China they make a delicious soup of tea-leaves, which is said to be like consommé, but far more palatable.

Francatelli is authority for the statement that the palate is as capable and nearly as worthy of education as the eye and the ear.

Epicures contend that the best way to eat asparagus is cold, with a dressing of oil and vinegar. To eat it hot they declare to be an abomination.

Some clever Frenchman has invented an artificial celery which has created a great sensation, especially as he refuses to divulge the secret of its manufacture.

A new fashion at Eastern dinner parties is to introduce mineral waters in the middle of the meal in place of sorbet. The idea is said to be to help digestion.

Blanc-mange of olden times was an altogether different dish from what we have now under that name, and used to include in its ingredients almonds, rice, salt, and even aniseed.

"Show me a man eating lettuce," said Lord Beaconsfield, "and I will tell you what manner of man he is." The highest epicurean authorities all agree that to cut lettuce is to ruin it.

It is now the fashionable thing at a New York dinner party to have the menu expressed and printed in the old English style, and to have imitations of dishes famous four or five hundred years ago.

Louise Chandler Moulton says in Our Continent that people in good society are at liberty to eat fish with a knife as well as a fork, and that a special silver fish-knife is now provided at all recherche dinners.

At a fish-dinner in London lately they had salmon, turbot, flounders, perch, eels, a charreasse of sole, rôté of whiting, lobster cutlets, mackerel à la maitre d'hôtel, trout, mullet, an omelet of whitebait, and curried skate.

Virchow, the eminent German professor, denies that he is, as charged, the opponent of soup. He says he merely declared that meat broths are neither nutritious nor substantial, and he further says it is the height of absurdity to eat bot meats.

In one of her recent articles on gastronomy, Miss Juliet Corson describes a soup made of white wine, eaten cold, and which she affirms to be a favorite dish in Austria. Another wine-soup she describes is made one-half of consommé and the other half of claret.

At a recent private dinner party at Pinard's, in New York, the strawberries were served inside of a large artificial strawberry made of ice-cream, and tinted to resemble the real fruit. The surprise was clever, and the combination of fruit and cream delicious.

According to a London journal "peculiar people" are they who dine at three o'clock, who cut lettuce with a knife, and who drink red wine with salmon. And it might be added, equally peculiar are the people who eat ice cream and drink coffee simultaneously.

Some audacious men of France lately dined upon the heart and ham of a lion. The meat was found firm, but not palatable, and the heart, although very skillfully prepared with truffles, was voted excessively tough and indigestible. Altogether, the king of the forest was a failure.

A recent number of the London Lancet comes out against suppers, and asserts that they are a mistake, unless they are in fact, if not in name, late dinners, and taken at a reasonably early hour. The maxim of health should be: Sup early and sup lightly; or, if you do dine late, do not sup at all.

Members of the Athenæum Club, of London, were recently reminded of the time when bustards were plentiful in England by the unwonted appearance of "roast bustard" on the bill of fare. The specimen, which weighed a hen, weighed twenty pounds, was sent from Hungary, where the bird is still not uncommon.

Some time ago the distinguished Washington gastronome, Mr. Sam Ward, declared that, except at the private tables of his friends and at clubs, he had never sat down to a first-class dinner in London. To this remark the London Caterer takes exception, and endeavors to prove that Mr. Ward has done the great city of London terrible injustice.

Summer dinners, observes the Boston Herald in commenting on the present heated term in that city, should never have anything on the table when the guests sit down but flowers and the dessert, the ice pitchers or carafes, and bowls of ice, the glass, china, and silver, and this should all be simple and not profuse. It is better for almost everybody to eat a hot dinner, even in hot weather. An egg salad is an excellent cold dish for lunch or a picnic dinner. Boil your eggs hard, slice them, cover with a mayonnaise dressing, and put a few lettuce leaves about the plate. Cold custards, Charlotte Russe, and cream stiffened with gelatine and delicately flavored, are very nice at a summer dinner, with home-made cake.

An alteration in the arrangement of the dinner table has been already adopted by the more refined and delicate dinner-givers of London. The tablecloths are no longer of the snowdrop white which their grandmothers were so proud to display on the polished mahogany board, but are of the color best suited to the furniture and the walls of the room. Some are now being exhibited in the show rooms in Waterloo place of a neutral tint of brown "made to go with every color." The table is adorned with flower-pots all down the centre. These are enclosed in covers of bright-colored plush, embroidered in gay colors, and are really more effective than the most expensive Sèvres china could possibly be. But the greatest innovation of all is that to be seen in the new Japanese paper dinner napkins, which are considered much prettier than the shining white square of damask.

CCXL.—Bill of Fare for Six Persons. Sunday, August 6th.

Okra Soup.
Cantaloupe.
Fried Soft-Shell Crabs.
Ox Tails à la Tartare.
Spinach, Young Beets.
Port Wine and Currant Jelly Sauce.
Baked Potatoes.
Tomato Salad.
Apricot Pie.
Peaches, Apples, Figs, Plums, Gages, Pears, Nectarines, and Grapes.

ON TAILS A LA TARTARE.—Two small ox tails, one large, half a cupful of bread crumbs, salt, pepper, one pint stock, a bouquet of sweet herbs. Cut the tails into four pieces, and put them in to boil with the stock and sweet herbs. Let them simmer two hours; take up, drain, and dry. When cold, dip them in the beaten egg and in the bread crumbs. Fry in boiling fat until a golden brown. Serve Tartare sauce spread in the centre of a cold dish, and arrange the tails on this. Garnish with parsley.

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

Little Drops.
Little drops of claret
Now and then at first,
Forms an awful habit,
And a dreadful thirst.

Little drops of lager,
Then a glass of ale;
Lastly rum and whisky,
Tell the drunkard's tale.

Little drops of brandy,
If you drink them clear,
Bring the maddening jim-jams,
And the drunkard's beer.

—Various Liars.

England's Song in Egypt.
Strike for the sacred "Status Quo,"
Your country's fame consulting;
Where bounteous Nile's dark waters flow Stands Arabi insulting.

Our fleet's to Alexandria gone,
Our troops shall go to Cairo;
On! Christian brethren, boldly on!
To sack the land of Pharaoh.

With heavy loans that land is rife,
Much Jews have lent the stranger;
What British soldier'll grudge his life
When ten per cent is in danger?

We'll nail our colors to the mast,
Our strength the world surprising;
Though British troops be falling fast,
Egyptian bands are rising.

Then let the jingo drum-beat roll—
Dread sound for every foe—
We'll live and die for the "Control."
The sacred "Status Quo!"

—New York World.

The Maiden's Prayer.

In all humility I ask
A blessing on my loves;
A bath-tub hat, a Jersey basque,
And terra-cotta gloves.

Give me this day my caramels,
My bangs and lemon glace;
My crimps and net invisible,
My sunshade trimmed with lace.

Give me my boots with shot-tower heels,
My new back hair, and take
Good care to give me six square meals
Of candy, cream, and cake.

I know to sin I am a slave,
And should ask naught, but then
This list of 'em I've got to have,
So whoop 'em up! Amen.

—Unknown Liar.

The Cucumber.

The cucumber came in the gloaming,
And crept in the urchin's maw;
Now that doubled-up angel is roaming
Through realms his dear parents ne'er saw.

For they on this sad earth are weeping,
And gnashing their teeth in despair;
Their cup of cold sorrow is heaping—
They are minus a ten-year-old heir.

—Unknown Liar.

Silently Stole Away.

"I'll tell you a little snake story!"
Cried Arabi from the shore;
"Of great Cleopatra it shall be;
And you'll want to bear some more!"

"Oh, what you are giving us, Arabi Bey?"
The men of the fleet replied;
"You'd better go off and be out of the way!"
Cried Arabi, "I glide!"—New York Liar.

Grayson MacArthur's Ride.

Lieutenant MacArthur's tent was pitched Down in the glen—a brook hard by—
When all of a sudden from twenty throats
Came up a wild and deafening cry.
"The flood! the flood!" were the awful words
That filled MacArthur with dire dismay,
For the flood bore down on this gallant tent—
And MacArthur one hundred yards away.

Lieutenant Twelves was as white as a sheet,
And Captain Carpenter paled with fright;
"There's a treasure rare in that tent!" they cried,
"Which the flood will carry forever from sight.
In vain they cursed the unhappy day,
The tent went down in the seething foam—
MacArthur one hundred yards away.

MacArthur knew what the moaning meant,
And he vaulted astride of a burro's back—
"Oh, haste thee, birdie, all into the flood
To save my treasure from ruin and rack!"
These were the words the soldiers heard
The gallant chief to the burro say;
The tent went down in the seething foam—
MacArthur full seventy feet away.

Bold and erect the warrior sat,
With his plumes afloat on the joyous wind—
The burro got bravely down to his work
And his paint-brush tail stood out behind.
Like a dart they flew—that burro staunch
And the warrior clad in his armor gray—
The swimming tent gave a lurch, and flopped—
MacArthur a dozen feet away!

The waters hissed, and the breakers roared,
As the tent flopped over on its side,
And, lo! to the warrior's gaze appeared
The treasure plunging through the tide.
In—into the boiling surf he plunged,
Into the foam, and the mist and spray—
The treasure careened and the burro brayed—
MacArthur a couple of feet away!

'Twas a glorious ride, and the troops all cheered
As the warrior came from the swelling tide;
The treasure—his demijohn—'as strapped
With a proud huzzo to his dripping side.
When history's page is being filled
With deeds of valor performed to-day,
Forget not the burro and demijohn—
And MacArthur one hundred yards away!

—Denver Tribune.

AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL.

For Diseases of the Throat and Lungs, such as Coughs, Colds, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis, Asthma, and Consumption.

The few compositions which have won the confidence of mankind and become household words, among not only one but many nations, must have extraordinary virtues. Perhaps no one ever secured so wide a reputation, or maintained it so long, as Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. It has been known to the public about forty years, by a long continued series of marvelous cures, that have won for it a confidence in its virtues, never equalled by any other medicine. It still makes the most effectual cures of Coughs, Colds, and Consumption that can be made by medical skill. Indeed, the Cherry Pectoral has really reduced these dangerous diseases of their terrors to a great extent, and given a feeling of immunity from their painful effects, that is well founded, if the remedy be taken in season. Every family should have it in their closet for the ready and prompt relief of its members. Sickness, suffering, and even life is saved by this timely defense. The prudent should not neglect it, and the wise will not. Keep it by you for the protection it affords by its early use in sudden attacks.

PREPARED BY

DR. J. C. AYER & Co., Lowell, Mass.

PRACTICAL AND ANALYTICAL CHEMISTS.

Sold by all Druggists and Dealers in Medicines.

ASSESSMENTS AND DIVIDENDS.

OPHIR SILVER MINING COMPANY
Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 21st day of July, 1882, an assessment (No. 42) of One Dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 16, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 24th day of August, 1882, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on Thursday, the 14th day of September, 1882, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with the costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

Office—Room 16, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

BEST AND BELCHER SILVER

Mining Company—Location of works, Virginia City, Storey County, Nevada. Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 20th day of July, 1882, an assessment (No. 24) of Fifty (50) Cents per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately, in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 29, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 24th day of August, 1882, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on Monday, the 18th day of September, 1882, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

Office—Room No. 29 Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

CHOLLAR MINING COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of Works, Virginia, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 17th day of July, 1882, an assessment (No. 9) of Twenty-five Cents per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately, in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 79, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the twenty-second day of August, 1882, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on Tuesday, the 14th day of September, 1882, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

Office—Room 79 Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal.

NO MYSTIFIED SECRECY.
We take pride in telling that Hop Bitters are made of such well known and valuable medicines as Hops, Buchu, Mandrake and Dandelion, which are so much used, relied on and recommended by the best physicians of all schools, that no further proof of their value is needed. These plants are compounded under the most eminent physicians and chemists, with the other valuable remedies, into the simple, harmless and powerful curative, Hop Bitters, that begins to restore, strengthen, build up and cure from the first dose, and that continually, until perfect health and strength is restored.
That poor, bed-ridden, invalid wife, sister, mother, or daughter, can be made the picture of health by a few bottles of Hop Bitters. Will you let them suffer? Send for Circular to HOP BITTERS MANUFACTURING CO., Rochester, N. Y., Toronto, Ont., or London, Eng.

NATHANIEL GRAY. C. S. WRIGHT. J. A. CAMPBELL.
N. GRAY & CO.,

UNDERTAKERS
641 Sacramento Street.

S. P. COLLINS & CO.
WHOLESALE AND RETAIL

dealers in Old London Dock Brandies, Port Wine, Sherries, and all the choicest brands Champagne, Apple Jack, Pisco, Arrack, Cordials, Liqueurs, etc. 123 MONTGOMERY, and 511 CALIFORNIA STREETS, S. F.

LEGAL NOTICES.

SHERIFF'S SALE.

ELISABETH VON HASSEL, Plaintiff,
vs.
HENRY VON HASSEL,
FREDERICK M. HUSTED,
HENRY N. CLEMENT,
Defendants.

UNDER AND BY VIRTUE OF AN

Order of Sale and Decree of Distribution issued out of the Superior Court, Department No. 7, of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on the 1st day of July, A. D. 1882, in the above-entitled action, wherein Elisabeth Von Hasel, the above-named plaintiff, obtained a Judgment and Decree of Distribution against Henry Von Hasel, Frederick M. Husted, Henry N. Clement, defendants, on the 28th day of April, A. D. 1882, which said Judgment and Decree was, on the 20th day of April, A. D. 1882, recorded in Judgment Book One of said Court, at page 645, I am commanded to sell all that certain lot, piece, or parcel of land, situate, lying, and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the northerly line of Dorland Street, distant one hundred and ninety (190) feet westerly from the westerly line of Church Street; thence westerly along Dorland Street twenty-four (24) feet; thence northerly one hundred and twenty-five (125) feet, more or less, to a point one hundred (100) feet southerly from the southerly line of Corbett Street, and also being distant twenty-five (25) feet westerly from the north-westerly corner of Williams's fence; thence easterly twenty-five (25) feet to said corner, and thence westerly along Williams's westerly line one hundred and twenty-four (124) feet, more or less, to the place of beginning; being part of Mission Block No. 94.

Public notice is hereby given that on Monday, the 14th day of August, A. D. 1882, at 12 o'clock, noon, of that day, in front of the Old City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, I will, in obedience to said order of sale and decree of distribution, sell the above-described property, or so much thereof as may be necessary to raise sufficient to satisfy said judgment, with interest and costs, etc., to the highest and best bidder, for lawful money of the United States.

San Francisco, July 22, 1882.
JOHN SEDGWICK, Sheriff.
WM. MATHEWS, Attorney for Plaintiff.
July 22, 29, August 5 and 12.

SHERIFF'S SALE.

ANTHONY WADDY, Plaintiff,
vs.
JAMES JONES, Defendant.

UNDER AND BY VIRTUE OF AN

Execution for Deficiency after Foreclosure Sale, issued out of the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, docketed at the twenty-third day of May, A. D. 1882, in the above-entitled action, wherein Anthony Waddy, the above-named plaintiff, obtained a judgment against James Jones, defendant, on the sixth day of March, A. D. 1882, for the sum of 1,173 dollars, U. S. gold coin, with interest thereon and costs, etc., and whereas an order of sale was on March 8, A. D. 1882, issued to the Sheriff of the City and County of San Francisco, which said order of sale was on May 16, 1882, returned by said Sheriff, showing a deficiency thereon in the sum of $1,207.05, as appears of record, which said deficiency was docketed. Pursuant to said judgment and decree I have vend upon all the right, title, and interest which the said defendant, James Jones, had on the sixteenth day of May, 1882, the day on which said judgment was docketed, or which he may have subsequently acquired in and to the hereinafter-described property, situate, lying, and being in the city and county of San Francisco, State of California, standing of record in the office of the County Recorder of said city and county the name of James Jones, and bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the southerly line of Pleasant (formerly Riley) Street, distant twenty-two feet and nine inches easterly from the southeasterly corner of Jones and Pleasant Streets, and running thence easterly upon the southerly line of Pleasant Street, twenty-two feet and nine inches; thence southerly, at right angles, to Pleasant Street, sixty feet; thence westerly, and parallel with Pleasant Street, twenty-two feet nine inches; thence northerly sixty feet to place of beginning; being portion of fifty-vara lot No. 825, as shown on the official map of San Francisco.

Public notice is hereby given that on MONDAY, THE SEVENTH DAY OF AUGUST, A. D. 1882, at twelve o'clock, noon, of that day, in front of the Old City Hall, in the city and county of San Francisco, I will sell all the right, title, and interest which the said defendant, James Jones, had on the sixteenth day of May, 1882, the day on which said judgment was docketed, as aforesaid, or which he may have subsequently acquired in and to the above-described property, to the highest and best bidder for gold coin of the United States.

San Francisco, July 15, 1882.
JOHN SEDGWICK, Sheriff.
B. B. NEWMAN, Attorney for Plaintiff.
July 15, 22, 29, and August 5.

PEBBLE SPECTACLES!

MULLER'S OPTICAL DEPOT
135 Montgomery St., nr. Bush,

Opposite Occidental Hotel.
Specialty Thirty-two Years.

COMPOUND ASTIGMATIC LENSES
Mounted to Order. 24 Hours Notice.

The most complicated cases of defective vision thoroughly diagnosed—free of charge.

WILLIAMS, DIMOND & CO.
SHIPPING AND

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,
Union Building, Junction Market and Pine Streets, San Francisco.

AGENTS FOR PACIFIC MAILS, S. F.
Co.; Pacific Steam Navigation Co.; The Cunard Royal Mail S. S. Co.; The Hawaiian Line; The China Traders' Insurance Co., Limited; The Marine Insurance Co. of London; The Baldwin Locomotive Works; The Glasgow Iron Co.; Nich. Aschott & Son's Salt.

PERRIN'S QUAKER DAIRY
114 SUTTER STREET,

Between Kearny & Montgomery, San Francisco
CHAS. L. BIRD and E. R. PERRIN, Prop's.

R. H. McDonald,
President,
San Francisco,
Cal.

PACIFIC BANK
Established
1863.
Capital Stock
$1,000,000.00
Surplus 460,800.70

San Francisco, Cal., July 1, 1882.

We take pleasure in presenting for your consideration the following Thirty-eighth Semi-Annual Statement of the condition of this Bank:

RESOURCES.
Bank Premises.....	$150,000 00
Other Real Estate.....	12,825 35
United States Bonds.....	629,597 69
Land Association Stock.....	15,121 55
Loans and Discounts.....	1,755,000 20
Due from Banks.....	527,279 09
Money on hand.....	632,365 30
LIABILITIES.	$3,752,099 09
Capital paid up.....	$1,000,000 00
Surplus.....	460,800 70
Due Depositors.....	1,953,672 50
Due Banks.....	337,491 09
Dividends unpaid.....	134 50
	$3,752,099 09

This Bank has special facilities for doing all kinds of banking business.

NEW ENGLAND BAKING POWDER

NO Alum
Flour
Starch
Ammonia
Phosphates
Tartaric Acid

Cream Tartar and Bi-Carb. Soda

NOTHING ELSE

Newton Bros. & Co.

SAN FRANCISCO

ROEDERER CHAMPAGNE.

NOTICE—THE TRADE AND THE
Public are informed that we receive the Genuine LOUIS ROEDERER CARTE BLANCHE CHAMPAGNE direct from Mr. Louis Roederer, Reims, over his signature and Consular invoice. Each case is marked upon the side, "Macondray & Co., San Francisco," and each bottle bears the label, "Macondray & Co., Sole Agents for the Pacific Coast."

MACONDRAY & CO.,
Sole Agents for the Pacific Coast.

J. M. LITCHFIELD & CO.

MERCHANT TAILORS,
And Dealers in Gents' Furnishing Goods,
415 MONTGOMERY STREET,
Bet. California and Sacramento San Francisco

LOUIS BRAVERMAN & CO.

(Successors to BRAVERMAN & LEVY.)

Manufacturers of FINE JEWELRY, and Importers of WATCHES, DIAMONDS, and other PRECIOUS STONES, STERLING SILVERWARE, and FRENCH CLOCKS.

Keep the best assortment and sell at LOWER PRICES than any house in this city.

119 MONTGOMERY STREET.

Apollinaris

"THE QUEEN OF TABLE WATERS."

British Medical Journal.

"Apollinaris Water is an article which is produced by Nature and is not the handiwork of man: it is a Natural and not an artificial Water."

U.S. Treasury, 28 January, 1882.

ANNUAL SALE, 10 MILLIONS.

Of all Grocers, Druggists, and Mineral Water Dealers.

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

FOR SALE BY RUHL BROTHERS,

522 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal.

PIANOS

HENRY F. MILLER, OF BOSTON,

HEMME & LONG, OF SAN FRANCISCO,

GROVESTEN & FULLER, OF NEW YORK,

TAYLOR & FARLEY ORGANS.

WOODWORTH, SCHELL & CO.,

Sole Agents, 105 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

PIANOS TO RENT.

FIREMAN'S FUND

INSURANCE COMPANY
OF CALIFORNIA.

CAPITAL, $750,000
ASSETS, DECEMBER 31, 1881, $1,240,000

D. J. STAPLES, President.

WILLIAM J. DUTTON, Secretary.

ALPHEUS BULL, Vice-President.

E. W. CARPENTER, Asst. Secretary.

AGENTS IN ALL PRINCIPAL LOCALITIES.

E. DETRICK & CO.

Importers, Manufacturers, and Dealers in BAGS AND BURLAPS, all kinds, BAG-TWINES, HYDRAULIC HOSE. Sole Agents for MOUNT VERNON CO.'S DUCK, all widths, Russell Manfg Co.'s COTTON BELTING, Russell Manfg Co.'s SEAMLESS LINEN HOSE. Tower's Celebrated OILED CLOTHING.

TENTS, HAMMOCKS, CAMP COTS, CHAIRS, STOOLS, AND CAMPERS' OUTFITS.

Tents let by the Week or Month. AMERICAN FLAGS, BUNTING.

5, 7 AND 9 CALIFORNIA, AND 108, 110 AND 112 MARKET STS.

C. P. SHEFFIELD. N. W. SPAULDING. J. PATTERSON

17 and 19 FREMONT ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

Price $25.

THE JACKSON VINEYARD HARROW.
The Best Harrow made for Vineyards and Orchards.
Made by JACKSON & TRUMAN, - San Francisco, Cal.

$72 A WEEK. $12 a day at home easily made. Costly outfit free. Address TRUE & Co., Augusta, Maine

ICHI BAN,
22 AND 24 GEARY STREET

We are anxious to impress on the minds of the public the fact that ICHI BAN is a FREE EXHIBITION, and that all are welcome to visit it every day or evening of the week, without making a purchase. There is always something new. Sole agents for the AUTOPHONE.

The Argonaut is printed with Shattuck & Fletcher's ink.

NATURAL CHAMPAGNE
DRY AND EXTRA DRY

Arpad Haraszthy & Co.
530 WASHINGTON ST. S.F. CAL.

N. B.—Examine the cork.

"Nashy in Exile"

The Best
Selling Book
Ever Published

Agents Wanted.
First Come
First Served

This Book will be the most rapid selling of any that has been published for years. It will be an elegant volume of 62 large pages, profusely illustrated, printed upon the finest paper, bound in an elegant and attractive style, being at once a humorous and truthful description of the countries of Europe, and making the most entertaining book of the kind ever printed. No writer is better known than its author, Mr. D. R. LOCKE, whose NOM DE PLUME, PETROLEUM V. NABBY, is known wherever the English language is spoken. Send for circulars.

SAMUEL CARSON,
Agent for the Locke Publishing Company,
120 SUTTER STREET,
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

JOHN TAYLOR & CO.

118 and 120 Market Street, and 15 and 17 California Street.
ASSAYERS' MATERIALS, MINE
Mill Supplies; also Druggists Glassware.

ART-PAINTED, PLAIN and GLAZED

TILES

For Decorations.

W. W. MONTAGUE & CO.
110 to 118 Battery Street.

DRINK FALK'S MILWAUKEE BEER.

The Argonaut.

VOL. XI. NO. 7.

SAN FRANCISCO, AUGUST 12, 1882.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

THE WRAITH OF STEPHEN ARNOLD.

A Story of the War.

I.

"Stay, illusion! If thou hast any sound, or use of voice, speak to me; if there be any good thing to be done that may to thee do ease, and grace to me, speak to me!"

A few days after the battle of Jonesboro, having received a forty days' furlough, I determined to pass the time in the neighborhood of a quiet little town near the Alabama line and the beautiful Tallapoosa River, and started alone on horseback from a point near Stone Mountain. Leaving Atlanta to the west, I went southward, intending to cross the Chattahoochee at Jones's bridge. In making for the road leading thither I reached the east end of what had been the battle-field before I had recalled the localities, and only became conscious of the fact when my faithful and intelligent horse began to manifest great interest in some old rifle-pits by the roadside. Soon the road began to be broken and impracticable from the debris of a line of hastily built earthworks. The evening was warm, and the sunlight streamed over my face as I rode slowly westward.

When I had reached the point where the battle had raged most fiercely the road became so nearly impassable that I turned out of it, intending to make my way through the scattered brushwood on a line as nearly parallel with it as possible. As soon as I struck into this stunted oak brush there started into life and activity what seemed to me to be acres and acres of flies, which swarmed past in a stream apparently as wide and ceaseless as a river. At the same time I began to grow sick with the foetid deadly odor of rotting flesh and blood. It was the perfume of mortality rising from dried-up pools of blood that had spurted from the veins of gallant men who had so recently met in sanguinary combat. This was increased by the corpses of dead artillery and cavalry horses scattered here and there through the underbrush, and the trenches filled with the seething corpses of hastily half-buried soldiers. The flies rained upon my hands, my face, my clothing, poured against my horse, and attempted to settle down upon both horse and rider in swarms, in streams, in clouds. There were flies of all kinds, green-beaded flies, black flies, large and small, of every conceivable movement, some slow, dull, lazy, some hissing and buzzing as they flitted by like flashes, some circling and droning around and around.

An awful silence brooded over the desolate region, and here and there black patches of shadow, floating over the dreary earth, marked where the vultures, gorged and satiated with their devilish feast, had risen slowly and reluctantly, and were silently wheeling overhead upon their funeral wings. I was in the midst of the horrors of that most horrible scene in the drama of war—a battle-field shortly after the battle.

Sick and disgusted, almost overpowered by the silent, ghastly horrors of the line of battle, I turned still more to the right, in order to avoid them, and kept in a course nearly parallel with the main road which I had quitted. But every few hundred yards brought me back again upon the line along which the combat had raged, and to the horrors I was seeking to avoid. Some strange, weird, unearthly influence seemed operating upon both myself and my horse, by which our course was imperceptibly but unfailingly deflected in the direction of the line of battle. My trusty Auster was foot-sore and weary, as I had had no opportunity to have him reshod for a good while. Our progress was slow at best, but no matter how I held the reins, no matter what the topography of the ground might be, it seemed impossible to travel on a line parallel with the road along which the breastworks ran without continually drifting back to them again. The ceaseless repetition of this fact began to excite my mental activity, and (if indeed I have any such feelings) my superstitious fancies.

What was it, then? Why was it? What influence thus persistently drifted us back to that fearful battle-line along the trenches? I might have found something to account for my own seeming tendency in that direction by referring it to morbid imaginings born of the loneliness and horror of the surrounding circumstances; but how account for the seemingly kindred fascination which infected the brave and faithful beast which bore me? Finally I turned his head more away from the line of works, and held the rein with a firm and unyielding hand. In the course of the next few hundred yards, by stepping almost imperceptibly sideways, he was back again upon the line of battle. And so it went on until the sun was sinking in the west, and travel off the road became more and more difficult.

About dark I crossed a ravine that ran in a nearly northern direction away from the battle-field. I guided my horse determinedly along its course, having concluded to find a spring where I could give him water, and halt until morning. In a mile, or less, I came to an opening where a small farm had been, and found a spring gushing from the hill and flowing into the ravine along which I had come. There I dismounted, and watered my horse. Taking the grain-bag from the saddle, I gave him his ration of shelled corn, and unloaded and removed the saddle and bridle-bit, that he might eat comfortably, leaving the head-stall upon him and the halter. I spread my blankets at the root of a tree, placed my saddle so as to answer for a pillow when I might wish to go to sleep, and sat down to consume the bread, onion, and dried beef which constituted my usual fare when traveling. The night came down in profound silence, and the large moon rose beautifully, so that the darkness was hardly increased by the transition from twilight to moonlight.

Auster was always a deliberate feeder when there was no occasion for any hurry, and I had finished my luncheon and lighted my pipe before he had eaten his corn. I went a little further down the ravine to cut some succulent shrubs for him, that even in the fall answer a horse well in place of fodder, especially the buds for next year's blossoms and the tender shoots on which they grow.

During the whole time I was dimly conscious that my horse and I were not altogether alone in this gloomy desolation. It did not occur to me, however, that this sense of the presence of something beside my horse and myself grew out of any thought of the possible propinquity of any other man or beast, and the consciousness of the impression itself was too shadowy and indistinct to be unpleasantly obtrusive. I do not think, however, that I would have been startled or surprised if I had heard a human voice addressing me. Having secured a good, big armful of the shrub for Auster, I returned to him, and threw them down in a pile at his feet. Then resuming my seat upon the blanket, and reclining against the saddle, I continued to smoke, while Auster browsed upon the shrubs I had given him, and the large moon rose higher and higher in the cloudless sky. But as my faithful horse got near the end of his repast he seemed to become anxious and disturbed. Every now and then he would raise his head and look around him, as if expecting the approach of some one, and would stand with his pointed, silky ears set forward, as if to catch some indistinct and distant sound. Then he would move his head aside, as if to avoid an unseen hand extended to catch his halter; and then he would stop chewing the tender twig held between his teeth, while he gazed at me for a moment with grave, inquiring eyes, and gave that low, peculiar rubble-rubble sound with his lips by which a horse recognizes the presence of an acquaintance.

"What is the matter, old fellow?" said I. "There is nobody here. Keep still!"

He put his face close down to mine, and again I patted him, and talked it over with him, until he seemed to be reassured. But he could not rest. Again he began that curious movement with his head, for all the world as if to keep some one from taking him by the halter. These same manoeuvres were rehearsed for the third time, and then I said:

"If there is anything up there to trouble us, old fellow, we will go and find out what it is."

I put the bit in his mouth again, re-saddled him, put on my blankets, and mounted. I let the reins hang loosely on his neck, and said, "Go on, Auster." The horse went slowly on until I supposed that we had come within a few yards of the old earthworks, some distance west of where I had turned away from them to follow the ravine. In passing through a patch of scrub-oak that was hardly as high as his back, Auster stood still. "Go on, sir," I said, and turning partly round, the horse started, but stopped at the very first step. "Go on, sir," I said again; and turning a little further round, he took another step, and stopped again.

My horse was manifestly laboring under some strange and shadowy fear, and thinking it possible that he might be frightened into leaving me, I concluded to take down the halter and hitb him, while I examined the underbrush to ascertain what might be lurking in it. I had become satisfied that there was something there, and if I had any definite idea on the subject, I think I rather expected to find a crippled horse, or a wounded soldier who had been overlooked at the time of the late battle.

The ground was flecked with shadows cast by the underbrush. As I looked around, seeking for something suitable to hit to, my attention was caught by what I supposed to be the top part of the stump of a small sapling that stood up, shattered and white, as if it had been cut off by a cannon-ball.

I put my left hand upon it to ascertain whether the halter could be securely fastened to it. No sooner had my hand come in contact with the top of the supposed stump than it shut down like the fingers of a human hand, and clasped my own like a vise.

It was the dead arm of a corpse sticking straight up from the shallow trench, in which it had been partially buried, to a height of more than two feet.

I am no coward; but when there alone, amid the surrounding horrors, in the ghastly moonlight, unexpectedly I felt the fingers of that dead man's hand grasp mine in their chilling clutch, a thrill of terror swept over me, and for one brief instant I think I would have taken to my heels if the dead hand had not held me so fast in its skeleton grasp. It was only for an instant, however. Quick as a flash of lightning it occurred to me that, although the fact was incredibly strange and repulsive, there was really nothing in the nature of danger about it; and as instantaneously also it occurred to me that if there should be any necessity for doing so, I could get my knife out of my pocket with my right hand, and cut the dead arm off at the wrist, and so release myself. I was utterly at a loss for a meaning to this marvel, and remained utterly passive. It seemed to me that all I had ever heard or read of mental hallucinations, odic force, psychology, witchcraft, and spiritualism, recurred to my mind at once, clearly and without any consciousness of mnemonic effort to receive it. At last I exclaimed:

"If there is any life or being connected in any way with this corpse that desires to communicate with me, I ask for some word or sign indicative of such desire."

Instantly the skeleton hand, upon which the dry and shriveled skin remained, relaxed its grasp, and then lightly closed again upon my own, but without any of that spasmodic force with which in the first instance it had clutched my hand.

"If that pressure of my hand signifies 'yes,' repeat it."

Again the bony fingers relaxed their hold, and lightly resumed it.

Then I said: "If it is possible for you to appear to me visibly, do so. If it is possible, press my hand again. If not, otherwise."

The dead fingers remained immovable, and I said: "Can you then speak to me?"

The dead hand made no sign.

"Do you mean that it is impossible for you to speak to me?"

Again the bony fingers relaxed for a moment, and again renewed their grasp.

After a little reflection, I spoke: "I take it to be true, then, that in order to get any information as to what you may desire, it will be necessary for me to put questions which may be answered by 'yes' or by 'no.' When this hand presses mine, you mean 'yes'; and when it does not, you mean 'no'?"

The skeleton fingers relaxed, and then renewed their bold upon my hand.

Of course I know that this is all strange, unphilosophical, fantastic, incredible, perhaps "impossible," but then I also know that it actually happened just as I have narrated it; and the line of communication having been thus established, I conversed with the skeleton, or with some one speaking through its hand, about as follows:

"Were you a soldier?"

"Yes."

"This coat-sleeve seems to have been blue: were you a Yankee?"

"No."

"A Confederate?"

"Yes."

"From the east side of the Mississippi?"

"No."

"From the west side?"

"Yes."

"From Missouri?"

"No."

"From Arkansas?"

"Yes."

"Is there any way possible by which more intelligible or expeditious communication can be had between us?"

"Yes, yes!" with apparent eagerness.

"You say you can not speak to me, nor become visible to me. Is this because there is no 'medium,' or third person present?"

"No."

"I desire to learn whether this more direct communication can be established here, or whether it will be necessary to go elsewhere. Can it be done here, and now?"

"Yes," eagerly.

"Can it be done by writing?"

"Yes."

"I have a small blank-book in my pocket, and a bit of pencil. Shall I undertake to write your wishes, allowing you to guide the pencil?"

"No."

"Is there, then, a better way than that?"

"Yes."

"You use this skeleton hand to communicate with me. Can you write with it if I put the pencil in these fingers, and hold my note-book against them?"

"Yes," with great eagerness.

I put my pencil between the skeleton's fingers, which opened to receive it, and held beneath a blank page of my note-book. Immediately I saw the dead hand in the act of writing, and after a little it ceased, as if the message had been completed. I looked at the hook, but the moonlight, although brilliant, was not bright enough for me to read the lines which I could faintly trace upon the pages. So I lit a match, and made a blaze with dry leaves and twigs sufficient to enable me to read. I managed to trace the writing as follows:

"Twenty feet beyond the spring where you fed your horse, on the south side of a large log, you will find a blank-book—a quartermaster's book of blanks. Get it; I have more to write than your note-book will contain. For God's sake do not forsake me. I suffer fearfully, and you can aid me if you will. I think you have too much good sense to fear me."

I read this singular message, and then said:

"I do not fear. I desire to help you if I can. I will go for the book, and will return as speedily as I can, and you may rest assured that I will not forsake you."

I went off to the spring, and without any difficulty found the large book of quartermaster's blanks, and set out on my return.

I can hardly describe my own emotions during the which was required to make this solitary little journey. I said to myself: "I am not laboring under any hallucination nor delusion; I am not frightened; I am not dreaming; I am not insane nor feverish; but am perfectly calm and collected, and in the full and normal use of all my faculties. I will see this to the end."

I determined to follow it out in spite of my loathing of the old battle-field and of my repugnance to that skeleton hand and arm.

I returned to the trench, sat down beside that dead hand, and having placed my pencil in the bony fingers again, I held the large blank book up to it, and said:

"Write what you wish."

Again the pencil glided to and fro over the broad page, and finally stopped.

I read as follows:

"For pity's sake help me—I am suffering. Bend this arm down level with the ground, and place the book and the pencil under this dead hand. It will take long to write all that I desire to say, and you can go to sleep. You can read it when you awake."

The night was so clear and beautiful that I had not thought of making a blanket tent for my own accommodation, but having determined to see this strange adventure to the end, I set about the work at once. Having cut some plant poles about as thick as two fingers, and more than six feet long, I sharpened both ends with my knife, and bending the poles into the shape of a half-hoop, I stuck them firmly into the ground, several feet apart, and then throwing my blankets over them, I drew them together at the ends, and fastened them to the ground with wooden pins. The tent was completed, and having crawled under it, I bent down the skeleton arm that stood up stark and stiff just within, and placed its bony hand upon the open page, and the pencil in the skeleton fingers. Having lit my pipe, I lay down with my head on the saddle, and smoked away in the darkness. For a long time I could distinguish the light, scraping sound of the pencil as it glided swiftly along the pages, and occasionally heard the rustling of the pages as they were turned over. I wondered at the marvelous phenomenon, and speculated as to what would come of it, until, overcome by weariness, I fell peacefully asleep.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

With the death of Madame de Balzac and the dispersal of her husband's literary effects a great many stories are now current in regard to the illustrious romancist. Here is one from the Figaro, which seems to have some probability about it, as it is in keeping with the imagination of De Balzac, who was the most impracticable of authors: An editor wanted Balzac to write a few pages in a book descriptive of Paris, to be entitled "Les Rues de Paris," and La Rue Richelieu was allotted to the novelist. When asked what emolument he would want for some four pages of printed matter, his reply was: "Three thousand francs." Publisher and editor were amazed at the price. Then Balzac explained the matter as follows: "If you want me to paint a landscape or a figure-piece, I suppose you will allow me to study my subject in all its details. Very well. How can I describe La Rue Richelieu, simply in its commercial aspect, without visiting, one after another, all the shops? Suppose I start on the Boulevard, necessarily I must breakfast at the Café Cardinal; then I shall buy some music at Brandus's, a fowling-piece next door, and a breastpin at the jeweler's. I never could do the thing properly without ordering a suit of clothes, a pair of boots, a hat, a dozen shirts, a score of cravats—" "Stop," said one of the editors; "one step more would have carried you to the shop where they sell cashmere shawls." There is no doubt that Balzac would have done exactly as he said for the construction of his article, for of all realists he was the most painstaking.

Some free translations: Ambulavit in litore—"He went out on a litter." Ergo Iris devolat et supra caput astitit—"Therefore Iris flew down, and stood upon her head." Sectam Epicuri flagitiorum magistrum esse—"The mistress of Epicurus was cut through with faults." Qui dedit ergo tribus patris aconita—"Who gave poison to his three fathers." Rara in tumi facundia Pano—"Eloquence is rare in their hands." Tiburno in gurgite mergis mara caput histerque—"Soak your head in the Tiber two or three times." Instruxit triplicem aciem—"He drew three axes." Contraria tellus nubibus assiduis pluviisquid madeset et austro—"The spunky earth got mad at the nibbling asses and the austere plover."

S. M. Brookes, says the Chicago Times, is still in that city. A committee of the Calumet Club has examined his pictures of early Chicago, and there is some prospect that they may come into possession of the club. While little claim is made for them as works of art, they have a local value which will increase with the years, as they are perhaps the only accurate representations of the little town, with its few one-story houses, from which a great city has grown since 1833. The artist has sold a number of his remarkable still-life pictures.

Lord Augustus Fitzroy, brother to the late duke, and successor to the title, was poor, a plain colonel in the army, with the small pay of an equerry to the queen. His eldest son, now Earl of Euston, and heir to the title, while an officer in the rifle brigade married a woman of the lowest character, whom he met at a drinking-saloon. A thriving family is the fruit. The shady woman's appearance among the nobility as a full-fledged countess is not hailed with the enthusiasm such an event would ordinarily create.

James Gordon Bennett has ordered a monster yacht to be built for him in Liverpool. It will be two hundred and fifty feet long, and eleven hundred tons burthen. The Namouna has evidently proved too limited in accommodation. If the present one proves too much the other way, Mr. Bennett may be able to sell her to one of the ocean steamship lines.

"For whom are you tolling the bell?" asked a gentleman of a sexton in a country village. "For Mrs. ——" was the reply. "What!" said the gentleman, "she is not dead!" "Not dead? Then I have tolled a lie."

OLD FAVORITES.

The Minstrel's Song.

Oh, sing unto my roundelay!
Oh, drop the hriny tear with me!
Dance no more at holiday;
Like a running river he,
My love is dead,
Gone to his death-bed,
All under the willow tree.

Black his hair as the winter night,
White his neck as the summer snow,
Ruddy his face as the morning light;
Cold he lies in the grave below.
My love is dead,
Gone to his death-bed,
All under the willow tree.

Sweet his tongue as the thrush's note;
Quick in dance as thought can be;
Deft his tabor, cudgel stout;
Oh, he lies by the willow tree!
My love is dead,
Gone to his death-bed,
All under the willow tree.

Hark! the raven flaps his wing
In the briared dell below;
Hark! the death-owl loud doth sing
To the nightmares as they go.
My love is dead,
Gone to his death-bed,
All under the willow tree.

See! the white moon shines on high;
Whiter is my true-love's shroud,
Whiter than the morning sky,
Whiter than the evening cloud.
My love is dead,
Gone to his death-bed,
All under the willow tree.

Here, upon my true-love's grave
Shall the harren flowers be laid,
Nor one holy saint to save
All the coldness of a maid.
My love is dead,
Gone to his death-bed,
All under the willow tree.

With my hands I'll hind the hriars
Round his holy corse to gre;
Ouphante fairy, light your fires;
Here my body still shall be.
My love is dead,
Gone to his death-bed,
All under the willow tree.

Come, with acorn-cup and thorn,
Drain my heart's blood all away;
Life and all its good I scorn,
Dance by night, or feast by day.
My love is dead,
Gone to his death-bed,
All under the willow tree.

Water-witches, crowned with reyes,
Bear me to your lethal tide,
I die! I come! my true-love waits.
Thus the damsel spake, and died.
—Thomas Chatterton.

Rosabelle.

O listen, listen, ladies gay!
No haughty feat of arms I tell;
Soft is the note, and sad the lay,
That mourns the lovely Rosabelle.

"Moor, moor the harge, ye gallant crew!
And, gentle lady, deign to stay;
Rest thee in Castle Ravensheuch,
Nor tempt the stormy firth to-day."

"The hackening wave is edged with white;
To inch and rock the sea-mews fly;
The fishers have heard the water-sprite,
Whose screams forebode that wreck is nigh."

"Last night the gifted seer did view
A wet shroud swathed round lady gay;
Then stay thee, Fair, in Ravensheuch;
Why cross the gloomy firth to-day?"

"Tis not because Lord Lindsay's heir
To-night at Roslin leads the ball,
But that my lady-mother there
Sits lonely in her castle hall."

"Tis not because the ring they ride,
And Lindsay at the ring rides well,
But that my sire the wine will chide,
If 'tis not filled by Rosabelle."

O'er Roslin that dreary night
A wondrous blaze was seen to gleam;
'Twas broader than the watch-fire's light,
And redder than the bright moonbeam.

It glared on Roslin's castled rock,
It ruddled all the copse-wood glen;
'Twas seen from Dryden's groves of oak,
And seen from caverned Hawthornden.

Seemed all on fire that chapel proud,
Where Roslin's chiefs unconfined lie;
Each baron, for a sable shroud,
Sheathed in his iron panoply.

Seemed all on fire, within, around,
Deep sacrilege and altar's pale;
Shone every pillar foliage-bound,
And glimmered all the dead men's mail.

Blazed battlement and pinnet high,
Blazed every rose-carved buttress fair—
So still they blaze, when fate is nigh
The lordly line of high St. Clair.

There are twenty of Roslin's harons hold
Lie buried within that proud chapel;
Each one the holy vault doth hold—
But the sea holds lovely Rosabelle!

And each St. Clair was hurried there,
With candle, with hook, and with knell;
But the sea-caves rung, and the wild winds sung
The dirge of lovely Rosabelle. —Sir Walter Scott.

PERSONAL GOSSIP.

Prince Victor Napoleon will in November enter the artillery branch of the French army for a year's military service.

Mr. George Augustus Sala has consented to be the first president of the first Journalists' Club in the British metropolis.

Minnie Hauk and her husband, the Chevalier von Hesse Wartegg, are spending the season at Marienbad, in Bohemia. Mr. Roswell Smith, publisher and principal owner of The Century, is also at the same picturesque resort.

When Gounod was but three years old he showed remarkable musical talent. He was able, with his face turned to the wall, to tell what key a person was playing in, and would follow successfully different modulations of various pieces.

Henri Rochefort knows all about the death of Skobelev, he says. A soporific draught was mixed with his wine, and in his sleep the gallant soldier was strangled. M. Rochefort always expected this to happen, and would have prophesied it, only prophecy is always a good deal safer after the event.

Lady Wilde's Saturday receptions are described as forming a most agreeable rendezvous, not only for æsthetes, but for writers, actors, painters, and even politicians and would-be philosophers. The guests all meet on even footing, as they are ushered up a quaint staircase into cosy salons, illuminated by a dim rosy-bued light, where they are greeted by their hostess with a graceful courtesy which is her characteristic charm.

The late General Skobelev was fond of Paris. He spoke French admirably, and loved French literature and all things French. When quartered in out-of-the-way places he always saved up his money to go and spend it in Paris. He was there when the Carlist war broke out, and joined the Pretender under a false name. It was the experience he gained and utilized while besieging a town in this war which enabled him afterward to take Plevna.

In common with a host of other celebrities, the Count D'Orsay, his celebrated friend, Lady Blessington, and her husband, have passed away leaving no descendants. D'Orsay left no children by his ill-starred marriage with Lady Harriet Gardiner, nor had that lady any issue by her second husband, Mr. Cowper. The title of Blessington is extinct, and, with a very small exception, nothing remains of an estate of two hundred thousand dollars a year.

Immediately after it was decided that the Irish judges were to have greater responsibility under the Crimes act, they were informed by the government that steps would be taken to afford them personal protection, and two detectives were put "on" each judge. Chief-Justice Morris, however, characteristically refused this honor from the very commencement. He has adopted the more sensible plan of going about in a pot hat and shooting-jacket, so that it will be hard to take him for a judge.

In referring to the talented Lafcadio Hearne, who writes the interesting translations from the foreign press, and the fantastic stories which appear in the New Orleans Times-Democrat, the Gulf Coast Advertiser remarks: "Few know under what difficulty his work is prepared. The sight of one eye is entirely gone, and the other much impaired, yet he struggles bravely against his afflictions." His translation of "One of Cleopatra's Nights" met with much favorable commendation from the press.

A letter written at Alexandria by a woman gives a highly romantic explanation of the Egyptian question. Her story is that Arabi, early in his career, fell madly in love with an Egyptian girl, the daughter of a fellah; but the unscrupulous Ishmail, then Khedive, also took a fancy to the girl, and had her carried off to his harem, without even saying "by your leave." He tried to pacify the luckless Arabi by making him a bey; but Arabi never forgave the injury, and from that moment vowed dire vengeance upon Ishmail and all his family. This is peculiarly a woman's solution of the problem.

The romantic elopement of Mademoiselle Marie d'Imecourt, which is hardly yet forgotten, has been followed by her regular and sober marriage with the Comte de Solms. This gentleman is a son of a Bonaparte princess, who has since been known as Madame Ratazzi and Madame de Rute. Mademoiselle d'Imecourt's first marriage with the son of the Turkish Ambassador in London was broken legally, but the first marriage hardly excited more comment than the second has excited. There is something incongruous in a union between the daughter of a staunch Legitimist family and a son of Madame Ratazzi.

A striking bit of history is told by the inscription on the marble tablets erected the other day in a room of a house in Velletri, Italy, by the authorities of that notable little city: "In this chamber," it reads, "Ferdinand II., of Bourbon, on the night of XVII. May, MDCCCXLIX, in face of a few regiments of volunteers, in vain sought to sleep in the midst of an army. Here reposed, victorious, on the following night, Giuseppe Garibaldi. Pius IX., returning from Portici to Rome, here dreamt of grandeur and stability of government among foreign swords. Here returned in MDCCCLXXV, and here, the country free and secure, slept Giuseppe Garibaldi. And here no one will ever sleep again."

Admiral Nicholson, who commands the American fleet at Alexandria, has the faculty of preserving his imperturbability under all circumstances. At dinner on his flag-ship, the Lancaster, one day, just previous to his departure for the Mediterranean last fall, a waiter, newly shipped, went to uncork a champagne bottle. He cut the strings, holding the head of the bottle toward the admiral. The cork flew out with a loud "pop," and a fountain of wine spouted over the dignified commander of the Mediterranean fleet. The waiter was petrified with dismay, and stood holding the bottle turned full upon his victim till one of the admiral's staff told the man to turn around, which he did, distributing what was left of the wine impartially over the rest of the company. The admiral did not move a muscle.

THE EMPIRE CITY.

Society Swells—their Trousers, and their Designs on Mrs. Langtry.

New York is full of visitors. They come from all over the world, and are mainly distinguished through their immense capacity for wonderment, their extreme gullibility, and their trousers. I hasten to add that my knowledge does not go beyond male visitors when I refer to trousers. It would be difficult to tell how many hundred thousand visitors there are, but it is never difficult to point them out in the streets. The surest and most tangible proof is unquestionably their trousers. I have mused on this subject nearly all day long, and have seen possibly a quarter of a million human legs (male) since I rose at noon, and wandered around to the Vienna Café for breakfast. The tables are out on the sidewalk, slightly sheltered from the crowd by some pots and shrubs, and we can thus sit and eat breakfast within five feet of the great crowd that rushes down Broadway in the morning, and up in the afternoon. I lounged about and looked at legs; and after seeing several hundred thousand I came to the conclusion that the leg-covering of a New Yorker resembles no one else's leg-covering, and that he walks as no other citizen walks. He invariably wears his trousers tight. There is no deviation from this. There are degrees of narrowness, of course, and some cases so extreme that the wearers look as if they could never sit down in the world without flying through at the knees; but the fact remains that a New Yorker wears tight trousers, and furthermore, he wears them so long that two wrinkles are carefully kept over the instep. If you see a man with trousers which, though tight are short, put him down at once as from Boston. If another one wears trousers which are made tight all the way down to the middle of the shin, and then suddenly "sprung" out large so as to make the foot appear less gigantic, put him down at once as a Philadelphian, whose courage always forsakes him at the last moment. And if a man wears trousers that are neither tight nor loose, but cut straight down, yell "Chicago," and ten to one he'll say "Here!" But a New Yorker wears them long and tight, and he walks with great care. It is not the rush-and-run walk that I refer to, but the walk up town at night when going home from business. The characteristic of a New York man's walk is a very straight carriage and a twenty-eight-inch step. While observing it to-day, I was at a loss to account for it until I remembered how many thousands of our young men belong to the militia. It is a fine thing, and gives a rather soldierly bearing to them; but at the best, I am bound to admit that New Yorkers do not carry themselves as well as Londoners. I refer of course to the English gentleman, not to the prancing cockney, with his toes turned in and elbows akimbo. Englishmen carry their heads in much finer style than we do, I am sorry to say, because I don't care to say anything good of them after their outrageous treatment of our Hillsdale crew.

A large number of Spaniards and Italians are in the city now. Many of them passed me to-day, strolling delicately along with graceful movements, on feet encased in high-heeled shoes that looked as though they belonged to their wives. Their shoulders are always too heavily padded. Many of them were in the café, where they sipped coffee and chattered incessantly. There are not so many as a short while ago, when the French Consul was in town. He used to go very often to the café, and there was quite a little coterie of foreign notables. That is, they were notable because they bore titles. Among them were Count de la Luna, Count Lowenhaupt, Count Geoffroi, Baron di Fava, M. C. Nogurass, Baron d'Agnos, and a handful of Spanish noblemen from their headquarters in Fourteenth Street. They sat and chatted incessantly, and made no end of fun of their surroundings. They were very poor customers of the café, seldom eating anything, taking at the most an ice, and they stared at the ladies inveterately. I may remark in this connection that the ladies enjoyed being stared at by them without doubt.

There are no end of people from the North, South, and West of the United States. The men wear baggy trousers and long black coats, and the women voluminous skirts, much too long. They wander about in the scorching heat with their faces fiery red, and their hands uncomfortably large, looking hoiled, saturated, and almost overcome, but feeling sublimely bappy. They are taken in and done for in the most astonishing manner by all sorts of charlatans in the streets, and seem to enjoy it. Three of them, two men and a woman, from Wisconsin I should judge, were walking along Twelfth Street a day or two ago, when a "roper," as he is technically called, saw them from afar, and he prepared himself. I knew what was coming, but it was a quiet street, and very warm, so I sat down on the steps of one of the houses, and watched the operations of the "roper" with languid interest. The "roper" gazed narrowly up and down the street, and seeing no policeman in sight, winked foxily at me, thereby, I presume, making me accessory to the crime, unfolded a sectional stand, and placed upon it his little satchel. Then he threw the satchel open, and revealed a couple of handfuls of little packages containing soap, and wrapped up in red paper, which he mixed up carelessly with his hands, and began in a loud voice:

"People wonder how I do it. Statesmen, orators, scientists, logicians, diplomats, and prize-fighters wonder how I do it. I wonder sometimes myself; but it certainly is done, and I am the man that does it."

This caught the ears of the countrymen, and they slowly gathered around the young man. I then went through the manoeuvres of a sham-battle with myself. I said: "Now, those people have probably very little money, and they are going to be outrageously done up. Shall I warn them, and get slugged some night by the 'roper,' when I am returning late, as a reward for my virtue? Or shall I sit here in the shade and see them done up?" I decided to see them done, and haven't had a single qualm of conscience since, which shows the effect of the heat on an uncommonly virtuous temperament. It was the usual game. The young man said he was selling that soap, which would do everything, from removing grease spots to curing insanity, for fifty cents a cake. The reason he charged so much was because there was so much money wrapped around the cakes of soap.

Here he picked up four of the packages, and opened them carelessly. All but one had five-dollar bills wrapped around the soap. The packages were about half an inch square. The young man apparently put the prize cakes back with the others, but in reality slid them into their little compartment underneath. Then he opened eight or ten more cakes, showing in all about sixty dollars, and after carelessly mixing the packages up asked the countrymen if they wanted to buy. Did they? Well, I guess; and they began to pick them out, paying their little fifty cents every time, but never, of course, finding the money that wasn't there. They couldn't understand their ill-luck, and kept at it, the woman being the most anxious of the three, till their money was exhausted, when they hurried away, looking nervous and frightened. The "roper," nine dollars richer, if I kept a correct tally, burst into a beaming smile, increased my gift by another confidential wink, stuck a cigar in his mouth, and said: "Beautiful gillers! Would you please give me a light, gov'nor?" I shook my head, and he passed on, hoping there was no offense, while I sat there, wondering over the stupidity of the three rural visitors. They are constantly being swindled, and are before the police justices every day trying to reclaim their own, when not in the hospitals recovering from the effects of having blown out the gas, which they do with unfailing regularity and effect.

This has been the most remarkable summer season New York has seen in many years. There seems to be no system about going into the country, and many people are still in town. Newport has not yet waked up thoroughly, though things are moving along. Long Branch isn't half full, while a year ago it was crowded. Coney Island has almost no fashionable permanent guests. Saratoga has not half its usual quota of really good people; and the other watering-places are all howling about the light patronage. Beside this, many people, like young August Belmont and his beautiful wife, the Townsends, the Wills, the Kingslands, and others, are returning from Europe right in the middle of summer. They land, and stop in the city until they can fix on a summering place.

There will be lots of fun, this fall and winter, over the beautiful Mrs. Langtry. The young society and club men are already telling what they will do when she comes, and looking forward to no end of fun. How superbly they will be "left." They seem to imagine that because Mrs. Langtry has gone on the stage she not only is no longer a lady, but is one of the breed of actresses about whom morbid, overgrown boys and would-be fast young men are constantly dreaming and talking. The afore-mentioned young society and club men make another ingenuous mistake when they imagine that the woman who has had the future king of England at her beck and call, and whose position in London society was assured by l'été-à-l'été luncheons with the Princess of Wales, will be flattered and fluttered by the lordly attentions of the young society and club men. Abbey, her manager, says that her hauteur is overpowering. He never saw her but once, and then she scarcely addressed him. She will live in the greatest seclusion while here, and go very little into society. Like Bernhardt, she comes to make money, and she will certainly make it, too. Her husband does not accompany her, of course. She will have nothing to do with him—which, after all, is proper, as he is unquestionably a mean-spirited little wretch.

Quite of the other sort is the husband of the other beauty, Madame Théo, who also comes in September for a short season of opera bouffe. Her husband has always struck me as being absolutely the beau ideal of a professional lady's conjugal appendage. He is a tailor, and a very good one, but instead of abandoning his noble art when his beautiful wife became the pet of Paris, he stuck to it like a trooper, and worked night and day making her costumes. Nothing deterred him. Wealth came and fame came, but he dug right on, devising costumes for her with a whole-hearted fervor that commanded her love, and made her wardrobe the envy of every woman in France. His whole object was to show his wife's "points," if such a word can be applied to a woman as plump and round as a peach. He has succeeded, for Madame Théo is said to look more nude and naughty with all her clothes on than most women do coming out of a bath. Let Mr. Catherine Lewis, Mr. Clara Morris, Mr. Emma Abbott, and the host of others take pattern by this admirable husband of the renowned Théo. Parisians believe the famous little opera-bouffe singer to be the most beautiful woman in the world. She has a lovely little face, immense eyes, and a pretty mouth. Beside, she has a reputation the reverse of Emma Abbott's, so she will undoubtedly "go" with New Yorkers, who in company with the rest of American citizens, are fond of piquant things with big eyes, who sing naughty songs, and dress in costumes of absorbing cohesiveness.

FLANEUR.

NEW YORK, August 4, 1882.

Why English ladies can not dress well, with the opportunities they possess, is beyond the comprehension of an American, remarks the London correspondent of the Boston Courier. They tell you, solemnly, that their fashions come from France; and yet when, after gazing at a French model, (as they are called,) you ask for a London-made gown, the difference is at once perceptible. The shops are delightfully well stocked, and everything necessary to a beautiful and a harmonious costuming is here. At Howell & James's we are bewildered at the quantity of beautiful materials, and the tasteful arrangement of the place. It seems a little odd to us to see all the fur stores filled with goods, just as they would be in the winter season. And it also strikes us as still stranger, while walking in the park, to meet ladies robed in lawn and muslin topped by fur capes. English children are all blacklegs just now, colored stockings being quite passé. But the bright color of their faces only makes a becoming contrast with their inky extremities.

At the best houses in England the artistes mix with the company after a concert, and sup with them; but at Buckingham Palace they are ignored. Nobody sees them except when they are singing, and they sup together in a hack apartment. It is believed that the Prince of Wales would be glad to alter this Escorial-like plan, but the Queen does not care to authorize so root-and-branch an innovation.

CHICAGO NOVELETTES.

"Back, I say!"

The silvered form of the sea was plashing in rhythmic cadence on the white sands of the beach, while here and there a flock of wavering light from the signal buoy on Sardine Shoals—that dreaded spot beneath whose treacherous waves so many goodly ships heightened with precious burdens from far Cathay and Muskegon had disappeared forever—brought into hold relief against the sky Giroflé McClosky's off foot as she stood by Bertram Perkins's side that soft June evening.

"You do not love me," said the girl, speaking slowly, "or you would not speak so cruelly. On this beautiful night, when the hills are suffused with amber haze, through which the stars glow in silent splendor, we should think of naught but love." For an instant the man did not reply. Then the girl stretched forth to him her bare white arms which glistened like marble in the growing dusk; but he heeded them not.

"Will you not speak to me, sweetheart?" she said, an infinite pathos in the words.

No answer came. Again the outstretched arms pleaded mutely and with pitiful eloquence for the joy that was never to be. Looking at her with a haughty, almost Vice-President-Davis expression on his face, Bertram again said: "Back, I say!"

With a despairing gleam in her darksome eyes, Giroflé turned away, and began to sob as if her corset would break. "God help me," she said, despairingly, "I can not hack."

"Why not?" asked Bertram.

"Because," was the reply, in tear-stained tones, "my polonaise is too eternally tight."—From "Whoa, Emma," by Joseph Medill, the Tribune Novelist.

"God help me!"

Standing by the window in an attitude of careless grace Beryl O'Flannigan spoke the words, in low, bitter tones, that told too plainly of the sorrow that was breaking her young heart. In her pretty white dress and ornaments of gold Beryl was indeed handsome. Brow, and throat, and cheek were as white as the fair cyclamen leaves that she had gathered in Brierton Wood that September afternoon, while the lustrous hazel eyes that peeped out from beneath a pair of brown lashes were sadly beautiful in the intensity of their pleading. But the dimpled face was pale, and the riant mouth as grave as a nun's.

Turning, Beryl stepped to the open door. The west wind met her with a caress as she emerged into the open air. Somewhere in the far blue overhead a lark was singing, and a hindle cow with foreshortened tail was sharply outlined against the western sky. As she stood there, thinking of the days gone by that were so filled with joy, her mother came softly beside her.

"There is no pie," she said.

Beryl's eyes grew dim with tears of longing, her little hands were lifted as if they could really reach out and gather back the happy past.

"All my life is mist and storm," she said, despairingly, "with not even a pie to send one ruddy gleam of hope athwart the horizon's sullen front."

The mother was bending over her child more tenderly than ever now. "Come into the house, my darling," she said, "there is a jar of doughnuts."

"Merciful heavens!" cried the girl; "what have you been giving me?"—From "How Beryl Jumped the Track," by Joseph Medill, the Tribune Novelist.

"Speak to me, Rupert."

Kneeling by his side as he sat on a fauteuil in the parlor of Coastcliff Castle, that summer evening, Gwendolen Mahaffy placed her little white hand in the broad, front-brake-man-on-a-freight-train palm of Rupert McMurry, and pleaded with her soft brown eyes. She was there at his feet, a lovely, brilliant creature, with some of the witchery of the wildwood in her lithe, listless grace of limb and poise. Rupert saw the pretty eyes dimmed with tears, the drooping mouth quivering in the intensity of its pain, and in an instant he had caught her in his arms. With a little sob of sweet content, she kissed him until his cheeks glowed like a girl's through their tan.

"We will never quarrel again, sweetheart," Rupert said, shifting his right leg slightly, so that the heiress could secure a more comfortable perch. "Never again must the black wrath of jealousy come between us, but through all the years that stretch away into the future we must sail together upon the shimmering sea of love."

"He is a lovely liar," said Gwendolen, softly to herself, after Rupert had gone, "and I must not let him get away." And then, seating herself at the piano, she began to play—gay dance music at first, but soon gliding into more mournful measures. Soft adagios and exquisite sonatas filled the room with melody, and stopped the street-cars. At last, with a sudden clang of sweet chords, she broke into a Breton love-song—a touching little ballad that she had heard the peasant women sing at their spinning-wheels in the red, warm-looking light before their cottage doors. It was a simple but pathetic thing, and when she had finished the refrain—

Go and start the kitchen fire,
Turn the gas a little higher,
Run and tell your Aunt Maria
Baby's got the cramp—

Her eyes were dim, and she broke down in a passion of tears. As she sat there, sobbing as if her heart would break, she felt an arm stealing gently around her neck, and soon a heaved face was pressed to her cheeks. Looking up in alarm, she saw that it was Rupert.

"Why are you weeping, my angel?" he asked, stroking with tender grace the blonde hair that was lying so trustfully against his vest. "Can you not tell me your sorrow?"

For an instant Gwendolen did not speak. Then, looking up to him, she said, in low, broken accents:

"I was thinking, precious, that if we ever did get married, and the baby did have a cramp, we could not start the fire—"

And a look of frozen horror overspread the pure young face.

"Why," asked Rupert, in agonized tones, "why not?"

"Because," said Gwendolen, "you are too eager to have any kindling-wood ready over night."—From "She Sat on Him," by Joseph Medill, the Tribune Novelist.

MUSICAL NOTES.

The Loring and Quintette Concerts.

It is many a month since four concerts of such merit as those given by the Loring and Quintette clubs have taken place in one week in San Francisco. This unusual series of musical events was introduced on Monday evening by the first farewell concert of the Mendelssohn Quintette, which has already been noticed. This was followed on Wednesday by the opening number of the Loring Club's sixth season; and as the quintette appeared on this occasion, the entertainment was one in spirit with the succeeding performances of the week. Under the direction of their leader, Mr. D. W. Loring, the members of the chorus contributed several effective numbers to the evening's programme. Mendelssohn's strong and dignified part-song, "To the Sons of Art," was rendered with much stability—a quality often recognized in finished instrumental performances than in vocal achievements. When it is perceptible enough in the latter to be leaned upon, so to speak, an important end has been gained; and the solid structure of firm and steady harmony which rose resolutely under the motion of Mr. Loring's haton was almost unwavering. Of different but equal excellence was the presentation of "Salentin von Isenberg," by Rheinberger. The careful management of its lights and shades was artistic, and very picturesque was this highly descriptive little tone-poem, full of tragedy and mystic German moonlight. Still another number awakening general approbation was an "Ave Maria" by Abt. A subdued murmur of accompaniment serves as a background for a beseeching solo part of much melodic beauty, which was taken by Dr. Bettencourt. The peculiar quality of voice possessed by this gentleman may be described as velvety. Its smoothness and softness are so marked, that if they were accompanied by a less throaty formation of tone, and infallibility of pitch, these characteristics would be remarkable. Dr. Bettencourt's voice is neither strong, round, nor always true; but its timbre is certainly very marked, and its effect in the "Ave Maria" was novel. An animated "Rhine Wine Song," by Liszt, "Spring Matins," by Behr, "Good-night," by Kücken, and "The Three Glasses," by Fischer, completed the choruses. The ensemble numbers played by the Quintette were two movements from the quintette in C, Op. 29, by Beethoven, and the andante and canzonetta, from Mendelssohn's E flat quartette. The canzonetta was loudly re-demanded, and the Quintette greeted with applause at every available opportunity. Solos were given by Miss Miller and Mr. Giese, who were both in happy mood. None of Miss Miller's English selections have been more pleasingly sung than was "The Bird that Came in Spring," on this occasion. The flute obligato to this graceful song by Benedict, was charmingly played by Mr. Schade; later, Miss Miller gave Cherubini's "Ave Maria," with a fine clarionette obligato played by Mr. Ryan, and as an encore, a vivacious composition by Campani. Mr. Giese's "Souvenir de Spa," by Servais, was the bonne-bouche of the evening, however. Mr. Giese gave of his musical bounty with a lavishness that he has not exhibited since his first days among us. It touched the depths of feeling; and after that mocking little Etude with which he responded to outbursts of applause, one knew not whether to laugh or cry. On Thursday came the second Quintette concert, memorable in many ways, but chiefly for the fine performance of the ninth quartette, in C, Op. 59, (No. 3 of the Rasoumofsky set,) by Beethoven. The four movements of this famous work are:

- a.—Introduzione—andante con moto and allegro vivace.
- b.—Andante con moto, quasi allegretto.
- c.—Menuetto.
- d.—Finale, allegro molto.

All musicians are aware of the especial celebrity attached to the Rasoumofsky set among the Beethoven quartettes. Stay-at-home Californians are rarely afforded an opportunity of listening to any interpretation at all of works of this character; and so finished a performance of them as one hears from the Quintette Club would command admiration the world over. It is impossible perhaps at a single hearing to form a practical judgment of composition so opulent in thought and varied in expression as are these quartettes; but at least one's keenest poetical appreciation may be exercised, and extreme delight be awakened. In addition to the quartette, the allegro con fuoco, from Mendelssohn's E flat quartette, Op. 44, was given, and an extremely taking adaptation of Soedermann's little "Swedish Wedding March" was played. Mr. Schade performed a Grand Fantaisie in F, for the flute, by Briccialdi, and obligingly responded to an encore. Mr. Ryan's interesting solo was a "Chant du Soir," by Hamm; Mr. Giese was recalled after playing an arrangement of his own of a "Feuille d'Album," by Vieuxtemps, and Mr. Schnitzler was artistic as always in the Andante, and Rondo Capriccioso, by Saint-Saëns. Miss Miller sang a scene and air from "Der Freischütz," "Pretty Primrose Flower," as an encore, and a cleverly written song by Mr. Ryan, entitled "Your Name."

But enjoyable as were all the events of Thursday evening, Friday's programme was still more satisfactory. Its first number was the allegro moderato, from Mozart's quintette in G minor—a movement of touching grace and beauty. Miss Miller followed in the difficult aria from the mad scene in "Lucia," with flute obligato, which proved to be one of her most brilliant efforts. The excellence of tune in which she sings could not have been better shown than by the accurate relation her voice sustained to the obligato, with its trying and difficult intervals. Miss Miller has a fine voice; it is sweet and strong, and her execution is unquestionably good. But as a singer she is surprisingly destitute of fire, feeling, and sympathy, and her pronunciation of English words is almost unintelligible. The familiarity of her encore, Mr. Redding's "Little Mountain Maid" song, helped matters slightly. But the lovely Schubert lied, "Thou art the rest," was veiled in mystery, as far as language goes. Its passionate climax, "Come, heart's delight, come here and stay," was given without a particle of enthusiasm, and yet, mechanically, the whole thing was faultlessly done. The pièce de résistance of the evening was, of course, Beethoven's tenth quartette in E flat, Op. 74, known as the "Harp Quartet," reason of the effect produced through profuse introduction of arpeggio passages. Its four movements consist of:

- a.—Poco adagio and allegro.
- b.—Adagio ma non troppo.
- c.—Presto.
- d.—Allegretto con variazioni.

It goes without saying that this famous and beautiful work was finely interpreted. All that delicate shading, refined expression, and technical perfection could do for its faithful presentation was certainly carried out; the first and last movements were characterized by a wealth of lyric life, and a clear coherency of treatment; but the second, if most involved, was also the most deeply and suggestively thoughtful. The fascinating scherzo, from the quartette in G, Op. 99, by Rubinstein, the Boccherini menuetto, completed the ensemble numbers. A peculiar inspiration seemed to have fallen upon the soloists of the evening. Mr. Schnitzler played with much power Sarasatè's fantasia on gypsy airs, and the "Chaconne," by Bach. To his instincts of artistic fitness this young violinist at times adds great force of feeling and magnetic brilliancy. His playing on Friday night was marvelous. The notes of his instrument took delicate flight, like visible sparks of fire, and vanished away, only to leave us longing, and wishing them back again. Mr. Giese, too, was in the happiest of humors. The "Souvenir de Spa" was deep-voiced, complaining or merry as he willed, and the "Etude" which followed, a carnival of whims. The Romance and Rondo for clarionette, composed and played by Mr. Ryan, aroused much approbation. The composition itself was an unaffected strain of graceful melody, and Mr. Ryan was particularly fortunate in the management of his mellow-throated instrument. To him, and to all the members of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club San Francisco owes many thanks, for with the closing notes of the little "Menuetto" ended on Friday evening one of the happiest periods of our musical history.

SAN FRANCISCO, August 9, 1882.

In Memoriam.

JUDGE DELOS LAKE—DIED AUGUST 9, 1882.

Within the sunlight of his home and pride,
Where Love stood sentinel with jealous care,
Through the dear watch, each heart to heart replied,
"All's well with him we guard—the morn is fair."

New honors came with every opening year,
So nobly earned none questioned the acclaim;
No man outranked him, for he stood the peer
Of all who sought the right—not tinsel fame.

Loyal and learn'd, chivalrous, brave and true—
A princely Bayard on Life's tented field—
His outstretched bands no measured pulses knew;
"Without Reproach" is graven on his shield.

Upon that shield we lay him down to rest;
Closed are the lips that hope and succor gave,
The falcon eye Death's hand has gently pressed,
The steadfast friend is hidden by the grave.

Within the sunlight of his home he died,
And Love stands sentinel with ceaseless moan,
Where heart to heart, in anguished tones replied:
"Our king is dead—the light of morn has flown."

SAN FRANCISCO, August 11, 1882.

A pleasant event was the large and successful surprise party that was tendered on last Tuesday evening to General and Mrs. George S. Evans, at the family residence. The occasion was their twenty-fifth wedding anniversary, and also the fifty-sixth birthday of the general. The spacious grounds were enclosed with canvas, and illuminated by Chinese lanterns. The entire first floor of the house, where dancing to Ballenberg's band was enjoyed, was canvased, and the rooms profusely decorated with flowers, smilax, and other vines. The company made their appearance at half-past eight o'clock, and half an hour later a procession headed by the general and his wife, and followed first by their six children, and then the guests, entered the parlors, when the couple took up their position in the front bay-window under a floral crown of choice flowers, and there had the nuptial knot again tied by the minister who had united them so many years before. The remainder of the evening was passed in dancing, in the partaking of a fine collation, and in admiring the large display of silver-wedding gifts.

Various classes of people have various patron cities: Twins—Paris. Tramps—Rome. Travelers—Turin. Dancers—Basle. Laundresses—Washington. Wicked people—Cincinnati. Ballet girls—Padua. Curious people—Pekin. Courting couples—Dublin. Drinkers—Cork. Pork-dealers—Hamburg. Musicians—Tunis. Vacillating sick folks—Constant to no pill. And so forth.

The San Francisco Bulletin says: "It is well known that Mr. Bryant was a purist in the use of English. For years he kept a list of tabooed words in his office. Not one of these vulgarisms was allowed to go into his newspaper." The Bulletin, says the Times, is not an apt pupil. "Tabooed" was one of the words rigorously excluded.

A Mr. Gotch has started as a rival to Oscar Wilde, and is drawing crowds to his æsthetic lectures in London. He pronounces the present male attire idiotic, condemns hat, coat, and vest, and reserves special bitterness for trousers. He goes in for knickerbockers and stockings, no shirt-fronts, no coat-tails, and no pockets.

A certain sharp attorney was said to be in bad circumstances. A friend of the unfortunate lawyer met Jerrold, and said: "Have you heard about poor R—?" His business is going to the devil." Jerrold—"That's all right then; he is sure to get it back again."

A London actress has written a letter to the Lord Chamberlain, (the Earl of Kenmare,) who revises plays and their "business," asking that he will abate the nuisance of décolleté dresses in the stalls and boxes, as they are annoying to ladies on the stage.

FLOTSAM AND JETSAM.

Some objects just found in Neufchatel are considered by Swiss archaeologists to throw a new light on the history of the lake-dwellers. Among them are a carriage wheel with iron rim, iron swords, and many human bones.

A peddler on an Iowa railroad concluded that, in the intervals of regular business, he might win some money from passengers as a three-card monte operator. After practicing with the cards until he considered himself an adept, he chose a green-looking man for a first victim; but this person was a professional gambler, and the peddler quickly lost one hundred and fifty dollars, for the recovery of which he has brought suit.

Mr. Hansom, who lately died, and who goes down to fame by the cab which bears his name, was a Roman Catholic of good family, and architect of many notable structures for the English Catholics, including the Duke of Norfolk, for whom he did much work at Arundel Castle. The carriage known as brougham was designed for Lord Brougham, and the clarence was named after the Duke, (afterward William IV.) for whom the first were built by the great coachmakers, Laurie & Manner, of London.

Let no trusting American citizen console himself with the reflection that the war in Egypt does not concern him. If he uses mucilage—as most likely he does—the war does concern him very nearly. The chief supply of gum arabic, which lies at the foundation of mucilage, is shipped from Alexandria, and the closing of that port will cut it off. There is a deep significance, therefore, as well as sound sense, in expressing a hope that the English admiral and his home backers will "screw their courage to the sticking place." Mucilagiously speaking, Alexandria is just now the sucking place.

At Ashton-under-Lyne, England, a custom is continued called "Riding the Black Lad." It consists in placing upon horseback the effigy of a man in armor, and after leading it through the town, using it as a hut at which the assembled people shoot, under pretense of putting it to an ignominious death. The figure represents Sir Ralph Assheton, who, according to tradition, oppressively exercised his privilege of fining those who omitted to extirpate corn marigolds from their lands, riding in black armor, with numerous followers over the fields, and levying penalties for neglect.

Not long ago the president of a French court examined a young man for a long time as to his insanity, and was so convinced that he was perfectly sane that he exclaimed: "I swear that if either of us is insane, it is I, and not this young man." The doctor of the lunatic asylum, who was in court, whispered to the judge to ask him about his mother. The judge did so, and the unfortunate patient, who was on all other subjects of more than ordinary intelligence, said: "My mother? She is here in my watch." And he opened his watch, saying, "Speak to these gentlemen, mamma," and then shutting it up, kissed it.

From some memoranda lately published by the Earl of Belmore it appears that in Ireland in 1737 a man's daily wages were seven cents. But then a cow cost from seven dollars and a half to ten dollars, and meal was one dollar and seventy-five cents per hundred pounds, while in 1719 a quarter of mutton cost thirty-one cents, and twenty-eight pounds of beef sixty-one cents. So again to-day untraveled Americans are often amazed at what seem such low salaries abroad, but then in Brussels, for instance, a much better room can be had for one dollar and a half a week than in New York for four dollars.

How many toes has a cat? This was one of the questions asked a certain class in a Paterson, New Jersey, school during examination week, and as simple as the question appears to be, none could answer it. In the emergency the principal was applied to for a solution, and he also, with a good-natured smile, gave it up, when one of the teachers, determined not to be beaten by so simple a question, hit upon the idea of sending out a delegation of boys to scour the neighborhood for a cat. Several boys went out, and having been successful, a returning board was at once appointed, and the toes counted, when, to the relief of all, it was learned that a cat possesses eighteen toes, ten on the front feet and eight on the hind feet.

An Arab on entering a house removes his shoes, but not his hat. He mounts his horse upon the right side, while his wife milks the cow on the left side. In writing a letter he puts nearly all his compliments on the outside. With him the point of a pin is its head, while its head is made his heel. His head must be wrapped up warm even in summer, while his feet may well enough go naked in winter. Every article of merchandise which is liquid he weighs, and he measures wheat, barley, and a few other articles. He reads and writes from right to left. He eats scarcely anything for breakfast, about as much for dinner, but after the work of the day is done he sits down to a full meal swimming in oil, or better yet, hoiled butter. His sons eat with him, but the females of his house wait till his lordship is done. He rides a donkey when traveling, his wife walking behind. He laughs at the idea of walking in the street with his wife, and of ever vacating his seat for a woman.

Everybody knows, observes a Paris journal of a recent date, under what circumstances Henri IV. was stabbed by Ravallac. While still brandishing the knife, he was arrested by the orders of the Duc d'Épernon, the knife being wrested from his hand by Pietro de Malaghino, an Italian attached to his suite, who afterward declared he had dropped the weapon in the crowd. It would appear, however, that Malaghino, who was a great amateur of curiosities, kept his historical relic until his death, when he left it to his descendants. It is difficult to say how it came in possession of Maurice de Saxe afterward; but certain it is that a month before his death the marshal made it a present to his physician, Sénac. Sénac bequeathed it to his son, M. Sénac de Meilhan, who presented it to the Marquis de Créqui, at whose death it became the property of the Baron de Blachefort, her cousin, when again it was lost sight of for nearly sixty years, until it turned up the other day in the Bureau of the Commissary of Police in the Quartier Latin, being then owned by a student whose father had been steward to the Raimbault family. This student had been for some time in the greatest poverty. The other morning he found himself absolutely penniless. Determined to put an end to his existence, he plunged it into his breast. Fortunately, it was too blunt to do much harm, and the unhappy youth only succeeded in inflicting a wound from the effects of which he will be cured in a fortnight.

The writer of an editorial article published in a recent issue of an Italian newspaper called the Sentinelletto del Midi, asserts that Garibaldi was slain at Aspromonte, and has, ever since that fatal day, been impersonated by a Livornese, whose resemblance to him was a matter of public notoriety for some years before the general's death. It is further alleged that the late King Victor Emanuel must be held responsible for the substitution in question, an expedient of his own suggestion for averting a downright breach between the Garibaldian faction and the dynasty. Several of the real Garibaldi's fellow-campaigners in Uruguay have at different times testified publicly to the hoax thus practiced upon the Italian nation, but to no purpose, although their allegations have been uniformly supported by indisputable physical evidence. They point, for instance, to the fact that Garibaldi's hands and feet were small and finely formed, while those of his impersonator were large and ill-shaped; that the former could scarcely write his own name, while the latter was a skilled and fluent penman. "This imposture," observes the writer, "accounts for the unconcealed antipathy entertained by Menotti and Ricciotti Garibaldi toward their dead father's impersonator, whom Menotti could never meet without breaking out into abusive language; while Ricciotti, although resident upon the island of Caprera, steadfastly declined to cross the impostor's threshold." It is worthy of mention that the Fanfulla, an organ of the Italian government, denounces the above-mentioned article in good round terms; but nevertheless reproduces it in its entirety, surrounded by a broad, black border.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

What shall we say of the death of Delos Lake? He filled a large space in this our small community. Not loved by all when living, he will be regretted by all now that he is dead. He was not a great man; he was an able man. He was not a great lawyer; but he was a most earnest and successful advocate, and a most excellent lawyer. He was a staunch, bold, and true friend. He could strike and spare not. He was brilliant, genial, and most companionable; but he could wound with a witticism and sting with caustic and bitter words. He was generous and brave, and had the courage that dared to defend the right when the right was not popular, and to shield the weak when the weak was wrong. He was in the prime of life, and in successful practice of a profession he loved. He stood among leaders in their front rank. He failed of attaining political distinction only because he was wanting in every mean art of the demagogue, and because he lacked every qualification that makes a proud and brave man acceptable to a cowardly and ignorant mob. Judge Lake died at his beautiful home, suddenly, in a moment, but not without warning, for now we learn to appreciate his bravery when we are advised that, during many months past, he has felt the shadow of the dark angel hovering over him; that behind his sunny demeanor and cheerful and quiet manner there lurked the ever-haunting thought of sudden death. Those who have been hurt by his stinging epigrams, or brought in contact with the sharp angles of his positive character, will treasure no resentments now that the grave has closed over him. The grief will be most bitter among those whom he best loved, and who best loved him—his wife and children. The shadow of his departure will linger longest over the home and loved ones whom his death has made desolate.

To those who are seriously intent on suicide, we would suggest that an instantaneous and painless death may be obtained by climbing an electric lamp-post and touching the wire. It will be found effective, and altogether a nicer way of ridding one's self of a no longer useful world, than by the vulgar mode of death by drowning, or with poison, knife, or pistol.

Through accident, and a desire to please certain young ladies, the writer found himself one evening this week at the "Tivoli." The Tivoli is a nondescript opera-house, a sort of foreign graft upon American manners, a cross between a lager-beer saloon and a concert hall. It is a spacious, cheap, uncomfortable hall, with hard chairs and sloppy tables, where anybody who has two bits can go, drink beer or gin, smoke hard cigars or worse cigarettes, with his hat on, and listen to music not of the first quality, to an opera not of the best morale, sung and played by artists not of the highest professional character. The house was comfortably filled with respectable middle-class people, and served to afford them a very satisfactory amusement. The audience was well-dressed, well-behaved, quiet, and orderly, and was composed mostly of people not born in America. The "Vienna Garden," the "Winter Garden," and the "Fountain" are places of similar resort, with the same general features of cheapness, music, beer, ham-sandwiches, and Limburger cheese. They are German "beer-gartens" and the French "jardin chantant," made to accommodate itself to our climate by coming in from outdoors under the protection of a roof. While we do not quarrel with any one whose tastes prompt him to the enjoyment of this kind of thing, or criticise his right to thus spend his evenings, we take the liberty of saying to those American parents who have been brought up to another kind of recreation, that in our opinion the old-fashioned American way is better for their children than this foreign thing which is being grafted upon our institutions. It is not only desirable but indispensable that amusement and recreation should be provided for our young folk; but when it comes to a mixed audience in a beer hall, with the free colloquium that beer-tables invite, we are old-fashioned enough to think that our girls can find safer and better places to enjoy themselves than at the Tivoli, Winter Garden, Vienna Garden, or the Fountain.

The San Diego Union favors the nomination of Joseph Russ, of Humboldt, for governor, and pays him a well-deserved compliment, as follows:

We want a candidate for governor whose party soundness can not be brought into question, who has a practical familiarity with politics, who knows men and things, and who has decided opinions, but whose chief merit consists in his standing as a man of the people. We think the gentleman who possesses in a special degree the qualifications we have recited is Joseph Russ, of Humboldt. We believe him to be not only the best man, but the most available man the Republicans can nominate. We have no doubt at all that he would be elected. With such a man at the head of the ticket, and no weak timber anywhere below, the Republican success in November would be assured. We believe the object of putting a ticket in the field is to elect it.

Let the San Francisco Irish be called together at once. Let the alarm be rung out from the old Monumental bell on Portsmouth Square. America is in danger. San Francisco has been insulted. Harry George has been arrested in Dublin by England's baughty minions of power. The iron belt of the Saxon is on the neck of Harry George. He has been snatched. Let San Francisco rise in the dignity and majesty of her might. Let her call upon her Irish braves, her noble Celts, to resent this cruel Saxon wrong. Let the MacMahon Grenadiers gird on their armor, and the brave Wolf Tones whet their swords for war. Let the Sarsfield Guards rally to the rescue of England's last captive of war. Let the Green Sons of Erin and the Order of Ancient Hibernians lay down the shovel and the bod, grasp the sunburst and the harp, snatch their rusty claymores, put a shamrock in their button-boles, and with avenging fire and sword and talking jawbone invade the baughty realm. Let the Land-Leaguers at once assemble to express their Celtic and just indignation, and while the warriors don their armor let the females of the Land League begin to scrape their linen undergarments for lint; and in the meantime let the usual finance committee bestir itself to gather money from servant girls and laboring men to avenge this wrong to an American Irishman who generously gave up a lucrative office in San Francisco, tore himself from the embrace of home, family, and the Democratic party to aid suffering Ireland to steal the property of land-owners; to encourage non-rent-paying tenants to murder landlords, and to help the most distressful island on its downward road from progress to poverty, from peace to political discontent, from the frying-pan of factious strife into the fire of rebellious war.

Who is Plunkett? W. A. Plunkett is the name subscribed to a column and a half review of the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of the Spring Valley Water Works vs. the Board of Supervisors. This new and unknown Daniel, who has so recently come to judgment in the water case, gravely concludes an opinion overruling and reversing the decision of the Supreme Court as follows:

After a careful perusal of the respective opinions of the majority and the minority of the court, and a perfectly impartial examination of the constitution and the statutes bearing upon the case between the Spring Valley Water Works and the Board of Supervisors, I find it impossible to resist the conclusion that the city is entitled to free water, according to the terms of the act of 1858.

W. A. PLUNKETT.

Who the devil is Plunkett?

General Stoneman's nomination by the Democratic convention was to him a great personal compliment. It was obtained through no intrigue nor by any of the improper appliances that too often characterize the pursuit of office by the professional office-seeker. Whether elected or defeated, he will come clear and stainless out of the campaign. If the Republican convention can nominate an equally unexceptional man, and in an equally clean way, in spite of unscrupulous machine politicians—a man who will spend no money in convention, and make no promises to delegates—it will be a long step toward success. If San Francisco had had her way in convention, Stoneman would have been beaten. The country beat the town. The San Francisco machine politicians, composed of the same men who in the Democratic party endeavored to nominate George Hearst, are now at work to nominate M. M. Estee. The Hearst rank and file were led by Buckley. The same faction, composed of the same element, is now led by Messrs. W. Higgins, James Gannon, and Richard Chute, Esquire. When there is a Democratic fight on hand, Buckley steps to the front. When a Republican fight is on hand, Higgins & Co. step to the front. Mr. Estee's nomination is being pressed by this element in politics, and it is this element that we do not favor. We do not think Mr. Estee is a representative of that higher, purer, and cleaner politics that we would like to see in ascendancy in this State. If he is a representative of a Sunday law—in favor of subjecting the liquor traffic to the control of the courts; if he is a resolute and manly opponent of party intrigue; if he take an independent and judicial attitude toward Mussel Slough rebels, Sand-lot agitators, gravel-sluicers, League of Freedom criminals, and corner-grocery whisky-sellers, he will disconnect himself from this nasty element of his party, rise superior to it, and not place himself under obligation to it. It is for these reasons that we do not regard him as the strongest candidate. Nor do we think that in event of election, under such circumstances, he could make the best governor. Hence we exercise our right of discussing these things in advance of the convention. At the convention we shall hear nothing but eulogy—"Sierra to the sea" declamation. This is the time, and the press is the place, to consider the choice of men seeking nomination. When the nomination is made, the party mouth is closed. Nor is any apology necessary to Mr. Estee. He is an avowed candidate, and has been for months. The machine is active for him. His partisans and friends are endeavoring to secure delegates pledged to him. They are endeavoring to keep out of the convention every known opponent. They are not over-scrupulous in their modes of party warfare; so they must not complain if Mr. Estee and his friends, and his character as a public man, and his modes of party management, should become the subject of comment.

The reason we desire to see James McM. Sbafter nominated for governor is because, in our opinion, he is a strong and respectable nominee, with whom the probabilities of success will be very great, and the accident of defeat honorable. We think him a broad-minded, resolute, and independent man, with the courage of moral convictions, the ability to carry his convictions into our code of laws, and the nerve to give the laws, when enacted, executive enforcement. If a law of the legislature should come to him for approval, we believe he has sufficient legal learning to determine whether it would be in harmony with the constitution. We think him capable, honest, and available. We expect to support anybody whom the Republican Convention will nominate. We have a first, second, and following choice, down to nine. If any one of the nine gets the nomination, he will have our support, if he has the moral courage to stand on a platform that has a strong moral underpinning—and that means, will support a rational Sunday law.

When Mr. Turguet was French Minister of the Fine Arts an old woman submitted to his inspection a beautiful vase which she said her son, a sailor, had given her long ago. No one could decide as to its origin, but Mr. Turguet saw that it was a fine work of art, and gave her what she asked. Some time afterward a Siamese swell was astounded on seeing it in the Ceramic Museum at Sevres. He declared it to be one of the sacred vases of Siam, whose exportation is strictly forbidden, and which are only in use in the grand temple at Bangkok. He valued it at five thousand dollars. The government gave the old woman a pension of two hundred and forty dollars a year.

The marriage of Miss Betty Evarts, daughter of Mr. William M. Evarts, to Edward Perkins, a son of Mr. Charles Perkins, of Boston, was announced to take place at Windsor, Vermont, Wednesday, August 2d. The engagement has been a long and happy one, unmarred even by a letter from the father of the bride.

Upward of thirteen million letters and postal-cards are posted daily in the world; 3,418,000,000 letters are annually distributed in Europe, 1,246,000,000 in America, 76,000,000 in Asia, 36,000,000 in Australia, and 11,000,000 in Africa.

SAN FRANCISCO FASHIONS.

The Styles in Furniture, Carpets, and Curtains at Present Popular.

A pretty thing in carpets is known as the Moquette carpet. It is certainly quite beautiful. In appearance it resembles the renowned Axminster, both in texture and in figures, showing soft, delicate colors in small designs, principally flowers. The borders that go with the Moquette are brilliant, and when one is made up it looks like a large handsome rug. The price of these carpets ranges from two dollars and twenty-five cents to two dollars and fifty cents. But the prettiest novelty in this line, although not as expensive as the Moquette carpet, is the Smyrna. In appearance it reminds one of the Turkish rugs. It is almost as thick as a board, and with both sides alike, which is certainly an advantage. It is one yard wide, and sells for one dollar and seventy-five cents. The border, however, which is only half the width, costs one dollar and a-half. I saw a carpet of this description being made up the other day. The warp was of black, and the wool of a rich cream color, upon which were designs of leaves and vines, done in heavy red, black, blue, yellow, and green, with the red and black predominating. The border displayed a quantity of black and yellow. Those large, sprawling figures, where the colors are contorted in all sorts of unheard of designs and flowers, the like of which was never seen in nature, may now be considered among the things that were. Borders to carpets now appear to be indispensable, and no carpet is complete without a border. Smyrna mats are also largely displayed by our merchants, and are quite pleasing to the sight. Then, there is the Yeddo mat. These come in very peculiar and odd-looking patterns of bric-à-brac, and range in price from five dollars up to seven dollars and a-half. It is astonishing how great a favorite red window shades have grown. What were at one time considered "loud," "vulgar," and by many positively "disreputable," are now all in vogue. Perhaps one reason of their popularity is owing to the delicate rose tint they cast upon the room and the complexions of the occupants. They certainly are not easily soiled. There are two shades of these reds—one a pale, and the other a dark red. The "crushed strawberry," however, is the most sought for. These look especially pretty under white lace draperies. There are other shades, however, that are very fashionable, among which is a sort of linen known as opaque. These shades come in all the subdued tints of gray and brown colors, and many of them are highly ornamental, with gilt hands or various designs; while others come in the plain. The purchaser first has his room furnished, then an artist surveys the apartments. This artist takes note of the predominant colors and arrangement of the furniture, and then paints the shades that they may be in perfect harmony with the rest. A favorite design for this style of work is to have scrolls or twisted ornaments running over the lower part of the curtain—not straight, but running diagonally from the left-hand corner, the space between the bars of gilt being filled in with work representing lace, or other designs, while at the upper end of the bars appears, gracefully drooping, a branch of flowers, fruit, etc., also done in gilt. Cornices to curtains are but little used now, massive but handsome poles taking their place. These poles are made either in gilt or in woods to correspond with the wood of the furniture. Gilt, of course, is considered the most fashionable, with brackets of the same to hold them up. The Madras curtains take the lead as fashionable drapery for windows. Some are completely covered with embroidery, while others have only a deep border of two or three feet. In looking through these curtains, or rather the embroidered part, it gives the effect of stained glass, as the colors wrought on the thin material, which is something of a cheese-cloth, are of the same tints used in the colored glass. The ground-work is of an écru tint, and said to be very durable. They are sold as high as twenty-five and thirty dollars, though there are some, with less work, to be had at ten dollars. In furniture I saw many novelties, both in design and material. Among them were different chairs for the parlor. One in particular is called the "conversation chair." It is made of oiled rose-wood. The posts at the corners are exquisitely carved into owl-heads. The chair is arranged for two seats, something like the old-fashioned à-la-tête, only instead of having the back in curves, it is square or of Grecian pattern, which is a decided novelty. The upholstery is of the richest quality of velours. A new style of bay-window chair is of mahogany, and another of ebony, both upholstered in satin brocade, with scroll arms, and the backs much lower than formerly. This is quite an improvement on the old style, as the backs do not interfere with the light. A reception chair of Cocobola-wood also claimed my attention. This wood is very pretty, having a slight purplish tint, though very dark. The back of this chair is perfectly straight and ornamented with embossed wood, showing medium-sized flowers. The seat is to be worked in embossed satin. The price placed upon it is one hundred and forty dollars. Another piece of the same kind of furniture, which has already been sold to a gentleman across the bay for three hundred dollars, was intended for the centre of a large parlor. It was arranged for six seats, but in three sections, each section having two seats, and instead of being a circle it was hexagonal in shape. The wood-work was exquisitely carved Cocobola, and these six-sided pieces are decidedly new. Amaranth is another very rare wood, and consequently very expensive. It is found principally in high-priced cabinets. Some unique shapes in bat-racks are taking the place of old-styled ones. These new designs are seen in exaggerated fans, horse-shoes, and crane's heads, with cut-glass mirrors, and books of silver, gilt, or bronze. New sconces are shown in ebony and fancy plush. The woods most in vogue for chamber-sets are mahogany, ash, bird's-eye maple, primavera, laurel, and toa-wood. This toa-wood, which is indigenous to the South Sea Islands, and very rare, resembles the walnut, although of a much finer and more finished grain. It is chiefly used in chamber-sets. A stylish combination of woods is the mahogany and ash. The tomana is another wood much in favor just now, from the South Pacific Islands, and is susceptible of a fine polish.

August 9, 1882.

AN ICHTHYOLOGICAL SYMPOSIUM.

A few days ago I went out walking in Golden Gate Park, and had just dropped down upon a bench for a rest, when an elderly-looking person approached, seated himself near me, and opened up a conversation by an abrupt interrogatory, thus:

"I'll bet you that you are the same old ferasfer that I once saw down near the coast of Florida, and don't you contradict me, for I'm a trepang of dimensions."

Now, that wasn't a peculiarly cordial salutation by any means; and if I had been out in the park alone I should have made no answer; but as there were hundreds of men and women passing each way, I concluded that I might as well encounter the odd party fearlessly, and so I replied by asking:

"So you are a trepang of dimensions, are you? And pray, sir, what is a trepang?"

"Did I needlessly throw away breath by declaring myself a trepang? Didn't you know, sir, the moment you saw me, that I was a lost member of the Holothuria Floridae? Or did you take me for one of those curious fishes, Periophthalmus and Boliophthalmus? They leave the water, come to think of it, just as I do, and run along the shore by a series of hops and jumps, very much after the fashion of the genus Rana, their wonderfully developed pectorals serving as the means of progress. When at rest, these fishes stand erect, resting on their fins, their heads elevated as if listening, and with their prominent eyes presenting a very curious appearance. Or maybe you take me for a species of the Anabas, which is also frequently seen out of water, having special organs for enabling it to breathe air. Ah ha! I believe you take me for that curious little fellow called the Antennarius, in irregular markings of olive and white, the mouth and fins decorated with a marvelous arrangement of waving barbels of flesh. Their pectoral fins, you know, are developed so that they have almost the appearance of limbs for progression on land; in fact, a common name for the creature is walking-fish. They are generally found, however, lying upon the surface of the water, half submerged in the Sargassum, of which they may be said to be mimics, as they are of the exact tint of the weed, and are thus protected from the Larus Zonotrichus, as it soars over the great patches in search of food."

"I take you, my friend, for a wandering lunatic," I replied, "and you had better go along about your business."

"You don't mean to say that I am crazy?"

"I mean to affirm that you are as crazy as a loon."

"You are very much mistaken; I am not the least bit out of my head. I am an odd fish, I will admit, and you will no doubt say so; but, thank heaven, I am an amphibious slug, and can travel by sea or by land. As I have once before remarked, I am a trepang of dimensions, and don't you fail to admire me as such."

I assured the curiosity that no person living could betray a more ardent admiration than myself for a real genuine trepang, and then for the first time I turned toward the visitor, and surveyed him carefully. He was shaped and dressed like a human being, and yet there was something decidedly fishy about him. His head was covered with sea-weed, and his ears looked like the fins of some big sea animal, and I thought that he had the smell of fish about him. His mouth looked more and more like that of a Nantucket cod every time I looked at it, and his hands seemed to be covered with scales. The buttons on his clothes were real barnacles; his watch-chain was made of sea-shells; his cane was the tail of a stingray; his watch was of abalone shell, and his long red-and-white fingers reminded me of the claws of a boiled lobster. Really, I concluded that he was indeed at least part fish.

There was silence for about five minutes, when I remarked:

"To tell you the truth, sir, I don't know what a trepang is. What is a trepang?"

"A trepang, my friend, is a delicate fish which grows to perfection in the Indian ocean, and is sometimes called a sea-slug, or a sea-cucumber. But I am no longer a trepang. I am now a catfish, of the genus Aspredo. By the way, sir, the catfish of Guiana are a curious species, and I will tell you something about them. I call them egg-carriers, because during breeding season, or on the approach of breeding season, pedicels appear upon the ventral surface, having curious cups upon them. The eggs having been deposited, the fish settles down upon them, each pedicle picking up an egg, which seems to attach itself by a glutinous secretion, hanging and dangling like so many bells or barbels. So they are carried around until the young are hatched and escape, when the pedicles disappear until the next breeding-time comes around. Agassiz, speaking of a member of the family, says: 'Who can see the catfish move about with its young, like a hen with her brood; or the sunfish hovering over its eggs, and protecting them for weeks, without becoming satisfied that the feeling which prompts these acts is of the same kind with that which attaches the cow to its calf?' Aristotle says that the catfish is conspicuous among river fishes for the care that it takes of its young; for the female, having deposited her eggs and departed, the male sets himself to watch the precious deposit, and keeps off other fishes for forty or fifty days, by which time the young have grown sufficiently to escape from their enemies. There is a catfish in South America whose male catches up the eggs in his mouth, and carries them until they are hatched. Catfish of the genus Doras and Calichthys travel in the dry season overland in search of water, moving over meadows in dense columns; and when the ponds dry up, burrowing in the mud. During rainy seasons these fish make regular nests of leaves, and carefully cover them up, which, during the process of hatching, are assiduously watched and courageously defended by both males and females."

And then my friend took a long breath, and I told him that his stories, about catfish in particular, were very interesting; and he proceeded:

"Do you know there are catfish that can sing?"

I answered that I did not.

"Why," he continued, "Aristotle mentions a fish by the name of Chirois, inhabiting the river Chitor, in the Mediterranean, as being one of the fishes that have the power of singing sounds. The Chirois is enumerated by Strabo among the fishes of the Nile, and it is said that the horns or spires on its head prevent the crocodiles from attacking it. These vocal productions of the catfish have been investigated by Sir Thomas Tennent, at Batticaloa, in northern Ceylon, who says: 'In the evening, when the moon had risen, I took a boat and accompanied the fishermen to the spot. We rowed about two hundred yards northeast of the jetty, by the front gate. There was not a breath of wind, and not a ripple but that caused by the dip of our oars; and on coming to the point already mentioned, I distinctly heard the sounds in question. They came up from the water like the gentle thrills of a musical chord, or the faint vibrations of a wine-glass when its rim is rubbed by a wet finger. It was not one sustained note, but a multitude of tiny sounds, each clear and distinct in itself—the sweetest treble mingling with the lowest bass. On applying the ear to the woodwork of the boat, the sound was greatly increased in volume by its conduction. They varied considerably at different points as we moved across the lake, as if the number of animals from which they proceeded was greater in particular spots; and occasionally we rowed out of hearing of them altogether, until, on returning to the original locality, the sounds were at once renewed.'"

"I never was so intensely interested in the Siluridae before, although I have read of some very large ones."

"Large ones!" he exclaimed, some of the barnacles dropping from his clothes at the time, and his face assuming an ultra-marine tint, "why, Pliny describes them so large and so voracious as to devour a horse, and I have many a time seen one hungry enough to eat an elephant. Grossinger mentions one which measured sixteen feet, and says that on one occasion a poor fisherman, on the confines of Turkey, captured one of these omnivorous fishes which had in its stomach the entire corpse of a woman! What do you think of that?"

"I consider that a mighty big fish story."

"Well, I can tell you bigger ones. Many years ago, during the eruption of a volcano near Ibarra, South America, hot, muddy water poured from crevices seventeen thousand feet above the sea, bringing with it millions of catfish, so many, in fact, that fatal fevers ensued from their subsequent decay for miles around. The Malapteuri, found in the rivers of North Africa, are remarkable for their power of giving electric shocks; the Arabs call them Raad, or thunder, while in the Niger they are known as Ishenza. Another Egyptian catfish, of the genus Clarias, was once worshipped in Latopolis, now known as Esneh, while those of the genus Hoplosternum are extremely valued on account of the strong smelling buni that is obtained from them, and which in Africa was formerly, and still is, an important article of exchange. Another curious catfish, the Stegophilus insidiosus, has the operculum set with curved spines, which enables the fish to attach itself to stones in rapid currents. A blind catfish, of the genus Gronias, is found in a subterranean tributary of the Conestoga River, in Pennsylvania; and two other genera, the Arges and Broutes, are nearly, if not quite, blind. But enough of this. I am no longer a catfish; I am a sea-serpent of dimensions!"

And like a flash of lightning the half-man-half-fish was transformed into an immense sea-snake (serpens marinus magnus) at least a hundred feet long, and curled himself up before me, and in a voice like a fog-horn, said:

"I am his traditional snakeship, sir; and I am known as the destroying angel of the deep. I am a monster, and don't you fail to impress that unmistakable fact upon the tablets of your memory. But do not fear; such an infinitesimal morsel as you are wouldn't make the hundredth part of a small bite for me. I swallow ships, with all their contents, and pick my teeth with their masts! I took down the Collins steamship Pacific, and one hundred and eighty-six men, women, and children, at one swallow, in mid-ocean, one cold morning in January, 1856. Sometimes I destroy vessels for the fun of the thing, which may give you some idea of what became of the steamship City of Boston, which I sunk in the Atlantic in February, 1870, and all on board, by a single movement of my tail!"

"But I have never believed in sea-serpents," I said, interrupting the monster.

"That's because you are a greater man than Agassiz, eh?" came the fog-horn tones, sarcastically. "That illustrious naturalist, in a lecture delivered in Philadelphia, March 20, 1849, expressed his belief in the existence of the sea-serpent, which he thought was a survivor of the almost extinct species of the Ichthyosaurus or Plesiosaurus, and believed it would one day be secured alive. Pontopidan, who is one of the earliest authorities on this subject, says that vessels have been destroyed by sea-serpents in Norwegian waters. In the records of the New England Linnæan Society there is testimony received in 1817 from a resident of one of the islands in Penobscot Bay, that he had often seen a serpent as large as a sloop's boom, and about sixty or seventy feet long. One of these enormous creatures, he asserted, had some years before leaped over a schooner lying in the bay, between the masts, and while the men on board were so frightened that they ran into the hold, the weight of the serpent sunk the vessel, which was of eighteen tons burden, fine streak of plank. For many years he was a regular visitor at Nahant and Gloucester, in which places he was seen by persons of unquestionable intelligence and veracity. Amos Lawrence, on April 26, 1849, wrote that he had never had any doubt of the existence of the sea-serpent since the morning he was seen off Nahant by old Marcial Prince, through his famous mast-head spy-glass. Such intelligent and reliable men as Samuel Cabot, Daniel P. Parker, Colonel Harris, once the commander at Fort Independence; Captain Sturgis, formerly of the revenue-cutter Hamilton, and many others, are on record as having declared that they have been eye-witnesses of the movements of a sea-serpent off Boston Light."

And then, he swallowed me, alive!

And now comes the narrative of the most delightful part of my adventure; for the belly of that fish into which I had been taken without a scratch was an aquarium of such magnitude and magnificence as to baffle perfect description. Its vastness exceeded that of any apartment I had ever seen, and was seemingly many miles in length and several in width. Through the middle of this grotto or aquarium meandered a stream at least an eighth of a mile in width, and many fathoms deep. I gazed with wonder and admiration upon the dazzling splendors of this matchless subterranean domain, unsurpassed as it was by the enchanting palace of Aladdin, even. I was accompanied by a guide, (a starfish,) who took me in directions which commanded a view of the high-vaulted arch over my head, studded with stalactites of every size and form, and covered with iridescent crystallizations. In some places the water trickled down the walls in miniature cataracts, and in other places, formed by the dropping of water from the ceiling, there were stalagmites, some of the purest white, and others tinted with a delicate rose and straw-color; some colossal, and others so gossamer-like that it seemed as if a breath might melt them away.

The aquarium was lighted by the Phyrosoma, Atlanticum, Thynnus, Pelamys, Sardon, Biphora, Cyanea, Caryophylla, Gorgonias, Pennatula, Phosphorea, Renillareniformis, and other phosphorescent fishes. There were phosphorescent shells, too, of the Pholas, Polyopthalmus, Chanolodus, Scopelus, Petropod-eleodora, Munida tennimana, and Gerjonus trideus species, which here and there throughout the grotto gave out flashes and illuminations like the electric lights.

There had evidently been a procession arranged for my entertainment, and the memory of that incomparable spectacle will never fade away. The procession was all night passing a given point, and was headed by a corps of drumfish; then came an immense swordfish, which seemed to have command of the cavalcade; then came sperm and common whale, all gorgeously illuminated by their own oils; then followed, in good order, platoons of mero, tintarero, and other voracious fish, including enormous man-eaters from off the coast of Florida, and others from the harbor of Havana, and smaller ones from Acapulco and Santa Cruz; then followed, in regular order, scup and tautog from Narragansett Bay; weakfish and bluefish, from the fishing banks near New York; shad from the Hudson, Connecticut, and Potomac rivers, and some from California waters; catfish from the Schuylkill and Wissahickon; halibut and cod from New England waters, and sheephead, mackerel, haddock, blackfish, hickory shad, eels, porgies, tinkers, flounders, flukes, kingfish, butter-fish, and many others from the Northern Atlantic Coast to the Gulf of Mexico; trout, pickerel, pike, perch, and suckers, from New England lakes and rivers; sheephead, and pompano—splendid specimens—from Mobile and Pensacola bays; whitefish, and trout, and bass, from western and northwestern lakes and rivers; fish from the Gila River; immense jewfish from the mouth of the Colorado; a variety of trout from California and Oregon lakes and rivers; salmon from the Sacramento and Columbia rivers; baracouda, turbot, rockcod, herring, mackerel, Spanish mackerel, tomcod, flounder, redfish, surf-fish, perch, sea-trout, flatfish, shrimp, sole, sturgeon, sardines, anchovies, greenfish, sea-bass, pompano, sheephead, and many others too numerous to mention from the bays and waters off the Coast of California; halibut and codfish, from Alaskan waters; goldfish, cuttle-fish, angel-fish, sunfish, starfish, and jelly-fish, in great varieties; flying-fish from the Pacific Ocean and from the Caribbean Sea; serpulæ, with three eyes, and serpulæ with clusters of eyes on their tentacles; annelids of all colors, shapes, and sizes; amphipods, squids, gasteropods, stingrays, carnivorous and vegetarian; mollusks of all descriptions; abalones, mussels, lobsters, prawn, crabs, cockles, clams, scallops, oysters, and other shell-fish and crustaceans; turtle, terrapin, and sheath fish; Chromides, Hydrogomas, Geophagus, and Physalia, from South American waters; Jarow, and Mana, and Tral-hote; Melanura, and other blind fish from the Mammoth Cave and from Cuban and African waters; then bellows-fish, parr, sterlet, bonito, dab, grayling, manatus, gudgeon, dolphin, graining, ling, grampus, kingfish, minnows, pilot-fish, roach, haddock, dace, pollock, stickleback, tench, white-bait, and porpoise; and then an ugly looking lot of wrasse, thornback, sea-wolf, trichinurus, flying-gurnard, torpedo, do-ree, moonfish, pipefish, stingfish, sily sirus, short sunfish, nambal, sculpin, starry-ray, dugong, father-lasher, goby, plaice, houndfish, sea-mouse, sawfish, garfish, lumpfish, malapterurus, electricus, glofish, ocellated blenny, gymnole, and milleis-thumb, and a great many others. Then came a huge cephalopod from Concepcion Bay; great schools of Nautili, Argonauta, and Spirula, and then the Paper Nautilus of Aristotle, Pliny, Pope, Johnson, and Montgomery, and of others who have contributed excessively to the halo of romance and poetry thrown over these remarkable creatures; then followed a curious fish known as the Gillichthys mirabilis, (Gill's wonderful fish,) to be found in all California marshes; then a lot of skate, which many people look upon with horror, and which Hogarth prejudiced the English against in one of his caricatures of the Boulogne Gate, and which many a chef converts into filets au gratin, by cutting off the meaty portions, and serves for turbot; then a platoon of Glyptocephalus cynoglossus, or in plain English, the pole-floounder, the new fish introduced to the people of this country by Professor Baird, and which nature has made with such a small mouth that it can not seize a hook; then a troop of murries, of which the ancient Romans were inordinately fond; then pigfish, from the waters about Sandy Hook and Long Branch, croaking a chorus; and then the maigre, cooing like a dove; then some fine specimens of brown mullet, from Florida, which, so Daniel Webster and Fanny Elssler have many times declared, have no superior as a pan fish; then a magnificent body of carp, which Badham says, "used to form an unfailing supply of orthodox diet for Lent and meager days, and was never wanting in larder or pond." Some of these were beauties, and had been raised on lettuce and celery leaves to perfection; how I would have liked to have had a three-pounder served from the boiling kettle with its scales untouched! Then came, as follows, a prodigious number of Finland herring; bream, from the Polar sea; red-snapper, from the hidden banks off St. Augustine; pearlfish from the Gulf of Finland; parrotfish, flying gurnet, salmon trout, sea-perch, zebra-fish, whiting, silver-bream, and twenty-seven other varieties from Australia. Then lampreys, the fish so much esteemed by the ancient Romans, and upon which Lucullus fattened; Idus melanotus, with a body almost as red as the gold fish of China. Then the following-named exotic fish: Gourami, of India, a fish of exquisite flavor; rock-bass, of Canada; mummichog of North America; transparent fish, of Bengal; macropodus, of Cochin China, its scales representing in themselves all the colors of the rainbow, and displaying vertical bands in yellow, red, and blue, intersected by stripes of changing color running from the head to the tail, sometimes called paradise fish, and is, among its kind, what the bird of paradise is among the feathered tribes; kin-yu, of Japan; omhre, of Turkey; catfish, of the Danube; doras, of Buenos Ayres; loach, from the north of Europe; telescope fish, from China and Japan, pictures of which are often seen in California; and the climbing fish of the Ganges, which often climb trees to quite a height in search of food, and is sometimes found upon the broad leaves of the palm-tree. Although the climbing-fish is said to be consumed in large quantities by the upper classes in India, says some writer on the subject, it has never been strictly considered as a food-fish, while its curious habits and form make it very interesting as an ornamental one.

As far as the eye could reach in any direction upon either side of the central stream, were to be seen angling implements of all kinds—weirs, hauling-seines, trawls, purse-nets, gill-nets, explosives, apparatus used in fish-culture, sponges, whalebones, oyster-cultural processes, utensils and implements, maps and plates of fishing streams, aquaria, artificial rivers, reservoirs, dead fish, skeletons, and fish-eggs preserved, cast in plaster, and colored; natural sea-water preserved pure, with all its properties, and rendered imputrescible by a new process; apparatus with an orifice for the forcing of oxygen into the water of aquaria, and plans in relief of transformations made in various marshes and rivers which had become breeding-places for fish and crustacea. The streets upon either side of the central stream resembled the shell roads leading from New Orleans to Ponchartrain, and from Mobile to Magnolia, twenty-five years ago. The hitching-posts were made of shafts of coral from the Mediterranean Sea, capped by mother-of-pearl from San Diego abalones, and there were monuments of boxes of boneless and preserved fish, and pyramids of hermetically-sealed cans of lobsters, clams, oysters, salmon, white-fish, mackerel, sardines, anchovies, and caviare.

Then came an ichthyological repast, pure et simple, as follows:

MENU.
Selected Oysters on the Half-Shell.
'POTAGES.
Green Turtle Soup. Fish Chowder.
HORS D'ŒUVRES.
Tartelettes of Craw-fish. Quenelles of Rockcod.
RELEVÉS.
Trout. Tomcod. Smelt.
ENTREES.
Filet of Sole. Cutlets of Baracuda. Soufflé of Salmon.
Deviled Crabs. Shrimp Salad.
Sea-bass en Brochette à la Ravigote.
FROID.
Sardines. Galantine of Eels. Anchovies.
DESSERT.
Clam Fritters.

Among the distinguished persons present were Hon. H. Fish, of New York; Preserved Fish, of Providence, R. I.; Herring, the safe manufacturer; Bass, the ale manufacturer; Judge Roach, of Santa Barbara; Professor Gill, of the Smithsonian Institution; the Fish Commissioners of the Pacific Coast, and other well-known ichthyophagists. There were also several ladies present dressed in salmon-colored silks. At the conclusion of the repast the Rev. Mr. Eels repeated the benediction.

Then the lights were suddenly extinguished, and for a moment the aquarium was as dark and as silent as a grave. Presently something like daylight came, and with it came out of the water toward me a great, fleshy, bulbous enormity, with eyes like locomotive head-lights, and a thousand boneless-looking arms dangling in all directions; and I heard a voice saying:

"Look out for me, for I am an Octopus Pentactus of dimensions!"

At the sight of a devil-fish I made an immediate attempt to escape; and, in doing so, fell off the bench in the park where I had been sleeping for an hour or more. I looked around about me, found I was on terra firma, and then picked up my hook on ichthyology, (which had fallen from my hands during my siesta), and felt relieved, as I took a street-car for down town, that it was from the arms of Morpheus, and not from the tentacles of an octopus that I was fleeing.

SAN FRANCISCO, August, 1882.

In his last lecture at Newport, Mr. Oscar Wilde, speaking from a platform decorated with bric-à-brac and Japanese vases, insisted that women's dress should be made in the simple style of former days. Like Mother Eve? No, Oscar, not yet; we can not stand so much æsthetics all at once. Mr. Wilde could not have selected a more appropriate place than Newport for the expression of his opinion that woman's dress should be made in the simple style of former days, when garments descended from parents to children; but there can be no doubt that men would favor the change. Many—a great many—years ago all modest women were clad in robes almost identical with the bathing-dresses of to-day, except that they did not wear trimmings, stockings, and trousers, and man's admiration for a pretty woman in a bathing-dress exceeds any that is given to the belle of the ball-room. But Mr. Wilde forgets that good figures, which were the rule in those days, are now the exception.

The festive and youthful Lord Shrewsbury, who has just made Mrs. Mundy his bride, is a regular scourge to his family, and his recent marriage has not improved his unenviable notoriety at home or abroad. His wife, however, does not lose sight of the fact that she is entitled now to wear a coronet, and is playing her low trumps right skillfully. No one familiar with the peculiar codes of the English aristocracy will be surprised if my Lady Shrewsbury is received with open arms before many moons have waned. She can not go to court, but that doesn't matter so long as those who do accept the situation.

The spot where Maximilian and his two companions were executed is marked only by a rude pile of stones and a cross. The inhabitants of Queretaro have repeatedly asked permission of the government to erect there a fitting monument, but the request has invariably been refused.

A DICKER OF DOWLES.

The following verses, taken from the August St. Nicholas, contain words not now in general use, but which may be found in Webster or Worcester. A key is appended below.

Once a culver(1) roiled(2) a corby,(3)
Chiding his furious(4) prowls;
And the corby from the culver
Tozed(5) in wrath a dicker(6) of dowles.(7)

"Give me back my dowles, O Corby!
Tozed from me with cruel force."
"When you bring a cogue(8) of cullis;(9)
Fribble(10) Culver, we will scorse!"(11)

Through the dorp(12) beyond the hill-top,
To appease the knaggy(13) rook,
Flew the culver; spied some cullis
Left to cool, and to the cook:

"Let me have a cogue of cullis,
Daff(14) me not with angry scowls.
I will take it to the corby
And get back my dicker of dowles."

"Fetch me first a trug(15) of cobbles,"(16)
Said the cook; and, undismayed,
To the colle(17) sped the culver,
And a trug of cobbles prayed.

"Collier, give a trug of cobbles
For the cook, who'll give to me
Cullis for the edacious(18) corby.
Then I'll once more heppen(19) he."

"Fetch me first a knitch(20) of chatwood,(21)
Culver," said the collier grim.
Culver sought a frim(22) woodmonger,
And the chatwood begged of him.

"Give to me a knitch of chatwood,
From the collier that will huy
For the cook a trug of cobbles,
Then with cullis I will fly

To the roiled, dicacious(23) corby,
And he'll give me back once more
All my pretty dowles, the dicker
That he tozed from me before."

"You shall have the knitch of chatwood
If you'll through the hortyard(24) pass,
And this rory(25) croceous(26) pansy
Give to yonder sonsy(27) lass."

Through the hortyard twirled(28) the culver,
With the rory croceous pounce(29);
Hattle(30) cocket(31) vafrous(32) pawky(33)
Hoiting(34) chirring(35) did advance.

There, beside a mucky(36) dossier,(37)
With a spaddle(38) in her hand
Cruddled(39) close the sonsy lassie
Whin(40) excerpting(41) from her hand.

Down he dropped the pounce so rory,
Degging(42) her with dew-drops sweet;
Back he flew to the woodmonger,
Claiming chatwood for the feat.

Next he this, the knitch of chatwood,
Quickly to the collier took;
Collier gave the trug of cobbles
Which won cullis from the cook.

Back, then, with the cogue of cullis—
Cullis made from fuhhy(43) fowls—
Flew the culver, and the corby
Gave to him his dicker of dowles.

1—Dove; 2—exasperated; 3—raven; 4—thievish; 5—pulled; 6—quantity; 7—down; 8—wooden bowl; 9—meat-broth; 10—frivolous; 11—exchange; 12—hamlet; 13—rough-tempered; 14—put aside; 15—bod; 16—rounded fragments of stone or coal; 17—coal-digger; 18—greedy; 19—comfortable; 20—faggot; 21—small sticks; 22—flourishing; 23—talkative; 24—orchard; 25—dewy; 26—yellow; 27—happy; 28—whirled; 29—pansy; 30—wild; 31—brisk; 32—cunning; 33—arch; 34—capering; 35—cooing; 36—dirty; 37—basket; 38—small spade; 39—stooped; 40—gorse or furze; 41—picking; 42—sprinkling; 43—plump.

George William Curtis in 1855 became a silent partner in the business firm of Dix, Edwards & Co., the publishers of Putnam's Monthly. He invested ten thousand dollars in the concern, but had no part in its management. Two years later the firm failed, and Mr. Curtis, through some informality in drawing up the articles of partnership, was declared to be legally responsible for a portion of its debts. Many of his friends held that he was in no way bound beyond the ten thousand dollars, and urged him to test the question in the courts. Mr. Curtis refused, although his decision involved the assumption by him of a debt of one hundred thousand dollars. He surrendered all his property. In sixteen years, by most arduous labor, writing and lecturing, he paid the last dollar of the debt.

Mrs. Burnett, the author of "That Lass o' Lowrie's," dresses in the highest style of æstheticism. At a recent entertainment in Washington she wore a gown described as the "Esmeralda." It was of shaded gray silk, with all the fullness of the drapery gathered both back and front into a yoke at the shoulders, and falling thence in one unbroken sweep to the floor. It was not confined in the least at the waist, and was buttoned in the back like a child's apron from the neck to the bottom of the skirt. There was a puff of cardinal satin on each shoulder, the sleeves were long and tight, and a small pleating of the bright satin finished the bottom of the skirt and neck.

The latest thing in bonnets, says the London Figaro, is a beautiful arrangement of spun glass. The bonnets are more "fetching" than anything ever yet turned out in silk, satin, or straw, being brighter in lustre and hue, and what is better than all, they are impervious to rain. At present their manufacture is restricted to Venice, and their price is rather high; but if there is a demand for them, no doubt they will be produced at a reasonable cost. A few ladies wore them last week in the Bois at Paris.

A Wagner festival is in progress at Bayreuth, which town is in Bavaria. It is hardly necessary to state that the government of Bavaria is an absolute monarchy.

PARIS FÊTES.

The Celebrations Which Attended Three Momentous Events.

For at least two days Paris has been in an uproar of celebration. There were three great events to call forth the populace: the dedication of the tomb of Michelet, the opening of the new Hotel de Ville, and finally, the greatest, the anniversary of the fall of the Bastille.

The morning of the 13th of July dawned brightly, and large crowds could be seen hurrying toward Père-la-Chaise. M. Jules Ferry was the person chosen to represent the government at this interesting unveiling of Michelet's monument. It was an appropriate selection, as Ferry was especially admired by Michelet from the fact that, while he was an ardent Republican, he was at the same time a devout Catholic.

The tomb I consider rather ugly. Michelet is represented as just having expired, and is half enshrouded in a winding sheet. The breast and arms are bare, and the face has a painful and ghastly look. Above rises the Genius of History, whose face and form were copied from Madame Michelet. With one finger she points to heaven, and with the other has just traced upon a marble tablet the legend: "L'histoire est une résurrection." The monument is the joint contribution of all the European nations, and cost a vast sum to build. M. Ferry delivered a fine oration, and the impressive ceremonies were concluded.

In the afternoon there was a grand review of the Scholastic battalion in the Place de l'Hotel de Ville. This consisted of fourteen-year-old youths, educated under municipal auspices. It had been the universal desire of the city authorities that the boys should drill on the 14th at Longchamps, and form part of the manoeuvres of the regular army; but the cruel Minister of War refused his consent, at the earnest wish of some surly army officers. Consequently the boys had a procession of their own. After their drill, which was exceedingly creditable, they were dined in the Salle Saint Jean of the Hotel de Ville, in which very hall, shortly after, took place the inaugural dinner. The battalion then had the privilege of going to two or three circus performances, which were held for its especial benefit. At about six o'clock the guests of the larger banquet began to arrive. First came President Grévy, escorted by the legislative and municipal authorities; after them came the foreign and other invited guests.

The new Hotel de Ville has already cost nearly five million dollars, and will cost many more ere its interior decoration is perfected. It is built upon the spot on which stood the old building, which was destroyed by the Communists in 1871.

During the banquet, which was partaken of by five hundred and forty guests, two fine military bands and the chorus from the Grand Opera House discoursed sweet strains of music. Three speeches were then made: one by M. Songeon, a second by M. Floquet, prefect of the Seine, and a reply to both by M. Grévy. After the banquet, the guests retired for a short time to the municipal chambers, while the tables were cleared away for the grand reception. This was attended by over seven thousand persons, and was crowded to repletion.

Early on the 14th the streets were filled with the gay merry-makers. M. Camescasse had issued an order to prevent street-dancing, but such a universal howl went up from the press and the indignant citizens that he was glad to hastily countermand the order, and permit the innocent revelry to proceed. At half-past nine o'clock every one could be seen hurrying for the train which was to hear the spectators to the race-course of Longchamps to witness the grand review of troops. The parade began at a little before two o'clock, and it was a fine sight to witness twenty thousand men go marching by. The Battalion de Saint Cyr headed the march. When the infantry approached there was great excitement. At its head was a corps of drummers, with a superb drum-major at its head. This is the first occasion since the revocation of Farre's stupid act abolishing the army-drum, that this instrument has appeared before the Paris public; and you may be sure that there was much rejoicing over the fact. People leaped in the air, shouting "Bravo! bravo! les Tambours!" The crowd then made a rush for the cars and conveyances, in order to reach the city in time for the regatta and water tournaments. Many stayed home from the review in order to attend the free performances at the half dozen theatres especially paid by the government for the occasion.

A week ago there died at Mantes an interesting personage. He was no less than the son of the late Duke de Berri, and the elder half brother of the present Comte de Chamford. In 1801, when the Bourbons had taken refuge in England to escape the revolutionary furies, the Duke de Berri, nephew of Louis XVI. and son of him who was afterward King Charles X. of France, fell desperately in love with the lovely daughter of a Kentish clergyman. Talleyrand himself fell in love with her because of her beauty and sweetness of disposition. In order to make the marriage binding, Amy Brown, for that was her name, consented to become a Roman Catholic. The two were married by a Roman priest, and registered in legal form.

But fate and the duke's family were against their happiness. After the births of three children—a son, George, and two daughters—the duke was persuaded to visit Italy, unaccompanied by his English family. Once there, his relatives persuaded him to repudiate the marriage. An order of annulment was secured from the Pope, although the children were considered as legitimate, and shortly after the duke was wedded to Marie Louise, daughter of the king of Naples, who several years after gave birth to the present Count de Chamford.

Poor Amy Brown went over to Paris with her three children to interview her recreant husband; but the police arrested her, and only permitted her to reside in Boulogne. She was granted a pension, and her two daughters were ennobled by their great uncle, Louis XVIII. The girls were married to two noblemen; but the boy never wedded. He has always passed a retired and dignified existence, engaged in acts of charity. His age at his death was where near eighty years.

PARIS, July 15, 1882.

BATH

PUBLISHERS' NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
Subscription, $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance—postage prepaid. City subscribers served by carriers at $4.50 per year, or 10 cents per week. Sample copies free. Single copies, 10 cents.
News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 213 Washington Street, to whom all orders from the trade should be addressed.
The American News Company, New York, and branches, are Agents for the Eastern trade. The Argonaut can be ordered from any News Dealer in the United States or Europe.
Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."

A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

ENTERED AT THE SAN FRANCISCO POSTOFFICE AS SECOND CLASS MATTER.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PIXLEY - - - - - Editor.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 12, 1882.

CONTENTS:

EDITORIALS:	Page.	EDITORIAL NOTES:	Page.
What a Christian Gentleman	1	The Loss Sustained in the Death	7
Thinks of the Sunday Law, and		or Judge Lake—Who is W. A.
its Opponents—The Unsolved		Plunkett?—The Reason That Problem of English Supremacy		Justice Would Make a in Egypt—A New Sequel to the		Good Candidate for Governor—
Holy Apparition at Knock—The		The Alarming News Concerning
Continued Endeavor of the Fed-		Henry George—The Governmen-
eral Judges to Sustain Chinese		Chances of Joseph Russ—
Iniquities—Another Essay on		Are German Beer-Gardens Good
Water from the Sagacious Editor		for the American Youth?—A Reof the Call—The Examiner's		view of the Relative Merits of
Cowardly Course—The Way in		General Stoneman and M. M.
Which the Sunday Law Favors		Estee.....	5
the Laborer.....	8-9	A DICK OF DOWLES.....	7
THE WRITER OF STEPHEN AR-		PARIS PETES.....	7
NOLD.....	1-2	COMPANY TO DINNER.....	10
OLD FAVORITES.....	2	LITERARY NOTES.....	10
PERSONAL GOSSIP.....	2	THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.....	11
THE EMPIRE CITY.....	3	THE TUNEFUL LIAR.....	11
CHICAGO NOVELTIES.....	3	DRAMA:
MUSICAL NOTES.....	4	Betsy B.'s Letter—The Parsifal
FLOTSAM AND JETSAM.....	4	Costumes.....	12
SAN FRANCISCO FASHIONS.....	5	STORYETTES.....	14
AN ICHTHYOLOGICAL SYMPOSIUM.....	6-7

Of a gentleman, a member of the "Christian Church," visiting San Francisco, we made some inquiries concerning the feeling that existed in the country in reference to the political issue made over the Sunday law. "Is it," we asked, "a live issue, that takes hold of the voter? And will it control him in his vote? Or is it a mere sentiment? Will it affect the entire State ticket, or only candidates for the legislature in their local nominations?" His answer was, in substance, that the sentiment is deep and wide-spread among the more respectable Democrats—church-members, and others—that the Democratic party has been guilty not only of a deliberate and wanton disregard of the feelings of all religious persons, that it has attacked Sunday not only as a day of religious worship, but has assaulted an institution that belongs to civilization, and done so in the interest of law-breakers and a criminal class in order to secure votes. "I am," said this gentleman, "not in any sense an illiberal Sabbatarian. I take as literal the words of our Saviour when He declared that 'the Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath.' I perform my necessary Sunday labors. I attend church with my family on the Sabbath day. I am not opposed to healthful recreation or innocent amusement on that day for my children. I assume, as a matter of law, right, and humanity, that my servants and my animals may rest. My household looks naturally to Sunday for the enjoyment of a quiet holiday. All my life I have lived under a Sunday law. I always understood that contracts could not be lawfully made on that day, that courts could not issue civil processes, and that hanks, postoffices, the village stores, and mechanics' shops were all closed. I am a farmer, and if I wanted to purchase goods, get my mail, or have my horses shod, I went to the village on Saturday. Thus, in my county, Saturday afternoon became, by common consent, a sort of half-holiday, and all the neighboring farmers congregated at the village. I never thought much about Sunday laws—in fact, I never heard much about them until of recent years. The first real serious opposition to a Sunday law that I ever heard of came from San Francisco. Upon inquiry, I ascertained that the liquor dealers would not close on Sunday. They claimed the right to keep open saloons for selling grog. This was some years ago, and when the case was taken to the Supreme Court, and it was decided by Judge Terry that it was unconstitutional to close the whisky saloons on Sunday, while all other occupations might not be conducted, I was of course very much surprised. But it, as I thought, affected only the city. I was a farmer. It was not to me or my neighbors a live question, and I thought but little of it. Then the temperance people became active, and I heard a great deal of local option. A Good Templars' Lodge was formed in the neighborhood. I am, I suppose, a temperance man. I have never signed a pledge or joined a temperance society. I drink wine. I have a small vineyard, and I make wine. I recognize the evil of alcoholic drink. I know the consequences in crime, poverty, domestic trouble, taxes, and discomforts which exist in the world by reason of the use of alcohol; and when this legal contest came between the temperance people and the saloon people, I was naturally in sympathy with the temperance people. When the Supreme Court decided that saloons must be closed on Sunday, I felt, as I suppose all law-abiding citizens felt, that the law ought to be obeyed; and when the beer-brewers, distillers, wholesale liquor dealers, lager beer saloon-keepers, and corner grocery whisky vendors of San Francisco formed an organization, raised funds, hired lawyers, bribed jurors, and impeded the course of justice by thronging the courts with cases, I felt just the least bit indignant. But still it was a city question, and I did not lie awake nights over it. I thought the temperance people and the whisky people might fight it out. When the Democratic State Convention assembled I did not dream of this question becoming a party issue, because I supposed that the principle of allowing Sunday as a day of rest, recreation, and worship was a recognized one, and had been accepted and protected by law for perhaps hundreds of years. When, therefore, I found that the Democratic party had, in the interest of whisky-makers and traffickers determined to break down and destroy the whole spirit of the Sunday law, wipe out the distinction between it and other days; allow courts and hanks, stores and shops to keep open; allow no protection to labor, no rest to working men on Sunday, I gave the matter some attention. I talked with my neighbors about it. We asked ourselves the occasion of this new departure, and we have come to the conclusion that the Democratic party wants the whisky vote more than it wants the church vote, and that it wants the criminal element of society more than it wants the respectable element. The League of Freedom organization is a combination of law-breakers in the interest of alcohol; and in this interest, and to secure its political support, the Democracy has determined to destroy the Sunday law. It was the act of the convention, and the party must be responsible for it. The conduct of the party is in this respect un-American. This 'league' of law-breakers is composed mostly of foreigners, and a few abandoned, unworthy, and criminal native-born. To destroy the Sunday law is to strike society and civilization a fatal blow. I and my immediate neighbors will vote the Republican ticket, if it takes the other side of this question, and nominates for governor a representative candidate. If not, I presume we will not vote at all. If there is anything to choose between candidates, I will vote for those I think best. If there is nothing to choose, I shall stay at home on election day." So far as we can learn, there is a very quiet under-current of opinion running in this direction. It takes with it an undemonstrative class of professing Christians, of moderate and undemonstrative temperance people, and a large number of native-born Americans, who think the time has come when, in the interest of so honored and acceptable an institution as Sunday, Americans should not permit themselves to be overrun by foreign manners. A very large class of Democrats who are neither professors of religion nor total-abstinence men, will not vote the ticket because of its cowardly subservience to this criminal, un-American, foreign, and whisky combination. It is a mistaken idea, and a libel upon the Germans, to think that a majority of them do not uphold a Sunday law, and we must do the Irish the justice to admit that all of them who pay any respect to the teachings of their religion, or who have any regard for the promptings of civilized life, are opposed to open saloons on Sunday, and to that extent desire to see the Sunday law upheld and enforced.

The Egyptian position remains in statu quo. Whether the English were whipped in their reconnaissance against Arah Bey, no one outside of the fighting force can find out; whether Turkey is in sympathy with England or Egypt, is a profound diplomatic secret; whether France will aid England, and Germany be content; whether Italy and Austria will unite to protect the Suez canal; whether the old Bear of the North is not arousing himself from the paw-sucking winter of a long peace, and getting ready to pour his irresistible Cossacks down upon the Bosphorus, are all inscrutable mysteries of that kind which time can alone explain. Of the false prophet of the Soudan and his innumerable myriads of invading Bedouins, the Associated Press no longer informs us. As we are not in the confidence of Admiral Seymour at Alexandria, nor of Lord Dufferin at Constantinople, nor of Bismarck, nor indeed—and we are mortified in making the admission—of any of the leading diplomats and statesmen of Europe, we find ourselves embarrassed in advising what ought to be done, or in explaining the complicated political tangle. Mr. Gladstone said at the Lord Mayor's banquet in London that "the forces have gone to Egypt in the protection of "great interests to the empire. Unless those interests exist "it would not have been possible for us to find justification "for intervention; but let it be known and proclaimed from "this spot—which affords a channel of communication with "the world not inferior to the senate itself—that those inter- "ests are not ours alone, but interests we have in common "with every State in Europe—nay, with the whole civilized "world." Referring to the Suez canal, he said: "It is es- "sential for mankind that that gate should be open, and that "country in which it is situated should be peaceable and or- "derly, and under a legal government. The utmost we have "in view, though the burden and honor of performing it may "fall upon ourselves, is a work that is essential for every "country in Europe to perform, and the performance of "which can not but redound, if it be associated with high "and disinterested objects, to the honor of those upon whom "the burden is cast. We don't go to war with the Egyptian "people, but to rescue them from the oppression of military "tyranny. Nor do we make war upon the Mohammedan "religion. Englishmen respect the convictions of believers "in every other faith. We do not want to repress the growth "of liberty in Egypt, but desire that she be prosperous. "England goes to Egypt with clean hands, and with no se- "cret intention to conceal from other nations. There is a "class of men besides the military who require to be over- "awed, who were the instruments of former oppression, "and who wish well to military tyranny because they would "provide for the revival of abuses and cruelty already ex- "tinguished or mitigated." When we read this, and recalled the splendid service of this distinguished statesman; when we remembered that he was England's premier, and that it was his strong hand that grasped the throttle-valve of the engine of war operating in the Delta of the Nile; when we recalled the fact that this declaration of England's purpose was made for the consideration of the world, and that upon its truth he staked the hard-won and proudly worn reputation of a long, laborious, and honored life, we guessed it might be true. When we contrast the condition of Egypt and its people with people under England's supremacy, it occurred to us as possible that under English rule and English law they might not suffer more, nor be worse treated, than under Moslem rule and Mohammedan law, and that perhaps good might come out of this struggle. Happily we are relieved somewhat from discussing these questions because they are so ably and intelligently handled by our contemporaries of the daily press. When Colonel Jackson of the Post, Mr. Pickering of the Call, and Mr. Parsons of the Sacramento Record-Union turn their powerful minds to the solution of any of these great European questions, we feel that the matter is in safe and able hands; and while we have our own opinions upon this new and English mode for the enforcement and collection of national debts, we feel a modesty that prevents us from intruding those opinions upon Colonel Jackson, Mr. Pickering, and Mr. Parsons. It was a Napoleonic idea that there should be established an international congress for the adjudication and settlement of international questions. We improve upon that idea by suggesting to Gladstone, Earl Dufferin, Prince Bismarck, Humbert of Italy, and their associate kings and emperors, that here in California they might find a triumvirate of talented and impartial editors who would undertake with confidence to successfully arbitrate this Egyptian difficulty.

Our readers have been often treated to an account of the authentic and marvelous apparition of the Sacred Mother Mary at the Roman Catholic chapel at Knock, in County Mayo, Ireland. On nights when the little village depended on the moon for its light, when the corporation was off its contract with the gas company to illuminate the town, at about the witching hour of twelve, when ghosts roam in church-yards, village sepulchres yawn, and the sheeted dead do squeak and gibber to scare lovers home at proper hours, and village tapsters send out their drunks, this stone image of the holy figure, carved in granite, was given to genuflections. It would raise its arms of adamant above its granite head, open its ponderous jaws, and in pantomime of facial contortion and moving limbs, bless the silent world of Knock, in the County Mayo. This veritable account is authenticated by several holy fathers and pious men who, happening to be out somewhat late at night, have seen this miraculous manifestation. Such miracles as can "make stones to dance" are infrequent, even in Ireland; and thus the little stone church, with its miraculous gable, sprang into deserved notoriety; and as one miracle hegets another, it was soon found out that the cement, chipped granite, and débris of the miraculous gable of the stone chapel at Knock would, if taken with proper faith, remedy all sorts of disease; while a midnight pilgrimage to the gable end would perform the most astonishing of cures. The good Father Kavanagh, not being unwilling to turn an honest penny, opened a traffic in this holy débris with pilgrims and curiosity-seekers visiting this holy place, and sold them, as relics of the chapel, so much brick, mortar, and woodwork that the building became unsafe, and now, as we learn, the ecclesiastical authorities have ordered it pulled down, and a new and handsome chapel erected near by. The ruins of the original edifice are fenced about and protected from the larcenous hands of such good and bigoted Romanists as think them worth stealing. These ruins still maintain their marvelous properties, and the good Father Kavanagh still makes holy merchandise of them. Their miraculous properties are as strong now as ever, and their curative qualities have not lessened. Taking advantage of the fact that he has relations residing at Knock, Mr. James Finchley, of New York city, has procured nearly a quart of this valuable débris, which he has for sale to the holy Roman faithful who believe in its miraculous properties, and the mortar is now on the market for general use. It is regarded as the best curative agency now offered to the public. The holy water of the miraculous spring at Lourdes, Jordan water, or the water of the two springs at Rome where Saint Paul's head hounded, are not at all comparable to the holy cement of the miraculous gable at Knock, warranted to cure, if one only has faith—not faith to remove mountains, but that kind of faith that enables a patient to take the gable end of a Catholic church in broken doses. Mr. James Finchley is now advertising his miraculous medicine, furnishing guarantees from the "clergy in charge" that it is genuine, and warranted to cure. We commend this church rubbish to such as are bigoted and superstitious enough to believe the lying story that there ever was any marvelous apparition upon the gable end of the Church at Knock, or that there is any curative property in this brick and mortar that does not belong to any brick manufactured by Phil Caduc, or to any mortar carried in a hod by any of the Pope's Democratic Irish in this city. Our good Christian Catholic readers who have an intelligent appreciation of the line between religion and knavery, between spiritualism and arrant nonsense, between reverence for holy things and the superstitions and hypocrisy with which priestcraft deals with ignorance, will pardon us if we make fun of this absurd story, which no intelligent person will seriously claim is other than a mercenary pretense to get money to build another church. The Roman Catholic Church is the strongest human organization that to-day exists upon earth. It embraces in its ranks most devout and learned men; it commands inexhaustible wealth; it dates back eighteen centuries; it is strengthened by inter-supporting organizations, that give it apparent strength to last through time. But it is not strong enough, well enough organized, old enough, rich enough, nor does it embrace among its members enough brains or religious fervor to enable it to convince an intelligent age that stone images genuflect by moonlight, or that the débris of a ruined church-wall contains curative properties to heal the sick. The age in which such absurd stories obtained credence has passed. The people to whom a belief in miracles is possible are dead, and thank God but few are now being born upon whom the wicked inventions of lying priests can impose the belief in miraculous gables as a quack medicine.

The recent decisions of our Federal judges, Field, Sawyer, and Hoffman, upon Chinese questions, such as the pigtail ordinance, Asiatic prostitutes, Mongolian laundries, etc., are steadily and persistently in favor of the barbarian. It is the law of this and all other civilized communities, that when the criminal is prepared for incarceration he shall be stripped, washed, and shorn of his hair. When this almost universal custom had the sanction of a municipal ordinance, and was made applicable to the Chinaman's braided queue, somehow or other the queue became a matter of conscience, worship, or religious observance, that gave it protection from the sheriff's shears. When a vile old hag, who had been plying her dreadful vocation in an alley devoted to window-tapping Chinese harlots, returned from China with new slaves for her shambles of prostitution, a lack of technical evidence turned harlot and victims loose to find their way direct to Stout's alley, where they are now murdering our youth by diseases that defy the skill of surgery and the science of medicine. When in the midst of our town and in all its busy places there lurks the Chinese wash-house, sometimes an opium den, and always dangerous of fire, it is found to be impossible that either the property-owners of the vicinage or the authority of the municipal government is sufficient to remedy the evil or abate the nuisance. The learning and the integrity of these eminent jurists place them above our criticism. We can not question their law or the purity of their motives, but we are, all the same, surprised and alarmed at the tendency of these, our Federal judges, to uphold every interest of our unwelcome guests. It really seems as though whenever the interest of our race comes in contact with the Chinese, our laws are generally protective, and our judges kindly considerate and jealously watchful of the Mongolian. If all these lesser adjudications are so uniformly in the direction of China, have we not cause for alarm lest in meeting the great question of Chinese immigration, and the greater question of naturalization, our Federal judges should stand up so straight in the stern impartiality of their international law that the Chinese will invade us through the hollow of their backs; that while they plant themselves so firmly, and stretch their limbs so wildly as to span the ocean and bridge the continent, that the Chinese may sneak between their legs for our invasion? We look up with awful veneration to the law; we bow to its majesty, and we fairly hump ourselves in hending reverence to the Federal judiciary; but, all the same, we modestly express the opinion that the municipal government of San Francisco exercises rightful power in controlling the location of Chinese laundries, in resisting the importation of Asiatic harlots, and in cutting off the hair of Chinese criminals.

Another air-hubble from the drowned cat. It is the Call that emits from its dead corpus the following declarations in reference to the Spring Valley Company's right of property in water: "Water is not property," says the Call; "water is a gift that nature bestows upon the people for the good of all." "Water falls from the clouds, and no one has a proprietary right to water in its original channels." "The water company has no claim of property in water, because it does not make it, and has no deed from the party who created it." "The water company does not produce water; it only handles what nature has produced for the good of all." "It does not own a drop of water; but may properly charge only for its distribution." "Water is nature's gift." This kind of twaddle fills a column in the Call. It is a specimen extract of a hundred columns of the same dreary hosh. There is not a school-girl on a primary hench who, having the ability to read, can not detect the illogical nonsense of this argument. There is property in water, the same as there is property in any one of God's gifts or creations. There is property in land, in air, and in light. Land becomes private property when reduced to possession. No man makes land, and no man has ever had a parchment deed from God, who made it. The wild beast is feræ naturæ until he is reduced to possession; but he is property when he is captured. The elephant Jumbo is a case in point. Fishes are only free until caught; when caught they are property, e. g., Woodward's seals. Water in the clouds, the ocean, or the running stream is by no means property; but when caught and held in reservoirs, when pumped for distribution, when diverted by rightful authority in pipes for use, it is as much property as milk in cans, wine in jugs, or oil in bottles. The Spring Valley Water Company go to San Mateo County, and buy land in fee simple title absolute for the collecting of the water that falls upon it from that part of the heavens, which they also own, for the title of land extends from the earth's centre to the zenith. They build reservoirs on their own lands, and through their own lands, having purchased the right of way. They convey their own water, in their own pipes, to reservoirs in San Francisco, built and owned by them. From this point they enjoy a franchise common to all—to gas, to water, to milk, to fruit, to vegetable peddlers, to Chinamen, white men, and negroes—viz: to carry their pipes, properly placed and under proper restrictions, to the consumer. The same right to carry gas or water under the streets is enjoyed by the milkman and merchant to carry their merchandise for distribution over the streets. The water company's title to water in pipes is the same as to water in pails. Water in a pail is as much property as when, after sugar and lemon are added, it becomes lemonade. Water in reservoirs, pipes, mains, and hydrants is property. Nor does it make any sort of difference to the consumer of water whether he pays for it as property, or whether he pays for its distribution; whether the company has property in it, or "use" for its control. The man who is thirsty has no time to watch these airy, gassy hubbles of the law. The man of sense knows that he has the same right to bring water, and is under the same obligation to pay for water brought from San Mateo in pipes as though it had been hauled the entire distance in a water-cart. The water of the Mahmoudieh Canal, in Alexandria, is as much property as that condensed and purified from Lake Marconis. Water being property, and the Spring Valley Company having the natural and legal right to sell it, it follows that no one has a right to use it without paying for it; that no one has a right to steal it; and if the individual has not the right to steal it, so the municipal government has not the right to confiscate it. If it be used for fires, streets, sewers, parks, and public buildings, the city must pay for it, and charge to tax-payers like all other municipal expenses; and if the individual would use it, he must pay for it at such rates as he can agree upon with the company, or as may be fixed by the Board of Supervisors, which is charged with the annual adjustment of rates. There is no difference between the principles involved in the commerce of water in California and those of oil in Pennsylvania. Oil is a product of nature; it was created by God; it is a gift of Providence bestowed upon the people for the good of all; it hubbles up from the earth, and there is no proprietary right in oil; it flows in veins through the earth, as does water; there are oil springs and water springs, oil wells and water wells. Does any one doubt that the oil that comes to the surface, or is pumped or run into the tank of the land-owner, belongs to him? Is there any difference in principle between the oil that comes from the earth into the claimant's possession, and the water that comes from the clouds? Oil is carried in pipes from the wells to the cities for sale. Has any idiot ever yet undertaken to declare that oil was not property, and that it might not be treated as merchandise, and sold for such price as its owners may demand for it. Has either the city of Philadelphia or Pittsburg, or has Oil City, ever set up the claim, through its board of supervisors or aldermen, that it had a right of free oil to illuminate those cities, and light their streets, parks, and public buildings; or the right to fix, without the consenting voice of the oil company, the price which citizens should pay for the commodity to fill their lamps or lubricate their machinery? If the San Francisco Daily Morning Call was printed in Philadelphia, and should set up such a doctrine with reference to oil, and should keep at it for fifteen years, and finally, after the question had been settled by the people at the polls, by the municipal government in three consecutive general decisions; after the Supreme Court of the State had adjudicated it, and on motion for rehearing again adjudicated it; and after all this the Call should persist in its absurd, illogical, and illegal attitude, we should think it was emitting offensive air-hubbles for the purpose of blackmail. The Argonaut uses this word "BLACKMAIL" in reference to the Call and its proprietors in retort for the mean and slanderous insinuation of being the organ of the water company. This water question is a public one. It is like any other that comes within the range of discussion as a question of political economy, as affecting all citizens, and as especially affecting the interest of the poorer consumers of an indispensable necessity. We discuss it, as we do all popular questions, in the interest of seventeen thousand consumers who, in our judgment, are unjustly taxed for water, and compelled to bear a burden that should be enforced upon all property and property-owners alike. We would let this controversy rest with the decision of the courts and the supervisors; but, so long as we are charged with being the "organ," we shall retort by saying that the course of the Call seems to us to be prompted by a desire to be hushed with coin, and to this we affix the epithet "blackmail." The Spring Valley Water Company presents to this community a business proposition, and is entitled to have the same protection of law and the same fair treatment that any public enterprise enjoys. It has the right of appeal to the common sense and common honesty of the community for its protection. When it violates law, it should be punished. When its affairs come before the public for discussion by the journals, it has a right to fair and impartial criticism. Its side of the argument has a right to be heard, and its opponents have a right to be heard; and it is altogether unbecoming for the Call and Bulletin to iterate the charge of interested and partial advocacy on the part of journals differing from them on this water question. The presumptions of blackmail are as strong against them as the presumptions of interest on the part of the Post, or any other journal defending the rights of the Spring Valley Water Company.

The Examiner pays the Argonaut the compliment of reprinting its choicest editorial paragraphs. We are altogether mistaken if there are not many intelligent readers of the Examiner in the Democratic party who wish that paper would be as indiscreet as the Argonaut, and once in a while dare to give utterance to an American sentiment, and occasionally write its real opinions concerning that class of foreigners who break our laws and bring our institutions into contempt—Irish Land-Leaguers and German beer-leaguers. It would be refreshing, if in all this broad America one Democratic newspaper could be found that had the moral courage to utter its honest political convictions. The men who own and who edit the Democratic organ are brave men. They are rich and talented. Yet there is not a mother's son of the whole cowardly staff who dares to write an honest opinion upon the Mussel Slough criminals, the Sand-Lot mob, the Land-League agitators, the League of Freedom conspirators, or the gravel mine depredators. They dare not use the terms "Germans," "Irish," "Jews," "squatters," or "slickens," without slobbering compliments, offensive to honest men because insincere. They dare not advocate any measure not in the platform; they dare not oppose anything in it. It is this sort of cowardly subservience to class vote that brings political parties, politicians, and party newspapers into contempt. To assault the party opponent, right or wrong, to uphold the party candidate, right or wrong, is the duty of the party organ and the party orator. To vote the party ticket through thick and thin is the duty of the Democratic partisan. In all these particulars the Examiner is thoroughly Bourbon.

The Sunday law is the only harrier between the laboring man and the capitalist that secures for him a day of rest in each week. Break down this law, and the capitalist will steal the day. He will compel every man to work for him on Sunday. If he will not work, capital will find a man who will. At first there will be seven-days' wages, and after that a week's work will be a week long with a week's pay. The laboring man who can not see this, and who is not willing to vote with the party that upholds a Sunday law, lacks common sense, and is guilty of dishonesty to himself.

COMPANY TO DINNER.

The Vital Subject of Roast-Veal Causes a Matrimonial Unpleasantness.

[With the assistance of Toinette, the cook, the head of the household has set the table, and he now awaits his spouse, who has been out shopping all day. At five o'clock she returns.]

She—I hurried home, my dear, because I knew that if I was not here to look after things nothing would be done properly.

He—I was just about to observe, my love, that when a woman expects company to dinner it is, if anything, preferable that she should remain at home, and not spend the day doing the dressmakers' shops.

She—You might as well say at once that you would like me to come down to dinner to-night stick, stark naked, for you know just as well as I do that I hadn't a stitch fit to put on.

He—Hum! Curious that whenever we give a dinner or go to a party you haven't a stitch fit to put on, though to my certain knowledge the moths are devouring whole cupboards full of your dresses.

She—Just like you to avoid answering my question. Any way, I was not sorry to give you a chance of showing how you would manage to get along supposing I were to die. What have you ordered for dinner?

He—We have first, two mackerel—two enormous mackerel—real whales. Then a nice jugged hare, a lovely piece of roast veal, a salad, some asparagus.

She—But that's a regular janitor's Sunday dinner—your mackerel, your veal, your jugged hare.

He—It was a learned hare, my dear; belonged to a showman that left it in his room when he slipped away, being unable to pay the rent. The dealer guarantees it to be a learned hare.

She—Then you must be sure to bring that fact out before the guests, so that they may appreciate it duly. We had better serve it up with preserves, and tell them it is a Russian dish. That'll tickle M. de Lèchelard—the old savant adores eccentric things.

He—Oh, that reminds me: De Lèchelard isn't coming to-night; he has to read a paper on something somewhere. We shall be just six at table.

She—Then we have ten times too much meat. Toinette! [The cook appears.] Take the veal off the spit; we shan't want it. [Exit Toinette.] Mother and sister Hortense are coming to-morrow, and the veal will do for them.

He (hesitatingly)—Ye—es, but we shall have barely enough to-night; some one'll go home hungry.

She—Then, when we have had the jugged learned hare, let us keep them waiting half an hour, as if we expected something from the restaurant, and at last you can say, gloomily: "Here, I suppose we had better let Toinette bring in the asparagus; but it's the last penny of my money they'll ever see!"

He—A capital idea. I had better say, "It's the last louis they'll ever get from me!" It'll sound more imposing.

She—Precisely; and after she has brought in the coffee Toinette can ring the outside bell, and come into the parlor, and say, "It's the truffled fowl from Bignon's, madame."

He—Yes; and I will go out furiously as if to give the man a wiggling for being so late.

She—Yes; and while you are out you can lock up the bottles we had at dinner that have anything left in them, for, between you and me, I have my doubts about Toinette.

He—You are right, my love. Still, it's going to be a pretty close fit, this feed.

She—With the jugged learned hare we'll give them some of your Pouillac.

He—Ugh, it's sour as vinegar; it's only fit to make pickles with.

She—But we must use it up somehow. Toinette won't drink it. You can tell them that it's one of the last five bottles that you got when the Emperor's cellar was sold out. I can fancy that I hear them smacking their lips, and remarking that the despot knew what good wine was.

He—Ye—es, it's all very ingenious; but still I think the veal—Now, if you'll take my advice, you'll tell Toinette to put the veal on again.

She (coldly)—You might as well tell her, while you are about it, to throw the remnants of our fortune out of the window.

He—Oh, nonsense! One little roast of veal.

She—There is no nonsense about it. The incident is a precious revelation of your character. You have an insane desire to air your magnificence before strangers; if you had your own way, it would be only a little roast of veal to-day, but to-morrow you would want to buy a palace to receive your company in. Oh, I haven't studied you all these five years for nothing!

He (resignedly)—Well, well, have it your own way.

She—Who will ever suspect us of economy when they see our silver? I mean to have all the silver on the table to-night, if it is only to take the shine out of that wretched Madame Dulac, who is so vain of her plated stuff that she'd like to wear forks in her hair, like a Congou negress, if she only dared to.

He—Well, and now, how shall we arrange them at table? We'll put Charnu at your right, I suppose?

She—Do you fancy for a moment that I want him at my right—that wretched little fellow who is always turning over the contents of his plate as if he were analyzing them, and sends it away barely touched? I'm sure that when he's at home he's glad enough to get a soup-bone to gnaw.

He—Well, then, have Dulac.

She—Thank you! That man is a perpetual trial to my nerves when he is at table. He always has the decanter in his hand, and yet he finds time to eat—to devour! The way that the victuals disappear from his plate always make me believe he carries a tin box under his coat to stow away provisions in for another siege.

He—But, my dear, we must arrange our guests in pairs, and I shall have to have the ladies on each side of me.

She—What? And I'll find that Madame Charnu before me? If you want to spoil my dinner just put that Madame before me. It takes away my appetite to see her glass screwed into her eye, and her head down lower than her elbows, scrutinizing her plate as if she was repairing a watch.

He—But, my dear, you know the poor woman is short-sighted.

She—Short-sighted? She isn't too short-sighted to be able to see well enough to deceive her husband!

He—Then, suppose we change the seats, and put Madame Dulac there.

She—Do, if you want to see me have an attack of hysterics. The minute any one says anything she breaks in, "Oh, worse than that happened to me once!" and she goes on to tell about that great fright that she had, and that scared her so that she was out of her senses for a while. I like that "for a while."

He—But, my dear, as we have only four guests, and you won't have any of them on your side of the table or on the other side, you must see that—When you asked them to dinner, you didn't surely intend that they were to eat in the kitchen?

She—When I asked them? I? Me?

He—Yes, when you asked them—

She—I never asked them!

He—Why, don't you remember at the Salon, when you said: "If you don't come and dine with us, my husband'll be positively unhappy," and as I couldn't say before them, "Oh, hosh, you know I won't!" I merely smiled and bowed, and they accepted your invitation.

She—It may have been so, but they should have declined it. If they had had the slightest acquaintance with good manners and the usages of society, they would have seen that I didn't want them at all, but had felt compelled to invite them because I had asked M. de Lèchelard in their hearing.

He—Why, Dulac saw that, and declined your invitation, but you wouldn't hear of it, and pressed the poor man till—Oh, that reminds me. Ho, Toinette. [She appears.] Put the veal on the spit; we'll have it for dinner. [Exit Toinette.]

She—And may I ask why you have given her these instructions?

He—I just remembered that Dulac abhors jugged hare, and as he doesn't care much for fish, the poor devil'll make an indifferent dinner unless—

She—Then it is Dulac who gives the law, whose pleasure is to be consulted in this household, is it? That he may gorge himself the house is to be given up to pillage? I shall have something to say about that. Toinette! [She enters.] Take off that veal, this instant! [Exit Toinette.]

He—Listen, my love. I did not desire to countermand your order before the servant; only, don't you see, as we have taken upon ourselves the burden of giving this infernal dinner, we must get out of the mess as best we can. We need never ask Dulac again, as his appetite alarms you, but for this time—

She—Your Dulac never shall lay down the law in my house. The man would devour the marble staircase if he were allowed to do so; you know yourself that he ate a great hole in his uncle's landed property.

He—Come, come, kitten, just do it to oblige me. All I ask is that the veal shall be placed on the table. I will let you anything you like that Dulac won't touch it. And besides, (coaxingly,) veal is always nicer cold next day.

She—Oh, I know your friend Dulac like a book; I've been watching these last six months for a chance to tell him what I think of him; and I propose to-night when the coffee is brought in to tell him—and I shall tell him right out loud, too, so that there can be no mistake about it—"If you still feel hungry, sir, I'll let the servant run round to the pork-butcher's and get you a few yards of bologna sausage!"

He (soothingly)—Don't excite yourself, my love, don't excite yourself. Come, (with a hewitching smile,) come, pussies, do it to please your little husband that loves his little wifey-pifey so. [She shakes her head.] Then, madame, I will—Here, Toinette! [Enter Toinette.] Put that blunk-dashed veal on the spit. You hear me?

She—Obey him at your peril, minx! I forbid you to do it.

He—And I command you to do it. Why don't you go?

Toinette—I wish you'd make up your minds about it. I'd like to know what that poor, innocent piece of veal thinks at being taken off the fire, and put on the fire, and taken off the fire again every minute?

He—No insolence, miss. Put on that veal, or out of the house you go, you impudent vixen!

She—Put that veal on, and I'll pack you out of here, after searching your boxes, you shameless creature!

Toinette—Oh, confound it; it's hard enough to have to serve idiots for poor wages and nothing to eat, without being abused too!

He—Out of the house this minute!

She—

Toinette—I will! [Rushes to kitchen, and returns with the veal.] There! do what you please with your measly old veal! [Slams it down on the satin-covered sofa, and exits.]

She (tensely)—Your hoon companion, Dulac, shall never happen on this veal. [Hurls it out of the window. It is picked up by a policeman, and taken to the Lost-and-Found Property Department. If not claimed within a year, the title to it will vest absolutely in the policeman.] And now, sir, hute as you are, I hardly think that you will ask me to seat myself at your table with the loathsome object to please whom you have trampled a doting woman in the dust. [Putting on her bonnet.] I will leave you to receive your guests yourself, and, in case inquiry should be made as to my absence, you have my authority to announce yourself a widower.

He (stupefied)—And pray where are you going, madame?

She—To the restaurant, to dine. I may not be able to find jugged learned hare there, but some gentleman may offer me a simple repast—

He (jamming on his hat)—By the grazing Nebuchadnezzar, madame, I'll see about that. Wherever you go, I, as your husband and guardian, will follow you, and let me see any one—[She goes out. He follows her. After a brief pause, the guests arrive.]

Toinette (who has lost her place anyhow)—Master and missus say to tell you they never are at home to the likes of you, and to git, or else I'm to throw hilling water over you. So! [They git. Curtain.]—New York World Translation from the French of Eugène Chavette.

LITERARY NOTES.

"A Chance Acquaintance," and "Their Wedding Journey," by W. D. Howells, have been reprinted from the first edition in a cheaper form. The volumes now make 12mo paper books of about three hundred pages each. Published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston; for sale by Bancroft; price, 50 cents each.

"The Eleventh Commandment" is a translation from the Italian of Anton Barilli by Clara Bell. It has attracted much attention in New York from the grace of its style and plot, although, like all Italian novels, it possesses a certain artificial floridity. Published by W. Gottsberger, New York; for sale by Bancroft; price, 50 cents.

The various volumes which have been lately published on the easier methods of acquiring foreign languages have generally displayed much good sense in their arrangement and development. "A Practical Method for Learning Spanish," by A. R. D. De Villegas, seems to embody all the newest and best ideas on the subject. Published by W. Gottsberger, New York; for sale by Bancroft; price, 75 cents.

"California, a Book for Travelers and Settlers," by Charles Nordhoff, appears in a new and thoroughly revised edition. This book has long been the standard work on this State for all those who intend a visit to this coast, or for our own local tourists. It originally appeared for the most part in Harper's Magazine, and in that form attracted much attention. Published by Harper & Bros., New York; for sale by Bancroft; price, $2.

"Demosthenes," by S. H. Butcher, of Oxford, England, is a concise and strongly written presentation of the life of the great orator. It is the sixth number of Dr. J. R. Green's series of "Classical Writers," and follows much the same arrangement and method as was employed in the preparation of the various volumes on "Milton," "Vergil," "Livy," and the rest. Published by D. Appleton & Co., New York; for sale by James T. White, 23 Dupont Street; price, 60 cents.

Constance Fennimore Woolson's "Anne" may be called one of the successes of the season. In its present bound form it is much more agreeable than when dragging its wearied length through a continued magazine. It is conceded by the critics that the first half is very cleverly written, but that the latter portion was too much for the author. However that may be, the story presents a series of very striking character sketches. Published by Harper & Bros., New York; for sale by Bancroft; price, $1.25.

"Vegetable Life" is the third volume of the "Science Ladders" series. The author, Mr. N. D'Anvers, endeavors in the simplest language to render intelligible to the juvenile mind the primary laws of the vegetable world. He successively treats the various stages of vegetation, through germs and cells, until a complete history of the plant is given. This little volume is copiously illustrated and substantially bound. Published by G. P. Putnam's Sons; for sale by Bancroft; price, twenty-five cents.

"Unknown to History" is the latest novel by Charlotte M. Yonge. It is a story of the captivity of Queen Mary Stuart of Scotland, and is a succession of striking incidents turning on a strong plot. It is one of the most interesting novels that Miss Yonge has written. We do not, however, agree with her in her view of the unfortunate Queen's character, and it is a pity that so talented an author should wander in the same old mistaken paths. Published by Macmillan & Co., New York; for sale by Bancroft; price, $1.75.

Mr. David R. Locke is known throughout the Union under his pseudonym of "Petroleum V. Nashy." His political satires have, beyond doubt, done more than many speeches to vanquish some of the political shams of our day. He now appears in a new rôle. His latest effort is "Nashy in Exile." It is the chronicle of a six months' tour through Great Britain, France, Germany, Switzerland, and Belgium. It is a large volume, after the style of Clemens's "Innocents Abroad," and is copiously illustrated. The style is exceedingly humorous, occasionally affording some good bits of description. The volume proves that Mr. Locke has lost none of his original power. Published by the Locke Publishing Company, Toledo and Boston; for sale by Samuel Carson, 120 Sutter Street; price to subscribers, $4.

Mr. Frank V. McDonald, of this city, has for several years been engaged in genealogical pursuits. While at Harvard College he began to trace the pedigree of his family, and for that purpose employed several vacations in visiting England, in order to interview the greater lights and authorities. He at first experienced much difficulty, mainly from the fact that his ancestors had first made their home in the Southern portion of this country. For, while any genealogist can almost guarantee to trace the ancestry of a New England family, with only the present generation given, it is a different matter in the South, where the records have been to a great extent destroyed by fire or war, or even when extant, prove to have been ill-kept and defective. Notwithstanding these obstructions, Mr. McDonald succeeded in ascertaining his genealogy, and the series of little volumes in which he recorded his experience in pedigree-hunting are interesting to the uninitiated as well as to one making a study of that subject. His labors now culminate in a life of his father, Doctor Richard H. McDonald, of this city, the first volume of which we have just received. It is an édition de luxe, elegantly bound and copiously illustrated. A specimen copy has been deposited in every State library in the Union, besides the British Museum, and many prominent public institutions in this city and the East.

Miscellany: Mr. Austin Dobson's rondeau, "On the Hurry of This Time," which first appeared in the Critic, has been pronounced by the London Athenaeum as "perhaps the best he has ever produced." Harrison Ainsworth's library, to be sold at the end of the month, is said to contain a blood-curdling collection of criminal literature which would make the fortune of the dime novelist.—M. Zola is writing an historical novel, with Garibaldi as the hero.—Mr. J. H. Shorthouse, in his introduction to the fac-simile reprint of George Herbert's "Temple," places that fastidious scholar and gentleman as a poet below Vaughan and below John Keble. The chief characteristics of his subject's poetry are, he declares, "strength of purpose and reality of insight, combined with carelessness and quaintness of expression."—At the Beckford sale, in London, the other day, Madame de Pompadour's own copy of F. Corneille's "Rodogune," a quarto volume magnificently bound, was purchased by Quaritch for $1,625.—London has a new Arabic monthly called Itihadu-l-Arabiyya.—A bit of early American literature was sold in London the other day for two hundred and fifty dollars. This was a small and rare volume, printed at Boston by B. Green in 1790, and entitled "The Indian Primer, and Milk for Babies."—Wide Awake for August contains its usual charming illustrations. Celia Thaxter contributes a bright little poem; L. C. Elson furnishes a sparkling little operetta; Ernest Ingersoll writes another ocean sketch, and Edward Everett Hale is the author of a very interesting paper on the English House of Commons. Published by D. Lothrop & Co., Boston. From the same publisher we have received the two little magazines for the "youngest readers," known as Little Folk's Reader and Baby-Land.—Those who cared to read Carlyle's frivolous and ill-tempered diary of his Irish tour may like to know that he has left a manuscript describing a visit which he made to Paris after the revolution in 1848. It contains sketches of several of the notable statesmen of that time. His reminiscences of his Irish journey have been welcomed by a universal note of indignation. The most lenient critic cannot forbear to express disgust at the dyspeptic Scotchman's invariable sneers at everybody who was kind and hospitable to him during that journey.—The promised appearance of Thackeray's suppressed preface to his "Irish Sketch Book" is indefinitely postponed, the firm of Smith & Elder having claimed to possess exclusive copyright over whatever work—whether printed or in manuscript—was left by that distinguished writer.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

Burdette's Budget.

The moon was full twice last month—the only month in the year thus honored, the astronomers tell us. Yes, we see; once on the Fourth of July, of course; and—well, we really don't know what special occasion there is for the other time, unless Congress adjourns.—Mrs. John Harriman, of Waterbury, Vt., astonished John the other day with four babies—three girls and a boy. Now, if she could only discard the boy and draw to the little girls, John would have to stay out.—The ancient Greeks used to call the cook an "archiniagirus," and his salary was four thousand dollars a year. And even then it isn't at all certain that the ancient cooks possessed the modern secret of frying a piece of liver so that it curls up like a sunburned shoe-sole, and you can draw blood in the middle and strike fire on the edges of it.—The Navy Department has telegraphed Admiral Nicholson that if he mixed up in the Egyptian war any further than his instructions went, it would be "entirely upon his own responsibility." Wouldn't it be funny, now, if Admiral Nicholson should get into a war away over there, all by himself, and the government would have nothing to do with it, and he should fight it out by himself, and capture Egypt, and change its name to Nicholsonia, and appoint himself minister to the United States, and come over here and put on imperial airs; and wouldn't the Navy Department wish it had stood in with him, then, just?—Hawkeye.

An Afflicted Family.

An English exchange says: "Recently, while the Princess of Wales was sitting in her carriage, near one of her country homes, a working man rushed forward, and offered to shake hands with her. This was regarded by the officers as a flagrant offense, and the man was promptly clubbed and dragged off." The English paper adds: "The princess bore the insult remarkably well, merely shrinking back in the carriage." From a special London correspondent we glean the following particulars: The princess bore up under the crushing disaster with remarkable fortitude, but the most terrible effects of the blow fell upon her royal relatives and the crowned heads of Europe. The Prince of Wales had only sworn off a week previous, and was behaving himself remarkably well, but when he heard that a man below the rank of duke had offered to shake hands with his wife, he just let go all holds, went on a prolonged spree, and has not drawn a sober breath since. Queen Victoria had washed the breakfast dishes, and was just hanging out the clothes in the back-yard of Balmoral Castle, when she heard the dread tidings. She fainted away, with a clothes-pin in her mouth, but was brought to in a few hours. On hearing, however, that the miscreant was named Snooks, and did not even have kid-gloves on, she had a relapse. She has been so ill ever since that Princess Beatrice has had to get the firewood, make the fires, and do all the cooking. She has even to chop up the firewood with her own royal hands. She asked the Prince of Wales to cut her up an armful of wood, but he was not in a condition to comply with her request. The Duke of Edinburgh was requested to take off his coat and help out, but he said he was not that kind of a duke, and that the family had better have their meals sent from a restaurant until the old lady was able to attend to her household cares once more. The unfortunate affair has played the mischief with the royal family.—Texas Siftings.

How Hazing was Stopped.

Many have wondered why there has not been any hazing at Harvard for the past three months. We are informed that hazing has been broken up in that college, and forever, by this means: Just after Sullivan whipped Ryan he was called to Harvard, and the faculty explained a plan to him, and he fell into it readily. He was to attire himself as a Quaker young man, and apply for admission as a freshman, and let nature take its course. On the first day of April Mr. Sullivan appeared at the college, under the name of Ahija Watson, and was assigned to a room, and placed on the roll of freshmen. His appearance was commented on, and as he passed through the college grounds with his peculiar garb, young fellows shouted "shoot the hat," "get on to his nifs," and other collegiate literature. It was all Mr. Sullivan could do to restrain himself from whipping a couple of dozen of the boys then and there, but he decided to wait until the proper time, when he would be able to get enough for a mess. That evening he was approached by a young man who pretended to be his friend, and invited to accompany him to a room where some boys were going to open a few bottles of wine. So they went to a large room where about seventy smart young fellows were congregated, with all of the appliances for hazing. Sullivan says there were seventy, but the faculty only found sixty-five senseless smart Alecks when the door was opened, but Sullivan thinks a few may have jumped out of the window, and taken to the woods. It seems that when they got the "Quaker" into the room they locked the door, and the ring-leader told the peaceful man to strip off his coat, vest, and shirt. He objected, but finally took them off. Some of the fellows who have since got out of the hospital say they noticed, when he removed his shirt, that he was put up like a hired man, and they thought it queer that a Quaker should have an arm as big as a canvas ham. They then told him to prepare to meet his God, and got out the iron to brand him on the back. He told them that he knew he was in their power, and was willing to submit to anything that was right; but he asked them as a favor not to bear on too hard, as he was of a nervous temperament, and might faint. Then they decided not to brand him until later, but throw him up in a blanket first. So they got the blanket, and tipped Sullivan over in it, and about twenty of the smartest hazers took hold of the sides, and tossed him up. When he came down, he knocked four fellows senseless with his fists, kicked four more across the room, and then got on his feet, and began to knock them right and left. He knocked down about twenty, stopped to spit on his hands, and said: "Is it hazing yet, want? Well, yez can have plenty," and he went at them, and in about fifteen minutes he corded up the whole gang, and hazing was broken up in Harvard College. As he threw his coat and shirt across his arm, and walked out of the room, and met the faculty in the hall, he said: "Trow wather in their faces, and they'll be all right in from tin minutes to half-an-hour," and he shook hands with the faculty, received his five hundred dollars, and left for New York.—Peck's Sun.

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

His Contribution.

Yes, I went to church one day
With some money—hy the way,
I'd been saving from my pay
For some socks.

But she sat across the aisle,
And she sunned me with a smile;
So I placed my little pile
In the box.

—Occasional Church-Goer.

A Minneapolis Song.

"Love me little, love me long."
Sang the dusty miller
To his wheat art, and his song
Did a maize and thrill her.

"Bid me harly hope. Oh, give Me one grain of comfort;
I would oat on thee, and live
Holding on to some fort.

In your eyes now love-looks shine,
There lies cereal pleasure,
Oh! hominy joys are mine,
Filling up my measure."

Came the maiden's corn-full laugh
At the miller's fawning;
"You can't winnow girls with chaff—Sir! to you good-morning."

—Providence Press.

To One Journeying to France.

Vous etes going o'er the sea
To visiter le grand Parea;
Ere you depart for France la helle,
Permettez moi to bid farewell.
Beware, mon ami, oh, beware,
Le Valentino's gilded snare,
And of the Mahille have a care—
They're mauvais people over there!
Beware la petite femme—griset—
Une jolie femme—hut had, you bet!
She bouls the boulevards all day
Au naturelle, décolletée.
I fondly hope and heg that you
Will these temptations all eschew,
And come back safe—say, voulez-vous?
Oui? Then tres-hien; ta-ta; adieu.

—Denver Tribune.

A Sage-green Song.

To yearn with an infinite yearning
Till the yearning yearningly yearns;
To burn with a fire consuming,
That, burningly burned, still burns;
To feel the incessant affliction
That comes from the passion-flower's leaves,
That weep o'er the dead love's eyelids
In the gloaming of misty eves;
To mourn with a sage-green sorrow;
To feel a cool gray pang;
To be haunted by vast black shadows
That over a lifetime hang;
To work these well together
In a grewsome style, I ween,
Is the way to rake in the ducats
From a fashionable magazine.

—Boston Transcript.

Woman's Way.

One tear-drop from a mother's eye,
One little soh from mother's heart,
Will make her wild boy's conscience start,
And waken echoes to her sigh.
One heavy slap from mother's hand,
A whack upon that wild boy's ear,
Will make him from her presence steer,
And rue the mischief he had planned.

—Erratic Enrique.

Rondeau a la Mode.

LUI.

Love is enough!

ELLE.

We must first huy
Or build a house with ceilings high,
With tapestries on hazen rooks,
Stained window-panes and cushioned nooks—
Our china must make artis's sigh.
Wax-candles' light shall soothe the eye,
Fitted in gleaming sconces high;
Brass mirrors shall reflect our looks—

LUI.

Love is enough!

ELLE.

Venetian glasses twisted wry
We'll have, and rugs of Moorish dye,
And vellum binding on our books—
And oh! we'll have Parisian cooks—
To us no Irish need apply—

LUI (feebly.)

Love is enough.

—Puck on Wheels.

Lines to a Guinea Hen.

I hear thy squawk at morning time, sweet hird;
When rosy-tinted clouds float in the skies,
Through dewy distances thy song is heard;
Above the robin's note thy carols rise,
Not low and harshful; no, hut glad and strong
Squawks to the clouds the clear, exultant song.

I can not catch thy warbled note, sweet hen;
Would thy soft numbers might inspire my rhyme.
Could I but make your cackle with my pen,
How down the ringing corridors of time
I'd send thy vesper hymn, dear speckle-back—
K'n ka, k'n ka, ka, ka, k'n ka, ka, kwack!

I glean the lesson of thy life so sweet,
To toot my horn, though I may sell no clam;
To make my carol loud, my footsteps fleet,
That men may hear, hut not come where I am,
And hide my treasures where no human arm, you bet,
Can take my unsung songs to make an omelet.

—Hawkeye.

TO HOUSEKEEPERS.

If you wish to use goods of full weight and absolute purity, see your grocer supplies you with

KINGSFORD'S
OSWEGO
STARCH.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER.

WALTER BAKER & CO.'S
CHOCOLATE.

SMITH
BROTHERS'
PACKAGE
BORAX.

WM. T. COLEMAN & CO.

AGENTS,

121 and 123 Market Street,

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

PRIVATE ASYLUM,
For the Care and Treatment of Mental and Nervous Diseases.

THE PROPRIETARY INSTITUTION
called THE PACIFIC ASYLUM, where the insane of the State of Nevada have been kept for several years, will be opened as a PRIVATE ASYLUM for the care and treatment of Mental and Nervous Diseases, on the 10th of August, 1882, the Nevada patients having been removed to the new State Asylum at Reno. The buildings are capacious and comfortable, having been constructed for the accommodation of over two hundred patients, and they are pleasantly situated in the suburbs of Stockton, and are surrounded by attractive grounds of forty acres in extent, with cultivated gardens and pleasant walks. Its advantages over public institutions in facility of admission and in procuring extra accommodations if required, are obvious. For terms and other particulars apply to the Proprietor and Superintendent, DR. ASA CLARK, Pacific Asylum, Stockton, Cal.
ASA CLARK, M. D.
References—Dr. L. C. Lane, San Francisco,
Dr. G. A. Shurtleff, Stockton,
Sup't State Insane Asylum.

GEORGE MORROW.

GEORGE MORROW & CO.

(Established 1841.)

COMMISSION MERCHANTS

....AND....

DEALERS IN HAY AND GRAIN.

SHIPPING ORDERS A SPECIALTY. CONSIGNMENTS SOLICITED.

39 Clay Street,

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

C. ADOLPHE LOW & CO.

Commission Merchants,
SAN FRANCISCO.

OFFICE IN NEW YORK, 42 CEDAR

Street

Liberal advances made on consignments.

S. & G. GUMP,

581 and 583 Market Street, S. F.,

Manufacturers

Mirrors, Cornices, Hardwood Mantles, Picture Frames, and Etc-a-Brac.

IMPORTERS OF GOUPIL'S ENGRAVINGS, CHROMOS, PHOTOGRAPHS, ETC.

CALIFORNIA SUGAR REFINERY.

OFFICE, 325 Market St.
WORKS, Eighth and Brannan Sts.

C. SPRECKELS, President,

J. D. SPRECKELS, Vice-President,

A. B. SPRECKELS, Secretary.

PACIFIC ROLLING MILL CO.

San Francisco, Cal., Manufacturers of

RAILROAD AND MERCHANT IRON

Car and Locomotive Axles and Frames, and Hammered Iron of every description. Rolled Beams, Angle, Channel, and T Iron, Bridge, and Machine Bolts, Lag Screws, Nuts, Washers, etc. Steamboat Shafts, Cranks, Pistons, Connecting Rods, etc., etc. Highest price paid for Scrap Iron.

OFFICE, 202 MARKET STREET.

THE AMERICAN SUGAR REFINERY

SAN FRANCISCO,

MANUFACTURERS OF ALL

Classes of Refined Sugars, including Loaf Sugar for export.

C. ADOLPHE LOW, President.

Office—208 California Street.

IRA P. RANKIN.

A. P. BRAYTON

PACIFIC IRON WORKS

RANKIN, BRAYTON & CO.,

127 to 132 First Street, San Francisco.

Mining Machinery of all kinds, Sugar Mills, Engines, both Marine and Stationary, Boilers, etc., etc.

CHARLES R. ALLEN

Wholesale and Retail Dealer in COAL or Office by Telephone 308.

Agent Pittsburg Coal Mining Company.

118 and 120 Beale Street, S. F.

J. C. MERRILL & CO.,

Shipping and Commission Merchants

204 and 206 California Street,

SAN FRANCISCO.

The Regular Dispatch Line of Packages to Honolulu, H. I.

PAYOT, UPHAM & CO

STATIONERS, BOOKSELLERS,

Commercial Printers.

and Blank Book Manufacturers

204 Sansome Street, near Pine.

TABER, HARKER & Co.,

IMPORTERS AND WHOLESALE GROCERS, 108 and 110 California St.

I do not know of anything the world can offer that is more satisfying than a handsome and intelligent woman. I was saying this to myself as I sat in the California Theatre on Monday evening, enjoying myself most thoroughly, when there sprang into my mind, as senseless things will spring at inopportune moments, that most inelegant but well-known conundrum: "What makes more noise than a pig under a gate?" Its ridiculously self-evident answer, "two pigs," was the only response that came to me as I fished around in my mind for some grandiloquent way of saying to myself, that if anything could have added to the pleasure of seeing Sara Jewett in California it was to see Maud Harrison with her.

What an odd mood the house was in, by the way. The gallery seemed to be affected with hysteria, the result perhaps of the sudden change from the style of performance which has been popular for a twelvemonth to the fineness of a trained metropolitan company. It broke out at intervals with misplaced laughs, and with what is always bracketed as [sensation] in reports of Sand-lot meetings. As for the circle, so well pleased an audience was never colder, but it was not the coldness of indifference. People sat down to a deliberate analysis of the trumpeted Union Square Company. There had been a premonitory growl or two when their arrival was chronicled. There was a contemptuous sniff or two at the number of transported maids and valets. It seemed like an advertising dodge, and alas, we have been sold so very often with advertising dodges.

Beside, have not the good people of our burg taken always a daring pleasure in picking flaws in a New York reputation, and flinging down a critical gauntlet to the high-handed metropolis? Bonnie, piquant Maud Harrison we knew and liked; but the darling of New York was a stranger. Her welcome was one of courtesy rather than cordiality, as she made her initial bow, and the regulation riding-habit gave no distinctive idea of her appearance. Any woman looks well en Amazone, if her appointments be perfect, and her figure be slender and shapely. Many women look well in no other dress. But when Sara Jewett changed it for a pretty neglige of Nile green, one obtained a fuller view of a sweep of classical curves from the crown of a small, well-poised head to the tips of fashionable feet. Her face is an unusual one, not modeled by the rules, but mobile and interesting; and her voice, notwithstanding an unpleasant cadence now and then—although even that never degenerates into a whine, as with some actresses—is strong, resonant, and modulated.

She is in truth a charming woman, with a deep stratum of intelligence underlying her beauty, which makes one feel that she grasps the problem of life, and that she plays with a knowing hand. Many have liked the players in this company and condemned the play; but it is easy to look around anywhere and find half a hundred just such cases as that of Lillian, the banker's daughter. Even in America women often marry for expediency, and learn to love their husbands with a good, solid, honest affection, even while hugging to their deluded breasts a phantom love for a sometime lover. It is not convenient in every one of these households to have him shot off in a duel. In fact, in real life they are more apt to marry him off; but in a play there is no other ending for him, and in this it brings about that pretty scene between husband and wife, in which the husband does a great deal of heavy nobility, and the wife is torn between contending feelings to a storm of uncertainty which none but a woman can understand. In point of fact, to paraphrase Pope, if one may dare, "Every woman is at heart a bigamist." She would like to marry two men, a solid man and a poet, the one for his strength and rude chivalry, and the other—well, I will leave it to the poets to tell why women should love poets. They have a flowery way of being irrational and non-committal which is very alluring and convincing. The poet in "The Banker's Daughter" is an artist. It is very difficult to give a man a genteel profession in an American society play. Our leaders, in giving dancing parties, draw heavily upon bank clerks, but our dramatists eschew them. The old playwrights made a bold plunge of it, and put a private secretary in every private family whenever they wanted a velvet-clad, dark-eyed, handsome lover, handicapped by poverty and inferior station.

But the new ones generally make an artist of him. It is romantic and Bohemian, and the two go hand in hand in these days when Bohemia is the fashion. "Malden Ramsay, the Routledge of the east, is a stranger in San Francisco, and was welcomed quite cordially, despite the fact that few recognized him by reason of the Titian hair and beard which reminded one forcibly and irreverently of a favorite subject of the old masters. Being prematurely shut off in his youth and beauty, by reason of the exigencies of the play, Harold Routledge's part is a brief, but not a minor one. Indeed, the three leading male parts, the three lovers of the banker's daughter, are of almost equal interest; but the shining talent of the company lies almost entirely among the ladies. Mr. Joseph Whiting has a good stage presence, and a not pleasant voice, but he has dignity, calm, and good taste, and was a very satisfactory rock of comfort in the maelstrom of feeling that was going on around him.

The Count de Carojac is an exceedingly unpleasant person, as it is intended he should be, and as De Belleville certainly makes him. When De Belleville drifted directly to the Union Square Company he fell into the groove for which nature fitted him as an actor with most unerring precision. Anything more unpleasant than the realistic fidelity with which he covers the innate brutality of the Count de Carojac with a veneer of suavity I have not seen, and in his tipsy provocation of a quarrel, and his taunting hardihood in the duel, one finds one's self contracting a very absurd but a very real dislike for him.

Every one remembers the fixed glare of Stoddard's eye; the sharp, deliberate expulsion of syllables from his lips, and the thorough artistic finish of his most minor character. Every one will find him unchanged in either. So that the little part of the banker's partner, which the playwright can only have sketched in with a careless hand, becomes vivid with life and forbids you to forget it.

In short, it is the charm of the Union Square Company that nothing is done hastily and at haphazard, and that every one, from the gout-ridden Brown, up and down, does at least the best he knows how. It gives one a satisfaction that has long been a missing feeling in our gamut of emotions on this side the Rocky Mountains.

The play has not the mechanical excellence of construction of the models of its class, nor the fusillade of wit that makes them brilliant. It is only now and then that a clever thing is said. It is invariably responded to. There is an American flavor about the whole affair that appeals involuntarily to one's patriotism. It is an American play, it is the representative American company, and Sara Jewett is the leading American leading lady. One of her chiefest charms is that she is what she is—the only American I ever saw upon the stage, aside from Clara Morris, without a single English affectation. People involuntarily recognize the charm of the liquid English accent when it comes trippingly from accustomed lips; but what so odious as an affectation of it? Sara Jewett has none of it. She speaks and acts as any cultivated American might in her own drawing-room, and even drops into which the wisest and best will drop at times. She is delightfully natural without, though she has a few of the little tricks and mannerisms into which players fall; for the human species are not chameleons. She is full of startling surprises; darts at a new idea with a suddenness which takes your breath away. She looks far over the heads of the people she is talking to, which gives you an odd idea of not being able to catch her eye yourself. Her embrace is at once impetuous and cold; her motions quick and gliding. She dresses eminently well, and she is not a divine genius, but is deeply and thoroughly interesting.

Maud Harrison is not her foil, but her aid. Together they satisfy the eye to look at, and the understanding to listen to. Maud Harrison's face is arch, piquante, and wonderfully expressive. She has the very neatest way of making every point that the author gives her. She is more bound by the traditions of the stage than is Sara Jewett, understands the pulse of the audience to a nicety, and can gauge the duration of a laugh to the last ha-ha. She is essentially a sourette, but a sourette of a higher order than the name itself suggests. She carries a sparkle of subdued mischief with her, even in her widow's weeds. The dramatist treats her shabbily by making a Mrs. Phipps of her after all her lamentations over the plebeian name of Brown, even with the added c. Indeed the comedy degenerates into low comedy when Phipps begins to make love. Even as the high-pressure American tourist, he is overdrawn, but his marriage on thirty days' notice with three days' grace is too abruptly introduced into a comedy drama which has hitherto kept within the borders of the possible. The unruffled temper with which Streblow, the husband, receives the information of his wife's misplaced affection is another debatable point of possibility, but you will find these noble-hearted fellows with their tempers well in rein, capering through any successful modern drama nowadays, and as nothing so enrages the ordinary man as to question the truthfulness of the picture, it is left open. They all seem to be laboring under an hallucination that they would act similarly under similar circumstances. They never do, but I would not dare to tell one of them so. I saw one of them weep a gill or two into his lorgnette the other night, when that small clever child, striking the attitude of the play-bills, entreated papa to kiss mamma, and at the moment he was so deeply moved by the little story that he felt capable of attaining the very sublimity of self-abnegation, but he would not receive the information quite as Streblow did if his wife came home to him at midnight from a duel by moonlight, and said, "My dear, you really must excuse me, but I have passionately loved another for seven years."

Apologies, although the midnight moonlight duel was conducted in the very highest style in the foreground, it had but a shabby background, and Mrs. Streblow's houdoir was altogether unworthy both the reputation of the theatre and the players upon its boards. Indeed there has rarely been anything so shabbily mounted in the old California as "The Banker's Daughter," for the imported scenery is worn with seams and unfit to hang up, and they can not have gone very deeply into the bowels of the property-room for the furnishings of the Streblow mansion. The ladies must have trailed those rich dresses very regretfully through such surroundings, accustomed as they must be to their own theatre to the perfection of appointment. However, since one can not have everything, there is something that will be willingly spared as the scenery. We had a surfeit of it for a long season at the Baldwin without any plays or people. Turn about is fair play. BETSY B.

THE "PARSIFAL" COSTUMES.

The Series of Pictures now Exhibited in New York.

The original plates of costumes designed by Rudolf Seitz for the Wagner opera of "Parsifal," performed in the Wagner Theatre at Bayreuth, Bavaria, are in New York in the possession of Mr. Dazian, the theatrical costumer, of No. 26 Union Square. Mr. Dazian recently returned from Bavaria, and while in Europe he met Wagner. He learned from him that the plates were for sale, and purchased them for five hundred dollars. A New York World reporter was shown them by the owner, and thus describes them: There are eighteen pictures, each of which is colored to represent the actual fabric. The pictures are mounted on card-board of gray, eight by ten inches, each picture being six by seven inches in dimensions. The plate descriptive of the mythical character of Kundry, in which Frau Materna achieved such success, is divided into two half-plates. The first is the costume worn in the first scene—a gray-gold half-tunic, reaching to the knee, is draped over flesh-colored tights, reaching to the foot. The feet are clad in half-sandals of leopard skin. Over the shoulders is thrown a cloak of hear skin, which falls almost to the feet. Around the waist is worn a broad girdle of serpents of gold. A cowl of gray covers the head, and the costume is adorned with barbaric ornaments, worn by the ancient Huns. The second half-plate describes the costume worn in the second scene. A flesh-colored tricot is draped in gold-embroidered white gauze. The bracelets and necklace are of beaten gold. The dress, which is of damask, reaches to the feet, but from the waist opens at the side and in front, thus showing the flesh-colored silk hose. A short sword with a curious handle of gems completes the costume. Parsifal's costume is a gray tunic, with a drapery of tiger skins. Broad gold bands cross each other upon the shoulders. The tunic reaches to the waist, and the limbs are clad in yellow and green tights. A short sword, two or three inches in width, with a handle of plated gold, is worn at the side. The figure stands erect, and in the left hand holds a bow of ivory, stained red. Over the right shoulder is a quiver full of arrows. Gurnemanz's costume is like that of Parsifal, only the material is of light green color, and no sword is worn. The king is dressed in a robe of damask trimmed with gold and silver, with a tunic of dark material beneath. On the head is a plain gold crown, the apex and sides of which are inlaid with brilliants. The flower-maidens of the chorus are clad in flesh-colored tunics and short cloaks of gauze of gold, draped from the shoulders way down the back. The male chorus wear tunics of yellow and green, with white overshirts of gauze. The remainder of the plates are descriptive of the other characters, and are variations only of the costumes already described. The King of Bavaria has especially designated Herr Rudolf Seitz as the designer of all of the costumes used in Wagner's operas. He designed those of the "Ring of the Nibelungs." His work is personally supervised by Wagner, and over a year was spent in perfecting the details of these costumes. Mr. Dazian purchased the plates for the purpose of placing them in his library. Fifty years ago, when the dramatic art of America was in its infancy, at No. 280 Bowery, the elder Dazian opened a modest little store, where the actors and actresses of the day purchased the few articles needed to represent the characters of the dramas of the time. As years passed on the theatre became more popular, and the Dazians moved with the tide to their present location. As the reporter stepped into the store a knight in harnessed armor seemed to bar the way. His mail-clad hand rested upon his sword, and it seemed as if, like the statue in "Giovanni," he would march from his post of vantage, and dash down his gauntlet in honor of his "fair lady." In a glass cabinet hung a wondrous article. It had the form of a pair of trim limbs. In answer to a question, Mr. Dazian said: "Oh, those are a pair of symmetricals for an actress at an up-town theatre. You see that nature, as a usual thing, does not always bestow her charms liberally. Nine out of ten of the people of the theatre are deficient in form. We obviate this defect by judicious padding. This set of 'symmetricals' is for an actress who has one limb smaller than the other. The defect is remedied by weaving lambs' wool padding into raw silk 'trunks.' This is worn as a stocking, and when the tights are put on, both limbs are shapely as can be, and only the costumer knows of the defect. We pad thighs, waists, arms, shoulders—in fact, any portion of the human form. The latest novelty is a pair of stockings costing seventy-five dollars a pair. They are of black silk, and are embroidered in beads. A lizard is depicted in lifelike colors, surrounded by foliage of natural hues. Here is a solid gold brocade, for dress cases. Frederick Leslie had a coat made of it which he wore in Manola. It cost one hundred dollars a yard and four hundred yards weighed only five pounds. Mary Anderson had a dress made from this piece. It was purchased in Algeria. Here is some brocade worth seven hundred dollars per yard. It came from Persia. I made a tunic of it for Edwin Booth before he went to Europe. It is thought that the actors and actresses wear imitation goods, but the majority of the stars wear only the best of quality. We manufactured a suit of armor worn by Campanioi in 'Aida' which cost seven hundred and fifty dollars. We have sold the late Charles Fechter, the elder Booth, McCullough, Forrest, John Wilkes Booth, and dozens of others, costumes of all descriptions."

It would seem as though Emilie Melville, the California prima donna, had at once resumed her hold on the affections of the Australians. She opened in Melbourne July 8, and was received with an ovation. She was deluged with flowers. Concerning her the Melbourne Bulletin says: "For years past the saying in Melbourne has been that the two stars which would most startle our theatrical world were Emilie Melville and Barry Sullivan. Well, the best of the pair dropped among us out of the clouds only a week or two ago, and all at once we heard that Emilie Melville was in Melbourne. Of course managers had, perforce, to arrange an opening for her. She re-appears to-morrow night at the Opera House, the arena of her former triumphs in 'La Perichole,' one of the characters in which she is best remembered. During her absence from us she has appeared in all the principal cities of America, and has mastered a variety of new parts, including 'Patience,' 'La Mascotte,' and 'Boccaccio.' Emilie Melville is the greatest favorite as an artist in comic opera that ever appeared in our city. We have all followed her in her rambles, while away, with a sympathy bestowed on no other performer, and the saying has been, 'Why doesn't Emilie come back?' Well, here she is. It would be a ridiculous piece of supererogation and impertinence to bespeak a crowded house for her. There will be a rub."

A circus clown has been telling a St. Louis newspaper that the best days of the circus are over. One of the reasons he gives for thinking so, is that for success in the circus training must begin early in life, and the societies for the suppression of cruelty to children are so active that they prevent anything of the kind. There may be something in this; but a more serious difficulty, we fancy, is that the part taken in the performance by the clown is much less attractive than it formerly was, owing to the fact that a great deal of the talent which once found its way into this business now goes into journalism, the mental outfit of a really able "funny man" being very much like what that of a successful clown used to be. The press makes a business of supplying daily just such jokes as the circus used to provide, and ambitious humorists, who would formerly have worn stripes and spangles in the ring, now entertain the public through a newspaper. The clown proper has consequently run down, because the profession no longer attracts the best humor, as any one may satisfy himself by going and listening to a modern clown trying to make jokes. There is obviously no remedy for this decay, which really gives a new illustration of the wonderful power of the press.—N. Y. Nation.

EDITORS ARGONAUT: WILL YOU KINDLY permit me to state through your paper that the paintings which are being displayed in my name at cheap auctions are not my work? I am not painting pot-boilers. Previous to my departure for the East I expected to have a public exhibition of all my works at the rooms of the San Francisco Art Association, to which the public is hereby cordially invited. The exhibition will open about September 1st, and continue for one week only. Very truly yours,

M. STRAUS.

The seventeenth annual exhibition of the Mechanics' Institute will open on next Monday, August 15th, in the new building. The exhibitors have already all their articles in position, and the exhibition is expected to surpass those of all previous years.

We have received from M. Gray, 117 Post Street, "The Vocal Centennial Lancers," composed by R. L. Yanke, and dedicated to the lady guests of the Hotel del Monte, at Monterey.

Mr. and Mrs. Lancaster (nee Gracie Plaisted) have gone to St. Louis, where they intend spending a year.

GEO. C. SHREVE & CO.

MANUFACTURERS OF FINE JEWELRY,

Offer better inducements to purchasers of DIAMONDS, WATCHES, JEWELRY, SILVERWARE, CLOCKS, etc., than any other house in San Francisco. They have the Largest Stock, the Finest Assortment, and sell at Closer Prices.

DIAMOND WORK and any other kind of Jewelry made to order at very low rates. All Goods marked in plain figures, and no deviation in price.

110 MONTGOMERY STREET.

— THE HIGH PRICE THAT IS SET UPON THE WORK of prominent artists and sculptors has compelled the majority of our citizens to forego the enjoyment attendant upon the ownership of a finished picture or perfect piece of statuary from the studio of an artist of high reputation. On this account most private individuals have been forced to content themselves with less than satisfactory chromos or the "pot-boilers" of second-rate and slovenly painters. This fact has done much damage to the artistic taste of San Franciscans, and has served to multiply and increase the multitude of bad painters and their products. Within the past year, however, this state of affairs has been partially remedied. The two "sales" given under the auspices of the Art Association have placed the works of many of our prominent artists at a figure more nearly within the reach of a moderate purse. But now an opportunity is offered which in its liberality far exceeds all previous occasions. Six of our leading artists and sculptors have come forward with a quantity of pictures and statuettes, to which they have given the best efforts of genius and labor, and are about to sell them at auction under the auspices of Edward S. Spear & Co. The sale will take place on the evenings of Thursday and Friday, the 17th and 18th instant, at Dashiway Hall, on Post Street between Kearny and Dupont. The names of these gentlemen are Messrs. Jules Tavernier, J. D. Strong, F. Marion Wells, G. J. Denny, R. H. Holdredge, and C. Von Perbandt, all leading and well-known names. Mr. Denny's sea-pictures have given him an Eastern as well as local celebrity. Mr. Tavernier held a high place in French and English art circles previous to his American visit. The extreme care and attention which he gives to all his work, produces the wonderful effects of tint and expression which his paintings possess. Mr. Joseph Strong, as is well known, has for a year been devoting his attention to some of the choicest bits of Arizona scenery. The resulting collection of pictures will be offered in its entirety at this sale. Mr. F. Marion Wells needs no comment. His statuary is held in such high admiration in this community that mere mention is sufficient. Mr. Holdredge and Mr. Von Perbandt are both well known for the talent which they display in graceful statuettes and the finer branches of the sculptor's art. These beautiful works of art will be placed on public exhibition previous to the sale, beginning Tuesday morning, August 15th, and lasting, day and evening, until the hour of sale. This is done in order that very one may inspect and appreciate the collection.

CXLI.—Bill of Fare for Six Persons. Sunday, August 13th.
Onion Soup.
Cantaloupe.
Fried Clams.
Beefsteak à la Bordelaise.
Saratoga Potatoes.
Baked Bell Peppers.
Summer Squash.
Roast Chickens. Currant Jelly.
Lettuce.
Apple Meringue, Sponge Cake, Watermelon.

APPLE MERINGUE.—Stew good tart apples, pass them through a sieve; add according to the number of the apples, if twelve, one quarter of a pound of thinly-cut citron, half a pound of currants, half a pound of stoned raisins, a little cinnamon and grated nutmeg. Sweeten to taste, mix all and put in a buttered baking-dish; cover and let it stew slowly for twenty minutes, then beat up the whites of your eggs to a stiff froth with four large table-spoonsful of powdered sugar, and flavor with lemon; lay this with a spoon on the top in heaps, return the dish to the oven, and wait evenly. Eat cold with rich cream.

Mr. Jacob R. Shattuck, lately treasurer of Havly's California Theatre, left on last Tuesday for New York. He goes to manage the finances of Mr. Taverly's New York Theatre.

THE RETURN OF MRS. LEWIS.

ELEGANT WORK DONE AT HER ESTABLISHMENT.

Since the return of Mrs. R. G. Lewis from the various watering-place resorts, where she has been residing during the summer, she has had her bandone dress-making parlors and commodious work-rooms, in Thurlow Block on Kearny Street, thoroughly renovated and refurnished, making a charming boudoir of a place for the reception of her many dear patrons, who can not but enjoy the artistic arrangement of the paintings and bric-à-brac, which adorn the walls of the reception rooms. Mrs. Lewis is on hand a complete bridal outfit for one of San Francisco's society belles, which, when completed, promises to show marvels of beauty and fashion; specially the marriage robe, an account of which will be seen in the near future. Mrs. Lewis has also on hand some lovely costumes to be worn shortly at Monterey. And she is also filling an order for an American lady in China, whose costumes there are copied upon as models by the English and American sidents, and from whence this fashionable modiste receives many expensive orders.

— THAT FOREIGN WINES ARE DEGENERATING, and that native wines are fast taking their place in public estimation is proved by the fact that the California "Eclipse" champagne took the first premium at all other champagnes at the great World's Exhibition of Wines which was recently held in New York city. This champagne is the only pure and natural brand to be found in this city. It may be secured from Messrs. Arpad Haraszty & Co., 430 Washington Street.

— MUSICAL BOXES, PAILLARD & Co., 23 Du- sent Street. Repairing done. Prices low.

It is estimated that Christie & Manson, the auctioneers, will clear seventy-five thousand dollars on the Hamilton sale.

— LADY READERS OF THE ARGONAUT will remember that the place to buy colognes, perfume, lotions, soaps, brushes, sponges, cosmetics, etc., is at the elegant and well-stocked store of James G. Steele & Co., Chemists and Apothecaries, 635 Market Street, Palace Hotel, San Francisco.

— MORSE HAS THE FINEST GALLERY IN THE world, 826 Market Street, (Phelan Block).

— GO TO Bradley & Rulofson's, 429 Montgomery.

JNO. LEVY & CO.

MANUFACTURING JEWELERS,

Importers of DIAMONDS and other PRECIOUS STONES,
WATCHES, CLOCKS, and SILVERWARE,

118 SUTTER STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.

(Of the late Firm of BRAVERMAN & LEVY.)

"MR. NASBY IN EXILE."

The last sensation in the Literary World. The book has been published but one month, and has already reached a sale of ten thousand copies. Seven hundred pages and two hundred illustrations. Price: In Cloth, $4.00; Library Binding, $5.00. Sold by subscription only. For circulars, terms to Agents, etc., address

SAMUEL CARSON,

PUBLISHER AND WHOLESALE BOOKSELLER,
120 SUTTER STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.

AGENTS WANTED.

HOUSEKEEPERS!

DO NOT SACRIFICE YOUR GOODS AT AUCTION, but STORE THEM with H. WINDEL & CO., NO. 30 STOCKTON STREET. Furniture, Pianos, Household Goods, Paintings, Trunks, etc., well taken care of. We have three large, airy, brick buildings, and no rent to pay, and can store goods very moderate. Money advanced on goods at one per cent. per month. We guarantee against damage and moths, and can give references dating back 20 years.

HANDSOME IMPORTATIONS.

A FASHIONABLE OPENING NEXT MONDAY.

The most courageous importer of this coast, D. Samuels, has recently returned from Europe, where he has been buying, one might think extensively, compared to what has been done on this coast until the present day, but not too much to supply the generous patrons of the Lace House, on Post Street, of which Mr. Samuels is the proprietor. E. Pingat, Norwand, Chandon, Rodriguez, Martin, and others, wishing to show that Paris, as represented in San Francisco by the Lace House, is unrivaled, and considering the opposition which exists, have done marvels; while the prices are just about half what might be expected. We are going to the fall opening, which is to take place next Monday, the 14th instant, and then we shall be able to give our readers a full description of the elegant cloaks, dresses, and other beautiful things we saw in boxes, which will be exhibited on that day.

"God Save the Queen" is being translated for practical use into fourteen different languages and dialects of India.

— REDDING'S RUSSIA SALVE HAS GENUINE MERIT, as all who use it will testify. Price 25c. Try it.

Plumpness, milky-whiteness of complexion, puffy eyelids, and swollen skin, mark emphatically the arsenic eater, says a Cleveland physician.

— MANY THOUSANDS OF PEOPLE YEARLY are saved from dangerous fevers by the exercise of a little timely care in the matter of properly cleansing the system in the spring season from the accumulated impurities which, if left undisturbed, breed disease. As a purifier Ayer's Sarsaparilla acts directly and promptly. A single bottle will prove its merits.

Queen Victoria sometimes gets as many as forty telegrams a day.

— THE VICINITY OF DUNCAN'S MILLS preserves its spring verdure when all other localities have become dried up by the summer heat. For hotel rooms apply to Queen & Goode, Duncan's Mills, N. P. C. R. R., Sonoma County.

An English clergyman has substituted Zoedone for the Sacramental wine.

— EVENING DRESS SUITS FOR SPECIAL OCCASIONS can be had at J. COOPER'S Tailoring Establishment, No. 24 New Montgomery Street, Palace Hotel block. Also black frock-coat suits for funerals, etc.

— DR. E. O. COCHRANE, DENTIST, 850 MARKET, cor. Stockton (over drug store.) Office hours, 9 to 5.

— HEADQUARTERS FOR ELECTRIC BELTS, and appliances for the cure of nervous, painful, and debilitating diseases. Pamphlets, with full particulars, free. Address PULVERMACHER GALVANIC COMPANY, 513 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal.

The Pope has begged several leading Cardinals who are anxious to escape from Rome not to leave him, as from one moment to another he may require their presence.

FILIPPE'S ACADEMY OF LANGUAGES
235 KEARNY ST.
SOUTHWEST CORNER OF BUSH.

PROF. DE FILIPPE continues to give personal instruction in Spanish and French, by his easy, practical method, saving months of study. Classes and private lessons. Apply from 5 to 7 or 7 to 8 P. M.

FINE

Suits, TAILORING Suits.
$25. Immense Reductions at J. S. HAND'S, 314 Kearny St.

Suits, TAILORING Suits.
$40. Cheapest House, J. S. HAND'S, 314 Kearny Street.

Suits, TAILORING Suits.
$60. J. S. HAND, 314 KEARNY ST.

RUPTURE Cured. Greatest Invention of the age. PIERCE & STEW 704 Sac. St., San Fran. Cal.

CONSOLIDATED VIRGINIA MIN-ing Company.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California; location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, State of Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Trustees held on the tenth day of August, 1882, an assessment (No 18) of Thirty Cents per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 26, No. 309 Montgomery Street, Nevada Block, San Francisco, Cal.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 16th day of September, 1882, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on Saturday, the 14th day of October, 1882, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Trustees.

A. W. HAVENS, Secretary,
Office—Room 26, No 309 Montgomery Street, Nevada Block, San Francisco, Cal.

$72 A WEEK. $12 a day at home easily made. Costly outfit free. Address FRUE & Co., Augusta, Maine

THE "DRESS REFORM"

CORSET.
Specialty for Stout Figures, by mail, $3.00. Send waist, hip, and bust measure. Also, Shoulder Braces, Union Under Flannels, Ladies' and Children's Comfort Waists, Bustles, Hose Supporters, etc.

Send for Circular. The only Depot for these Goods.

Mrs. M. H. OBER & CO.
Boston
Dress Reform,
326 Sutter St.,
SAN FRANCISCO.

An Elegant Corset to Order for $4.

KNABE PIANOS!

A LARGE INVOICE JUST RECEIVED. CALL and see these magnificent instruments before purchasing elsewhere.

A. L. BANCROFT & CO.,
721 Market Street.

JENNIE E. MacGOWAN,
Dress and Cloak Maker.

428 Sutter Street.

Original designs, perfect work, and reasonable prices.

DO NOT SACRIFICE YOUR FUR-NITURE, PIANOS, and HOUSEHOLD GOODS, at auction sales, while you are boarding or out of the city, but

STORE THEM,

As well as your Trunks and Paintings, with

J. H. MOTT & CO.,

647 Market St.,

Nucleus Block, Second Floor.
Large, airy brick building, with elevator. MONEY LOANED on valuable goods. Terms moderate.

MECHANICS' INSTITUTE FAIR, at the PAVILION, LARKIN ST., near MARKET, opens TUESDAY, AUGUST 15th.

COMPOUND OXYGEN

NEW TREATMENT BY INHALA-tion, for Consumption, Asthma, Bronchitis, Dyspepsia, Catarrh, Headache, Debility, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, and all Chronic and Nervous Disorders. Prepared by DR. STARK & PALLEN, Philadelphia, Pa. Package contains all directions, and is easily sent by express, ready for USE AT HOME. H. E. MATTHEWS, Forwarding Agent, 806 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal. Send for Free Pamphlets.

J. R. COWEN.

J. W. PORTER.

COWEN & PORTER,
FUNERAL DIRECTORS,

118 State Street, San Francisco.
OPPOSITE STARR-KING CHURCH.

WEST'S NEW ELECTRIC BELT.—C. N. West's Electro-Medical Belts always have excelled all other electrical appliances. They have taken the premiums at all State Fairs. This new Belt excels every other that he has invented. Cures

all diseases without medicine. Price, from $5.00 to $20.00. Warranted ten years. Patronized by the representative men and leading ladies of this and other States. Address or call on C. N. WEST, 652 Market Street, San Francisco.

PERRIN'S QUAKER DAIRY
114 SUTTER STREET,
Between Kearny & Montgomery, San Francisco
CHAS. L. BIRD and E. R. PERRIN, Props.

DODGE BROS.

STATIONERS,
Formerly 116 POST ST.,
REMOVED TO

NO. 32

GEARY ST.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

A story of the present London season: She is virtuous, and even prudish, but naturally anxious to marry her daughters. He is a peer with about ten thousand pounds sterling a year. But on being left alone with her, he mistook the tenor of her conversation, and springing up almost tragically, said: "Oh, my dear Lady—, don't lead me on, please! I swore to my father, on his death-bed, that I would never have an intrigue with a married woman."

A good story is told by a French paper of two provincials—a man and his wife—who visited the Louvre, in Paris. "What struck you most at the Louvre?" asked one of their friends, when they returned home and began to tell of the wonders they had seen. "Oh," replied the husband, "a picture which represented Adam and Eve, with the apple and the serpent." And his excellent wife chimed in: "Yes, we found that very interesting, because, you know, we knew the anecdote."

Nestor Roqueplan, of glorious memory, had an infallible recipe for ridding himself of bores. When accosted by one he would shake hands warmly with his persecutor, glance around anxiously, and dropping his voice, confidentially remark: "S-s-s-h! I must be off—there's an infernal bore here that I want to dodge—talk a fellow to death. You understand, old boy!" The bore (with a wink:) "I understand, old fellow. See you later." [Departs without the remotest suspicion that he was the bore.]

A Londoner who lately crossed from Canada to Ogdensburg asked his hack-driver as to the population and form of government of Ogdensburg. On being informed that it was an incorporated city, the chief officer of which was a mayor, he exclaimed: "And does not the mayor wear the insignia of office?" "Insignia—what's that?" asked the astonished hackman. "Why, a chain about his neck," explained the cockney. "Oh, bless you, no," responded the other; "he's perfectly harmless, and goes about loose."

A Conservative member of the House of Commons, who talks much on foreign affairs, but not wisely, was passing last week through Palace Yard, when a man ran against him. "Do you know, sir, who I am?" said the member; "I am Mr. M. P." "What," irreverently answered the man, "are you Mr. —, the greatest fool in the House of Commons?" "You are drunk," exclaimed the M. P. "Even if I am," replied the man, "I have this advantage over you—I shall be sober to-morrow, whereas you will remain the fool you are to-day."

About Benjamin Webster, the English actor, just deceased, there was something of the foxy nature of Cardinal Richelieu. One day he was at the point of death. Two of his old friends had come to see the last of him. The end, they thought, had come, so they reverently covered his face with a sheet, and went down stairs to console themselves and discuss his character. They found out his whisky and cigars, and had sat down to make a night of it under the dead man's roof, when suddenly the door opened. There stood Benjamin Webster in his winding-sheet. "I am not dead yet," chuckled the invincible old man, "but I see you know how to enjoy yourselves."

A party of ladies and gentlemen who were recreating in the woods at Lake George recently, sat down under a high ledge of rocks for a rest. Presently they heard a rustling among the leaves and bushes over their heads, and looking up saw a huge black bear. Old Bruin evidently did not know of their presence, for he rolled down the declivity into their midst. Upon learning that he had intruded, the bear suddenly picked himself up, and ran off at a rapid speed. In the meantime the ladies had taken flight, and on taking an inventory it was found that Miss Payne, of Brooklyn, had lost a diamond earring; Miss Marden, of Boston, her hat feather, and Miss Mathias, of New York, a slipper. All Bruin lost was his presence of mind.

Once in a case before Sir Lancelot Shadwell, Mr. Wakefield demanded that judgment should be given in his favor, because Sir Lancelot had already given his decision in the similar case of Jones vs. Webb. The vice-chancellor had no recollection on the point. Mr. Bethell, on the other side, was equal to the occasion. He got up, and said: "I perfectly recollect the case of Jones and Webb, mentioned by my learned friend, but my learned friend, of course, accidentally omitted to mention that your Honor's judgment was finally reversed on appeal in the House of Lords." This was too much for the ingenious Mr. Wakefield, who, in his despair, was heard to mutter, "What a d—d lie; there never was such a case at all!"

A good story is told of one of the old-time Philadelphia Quakers, whose sterling integrity was ingeniously commingled with worldly shrewdness. He was an extensive vessel-owner, and during his life made a fortune, which has since, in the hands of his heirs, been doubled again and again. At one time, when a long period of stormy weather had greatly delayed shipping of all kinds, he became alarmed for the safety of a ship loaded with a most valuable cargo, and several weeks overdue. Going to an insurance agent, he truthfully told him that he feared the vessel had been lost; but if the agent wished to take the risk he had no objections. Of course, the agent hesitated, and put him off from day to day, hoping for private information regarding the missing craft. One bright morning the old Quaker drove up to the insurance office, and called to the agent: "Thee need not make out those papers. I have heard from the ship." Instantly the office was in a bustle, and in a few moments the agent came hurrying forward, exclaiming: "Oh, you are too late; the papers are already made out. Here they are." As the Quaker looked them over, (the ink being scarcely dry,) the agent asked: "Well, what have you heard?" "I have heard," responded the Quaker, with child-like simplicity, as he put the documents in his pocket, "I have heard that the ship has gone to the bottom."

RUHL BROTHERS
AGENTS FOR THE PACIFIC COAST
522 Montgomery Street,
SAN FRANCISCO.

AYER'S SARSAPARILLA,
For Purifying the Blood.

This compound of the vegetable alteratives, Sarsaparilla, Dock, Stillingia, and Mandrake, with the Iodides of Potash and Iron, makes a most effectual cure of complaints affecting the blood. It purifies the blood, purges out the lurking humors, in the system that undermine health and settle into troublesome disorders. Eruptions on the skin are the appearance at the surface of humors that should be expelled from the blood. Internal derangements are the determination of these same humors to some internal organ or organs, whose action they derange, and whose substance they disease and destroy. AYER'S SARSAPARILLA expels these humors from the blood. When they are gone, the disorders they produce disappear, such as Ulcerations of the Liver, Stomach, Kidneys, Lungs, Eruptions and Eruptive diseases of the Skin, Rose or Erysipelas, Pimples, Pustules, Blotches, Boils, Tumors, Tetters and Salt Rheum, Scald Head, Ringworm, Ulcers and Sores, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Pain in the Bones, Side and Head, Female Weakness, Sterility, Dropsy, Dyspepsia, Emaciation, and General Debility. With their departure health returns.

PREPARED BY
DR. J. C. AYER & Co., Lowell, Mass.
PRACTICAL AND ANALYTICAL CHEMISTS.
Sold by all Druggists and Dealers in Medicines.

C. P. SHEFFIELD, N. W. SPAULDING, J. PATTERSON

17 and 19 FREMONT ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

CURTIS, DIXON & CO.,
CIGAR MANUFACTURERS,
FACTORY, 309 to 313 CLAY STREET.
Office, No. 309 Clay Street, between Front and Battery,
SAN FRANCISCO.
P. O. Box 998.

PACIFIC BUREAU OF EDUCATION
Supplies (1) Teachers with desirable positions; (2) Colleges with Professors and Tutors; (3) Academies, Seminaries and Public Schools of every grade, and families, with competent Principals and Teachers; (4) Colleges, Seminaries, Teachers' Institutes, and Lyceums with Lecturers. Circulars and forms of application sent free by MYRON H. SAVAGE, Manager, 19 New Montgomery Street, S. F.

JOHN TAYLOR & CO.
118 and 120 Market Street, and 15 and 17 California Street.
ASSAYERS' MATERIALS, MINE
Mill Supplies; also Druggists Glassware.

ASSESSMENTS AND DIVIDENDS.

MEXICAN GOLD AND SILVER

Mining Company. Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.
Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 4th day of August, 1882, an assessment, (No. 20,) of One Dollar ($1) per share, was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately, in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 16, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.
Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the Seventh day of September, 1882, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction; and unless payment is made before, will be sold on Tuesday, the 26th day of September, 1882, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

Office—Room 16, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.
L. MCCOY, Secretary.

OPHIR SILVER MINING COMPANY

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 21st day of July, 1882, an assessment (No. 42) of One Dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 16, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 24th day of August, 1882, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on Thursday, the 14th day of September, 1882, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with the costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

Office—Room 16, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.
L. MCCOY, Secretary.

BEST AND BELCHER SILVER

Mining Company—Location of works, Virginia City, Storey County, Nevada. Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 20th day of July, 1882, an assessment (No. 24) of Fifty (50) Cents per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately, in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room No. 29, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 24th day of August, 1882, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on Monday, the 18th day of September, 1882, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

Office—Room No. 29 Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.
WILLIAM WILLIS, Secretary.

CHOLLAR MINING COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 17th day of July, 1882, an assessment (No. 9) of Twenty-five Cents per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately, in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 79, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the twenty-second day of August, 1882, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on Tuesday, the 12th day of September, 1882, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

Office—Room 79 Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal.
W. E. DEAN, Secretary.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF

the Silver King Mining Company, San Francisco, August 2, 1882.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above-named Company held this day, a Dividend (No. 32) of Twenty-five Cents (25c) per share was declared, payable on Tuesday, August 15, 1882, at the office of the Company, Room 19, 328 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California. Transfer books will close August 9, 1882, at 3 P. M.

JOSEPH NASH, Sec.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF

the Standard Consolidated Mining Company, San Francisco, August 2, 1882.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named Company, held this day, dividend No. 44, of Seventy-five cents per share was declared, payable on Saturday, August 12, 1882, at the office in this city, or at the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company in New York.

W. M. WILLIS, Secretary.

Office—Room No. 29, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal.

PEBBLE SPECTACLES!

MULLER'S OPTICAL DEPOT
135 Montgomery St., nr. Bush,
Opposite Occidental Hotel.

Specialty Thirty-two Years.
COMPOUND ASTIGMATIC LENSES
Mounted to Order. Two Hours Notice.

The most complicated cases of defective vision thoroughly diagnosed, free of charge.

NATHANIEL GRAY. C. S. WRIGHT. J. A. CAMPBELL.
N. GRAY & CO.,

UNDERTAKERS
641 Sacramento Street.

S. P. COLLINS & CO.
Wholesale and Retail
dealers in Old London Dock Brandies, Port Wine, Sherries, and all the choicest brands Champagne, Apple Jack, Pisco, Arrack, Cordials, Liqueurs, etc. 339 MONTGOMERY, and 511 CALIFORNIA STREETS, S. F.

LEGAL NOTICES.

(Department No. 7.)

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT, City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

EMMA J. FAIRBAIRN,
Plaintiff,
vs.
NICHOLAS H. FAIRBAIRN
Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF

California send Greeting to NICHOLAS H. FAIRBAIRN, Defendant. You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named plaintiff, in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this county; or if served elsewhere, within thirty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said Complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds of defendant's willful desertion, and failure to provide plaintiff with the common necessities of life; and awarding the custody of the child of the parties hereto to plaintiff. Also, requiring defendant to pay such sums as the Court may deem proper for the support of plaintiff and her child, and costs of suit, together with general relief. Reference to the complaint is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said Complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and seal of the said Superior Court, at the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, this 3d day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty two.

(Seal.) DAVID WILDER, Clerk.
By J. D. RUGGLES, Deputy Clerk.

(Department No. 7.)

SHERIFF'S SALE—EXECUTION.

A. F. BENJAMIN,
Plaintiff,
vs.
JACOB LEVY,
Defendant.

UNDER AND BY VIRTUE OF AN

Execution issued out of the Superior Court, of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, duly attested, on the 2d day of August, A. D. 1882, in the above-entitled action, wherein A. F. Benjamin, the above-named plaintiff, obtained a Judgment against Jacob Levy, defendant, on the 1st day of August, A. D. 1882, for the sum of $2,327 97-100 U. S. Gold Coin, with interest thereon and costs, etc. I have levied upon all the right, title, and interest which the said defendant, Jacob Levy, had on the 1st day of August, 1882, the day on which said judgment was docketed, or which he may have subsequently acquired in and to the hereinafter described property, situate, lying, and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, standing of record in the office of the County Recorder of said City and County in the name of Jacob Levy, and bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point in the northerly line of Tyler Street, distant 165 feet westerly from the west line of Franklin Street, running thence westerly along said north line of Tyler Street 276-1/2 feet; thence at right-angles northerly 100 feet; thence at right-angles easterly 6-1/2 feet; and thence at right-angles southerly 120 feet to the point of commencement. Together with the dwelling house thereon and its appurtenances.

Public notice is hereby given that on Monday, the 28th day of August, A. D. 1882, at 12 o'clock, noon, of that day, in front of the Old City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, I will sell all the right, title, and interest which the said defendant, Jacob Levy, had on the first day of August, 1882, the day on which said judgment was docketed as aforesaid, or which he may have subsequently acquired in and to the above-described property, to the highest and best bidder for lawful money of the United States.

San Francisco, August 5, 1882.
JOHN SEDGWICK, Sheriff
J. B. L. BRANDT, Attorney for Plaintiff.
August 5, 12, 19, 26.

SHERIFF'S SALE.

ELISABETH VON HASSEL,
Plaintiff,
vs.
HENRY VON HASSEL,
FREDERICK M. HUSTED,
HENRY N. CLEMENT,
Defendants.

Superior Court, Department No. 7.
Order of Sale and Decree of Distribution.

UNDER AND BY VIRTUE OF AN

Order of Sale and Decree of Distribution issued out of the Superior Court, Department No. 7, of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on the 1st day of July, A. D. 1882, in the above-entitled action, wherein Elisabeth Von Hassel, the above-named plaintiff, obtained a Judgment and Decree of Distribution against Henry Von Hassel, Frederick M. Husted, Henry N. Clement, defendants, on the 28th day of April, A. D. 1882, which said Judgment and Decree was, on the 29th day of April, A. D. 1882, recorded in Judgment Book One of said Court, at page 645, I am commanded to sell all that certain lot, piece, or parcel of land, situate, lying, and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the northerly line of Dorland Street, distant one hundred and ninety (190) feet westerly from the westerly line of Church Street; thence westerly along Dorland Street twenty-four (24) feet; thence northerly one hundred and twenty-four (124) feet, more or less, to a point one hundred (100) feet southerly from the southerly line of Corbett Street, and also being distant twenty-five (25) feet westerly from the northerly corner of Williams's fence; thence easterly twenty-five (25) feet to said corner, and thence westerly along Williams's westerly line one hundred and twenty-four (124) feet, more or less, to the place of beginning; being part of Mission Block No. 94.

Public notice is hereby given that on Monday, the 14th day of August, A. D. 1882, at 12 o'clock, noon, of that day, in front of the Old City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, I will, in obedience to said order of sale and decree of distribution, sell the above-described property, or so much thereof as may be necessary to raise sufficient to satisfy said judgment, with interest, and costs, etc., to the highest and best bidder, for lawful money of the United States.

San Francisco, July 22, 1882.
JOHN SEDGWICK, Sheriff.
WM. MATTHEWS, Attorney for Plaintiff.
July 22, 29, August 5 and 12.

SAMUEL P. MIDDLETON, AUCTIONEER.
JOHN MIDDLETON & SON,
Stock, Real Estate, and General

AUCTIONEERS.
116 Montgomery Street,
Occidental Hotel Block, SAN FRANCISCO

R. H. McDonald,
President,
San Francisco,
Cal.

PACIFIC BANK
Established
1863.
Capital Stock
$1,000,000.00
Surplus 460,800.70

San Francisco, Cal., July 1, 1882.

We take pleasure in presenting for your consideration the following Thirty-eighth Semi-Annual Statement of the condition of this Bank:

RESOURCES.

Bank Premises.....	$150,000 00
Other Real Estate.....	12,825 35
United States Bonds.....	629,507 60
Land Association Stock.....	15,121 55
Loans and Discounts.....	1,755,000 20
Due from Banks.....	527,279 09
Money on hand.....	632,365 30
LIABILITIES.	$3,752,099 09
Capital paid up.....	$1,000,000 00
Surplus.....	460,800 70
Due Depositors.....	1,953,672 84
Due Banks.....	337,491 05
Dividends unpaid.....	134 54
	$3,752,099 09

This Bank has special facilities for doing all kinds of banking business.

NEW ENGLAND BAKING POWDER

NO Alum Flour Starch Ammonia Phosphates Tartaric Acid

Cream Tartar and Bi-Carb. Soda
NOTHING ELSE
Newton Bros. & Co.
SAN FRANCISCO

Price $25. Weight 170 lbs. Has 1/2-inch Steel Teeth.

Made to rotate either way. Very thorough in its work and don't injure the vines or trees. Used by R.E. Blowers, G.G. Briggs and all leading vineyardists.

THE JACKSON VINEYARD HARROW.
The Best Harrow made for Vineyards and Orchards.
Made by JACKSON & TRUMAN, - San Francisco, Cal.

WILLIAMS, DIMOND & CO.
SHIPPING AND COMMISSION MERCHANTS,
Union Building, Junction Market and Pine Streets, San Francisco.
AGENTS FOR PACIFIC MAIL S. S.
Co.; Pacific Steam Navigation Co.; The Cunard Royal Mail S. S. Co.; The Hawaiian Line; The China Traders' Insurance Co., Limited; The Marine Insurance Co. of London; The Baldwin Locomotive Works; The Glasgow Iron Co.; Nich. Ashton & Son's Salt

LOUIS BRAVERMAN & CO.
(Successors to BRAVERMAN & LEVY.)
Manufacturers of FINE JEWELRY, and Importers of WATCHES, DIAMONDS, and other PRECIOUS STONES, STERLING SILVERWARE, and FRENCH CLOCKS.
Keep the best assortment and sell at LOWER PRICES than any house in this city.
119 MONTGOMERY STREET.

Apollinaris
"THE QUEEN OF TABLE WATERS."
British Medical Journal.
"Tonic, Restorative, and Enlivening."
Dr. Thilenius.
"Exhilarating, good for Loss of Appetite."
Peter Squire, Chemist to the Queen.
ANNUAL SALE, 10 MILLIONS.
Of all Grocers, Druggists, and Mineral Water Dealers.
BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.
FOR SALE BY RUHL BROTHERS,
522 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal.

PIANOS
HENRY F. MILLER, OF BOSTON,
HEMME & LONG, OF SAN FRANCISCO,
GROVESTEN & FULLER, OF NEW YORK,
TAYLOR & FARLEY ORGANS.
WOODWORTH, SCHELL & CO.,
Sole Agents, 105 Stockton Street, San Francisco.
PIANOS TO RENT.
PIANOS FOR SALE OR RENT
One Henry Miller, second-hand square Piano, in good order. Price, $200, in payments of ten dollars per month; or will rent for five dollars per month. Also, ONE FISHER UPRIGHT PIANO, ebonized case, nearly new. For rent at a low price. Inquire of
SAMUEL CARSON,
Publisher and Wholesale Bookseller,
120 SUTTER STREET, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

FIREMAN'S FUND
INSURANCE COMPANY
OF CALIFORNIA.
CAPITAL, $750,000
ASSETS, DECEMBER 31, 1881, $1,240,000
D. J. STAPLES, President. WILLIAM J. DUTTON, Secretary.
ALPHEUS BULL, Vice-President. E. W. CARPENTER, Asst. Secretary.
AGENTS IN ALL PRINCIPAL LOCALITIES.

E. DETRICK & CO.
Importers, Manufacturers, and Dealers in BAGS AND BURLAPS, all kinds, BAG-TWINES, HYDRAULIC HOSE. Sole Agents for MOUNT VERNON CO.'S DUCK, all widths, Russell Manf'g Co.'s COTTON BELTING, Russell Manf'g Co.'s SEAMLESS LINEN HOSE. Tower's Celebrated OILED CLOTHING.
TENTS, HAMMOCKS, CAMP COTS, CHAIRS, STOOLS, AND CAMPERS' OUTFITS.
Tents let by the Week or Month. AMERICAN FLAGS, BUNTING.
5, 7 AND 9 CALIFORNIA, AND 108, 110 AND 112 MARKET STS.

ICHI BAN,
22 AND 24 GEARY STREET
We are anxious to impress on the minds of the public the fact that ICHI BAN is a FREE EXHIBITION, and that all are welcome to visit it every day or evening of the week, without making a purchase. There is always something new. Sole agents for the AUTOPHONE.
The Argonaut is printed with Shattuck & Fletcher's ink.

OREGON IMPROVEMENT CO.
CUMBERLAND COAL,
LEHIGH LUMP and EGG COAL,
AT WHOLESALE.
SEATTLE COAL,
At Reduced Rates for Domestic and Steam Use.
MAIN OFFICE:
210 BATTERY STREET,
San Francisco.
DEPOTS:
Beale Street Wharf, San Francisco.
Foster's Wharf - Oakland.

NATURAL CHAMPAGNE
DRY AND EXTRA DRY
When ordering Wine, don't call for "California Champagne" merely, but state the brand, "EXTRA DRY," or the brand, "EXTRA DRY," or the brand, "EXTRA DRY."

Charles Heidsieck & Co.
530 WASHINGTON ST. S.F. CAL.
N. E.—Examine the cork.

J. M. LITCHFIELD & CO.
MERCHANT TAILORS,
And Dealers in Gents' Furnishing Goods,
415 MONTGOMERY STREET,
Bet. California and Sacramento San Francisco
ART-PAINTED, PLAIN AND GLAZED
TILES
For Decorations.
W. W. MONTAGUE & CO.
110 to 118 Battery Street.

DRINK FALK'S MILWAUKEE BEER.

The Argonaut.

VOL. XI. NO. 8.

SAN FRANCISCO, AUGUST 19, 1882.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

THE WRAITH OF STEPHEN ARNOLD.

A Story of the War.

II.

I do not know how long I had been sleeping, but it must have been a good while, judging from the fact that I felt thoroughly rested and refreshed when I awoke. I was awakened by what seemed to me a breath of cold air striking on my face, and around me was darkness and silence. I could no longer hear the scratching of the pencil. Then I struck a light, and saw the book outspread, and the pencil lying upon it. I drew the book over to myself, and read the following statement, written lightly, but in the clear, free handwriting of an educated man:

"Thank you, brave, kind friend, for all you have done for me, and for that eternal debt of gratitude which I shall owe you when you will have complied with the very unusual but not difficult requests I am about to make of you. Ever since I was separated from the corpse lying here I have been striving to get into communication with some living man, but without success, and this has been a great sorrow to me. You at first did not realize my presence, but your horse did, and for hours and hours I was trying to force him to come to this spot. I have not obtained a new body—which is the greatest want and need of man as soon as he leaves his earthly form—and therefore it happens that the contact of my naked soul and spirit with any physical object is a torture to me, and the light, especially the light of the sun, is a cause of exquisite suffering. In spite of the anguish caused by these efforts I have persevered in trying to communicate with men in the flesh. If you had been a coward or a fool I must necessarily have failed again, because, not having obtained the new body, I can do very little except through this fast rotting corpse, since I think Christians have discarded the idea of being baptized for the dead, and men seem to entertain some groundless but universal fear of all disembodied spirits. I am, therefore, without hope, unless some strong-hearted, clear-sighted, charitable man shall do for me what I beseech you to undertake.

"The facts are these: My name is Stephen Arnold. I was a physician by profession, and I had been engaged in practice for two years when the war began. I volunteered in an Arkansas regiment, and my body was cut almost in two by a cannon-hall at the recent battle fought here. I was just of age when I entered the army, and a mere boy when attending medical lectures. At this time I was engaged to be married to Amy Ramsay, the daughter of one of our neighbors, and we loved each other devotedly. But Amy's family were Scotch Presbyterians of the strictest kind, and I, like too many young medical students who learn the secrets of the dissecting-room so soon in life, was a confirmed materialist. I did not believe that there was any soul in a man that I could not reach with trephine and scalpel. Not only was I utterly devoid of the faith on which old Squire Ramsey and his family builded their daily life, but my morality was at loose ends in all respects, and in the matter of the use of alcoholic stimulants my life was shameful. As soon, therefore, as the old squire became aware of the attachment existing between Amy and myself, he very solemnly declared that he would rather see Amy laid in the grave than see her married to me.

"This opposition only intensified our affection, and while Amy strictly followed her father's injunctions in regard to her intercourse with me, she never hesitated to say that it did not change her heart toward me. It was impossible, of course, for her to avoid meeting me at the neighborhood gatherings which constituted the society of our country life, and her constant plea and prayer was that if I really loved her as I said, I would so regulate my life as ere long to win her father's approval of our union.

"I secured a short furlough less than a year ago, and returned home. Of course I saw Amy repeatedly. Our affection had only been made the stronger by my absence, and as my conduct while in the service, like that of most Confederate soldiers, had been very exemplary, I felt old Squire Ramsay's interdiction of my visits to his house to be grievously unjust, although he had never forbidden Amy to recognize me as an acquaintance or friend when we met at other places. The old gentleman, however, was as hard as iron. He finally yielded so far as to say in the hearing of some one, from whom he knew that I would quickly get the information, that as a Southerner he admired the devotion I was reported to have shown to the cause of Southern independence, and rejoiced over the great amendment in my moral conduct, and that if I preserved this reputation for good decorum another year, he might himself believe that it would prove to be permanent, but that for the present he absolutely forbade anything like intimacy between his daughter and myself.

"On the night preceding the day on which I was compelled to set out for the army under the terms of my furlough, I had persuaded Amy to meet me in the orchard back of her father's house for a farewell interview. We had made this arrangement at church, and I suppose that it was the only time she had ever disregarded her father's injunctions as to any private meetings with me, or indeed in regard to any other matter whatever. She was young, loving, artless, and innocent, and I had never in my life even attempted to put any restraint upon my passions, appetites, or desires.

"My interview with Amy in the halmy air and under the moonlight of a Southern sky soon became for both of us an agony of grief, love, and passion. She from her very youth and innocence, and I from habitual indulgence of every passion and longing, yielded to the sway of that resistless love which had become the dominant influence of both our lives, and our union was consummated without the intervention of priest or magistrate.

"The next morning I set out to rejoin my regiment. The idea that any misfortune might prevent us from ever being united in accordance with the forms of the church and of society, had never occurred to either of us; but a few days before we evacuated Atlanta I received a letter which had been a long time on the way, in which Amy wrote as follows: 'Darling, come home to me. I suffer cruelly, not because I have any doubt of you; but because I think I will die if our child should be born while its father is away. Come, if only for a day. Yours for life, death, and eternity, Amy.'

"This result of our indiscretion had never suggested itself to my mind, and the thought of the anguish I had brought upon the only woman for whom my heart ever yearned was intolerable. From the very moment that I received her letter my only desire was to return to Amy, and I applied at once for a furlough for that purpose, having already resolved to desert and go at any cost if it should be refused; for any dishonor to myself appeared preferable to absence from Amy under such circumstances. Before, however, it would have been possible to get any response to my application for furlough in the course of the routine of business, there came the hurried evacuation of Atlanta, and our double-quick march to Jonesboro. In the thickest of the battle, with Amy's letter next my heart, and with little thought or care for anything but her and her unhappy condition, a cannon-hall crushed through the body of this corpse here, and as I came forth from the broken frame, even the lurid light of the battle-field caused me exquisite pain. But almost instantly I felt myself enveloped by an existence separate from my own, and borne away with the velocity of lightning to the dark side of the world. As soon as I reached the side of the earth away from the sun, I grew calm, and free from the sense of pain.

"It is impossible for me to make you fully acquainted with the manner in which we communicate with each other, but I was given to understand that contact with physical bodies (especially animated physical bodies) and exposure to the light would always torture me, until I should be clothed with a new body, and that the time of the occurrence of this, if it should ever occur, could not be foretold.

"As soon as darkness began to envelope this western hemisphere, I passed over with it into Arkansas, and endeavored to make known to Amy that I was near her; but even at the cost of exquisite pain to myself I could do no more than to awaken a vague terror and longing in her bosom; although I have been with her in many hours of darkness, and have felt that her condition inflicts enduring anguish upon me. I am somehow impressed with the conviction that the reason I have not been able to obtain the new body is that I have done nothing by which Amy and her child can be relieved from the wrong I have done them. I have gone along the lines of the army, both in Virginia and in the West, and have visited many cities, searching everywhere for a man who might be physically and mentally endowed with such peculiarities as would enable him to render me the priceless boon which I am about to solicit at your hands. Will you consent to undertake it? For God's sake, for pity's sake, for the sake of a pure-hearted, suffering girl and her unhorn child, do not refuse my prayer!

"You are just my age, of precisely my stature. Your clear-cut face is almost a duplicate of mine. The color of your eyes, and hair, and complexion, all are wonderfully like my own. If you will, you can enable me to carry out my plan to rehabilitate Amy and her child, morally and socially. The things that must be done to that end will of course be my acts, although you must permit me to use your material form for the purpose of accomplishing them. In addition to these physical qualities which especially fit you to aid me in this undertaking, you are possessed of calm, self-centered, imperturbable courage. This would enable you to consent that I might go into your frame and possess it, as the legion that were cast out possessed the tombs-man at Gadar. It would not excite in you any of those emotions of terror or of loathing at the idea of intimacy with a disembodied spirit which in ordinary men sometimes produce insanity, epilepsy, or catalepsy, and those other diseases which haffle medical science. Indeed you would be able, without experiencing any shock—moral, physical, or intellectual—to remain quiescent while I might be in entire control of your physical organism, acting in you and for you in carrying out the scheme which I believe necessary for my everlasting peace, and for the temporal happiness of Amy and her child. We might sit down and sup together, if you will suffer it to be so. You could, whenever you desire it, resume your normal activity and self-control, although I pray you not to do so until I shall have completed the work contemplated, and then you can drive me out whenever you determine to do so. Therefore I beseech you to permit me to possess you. If you will consent to this arrangement for thirty days, I will go over in your person, and have the marriage service read by a preacher for Amy and myself. I will arrange with an old minister, who is my friend, to perform the ceremony and give a certificate of the fact, leaving the date blank, and on the next day will go to old Squire Ramsay, and openly and publicly claim my wife. There need be no lie told about it, and Amy need do nothing more than to claim me as her husband, saying that we had been privately married. It is simply a concession to the usages of society, but it is one which would rehabilitate a good woman and her child, and save untold sorrows and mortifications. I believe, also, that if this were accomplished I could obtain the new or spiritual body.

"If you will do this vast, inestimable favor for me, in ten days you can be with Amy; you can remain ten days, and in ten days more we can return hither, and I will go out of you, and relieve you of my presence forever. Of course every one will believe that I have come home upon a thirty days' furlough in consequence of her condition, and after my return to the army they will only have to chronicle the disappearance of another soldier. If any objection to this arrangement occurs to you, tell it to me without reserve, and I will write an answer in this book, if it should appear to me that the objection is not well founded. Unless you are incapable of compassion for those who suffer, I know that I have not appealed to your manhood and your sympathy in vain."

I reflected for some time upon the strange petition thus marvelously and pathetically addressed to me. At last I said:

"Two objections occur to me. One of them is an objection to the morality of the whole proceeding. I am to falsely personate a dead man. The other objection is based upon a proper regard for my own interests—self-preservation. If I suffer you to possess me as you propose, what assurance have I that I will be able to 'cast you out' at the termination of our engagement if you should feel disinclined to go? If you can satisfy me upon these two points I will consent to what you propose, strange and unparalleled as the whole thing appears."

Immediately after I heard the pencil scratching in the book, and when the sound had ceased, I read what my weird correspondent had written, as follows:

"To your ethical objections I desire to present two answers: First, what I propose to you is not a case of 'doing evil that good may come'; it is an act not wrong of itself, and is done with the highest and purest motives. The second answer I make is that you are not to do anything. You are only to enable me to do something which I am bound in honor and good conscience to do, if it be possible. Your body is not you any more than this decaying corpse is I. The act will be mine, not yours, and I presume that there can be no possible question about the fact that, if it is possible for me to do so, I ought to carry out my promise to marry Amy. To your second objection I answer, in perfect candor, that you are calm, wise, and resolute enough to cast me out even though I should be unwilling to go, and that in your own consciousness you know this to be so. If you were not, you might indeed be incurring a most fearful risk in permitting any spirit to possess your body. In the second place, I have to state the simple fact that I would go out of you voluntarily, because I hope to get 'a new body'—a hope the mighty force of which I do not think you can fully understand. In addition, I can only pledge you my solemn word, and the hope I cherish of one day completing my spiritual being by the acquisition of a spiritual form, that I will come out of you as soon as this good work will be completed, and we shall have returned to this spot. If you consent, remain as passive and receptive as you can, holding this withered hand in yours, and I will come in to you."

I pondered over this grave, mysterious question long and earnestly. Half-forgotten passages of the old and new Testaments referring to demoniacal possession and cognate experiences, and all that I had ever read upon weird and ghostly subjects came flooding back into my mind, clothed with an actual, unmistakable meaning, more real and practical than any interpretation which the wildest flight of fancy could have invested them with. Here was the disembodied spirit present; he was praying to be permitted to "possess" my body. I think my resolution turned finally upon the conviction in my own mind that if I admitted him I could cast him out, no matter how unwilling he might be to go.

So, clasping the skeleton hand once more in mine, I said: "Come."

It is difficult to express in words the experience that followed. Perhaps if some scientist could devise means by which one might grasp the poles of an electric battery, and receive the charge of it without experiencing any shock whatever, without even the perception of any mechanical means or appliances whatever, the quiet influx of that subtle fluid might be something like what I felt, and when the peaceful process seemed to have pervaded my whole frame, I was distinctly conscious that my body was tenanted by a being separate from myself—an alter ego indeed.

A new and startling experience soon presented itself to me. If you will close your eyes, and think intensely of the words or music of some familiar song, you will be able to see them without speaking or uttering the words or notes; and so all at once I saw the fact that my strange was saying, or rather impressing upon my brain, so that I could see it as well as I could have heard it if some one had spoken the words, the following:

"Friend, I thank you. It is good to be once more clothed in human form."

Then I became conscious of answering in the same mysterious way, but as distinctly and emphatically as if I had spoken the words:

"But the physical organism is mine, and I intend to keep it. If there is ever to be any contest between us about the permanent possession of this tabernacle, let it begin and end now and here."

"Oh, no," replied my mysterious tenant, "I am far too grateful to you to be capable of ever wishing to wrong you. I will keep my promise to the letter, and when I leave you I know you will be glad that you aided me in doing a good work here, and in attaining to the 'new body'; for, though this frame of yours is a splendid one indeed, I fancy that the spiritual form for which I yearn is far more excellent."

"Then," answered I, "you shall be a welcome guest for thirty days; and now let us go to sleep."

I understand, of course, that all these things of which I have been speaking are "strange," "improbable," "incomprehensible," "impossible," and all that, yet nevertheless the undoubted fact is that they all occurred just as I have stated them; and I fell asleep there on the battle-field of Jonesboro, wondering none the less at these strange experiences because I knew that they had actually occurred.

With the rising sun I sprang up, saddled my horse, and rode down to the spring to make my morning's ablutions, feed my horse, consume my own rations, and then resume my journey.

I was dimly conscious of the presence of my mysterious friend during the whole time; but after having ridden along for several hours communing with my own thoughts, I suddenly became conscious that Stephen Arnold was making use of my brain, and I saw the following words as plainly as I could have heard them if they had been articulately spoken:

"I am not disposed to intrude upon you, nor to use your phrenic nerves except when you desire conversation with me, but I wish to suggest that if you are traveling for my benefit, it would be better to turn southward by the first State road, and make for West Point or Opelika."

Then, just as if two girls were playing strophe and antistrophe upon the same piano, (except that ours was a voiceless symphony,) the brain seemed responsive to my thought, which answered:

"Certainly; I will do so. You may be assured, also, that any suggestions you may desire to make will not be intrusive at all."

I let the brain go, and he instantly replied with it:

"Then I suggest further that you will perhaps find this body of yours requiring a little more sleep and a little more food than usual, if we are both to make use of it. I have no experience of such a case, but from my professional studies I suppose the brain and other parts of the human instrument would suffer exhaustion more rapidly from being used by two than if they performed only the customary service."

We rode along until the hour of noon had come, and I saw before us a neat frame house, and a blacksmith shop. I determined to get Auster shod, and to obtain a meal for myself. I quickly found the disciple of Vulcan, and entered into negotiations with him, proposing to give him a sixty-dollar Confederate note to shoe my horse "all round," and get dinner for him and myself. The smith said that I and my horse should be welcome to all we could eat without remuneration, but that he could not do the work I wanted; he had neither coal nor iron; there was none in the country.

I was familiar enough with the condition of things to take in the situation at once. The nature of my service in the army had been such that money was often a matter of vital consequence to me, and I seldom left the brigade without having large sums in Confederate notes, a generous supply of "greenbacks," and some gold and silver upon my person, and the government had never refused any application I made for either kind of "money." I therefore handed the smith four half-dollars in silver, and assured him that I thought he had wit enough to make some arrangement for shoeing my horse. The keen fellow laughed, and looked a little ashamed, as he said in a droll sort of way:

"Well, I'll try anyhow."

He called a bright boy of about twelve years of age, who was practicing the Confederate drill with an old shot-gun in the front yard, and told him to go up into the barn loft and bring down a sack of charcoal. The smith himself went to an old wagon behind the shop, and having wrenched off one of the tires, he heated it at the forge, and cut off a piece with which to make horseshoes. The deft way in which the smith handled hammer and tongs soon satisfied me that he was master of his craft, and at his request I went into the house to wait for dinner.

The housewife was hearty and hospitable, and everything about the place indicated a happy and prosperous home. At the bountiful table the smith opened conversation with the universal inquiry about the news "from the front," and I gave all that I had. Finally I asked him how it happened that he was not in the army. He blushed with generous shame, as if the question were in some way an imputation upon his patriotism, and answered:

"Just owing to my infernal bad luck. There were only two blacksmiths in this township, and the planters demanded that one of them might be exempted, to keep their plows and wagons in running order, and both of us wanted to go. As neither of us would give way, they finally made us throw dice for the privilege of going—and Brown, confound him!—beat me. He is Captain Brown—and I had to stay at home."

"He feels pretty badly about it," said the wife, "but all of the neighbors insist that he can do more for the cause at home with his forge than a dozen men could do with their muskets in the army."

I concurred in this opinion, and consoled the dissatisfied patriot by declaring that true honor for a Confederate consisted in doing his best in any station in which he could best aid the cause, without consulting his own feelings and preferences.

Bay Auster testified his extreme satisfaction with the hountiful feed the smith's son had given him by uttering that peculiar rubble-rubble sound which a horse can make with his lips, and by which he can express so many phases of feeling, as soon as he saw me, and by rubbing his head against my shoulder as soon as I had come near enough to him. He then turned up each foot in succession to have me inspect his new shoes, and to get my opinion of the smith's work.

We then resumed our journey. We traveled on until nightfall, and having been hospitably received into a planter's house, we passed the night in such comfort as had been unusual to me during the three years I had been in the Confederate service, and the next morning my horse and I resumed our journey, refreshed and hopeful. In consequence, however, of the arrangement I had made with Arnold, the journey was prosecuted southwardly in the direction of Opelika, instead of westward toward the Tallapoosa River, as I had originally intended.

Having taken the railroad at Opelika on the fourth day after Stephen Arnold had become my guest, the excitement of travel, the noise and confusion of the train, the continual meeting with old acquaintances and the making of new ones, and the almost ceaseless clatter of conversation about the progress and duration of the war with which every car, depot, and hotel were filled, almost rendered any communication with him impracticable, and he remained entirely quiescent while I followed the line of travel from Opelika to a point within a few miles of Memphis, from which point, on the evening of the seventh day, I walked into the last-named city. On the morning following I purchased a serviceable horse, crossed the river to Hopefield, on the Arkansas side, and began a new journey in the saddle, which Arnold informed me would require three days of pretty constant riding before we could reach the place of Amy Ramsay's residence.

The strange being who shared my fleshly tabernacle with me had been my guest for a week, and I had experienced no unpleasant results from the experiment I had ventured upon in permitting him to "possess" me. I still felt satisfied that I could expel him whenever I might resolve to do so, and I could not understand why it was that he regarded the fact that a man should suffer himself to be "possessed" as a thing of such supreme gravity and hazard as many of his expressions seemed to indicate.

"I was agreeably surprised," said he, "at the apparent readiness with which you consented to my request to permit me to possess you. I am very sure that if you had fully appreciated the fearful risk one may encounter who permits spirits whom he does not know to possess him, you would, perhaps, have rejected my petition with loathing and with terror, and I realize so fully what might have happened to you that I feel like giving you constant assurances of my gratitude, and of my total unwillingness to do you any wrong."

The morning of the tenth day dawned upon us, and soon after we had resumed our journey, I became convinced that Arnold was communicating the following:

"Hitherto I have incommoded you as little as it was possible for me to do, and have endeavored to entertain you by communicating my opinions to you upon such matters as you have chosen to suggest. For the next ten days there must be a very decided change in the relations which we bear to each other and to this body of yours, if you remain firm in your resolution to aid me, of which I have no doubt, although I understand better than you do that the act is one demanding supreme courage and unquestioning friendship. It will be necessary for you to remain passive, and for me to become active and dominant. You are to be guest, I am to be proprietor. In other words, I am to possess you more completely, and the things done by your physical organization are to be my acts, not yours. I must see my old friend the clergyman this evening, and arrange with him the marriage service to-night. I must make arrangements with Amy to meet me again secretly, and I must then go to my father's house and spend the night. During the time I remain here, which shall in no event exceed ten days, no one must have the slightest cause to entertain a doubt that I am the veritable Stephen Arnold, whom every one in that neighborhood has known from his childhood. It is only necessary for you to will the entire control of this body to me. Are you ready to give me this supreme proof of confidence and affection?"

In fact, I felt a very strong repugnance to doing anything of the kind, but I had voluntarily promised to do so, and had made a journey of ten days' duration in pursuance of that promise. And, moreover, all that I had learned of Arnold during this time had impressed me with the conviction that he was worthy of the largest and most implicit trust, and in addition to this, I had an abiding confidence in my own power to cast him out and resume my normal ascendancy even in spite of him. So, after some little hesitation, I replied:

"I am becoming as passive as possible. Take entire possession as soon as you please."

Immediately I became conscious of the fact that the control of the voluntary movements of my body, and of every organ of it, were passing away from me; yet, although I was startled, I was not frightened. The process was a gradual one, but in a very short time it was completed. Then I heard words uttered with my tongue that were not my words; my hands, and eyes, and person became responsive to thoughts that were not my thoughts; and I realized the fact that no act done by this body under existing circumstances ought either morally or legally to be considered my act, but in truth must be the act of Stephen Arnold. And if he had committed a murder with my hand, it would have been only an error of human justice to have punished my body for his deeds. He had spoken with scientific accuracy when he declared "the act to be done will be my act only, not yours."

"Now for old father Mitchell's and Amy!" said Arnold, as we left the State highway by which we had been traveling, and turned into a neighborhood road.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

"Sure, Biddy darlin'," said Patrick, "have compassion on me and be mine; why, your very heart says pity pat, pity pat."

CHICAGO NOVELETTES.

"You have broken my heart, Vivian."

It was a fair-haired girl who spoke these words, and as they came from her lips Vivian Mahoney, the young man to whom they were addressed, leaned tenderly over Ferida Peterson, and strove to kiss away the tears that were welling up in her beautiful, dreamy, brown eyes.

"I do not blame you," she continued, in a broken voice. "She whom you will one day wed is fair to look upon, and when her warm kisses melt upon your lips it is not strange that you forget all else but that she would gladly be your wife, and that her father owns a coal-yard. But I love you with a mad, deathless passion that will burn out my life in the intensity of its flame. You have won my Scandinavian affections unwittingly, but you have won them all the same. In the years that are to come, Vivian, when your children are playing at your knee, you will sometimes let a tender thought lie in your heart for the little flaxen-haired girl who knew no happiness so great as to hear your voice, and see the gleam of the matinee tickets in your vest pocket?"

"By yon bright moon I swear," said Vivian, taking another kiss on the fly, "that your memory shall ever be enshrined in my heart." He was about to imprint another kiss on the rosy lips upheld to his, when a dull thud was heard at the rear of his pants, and Vivian lay senseless on the sidewalk.

Old Mr. Peterson had opened the front door and adjourned the meeting—From "Off the Front Steps," by Joseph Medill.

"Be brave, Beryl."

The north wind was howling fiercely through the cordage of a staunch vessel as she dashed madly through the seething waters that stretched away from her on every side in desolate fury. Now poised on the crest of a great green billow, and anon plunged into a watery depth that seemed to end only in the hosom of the earth, the good ship struggled bravely with the mighty forces of the tempest, but though her timbers might groan in almost human agony, there was no parting of the seams, no weakening of the bolts that held deck and bulwark together in so firm a clasp.

It was Beryl McCloskey's wedding-trip. Two days ago she had been joined in wedlock's holy bonds to George W. Simpson, and her mother had consented to go with them on their bridal journey. It was her loving arm that supported Beryl now, her kindly voice that spoke the words with which this chapter opens.

"George can not love me, mamma," the girl said, speaking in low, mellow tones, "or he would be at my side now, when I need him sorely."

"Do not judge hastily, my child," replied the mother. "George is pretty busy. Even now I see him leaning over the vessel's side."

"Is he then so very, very sick?" asked Beryl.

"Quite very," said Mrs. McCloskey.

"Has he thrown up his situation?"

"No, my darling."

"Then," said the girl, a holy love-light illumining her pure young face, "I will never leave him."—From "Beryl's Bluff," by Joseph Medill.

"My heart is broken."

The world was white with snow that came sifting down in a fleecy torrent from the gray cloud-banks above, eddying bither and yon in the gusts of wind that swept with fierce fury over moorland and forest, and then falling with soft coyness upon the bleak hosom of the earth, already made cold and cheerless by the December frosts. The trees that such a little time ago were burdened down with a wealth of bud and blossom, now waved their gaunt arms as if in silent protest against the cruel cold.

Gazing out upon the scene, looking with a strained, wistful what-are-the-chances-for-matinee-tickets-this-winter expression in her eyes, Gwendolen Mahaffy stood in the bay-window of her father's palatial residence that December afternoon, and as she peered into the storm a look of pain passed over the fair young face, and into the brown eyes came tears that could not be repressed.

And yet, in spite of all its sadness the picture was a pretty one. As the darkening shadows of a dying day fell upon the earth, the ruddy glow of a coal-fire whose tongues of flame leaped bravely up the chimney and roared as if in very glee at their own power, brought into strong relief the lithe, stately beauty of the girlish figure in the window, and cast over the marble statues of Psyche and Diana that stood on either side of her a mellow warmth that made them seem instinct with life. And while the girl stood there sobbing as if her heart would break, while now and then a low moan, that was pitiful in its sad intensity, came from her lips, there stepped into the room a strong-limbed, sunnily-haired man whose face possessed the almost boyish beauty that one sees so often in Ohio. Going quickly to where Gwendolen was standing, his arm was around her, his face bending above hers in loving tenderness almost before she knew whether she was afoot or horseback.

"Why are you weeping, my darling?" he asked, kissing away the tears in a confident I-am-solid way that told, more plainly than could any words, of his having been there before.

The girl gave no answer in words, but placing her head above his left lung, a little shiver of pain passed over the lissome form, and then Gwendolen broke into a storm of sobs.

"Speak to me, sweetheart!" cried Bertie Cecil, in an agony of fear. "Tell me what terrible grief is oppressing you."

Checking herself with a mighty overhead-check, the girl looked up to him with eyes that spoke only of love. There were no tears on the pretty face now, but in their place had come a look of haunting fear, a ghastly bet-on-the-wrong-horse-yesterday expression, that sent a chill to the man's heart. Twice she tried to speak, and twice the words that she would say refused to come. But suddenly she kissed him with a rapturous, clinging, all-over-the-house-and-part-of-the-front-yard kiss, and as he turned away to catch his breath, Gwendolen whispered in low, solemn tones:

"I have broken my hustle."

"Thank heaven it is no worse," said Bertie. "I was afraid you might have heard the Thomas orchestra play a fugue."—From "Tassels on Her Boots," by Joseph Medill, the Tribune Novelist.

SARATOGA AND WHITE SULPHUR.

Two Letters About Two Typical Northern and Southern Resorts.

A correspondent of the New York World writes as follows from Saratoga: "The eleven thousand virgins of Cologne could be duplicated at Saratoga, and the masculine element is conspicuous by its absence. Of course there are lots of trousered creatures walking about, but they scorn the delights of the waxed floor and the orchestras, and sit around and smoke with a heartless disregard of their obligations to the fairer part of humanity, who are arrayed in delicious costumes that were meant for something better than sitting up against the wall. When these masculine monsters are asked if they mean to dance, they answer, with a cold laugh or a sardonic smile: 'Not much!' and go on smoking, and hobnobbing, and gossiping. It makes the cynic smile and the moralist weep to see this utter indifference to the whole duty of man, which is to do the agreeable to woman, and what part of a man's duty is more obvious than his dancing duty? They say here that it is considered more distinguished not to dance. Now, that means exactly this: there are not men enough to dance with, and besides, by a well-known paradox, distinguished people always do the most unfashionable things. It is the veneerings of society, the people who are brand-new all over, who are afraid to dance at Saratoga. But Saratoga possesses one attraction that has brought joy to many a husband and father—the shops where one has the privilege of paying a first-rate price for a second-rate article. This accounts partly for the immense popularity of Saratoga, and when pater-familias and uxor-irritabilis have enjoyed the luxury of paying bills all the winter, they naturally want it all the summer. It is beautiful to see how they urge the reluctant wives and daughters into these bazaars, where a nun's veiling costume, that probably cost the modiste about twenty-five dollars, is exhibited as the model of simplicity and cheapness at one hundred. Now, to one who knows, nun's veiling is a very inexpensive material; it could not possibly cost more than one dollar and a half a yard, and probably cost the modiste about half that at importer's prices, and when a costume made of it, with a hint of satin here and there, is retailed at one hundred dollars, it is enough to bring Thackeray's friend, old 'shent-per-shent,' back to life again. Of course the women dress a great deal, but there is, year by year, a marked improvement in the style of dress, even at the great watering-places, and this year there are so many well-dressed women at Saratoga that an ill-dressed one is peculiarly noticeable. Occasionally the woman is seen who appears at breakfast in full dress, with diamonds in her ears, and chains and lockets around her neck, until she looks like a Christmas turkey, but they are rare. The young ladies wear simpler, prettier, Frenchier dresses—little quiet costumes that suit young faces and slim forms—and big, sensible hats, and umbrellas that accomplish what they were made for.

Another correspondent writes to the same journal from White Sulphur Springs, Virginia, the following letter: "With only between seven and eight hundred people at the White Sulphur Springs the season can scarcely be said to have opened, since the hotel and its various dependencies are intended for a couple of thousand and more. Southern girls mature much more rapidly than do Northern girls. The Northern girl at sixteen is scrawny and still at school, when the Southern girl is planning her wedding clothes. There could be no such sight at a Northern watering-place where a pretty young girl undertaking the serious business of dancing, flirting, and going through the preliminary steps to matrimony is an isolated creature; the others, if there be others of her kind, are still under the eyes of mammas, governesses, or maids, and go to bed at ten o'clock. The type of beauty is quite as unusual. Coming from the sea-shore, where the girls are in the breakers every day, with their heads tied up in turbans, and their arms and faces bared to sun and wind, and have long since ceased to have complexions, these dainty, lily-like creatures seem only fit to be put under glass cases and admired. One would like to usher into the great parlor here a group of Newport girls fresh from a hunt, with burned noses, and cheeks not yet peeled off from the last meet. There is no question but that they would be eyed with great consternation, and it would be difficult to persuade the guests at the White Sulphur that these could in any way represent any great height of fashion. One wonders how to account for these slender striplings, with narrow chests and high-keyed voices, who represent the South here. They are handsome, attractive, and have that gentle courtesy toward women which is the abiding charm of a Southern man. But it does not seem possible that they will broaden out like the older generation of which one sees such fine representatives here, like General Fitzhugh Lee, for example, or become fitted to undertake the serious responsibilities of life. Although when one remembers the small amount of material which goes to make up that entity known as General Mahone, and the amount of concern he has given in proportion to his substance, it seems needless to consider further the bone and muscle of the Virginia youth. The woods, the walks, the lawn all fresh and glowing from the summer rains; the piazzas, and above all the ball-room, are its stage. The older people may come to make water-jugs of themselves and leave their rheumatism in the sulphur baths; the politicians may gather to make slates and discuss the situation; but the real charm of the White Sulphur is in its spectacle of happy youth engaged in alluring devices, full of innocent pastimes, beguiling manoeuvres, and that little, tender by-play which since the beginning has always resulted when youths and maidens meet. In Dahomey he seizes her from the midst of her friends, and bears her away on his horse behind him. At the White Sulphur he dances the polka with her, and then takes her to a secluded window seat, or ties a handkerchief on his neck, and goes out on the lawn. Dancing means here something more than a languid quadrille and a few girls with their arms entwined waltzing together. With no cast-iron rules to warn them, the young men bring their dress-coats and dancing-shoes, and thus do the pretty girls honor each evening, although dress balls, as announced, take place only on Wednesday and Friday evenings. The polka appears to be the favorite dance. As danced, it is not the usual whirling movement, but three sliding steps, ending with a twirl, and is really very pretty."

OLD FAVORITES.

Genevieve.

Maid of my love, sweet Genevieve;
In beauty's light you glide along;
Your eye is like the star of eve,
And sweet your voice as seraph's song.
Yet not your heavenly beauty gives
This heart with passion soft to glow;
Within your soul a voice there lives,
It bids you hear the tale of woe.
When sinking low the sufferer wanes
Beholds no hand outstretched to save;
Fair as the bosom of the swan
That rises graceful o'er the wave,
I've seen your breast with pity heave,
And therefore love I you, sweet Genevieve.
—Samuel Taylor Coleridge.

The Girl of Cadiz.

Oh never talk again to me
Of northern climes and British ladies;
It has not been your lot to see,
Like me, the lovely girl of Cadiz.
Although her eye be not of blue,
Nor fair her locks, like English lasses,
How far its own expressive hue
The languid azure eye surpasses!

Prometheus-like, from heaven she stole
The fire that through those silken lashes
In darkest glances seems to roll,
From eyes that can not hide their flashes;
And as along her bosom steal
In lengthened flow her raven tresses,
You'd swear each clustering lock could feel,
And curled to give her neck caresses.

Our English maids are long to woo,
And rigid even in possession;
And if their charms be fair to view,
Their lips are slow at love's confession;
But born beneath a brighter sun,
For love ordained the Spanish maid is,
And who—when fondly, fairly won—
Enchants you like the Girl of Cadiz?

The Spanish maid is no coquette,
Nor joys to see a lover tremble,
And if she love, or if she hate,
Alike she knows not to dissemble.
Her heart can ne'er be bought or sold—
How'er it beats, it beats sincerely;
And though it will not bend to gold,
'Twill love you long and love you dearly.

The Spanish girl that meets your love
Ne'er taunts you with a mock denial,
For every thought is bent to prove
Her passion in the hour of trial.
When thronging foemen menace Spain,
She dures the deed and shares the danger,
And should her lover press the plain,
She hurls the spear, her love's avenger.

And when, beneath the evening star,
She mingles in the gay Bolero,
Or sings to her attuned guitar
Of Christian knight or Moorish hero,
Or counts her beads with fairy hand
Beneath the twinkling rays of Hesper,
Or joins devotion's choral band,
To chant the sweet and hallowed vesper,

In each her charms the heart must move
Of all who venture to behold her;
Then let not maids less fair reprove
Because her bosom is not colder.
Through many a clime 'tis mine to roam,
Where many a soft and melting maid is,
But none abroad, and few at home,
May match the dark-eyed Girl of Cadiz.
—Lord Byron.

Fanny of Timmol—A Mail-coach Adventure.

"Quadrifid petimus vivere."—Horace.

A poem by Thomas Moore, seldom found in his works, and which was first published in the Philadelphia edition of 1874.

Sweet Fanny of Timmol! when first you came in
To the close little carriage in which I was hurled,
I thought to myself, if it were not a sin,
I could teach you the prettiest tricks in the world.

For your dear little lips, to their destiny true,
Seemed to know they were born for the use of another,
And, to put me in mind of what I ought to do,
Were eternally biting and kissing each other.

And then you were darting from eyelids so sly—
Half open, half shutting—such tremulous light;
Let them say what they will, I could read in your eye
More comical things than I ever shall write.

* * * * *
At length when arrived, at our supper we sat,
I heard with a sigh, which had something of pain,
That perhaps our last moment of meeting was that,
And Fanny should go back to Timmol again.

Yet I swore not that I was in love with you, Fanny—
Oh no! for I felt it could never be true;
I but said—what I've said very often to many—
There's few I would rather be kissing than you.

Then first did I learn that you once had believed
Some loved, the dearest and falsest of men;
And so gently you spoke of the youth who deceived,
That I thought you perhaps might be tempted again.

But you told me that passion a moment amused
Was followed too oft by an age of repenting,
And checked me so softly that, while you refused,
Forgive me, dear girl, if I thought you consenting.

And still I intreated, and still you denied,
Till I almost was made to believe you sincere;
Though I found that in bidding me leave you, you sighed,
And when you repulsed me, 'twas done with a tear.

In vain did I whisper, "There's nobody nigh;"
In vain with the tremor of passion implore;
Your excuse was a kiss, and a tear your reply—
I acknowledged them both, and I asked for no more.

Was I right? Oh, I cannot believe I was wrong.
Poor Fanny is gone back to Timmol again;
And may Providence guide her uninjured along,
Nor scatter her path with repentance and pain.

By heaven! I would rather forever foreswear
The elysium that dwells in a beautiful breast,
Than alarm for a moment the peace that is there,
Or banish the dove from so hallowed a nest.

AN ENGLISH HERO.

How London is Ringing with the Praises of a Young Nobleman.

The hero of the hour is Lord Charles Beresford, the commander of the gunboat Condor, which did such good service at the bombardment of Alexandria, and which, owing to the pluck and excellent manoeuvring of his lordship succeeded in silencing, at close range, the guns of a fort, a single shot from which, had it struck her, would have instantly sunk the little vessel. Lord Charles is one of the leading spirits of the Prince of Wales's set—a lark, jolly little fellow, with curly brown hair, and a bright, dancing eye. He is the hero of no end of scrapes, both at home and abroad, and has usually been regarded by those who have known him best as too rash and scatter-brained ever to make a good officer. But his friends were rather at fault in their estimate, for his coolness and gallantry under fire have made people begin to wish that the fleet had a few more officers renowned for recklessness.

But all the Waterfords have been a wild lot from time immemorial, and he comes naturally by his ways. His grandfather was the famous Marquis of Waterford, whose exploits are historical, and his eldest brother, the present marquis, when Earl of Tyrone, eloped with the wife of Captain Vivian, and married her, after the customary divorce and damages. Another brother, Lord William Beresford, an officer of the Ninth Lancers, when a few years ago in India, won the Victoria Cross, England's greatest decoration for personal valor; while a third brother, Lord Marcus, or "Marky," as he is called in the clubs, is perhaps the best "gentleman" jockey and steeple-chase rider in the kingdom. He was formerly in the Seventh Hussars, but got too deeply "into it" on the turf, and was obliged to sell out to save his commission from the clutches of the money-lender. Two or three years ago he was up before a London police magistrate, and fined five hundred pounds with the option of six months imprisonment in the House of Correction, for unmercifully beating a solicitor who had lent him some money and had come to ask for it. Lord Charles's doings would fill a volume. But one will suffice. During the American war of the rebellion he was a midshipman on board the flagship Sutlej of the Pacific squadron, and one night, while the ship lay in Honolulu harbor at the Sandwich Islands, he asked leave to go ashore. His sympathies, like most Englishmen of his class at the time, were with the Southern Confederacy, and he thought he couldn't better display them than by climbing up in the dark, and sawing down the shield which decorated the door of the United States Consulate. The act was traced to him without much trouble, and the Admiral compelled him to make reparation by climbing up again in broad daylight, in the presence of the assembled populace and officers of the fleet, and fasten the shield back in its place. He has saved the lives of no end of people from drowning, and might have the Humane Society's medal a dozen times over, did not one bestowal of the decoration sufficiently show the society's appreciation of his services. Altogether he, like all the others of his race and line, combines the qualities of good and bad in an odd sort of heterogeneous fashion. He is an immense favorite with everybody, and is an especial pet of the Prince and Princess of Wales, he and his wife—for he is married to a brewer's daughter, who brought him a big dot—being guests at Sandringham for the bunting, and at Marlborough House during the season, oftener than any one else. Perhaps not the least of his achievements, and one which has gained him no little notoriety, is the invention of the phrase "In the swim"—a saying to which Ouida has added much fame by so constantly introducing it into her later novels.

The Queen's sorrow for her late consort is curious, for while it forbids the doing of the queenly honors of a state ball at her majesty's London palace to the nobility and gentry of her realm, yet allows the taking of a boisterous part in Scotch reels and Highland flings, with a gillie for a partner, and a farm laborer for a vis-à-vis. Truly it is. Yet it is of but recent notoriety how on the day of Lord Frederick Cavendish's funeral the decency of a postponed drawing-room could not be observed, as her majesty was obliged to leave town that evening for Scotland, to be present at a ball she was to give to the servants of Balmoral.

A great many stories get afloat from time to time, of which her servant, John Brown, is either the hero or the subject. No doubt most of them are indebted to a whole piece of cloth for their manufacture, though now and then an authentic one gets out. I can tell you one about him that is in a measure apropos of the subject just referred to, and also combines the virtues of recent occurrence as to its incidents, and undoubted authority as to its recital, my informant of the facts being none other than one of the queen's equeries. Prince Frederick Augustus of Schleswig-Holstein, the elderly German who some years ago married the Queen's third daughter, the Princess Helena, holds the position of Ranger of Windsor Park. The office is of course a sinecure, a fat income, and a fine residence in Windsor Park (called Frogmore) being given the incumbent in return for doing nothing. It seems that a few weeks ago, during the Ascot races, when the neighborhood of Windsor was thronged with the élite, the German prince was desirous of giving a garden party. His house being within the limits of a royal demesne, it became his duty, in accordance with the sovereign's prerogative, to submit the list of his intended guests to the Queen for her approval before an invitation could be issued. Her majesty, who, where her rights are concerned, is more exact and precise about small observances than many people suppose, read over the list with care. Then she sent for the prince, and told him that it had her approbation with but one exception. It did not include the name of John Brown. She desired that he should be invited. The prince said nothing, but bowed low, and took his leave. On the appointed day the party came off, and Mr. Brown was there; but he was the only guest. The prince had obeyed the royal command, but had invited no one else. The Queen heard of it, of course, but thought it wiser to say nothing. The recent appointment, however, of the Duke of Teck as her special parliamentary reporter in place of the prince might possibly indicate a desire to show her displeasure.

LONDON, July 16, 1882.

WASHINGTON REMINISCENCES.

Something about Society at the Capital a Decade of Years Ago.

The bitter fight that has lately been waged against Grant's Secretary of the Navy by Democratic newspapers and Democratic congressmen, brings to my mind the days when Roheson was the jolliest fellow there in Washington. At the time I speak of—say 1870-71—he was a bachelor, and lived in a three-story house on I Street, next door to Wormley's, (the Delmonico's—the black Delmonico's—of the national capital,) and was known to live an easy and an agreeable life. He was about fifty then, portly, and had iron-gray hair. Wormley used to superintend the getting up of all the swell repasts intended for the convivial Jerseyman next door, which generally included terrapin, Saddle Rock oysters, and frogs' legs à la poulette; and the wines—great goodness! how good they were, and how they were appreciated, especially by such rotund fellows as Senator Carpenter, Governor Nye, and Admiral Goldsborough! How quickly the above-named trio would demolish a hottle of Amontillado, to be sure! "There is a charm in going to a bachelor's establishment," said Mrs. Attorney-General Williams to me one day, "and especially when its head is as full of jolly hospitality as is Mr. Roheson." Jolly was the adjective always used, and it was so applicable. During the time I speak of the old "sea-dog" had three very handsome Philadelphia ladies visiting him, and he used to give musicales in their honor occasionally, to which only a few were invited, in addition to his regular Wednesday evening receptions, which were open to all his friends. Mr. Roheson's custom was to stand near the door until the last person arrived, and so soon as the name was announced he would extend his hand, and give a hearty shake, and exclaim: "Now get off your wraps, and go right into the back parlor, and see if you can't get something to eat." Well, now, there was no question about the feasibility of that thing. The table was always set, and hountifully spread; and while there were always waiters in attendance, there was always a slick, good-looking navy officer detailed for the day, to see that every one was well helped. No entertainer could put you more at your ease than Roheson in those days. Of course his manner was jolly and off-hand, but it imparted a character of sociability to a reception that was contagious. So delightful a person was the secretary that it was an understood thing that certain married ladies of his circle had entered into a compact to thwart the plans of any young woman who should dare to turn the thoughts of the unsophisticated sailor toward matrimony.

Such crushes as took place that winter at Belknap's I shall never forget. Belknap was Grant's Secretary of War, and subsequently came to grief. He was a noble fellow during the rebellion, and ranked among the highest of Iowa's eminent men. But too much prosperity turned his head. He was a handsomer man than Roheson, and just as exuberant, and ought to have been as popular a Secretary of War as he was general in the army. But he got into a habit of snubbing officers and others who called upon him on business during office hours, and gave himself aristocratic airs in the presence of other than those of superior rank and station. He ultimately became greatly absorbed in style, and attempted the Matterhorn of social distinction. How he fell and broke his neck is one of the conspicuous episodes of his previously radiant life. I never saw Mrs. Belknap but once, and that was at her second reception during the winter of '71-2, although I attended two others, late, at which locomotion was at times absolutely impossible. At this time Mrs. Belknap was a young queen—so handsome and agreeable as to be sought after, and kind enough to be thoroughly liked.

Mrs. Senator Cole, who lived in a pretentious residence near the Arlington, was greatly admired, as was her sister, Mrs. Colonel Whiting, who was visiting Mrs. C. from California, and who now resides in Los Angeles in the midst of lemon and orange trees. Mrs. Cole's amiability was proverbial, and she was the pleasantest lady in Washington to drop in and have a chat with morning, noon, or night. Her daughter Emma, now roaming somewhere in the East with a good-looking, well-to-do husband named Brown, was just lengthening her clothes to keep up with a stature that was gaining on her mother, and was the counterpart in face and figure of the delightful Mrs. C. herself. In the winter of 1872-73, Miss Cole, who had grown to be a young lady, had her cousin, Miss Kate Whiting, with her, and the two were great favorites in society. I used to see Miss Whiting at the opera occasionally with Governor McCormick, and as the governor was a young widower, and a gentleman of exceedingly good taste, I thought he might lay siege for the matrimonial possession of the fair young Californian. But he soon after married the youngest daughter of Senator Thurman, and Miss Whiting subsequently became Mrs. James Howard, of Los Angeles, while her sister married Mr. James Mellus, of Los Angeles, and there they all live under their own vines and fig trees, with grandma Whiting. Senator Cole had the ear of the President, as the saying went, and was besought by all the accidental office-hunters, as Senator Casserly, who had just succeeded Conness, although as much a partisan as his predecessor, was on the anti-Administration side, and had "no influence at court." Senator Cole was a fine-looking man, a hard worker, but neither an eloquent speaker, nor a ready debater. He was slow, hesitating, and over-cautious, but very pleasant at all times, and made hosts of Pacific Coasters feel perfectly at home whether at his house or in the "marble room."

Hon. James G. Blaine was Speaker of the House of Representatives at this time, and with his charming wife, a tall, dark-eyed woman, made a visitor feel much at his or her ease at their house on Fifteenth Street, near I. As a general thing, take it from January to December, a person could feel more at home under Blaine's roof than under any other in Washington. I have never known a more fascinating man than Blaine. He could shake hands across a gory chasm oftener and more genuinely with a political adversary than any man living. He would run an enemy through in debate, and apply a healing embrocation afterward as no American could. His wife was as accomplished as she was charming, and her sister ("Gail Hamilton") was as witty as he was intellectual. You were received at Mr. and Mrs. Blaine's receptions with a smile and a grasp of the hand which expressed more than the formula customary on such occasions—in short, a greeting which made one feel that he or she was really welcome.

Blaine's house was a great resort for literary women. I recollect well meeting "Grace Greenwood" (Mrs. Livingston) at Mr. Blaine's one evening. I believe she has visited this coast. No one who ever saw her could forget her—a real brunette, with clear, defined features, a high forehead, somewhat modified by the careless freedom of her hair, beginning then to number silver threads in its abundance. There was an intensity and purpose about her face and deep dark eyes that made a lasting impression.

Miss Boutwell, of Massachusetts, twelve years ago was a very interesting young lady of twenty. She was slight and sweet-faced, simple in dress, and unobtrusive in bearing. She was one of your deeply thoughtful New England girls, thoroughly educated and self-poised, and betrayed all the evidences of good and gentle breeding. She could converse as well as her father on all national questions. If she had been a man, the very force of her convictions and her power to express them would have inevitably borne her into public life. The prettiest girl in Washington that winter was Blanche Butler, who afterward became Mrs. Senator Adelbert Ames. She had a remarkably beautiful face, and a perfect figure, and must have taken after her mother, who was an actress of note when she married Benjamin F. Miss Butler was a blonde, and her cheeks wore the soft glow of the peach. General and Senator Ames, who married Miss Butler, was a very handsome man—tall, erect, square-shouldered—an Apollo, in fact. It was generally claimed, and as often admitted, that Mr. and Mrs. Ames made the finest-looking couple ever seen in Washington, although General James S. Negley, who represented the Pittsburg district in Congress for two or three terms, and his second wife, who was marvelously beautiful, were thought by many to carry off the palm in this respect. Miss Chandler, of Michigan, now Mrs. Senator Hale, of Maine, was, like Blanche Butler, an only daughter, and a blonde. She was not so much admired as the magnificent Lowell belle, but as much beloved. She had a pair of pleasant eyes, but not the faultlessly arched eyebrows of the Massachusetts girl. When Zachariah Chandler died this lady became the possessor of two millions of dollars. Miss Dennison was a pretty girl. She was the daughter of Governor, Senator, and Postmaster-General Dennison, and had one brother in the army and one in the navy, the latter having killed himself in this city some years ago. Neil is out of the army now, married, and settled down in Ohio. Miss Dennison became the wife of an awfully charming fellow—"Tony" Forsyth, of Sheridan's staff. Josephine and Minnie Fenton, daughters of Governor and Senator Fenton, of New York, were both beauties, and are both married. Mrs. Johnson, the wife of Congressman Johnson, of California, was a very attractive woman, and was a great favorite with all who knew her, on account of her suavity of manner. With her was Miss Jessie D. Carr, of Salinas, now Mrs. Seale, of Mayfield. Mrs. Charles McLaughlin also spent that winter in Washington, and was as famous then, as she is now, for her elegant dresses and agreeable ways. A Mrs. Taylor, of Baltimore, sister of Mrs. Postmaster-General Creswell, was a lady of great personal attractions. Then there were Mrs. Senator Sprague and her sister, Miss Nettie Chase; Mrs. Senator Williams, of Oregon; Madame Blaque Bey, Madame Catacazy, and others, whom I will chat about in my next.

B. C. T.
SAN FRANCISCO, August 17, 1882.

Our readers will recall the long and bitter controversy waged by the Hon. Frank Page against H. L. Dodge, Esq., Superintendent of the United States Branch Mint in San Francisco. Mr. Page claimed to control the patronage of the Mint, and because he was not permitted to do this, and fill a government office with his personal and political utensils, he inaugurated a quarrel which ended in his discomfiture, and in the entire exoneration of Mr. Dodge from all the charges against him. Mr. Dodge's term expired, and the Hon. Mr. Page has endeavored to do the same thing with the new Mint Superintendent, Mr. Burton. By what appliances we are not informed, he succeeded in restoring Mr. Frank X. Cicott to the place from which, as the result of that investigation, he was removed in June, 1881, for having endeavored to disparage and discredit Mr. Dodge's management. The following quotation from the report of the commission shows how little he was accredited in his testimony:

It was claimed and evidence produced to prove that this bullion was unfit for coinage and should have been refined, and that in consequence of its impure condition, breaking at the rolls, etc., that great expense was occasioned the government in re-melting and re-working it. The testimony of Mr. Frank X. Cicott, late Coiner, who was removed on July first, last, was mainly relied on to establish this. He testified that over two million ounces of bad metal were returned in two years from the coiner's department, occasioned by the unfitness of the ingots sent him by the melter and refiner to make good coin, and that the cost to the government of re-working this amount of bullion was some twenty-five thousand dollars. He also testified that owing to the unfitness of the ingots to make good coin, the percentage of coin produced from bullion operated on in his department was much smaller under Mr. Dodge than under his predecessor. This was not only contradicted by the testimony of his assistant, Mr. Cady, by the present coiner, and other foremen of that department, but by the records of the coiner's department.

The indefatigable Mr. Page succeeds in removing Mr. White, and in giving to Mr. Cicott the place of assistant coiner; and now comes the intelligence that Judge Folger, Secretary of the Treasury, has rejected his appointment, refused to confirm him, and Mr. Francis Xavier Cicott will be compelled to fold his tent and silently steal away. How these Arah chickens do come home to roost.

Just down at the interval, where the brake ferns grow rank, she placed her easel, and sat by it sketching from nature. "Please, ma'am, is that me you're drawing, milking that cow in the pasture?" "Why, yes, my little man, but I didn't know you were looking." "Coz, if that's me," continued the boy, unmindful of the artist's confusion, "you put me on the wrong side of the cow, and I'll get kicked way off the lot." Even lady artists need a little practical knowledge.

Diving belles are plentiful at Long Beach.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

"Ouida" has ventured into the field of politics, abandoning for the moment the writing of novels. She has just written to the London Times a letter describing the hatred felt by Italians toward England since the bombardment of Alexandria. She declares that the Italian press "is hissing like a million flocks of geese."

Alexandre Dumas has a charming frankness. Lately one of his friends said to him: "How is it we never see you at the first representation of the plays of other dramatic authors?" Dumas smiled, and replied: "It is simple enough. If the play is stupid, it annoys and wearies me; and if it is amusing—well, then, to be frank, it annoys me still more."

Sidney Smith's son's inclinations were all for horses and horse-racing, and on one occasion, when seated next the Archbishop of York at dinner, he was at loss for an appropriate topic of conversation. To the astonishment of the primate of the northern province, his next-door neighbor inquired: "How long do you think it took Nehuchadnezzar to get into condition again after his turn out at grass?"

M. Giffard, the well-known Parisian inventor, lately deceased, left to the French Government a generous legacy, under most singular conditions. It is to be devoted to the establishment of suicidaria, or public institutions in which persons suffering from painful and incurable diseases may bring their own lives to an end, under the direction of medical experts, and with the consent of their immediate relatives.

The Italian courts have just decided adversely to the claims of the heirs of Pius IX. for fifteen million lire, which they alleged was due them from the Italian government. Under the Papal Guarantees this money was granted to Pius IX. by Italy, but he always refused to accept it. Now the courts declare that the money was granted to Pius as pope and not as a private individual, and that his heirs have no legal claim upon it.

On the eve of a Yorkshire election Mrs. Wentworth Beaumont, (a great coal owner,) an aged lady, drove in her chariot-and-four to Downing Street, and sought an interview with the then prime minister, with whom she was well acquainted. "Well, my lord, are you quite determined to make your man stand for our seat?" "Quite determined." "Very well. I am on my way to Yorkshire with four hundred thousand dollars in my carriage for my man. Try and do better than that." Lord Dacre, who told this story, said that he had known the government to spend two hundred thousand dollars secret-service money on an election.

One of the most notable decorations worn at the recent christening of the youngest heir to the German throne, was the Order of the Golden Fleece, which gleamed upon the breast of Prince Frederick Charles. There are no new specimens of this decoration made nowadays, the ones being handed down from knight to knight, the name of each successive owner being engraved on one of the links. So it happens, by a strange freak of fate, that Prince Frederick Charles, the Red Prince, a liberal-minded but earnest Protestant, wears the very chain once bestowed by Philip II. upon that stern and relentless persecutor of heretics, the Duke of Alva.

The most intimate friend of Queen Victoria for the last thirty years is an American lady, Mrs. Van der Weyer; Lady Randolph Churchill, Lady Mandeville, Lady Anglesey, Lady Harcourt, Lady John Lister Kaye, Lady Fermor-Hesketh, and Lady Colin Campbell are all Americans; the Princess de Lynar, of Berlin, came from Columbus, Ohio; the Princess de Noer, a cousin of Victoria by marriage, and sister-in-law of the dowager queen of Denmark, was a Miss Lee, of New York; the Duchess Laute Della Novere was a Miss Davis; the Princess Louise de Bourbon, the Duchess de Praslin, and the Roman Princess Cecci, Brancaccio, and Giustiniani are also Americans; while the crown of Holland, in the person of the late Prince of Orange, was refused five years ago by an American lady in Paris.

According to the Paris papers a marriage is soon to be celebrated in Russia which will more or less interest sundry American women. Alexander III., it is reported, will shortly raise a Russian lady, Madame Jukowski, to the rank of a countess, and issue an imperial ukase recognizing her marriage with his brother, the Grand Duke Alexis. Alexander II. was bitterly opposed to this marriage, and did all in his power to separate the Grand Duke from Madame Jukowski, but the Grand Duke stuck manfully to the wife of his choice, by whom he has a large family of blooming children, and for whom he is about to build a residence at Orel, on the estate of Prince Lohanoff-Rostorsky, which he purchased not long ago. As there is no such constitutional difficulty in the way as the absurd Royal Marriage Act of England, the grand duke and his wife can be made bappy in their own fashion.

Mrs. Buchanan, of Georgetown, D. C., her son, Mr. Roberdeau Buchanan, and her sister, Miss Roberdeau, are summering at Rock Enon. Mrs. Buchanan, says the Washington Critic, is a daughter of old General Roberdeau. He had no sons, to his great regret, but five daughters, and he solaced himself for his disappointment by drilling these daughters as if they were boys. They were put daily through the manual of arms, were taught to fence—and thence, no doubt, came the strength and dexterity of their beautiful white hands—and obliged to take an amount of exercise that gave them superb figures and cheeks like roses. They were obliged, too, to clean, load, and fire a canon at sunset each day, but this was discontinued after an accident to one of the sisters. She was nervous, despite her training, and knowing how much her father disliked anything of the sort, she suppressed all signs of fear by a really heroic effort. On the day of the accident, in her endeavor to do so, she shut her lips firmly together as she "touched off." The report came, and when the smoke cleared away she was found lying in a dead faint, with the blood oozing from ears and nose. The old general was much distressed, for he loved his children devotedly, and ever after was the artilleryman of the household himself.

THE SOCIETY EDITOR.

Not Being In, the Trotting-Horse Reporter Speaks for Him.

"Ob my! Is this the place?"

A good-looking young lady stood in the door of the editorial rooms, and looked carefully around the apartment.

"I want to see an editor," she continued; "the one that writes those lovely articles in the Sunday papers about 'satin de Lyon will be much worn this fall,' and 'Cape May fashionables do not consider striped bathing-suits fashionable, and all those other sweet editorials about people who are going away for the summer, and everything like that, you know."

"I guess you are looking for the society editor," said the horse-reporter. "He is out just now; but if you want to know when Goldsmith Maid trotted in 2:16½, or what the two-mile record was in 1872, I could tell you all about it. What was it you wanted to see the society editor about?"

"Well," said the young lady, "I really hate to tell you about this matter; but mamma said the best way would be to go right to a newspaper, and see what I had better do, because ever since papa died we haven't had any man to put us right about such things, and mamma thinks just as I do, that in a case like this a man would be ever so much more apt to decide right on what was best to do, because women, you know, always let their feelings run away with their judgment, and frequently make mistakes in matters that perhaps affect their whole future existence. I told mamma that it seemed awfully queer to me to talk to a strange man about any such thing as this; but she said editors were persons of great experience, and since dear papa was dead it would be a good deal better to find out what some man of experience thought about it before I went any further."

"Were you able to talk when papa hid the last hurdle?" inquired the horse-reporter.

"Oh, yes. I was nearly nine when he died."

"Your father must have left a large property?"

"Well, he did," replied the girl; "but what made you think so?"

"Oh, nothing," replied St. Julien's friend, "only I have noticed that lucky men are generally rich."

"Well, of course I don't know anything about that," said the young lady, "but anyhow, mamma thought I had better see some of you gentlemen about my affair. I am in love, you know, with a young man, and we are corresponding right along, but he doesn't seem to progress any about what I am thinking about, you know, and mamma thinks that probably my letters aren't quite tender enough, and it seemed to me that an editor ought to know about anything like that."

"Did you ever try the blanks-between-the-stars racket?" asked the horse-reporter.

"The what?"

"The blanks-between-the-stars racket. That's a daisy, and unless this young fellow is pretty fly, the chances are that you will land him on the first throw. I have seen some pretty wise young men go against that deadfall and get caught—not dry-goods clerks or any such tissue-paper ducks as those, you know, but boys that had been out after nine o'clock for several consecutive nights, and were supposed to be right in the front end of the procession all the time."

"I'm sure I don't know what you mean," said the young lady, "but I will try this—"

"Racket," suggested the reporter.

"Racket," continued the young lady, "if you will tell me about it."

"Well," said the horse-reporter, "the next time you write to Ethelbert, or whatever his name is, you just give it to him strong about the deathless passion that your heart holds for him—a heart that has never before known what it was to be tortured by doubts and fears that the one on whom the priceless treasure of its love was set might prove unfaithful to that love, unworthy of the trusting heart which gave it birth. This will wake him up pretty well, and then is the time to find out where he lives. Say that without his love life would be an arid waste upon whose burning sands lay the whitened skeletons of Love and Hope. That the days on which no letter comes from him are as the blanks between the stars—seeming all the more dark and cheerless because of the brightness on either side."

"Do you think that would have the desired result?" asked the girl.

"If it doesn't," replied the horse-reporter, "you are lucky to lose him."—Chicago Tribune.

Mr. and Mrs. William Hopkins and family are in the East, spending a short season at Newport. Doctor J. C. Tucker returned (via Southern route) from the East a few days since. Mrs. Tucker and daughters are still at Narragansett Pier. They pass the winter at Mrs. Havemeyer's, in New York city, and return to the coast next Spring. Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Wattles and son have gone East for six months. In the meantime their residence in Alameda will be occupied by Mr. J. W. Brown and family. Mrs. Alvinza Hayward and her daughter, Mrs. Rose, have returned from Siegler's Springs to San Mateo. S. M. Wilson and wife have returned from Monterey. Mrs. Thomas Breeze and family have also returned from Monterey. Mr. Joseph Marks sails from New York for Europe August twenty-third. Mrs. Frank Unger is at present visiting friends at Winthrop, Massachusetts. Mr. Charles Kaeding has returned from Europe. Mrs. W. W. Stow goes East shortly to place her daughter at school in Baltimore. Mrs. Stowe will also take the two daughters of General Naglee, and place them in the same educational institution. D. J. Staples has gone to the Sierra for a two-weeks' vacation, accompanied by Mrs. Staples, Miss Kittie Staples, and Mrs. W. J. Dutton.

It was Baron Huddleston who cut the Gordian knot of precedence by taking Sarah Bernhardt in to dinner in advance of several duchesses and countesses who were present. "The last of the Barons," as he is styled, is wedded to Lady Diana Beauclerc, the sister of the Duke of St. Albans, one of the brightest and prettiest women of London society, and the authoress of several pleasant and popular works. The baron is a Dublin boy.

THE COMIC MUSE.

Kentucky Philosophy.

You Wi'jam, come 'ere, suh, dis instunce. Wu' dat you got nnder dat box?

I do' want no foolin'—you hear me? Wut you say? Ain't nu'h'n' but rocks?

'Peaks ter me you's owdashus p'ticler. S'posin' dey's of a new kine. I'll des take a look at dem rocks. Hi yi! der you think dat I's hline?

I calls dat a plain watermillon, you scamp, en I knows wah it growed; It come fum de Jimmerson cawn fiel, dah on ter side er de road. You stole it, you rascal—you stole it! I watched you fum down in de lot.

En tme I gits th'ough wid you, nigger, you won't eh'n be a grease spot!

I'll fix you. Mirandy! go cut me a hick'ry—make 'ase! En cut me de toughest 'en keenes' you c'n fine anywhah on de place. I'll larn you, Mr. Wi'jam Joe Vettters, ter steal en ter lie, you young sinner.

Disgracin' yo' ole Christian mammy, en makin' her leave cookin' dinner!

Now ain't you 'shamed er yo'self, suh? I is. I's 'shamed you's my son!

En de holy accorjan angel he's 'shamed er wut you has done; En he's tuck it down up yander in coal-black, blood-red letters—

"One watermillon stole by Wi'jam Josephus Vettters."

En wut you s'posen Erer Bascom, yo' teacher at Sunday-school, U'd say ef he knowed how you's broke de good Lawd's Gol'n Rule?

Boy, wah's de raisin' I give you? Is you houn' fuh ter he a black willian?

I's s'prised dat a chile er yo' mammy 'ud steal any man's watermillon.

En I's now gwiner cut it right open, en you shain't have nary hite, Fuh a boy who'll steal watermillons—en dat in de day's broad light—

Ain't—Lawdy! it's GREEN! Mirandy! Mi-ran-d-y! come on wi' dat switch!

Well, stealin' a g-r-e-e-n watermillon! who ever yeered tell er des sich?

Cain't tell w'en dey's ripe? W'y, you thump um, en we'n dey go punk dey is green;

But w'en dey go punk, now you mine me, dey's ripe—en dat's des wut I mean.

En nex' tme you hook watermillons—you heered me, you ign'ant, you hunk—

Ef you do' want a lickin' all over, he sho dat dey allers go "punk!" —Harrison Robertson in September Harper.

The Donation Party of Dead-Mule Flat.

From bleak New England's mountains. First, Brother "Terror A. I."

Up to the corralled strand. Would range them in a row.

Where fair Montana's fountains. And stand prepared to slay one

Roll alleged silver sand, Whose hands should downward

A missionary, mild in go. While Deacon "Murderer Ed," he

In his manners and his speech, Went through them systemat-

Journeyed to seek the wild in ically, and the ready

A church wherein to preach. Placed in the parson's hat.

In the "city" where he duly. The party cleaned the city

His wandering tent did pitch, Out in an hour or so.

It could not be said truly, "Doc," said the "Terror" witty,

"The good man 'struck it rich.' " 'Tis time for us to go.

For the people (who would gather. Unto the distant heathen

To hear his words with mirth) We mean forthwith to slide,

Were not earth's salt, but rather. And preach the Gospel; we, then,

The salters of the earth. The plunder must divide.

Of calls though oft spoke deacon. "The sun is hast'ning backward,

Or brother—I mean 'pard'— No time to lose have we—

He found that they were speaking. Here's half for Deacon Edward, (See Hamlet) by the card. And here is half for me;

And the language that they used. And, my white-chokered hearty,

With. You shall have back your hat.

Regard to every game. 'Rah for the donation party

The good man's face suffused with. For the Church of Dead-mule

A (boh-tailed) flush of shame. Flat!"

And to his deep dejection, "But, boys," the parson pleaded,

When all around his hat. "'Tis hardly right for me

He sent for a collection, To let you, unimpeded,

But little wealth he gat. Take the church property.

If growled the parson plucky. All preachers to their trust are

They would satiric smile, Faithful presumed to be;

And hint he was blamed lucky. Just shook my hat and duster,

In getting back the tile. That folk the holes may see,

One day unto the preacher. "And think I made endeavor

Two ruffians did repair; The church funds to retain."

Each was the vilest creature. In duster and in beaver

Except the other—there. They fired their pistols twain,

One was the "A. I. Terror," And the parson snickered queerly

The other "Murderer Ned"; As he two six-shooters drew;

And they confessed the error. "Brethren, beloved dearly,

Of the lives that they had led. I've got the drop on you!"

The missionary 'ware was. He marches to the city,

That jesting they must be; And there his prize presents

He said in his church there was. To a vigilance committee

But then no vacancy. Of prominent residents.

But when toward the trigger. The pleas the missionary

He saw their fingers glide. For his captives makes they fend

He remembered with great vigor. off.

There was "room for two in-". And they give the cemetery side." Of his church a double send-off.

"Seem' we now air brothers," They give him the "donation,"

The "A. I. Terror" cries, And heap anew his hat,

"We ought to get the others. And elect by acclamation

To come and be likewise. Him Pope of Dead-mule Flat;

So cock your gun, my hearty, A church tax straight they levy,

And, parson, fetch your hat; And now, when the hat goes

Hey for a donation party. round,

For the Church of Dead-mule. Its contents are right heavy,

Flat!" And have a chinking sound.

Forth went the luckless parson, And his mother would not know'm,

Between the ruffians two, That young mining engineer,

Who homicide and arson. Who once had been to Rome,

Vowed for "the cause" they'd. And with a superior sneer, do. Where the Flatters most do cluster,

They had their weapons handy, The statement did dispute

And used toward all they met. That the Pope wore a linen duster,

The modus operandi. And was upon the shoot.

Of frontier etiquette. —Geo. T. Lanigan in September Harper.

The auction sale of a collection of pictures and statuettes, by some of our well-known local artists, took place on Thursday and Friday evenings. The sale was well attended both evenings. The pictures, as a rule, sold for medium prices, and in many instances did not bring their value.

A daughter of John Brown has accepted a position in the San Francisco Mint. The Tribune remarks that Mr. Brown will be remembered as the gentleman whose soul is a professional pedestrian.

GENIUS IN DISGUISE.

A Few of the Literary Masques Which Have Become Celebrated.

A writer in the New York Sunday News gives the following interesting review of famous pseudonyms: Ouida's name in private life is Louise de la Ramé. The studies of character which have created such a sensation of late years in the Argosy magazine over the signature of "Johnny Ludlow," are the works of Mrs. Henry Wood, the author of "East Lynne." The real name of "Holme Lee," whose domestic novels are among the brightest and best of the modern three-volume school, is Harriet Parr. Miss Braddon is a Mrs. Maxwell, though she has the right of birth to the name she is best known by. Among the littérateurs who have affected the nom de plume, pretty much every one addicted to book-reading remembers "Harry Franco," otherwise Charles F. Briggs, who died in Brooklyn in 1877. A popular contemporary of Briggs was Henry William Herbert, better known as Frank Forrester. "Sam Slick," once so famous, was Judge Haliburton. Another humorist of the time in which Briggs flourished was Lieutenant Derby, whose "John Phoenix" papers are a part of every American library. "Q. K. Philander Doesticks, P. B.," belonged really to the Phoenix epoch, though he outlived it, and his fortune and fame as well; Mortimer Thompson, who bore this pseudonym, was in his time one of our foremost journalists. He began as a reporter on the Tribune, and his last work was performed in the editorial department of Frank Leslie's establishment. He died in Blackwell's Island Hospital, and was buried by some brother journalists in New York. The history of Doesticks is bound up with that of another once famous nom de plume. "Fanny Fern," Sarah Payson Willis, a young woman from Maine, became popular as a contributor to the New York Ledger over the above signature. One of her daughters became the wife of Mortimer Thompson, and experienced the unhappy union which is only too common among Bohemians of all ages. Another humorist of the Doesticks era was Thomas Powell, John Brougham's partner in the Lantern, and other ventures, playwright, novelist, and satirist, whose pseudonym of "Pierce Cutting" was better known in its day than his real name is now. The identity of Charles Farrer Browne with Artemus Ward is well enough known. One of the most popular of New England story writers thirty years ago, "H. Trussta" was really Mrs. Stuart, the mother of Elizabeth Stuart Phelps. Samuel L. Clemens figures on his title pages as "Mark Twain" by thousands for whom his real name possesses no significance until his works are forgotten. Another favorite humorist, "John Paul," will never be popular as anybody else, though his true patronymic, Charles H. Webb, is just as euphonious a one. There are few people who have an eye for the newspapers who have not more or less of an acquaintance with the odd saws and wise philosophizings of "Josh Billings," but quite as few know that that professor of eccentric English is Wm. E. Shaw out of print. The anything but humorous name of Landon was good enough for "Eli Perkins" while he was a reporter on a daily paper; and the butcher's bills (if there is a butcher weak enough to extend credit to a professional humorist) of the Detroit Free Press fiend, "M. Quad," are made out to plain Charles B. Lewis. D. R. Locke and "Petroleum V. Nasby," are two entirely different parties to most people who have perused the correspondence from Confederate Cross Roads with the keen enjoyment they were calculated to provide. "Mrs. Partington's" malapropisms are familiar enough to most American readers; much more familiar than the name of Mr. B. P. Shillaber, who created them, and the readers who have become acquainted with Mr. Blaine's friend, "Gail Hamilton," in a literary way, would not know Miss Abigail Dodge if they were to meet her face to face. "Nym Crynk" is the chosen pseudonym of A. C. Wheeler, for many years dramatic critic in succession of the New York dailies, the World, Sun, and Star, and now an editor of a weekly dramatic paper. The familiar combination, "Gath," belongs to George Alfred Townsend. Another popular correspondent, "Jenny June," is Mrs. D. G. Croly, the wife of the one-time editor of the Graphic, and the lady who signs her spicy contributions to various out-of-town newspapers, "Clara Belle," is Mrs. Stephen Fiske. The correspondence of "Grace Greenwood," perhaps the best work of its kind ever done by a woman, was written by Mrs. Lippincott, a lady of Philadelphia extraction. Another famous contributor of metropolitan gossip to out-of-town papers, "Burleigh," is Matthew Hale Smith. "Ned Buntline" is still the chosen pseudonym of Colonel E. Z. Judson, as it was in the days when he bore a hand in the Macready riot, and went to the island for a year to have his hot blood cooled. Bracebridge Hemyny clings to his masquerade of "Jack Harkaway," and Augustus Comstock still signs his thrilling sea-yarns "Roger Starbuck," as of yore. The col-laborateur with a Japanese graduate of Yale College in the translation of the Japanese novel which created such a flutter in literary circles, Edward Greedy, continues to write stories for the boys' papers as "Commodore Ah Look of New Bedford." "James Otis," the author of "Toby Tyler," and other clever children's yarns in The Young People, is James Otis Kaler, a well-known concocter of blood-and-thunder serials. The London letters in the New York Times by J. H. are written by Joseph Hatton, the author of "Clytie," and those theatrical and literary studies of G. E. M., date their creation from the dramatic critic and stock poet of the paper, George Edgar Montgomery. The splendid book reviews in the Sun signed M. W. H., are by Mayo W. Hazeltine, and N. L. T., who dishes up the weekly "What is Going on in Europe" for the same paper, is N. L. Thieblin. G. T. L., of the World, is George T. Lanigan, and M. K. F. stands for Marian K. Fortescue, one of the cleverest and most charming of our female Bohemians.

Some of the terms used in the Bible are bewildering to children. A few Sundays ago, says Texas Siftings, an Austin Sunday-school teacher was asked what was meant by the verse in the Bible that said Solomon had a thousand concubines. The young lady teacher was rather taken by surprise, but she finally said that it meant Solomon had a thousand lady friends. "What a nice time he must have had making New Year's calls," was the response.

A WIFE'S PUNISHMENT.

The Mysterious Murder Which Checked the Career of Two Lovers.

The Señora de Gomera was left a widow, with one daughter of such marvelous beauty that she merited the name of the Daughter of the Sun, by which she was known. Her mother reared her far from the world in silence and solitude, unceasingly watching her treasure, until she placed her in the hands of an honorable man, who gave the young beauty his name and fortune. Don Alfonso Fontana was a man of merit, and the girl consented to marry him without wishing for or objecting to the marriage, following on this occasion the dictates of her mother, who never found opposition from the docile child.

The wedded pair had enjoyed for some time a happy union, when business obliged Don Alfonso Fontana to go to Havana. He requested his mother-in-law to take charge of her daughter, and to take her out of Cadiz during his absence. Cadiz was then rich and powerful, and gold brought in its train extravagance, and the passions which ordinarily follow it. To avoid this temptation he requested them to remove to the island, a city of arsenals and of the navy, vast and solitary, because Cadiz absorbed all in its neighborhood.

While the bark sailed slowly from the Bay of Cadiz, an animated scene transpired. A carriage with four horses, whose bells rang merrily, hastened to the road which leads from Cadiz to the island, and is situated between two seas which are united at high tide. In the carriage sat two women, one old, whose appearance expressed care and watchfulness, the other, young and beautiful, whose face was bathed in tears. Before them was seated a black woman, also young, maid and companion since infancy of Mariquita.

On the Isle of Leon is a city, long and narrow, which rises fair and shining between the heaps of salt like a swan surrounded by its brood. The island, with its arsenals, its wharves, its rope-walks, its dock-yards, and its machinery, seemed a mariner's bride in her solitude, seated on the shore, and looking toward the sea.

The carriage stopped before a fine house, which, like the majority, was of stone, its floors of marble, its doors of mahogany. Opposite the street entrance extended a garden. A gallery leading to it was built upon marble columns, among which jasmynes and honeysuckles mingled, and roses hung swings to rock their flowers. Brick walks divided the garden into four parts. The house disappeared under a thick veil of vines. In the middle of the garden was an arbor so closely covered with passion-flowers that in its cool darkness it was more grotto than bower. In the centre, upon a pedestal, was a marble Cupid, who, with one hand hid his arrows, and with one finger of the other raised to his lips, imposed silence. It was in this summer-house that the beauty passed long, solitary hours. Sometimes Paca, her black woman, said to her, after long intervals of silence:

"That boy, my lady, makes us signs to keep still. Much better make us talk, or surely we'll forget how. My master, in the ship at sea, has the gales and dangers, but here we have nothing but flowers."

Her mistress yawned, and answered: "My husband thinks where two love, it is enough if one has pleasure."

Thus passed the life of this woman who, unfortunately, had not been accustomed to fill her time and occupy her mind, and upon whom idleness weighed like darkness upon the watchful. She needed an active life, and flew about aimlessly from flower to flower, like a butterfly. One day she sat fanning herself in her deep window. Paca, on the floor, was dyeing blue (with indigo-water) the fleece of the little Cuban poodle.

"Do you know, my mistress," she said, suddenly, "that officer, that commander of the marine guards, who followed us when coming from mass, has moved here opposite?"

Listening to her maid, the lady turned her head by an indiscreet and involuntary impulse, and saw on the balcony of the house to which Paca alluded a young man, who advanced the instant her gaze was fixed on him, and gracefully saluted her. The expostulation she was about to make to her maid expired on her lips at sight of the gentleman, whom she had seen before. Thus it was that Paca continued:

"He is called Don Carlos de las Navas, is twenty-four years old, and is the best fellow in the brigade, so good and so kind that every one likes him."

"You seem to know all about him," the beauty interrupted, "but as all that does not concern me, and is nothing to me, keep it for yourself and other gossips."

"Here, my mistress, is your dog, bluer than a periwinkle," said the woman, humbly, to divert the lady.

But Mariquita was not thinking of the blue dog nor of her black maid. For days a gay youth had followed her everywhere. She saw him in all places, in the street, in the church, in her thoughts, in her dreams. Now he had taken lodgings opposite her window. He had been married, and had almost opened communication with her by means of a salute which had no possible excuse.

At sight of Mariquita, Las Navas conceived for her a passion which, in times when men were not completely absorbed in politics, filled and exalted their souls to the point of attempting the impossible. For a long time all his exertions were useless, because her mind had been imbued with religious principles. Las Navas became desperate. She, on her part, had exchanged her previous weary quiet for a constant pain that consumed her.

Paca, the negress, full of compassion for the suffering of both, and yielding to the instincts of an uncivilized race, without reflection on the culpable cause of their voluntary pain, nor on the transcendent consequences of her injudicious compliance, yielded to Las Navas's prayers, and one night when her mistress was sadly sitting in the summer-house in the garden, she unfastened a wicket which opened on the marsh, a solitary and boggy expanse between the island and the sea.

It is a well-known truth that it is the first step which costs. The portal which the negress so imprudently opened was afterward open every night. In that gallery, lately so lonely and vacant, among those flowers lately so scornful, by the light of that moon lately so heedless, the lovers passed nights of enchantment, whose felicity almost lulled conscience deep. In this manner a year passed.

Then it happened that the captain-general of the department, who had gone to Jerez, suddenly died there. All the brigade of marine guards were to go to that city to take part in the funeral. This absence—brief though it might be—caused intense pain to both, who for a year had not been able to exist except in the same atmosphere, and for whom this separation was a compound of pain, of disquiet, of anxiety, and of dread.

The night of the second day Mariquita was sitting in the gallery of her garden. Paca was at her feet. The moon rose clear and tranquil, like a heart exempt from passion and unrest.

"My lady," said Paca, springing to her feet, "here is Don Carlos! Don't you hear him give the signals?"

"It is impossible!" answered the startled beauty, with palpitating heart.

"Listen, mistress, listen!" replied the negress.

The lady listened attentively, and heard distinctly the particular whistle which Las Navas used to give for them to recognize. Paca ran to find the key of the gate, hurried to it, opened it, and Las Navas, enveloped in his cloak, entered with hasty steps. But Paca was unable to turn to fasten the gate, because two men pushed her back, entered, and followed Las Navas, and before he could defend himself or strike a blow, they plunged their daggers into his breast. Las Navas fell without a groan. When he lay stretched on the ground the assassins fled.

For some time after profound silence reigned in that spot, mute witness of the catastrophe. Paca remained paralyzed, under the double impression of dismay and horror. Mariquita lay fainting on the marble steps of the gallery. Las Navas gave no sign of life.

After a while Paca came to herself. In the anguish which succeeded her panic of fright she flew to her mistress, whom she looked upon as now disgraced and lost, took her in her arms, aroused her, and revived her.

"My lady! my lady!" she exclaimed, "you are lost if this corpse is discovered here! My mistress, your honor and your fate depend on what it is possible to do at this moment, and at once. It is necessary to remove this body which will compromise you. Courage, my lady, courage! If you can not do it for yourself, do it for the master! We must take this corpse away to avoid scandal and insult. Help me to drag it to the marsh, for I can not do it alone."

And the brave negress lifted her unhappy mistress, and forced her to aid her in dragging the body to the marsh.

"Enough! I can do no more," groaned Mariquita.

"Further yet, my lady," the maid replied, with a pang. "Do you want to appear before the tribunal?"

And the two, mastering their woe, their dread, and their weakness, returned to seize the rigid form and remove it still further away.

Afterward Paca, supporting her mistress, dragged her to her room, and put her to bed, returned to the garden, threw water on the spots of blood, and made every trace, every vestige of that melancholy crime disappear, with that energy born of love, which is the most persevering. She went back to her lady's side, and seeing her extended there so white and so immovable, as if the bed were her bier, she fell on her knees, raised her trembling hands toward her, and bursting into sobs, exclaimed:

"My mistress, I have lost you!"

"No, Paca, no," murmured the lady, "you have saved me!" And throwing her ivory arms about the slave's ebony neck, she burst into tears.

"Now comes the dawn," said Paca, opening the windows as if to hasten the end of that terrible night.

* * * * *

The light of day illumed a lifeless city; such brilliance in the heavens and such silence on earth contrasted sadly. Mariquita, beautiful and silent, appeared this morning without life. Paca forced her to rise, and to sit at her window, as was her custom, to evade suspicion. Paca came, and went in the dressing-room.

"What do they say?" the lady asked her, in an undertone.

"Nothing yet," responded Paca, in the same tone.

Paca crossed her hands, and made Mariquita a sign to keep silence, pointing to her mother, who muttered her prayers. Suddenly the brilliant and animated sounds of military music were heard. It was the marine brigade returning from Jerez. Each note of the music which she had heard so many times precede the brigade when at its head came the man she loved, who now lay dead and deserted in the marsh, each one of these notes was a dagger that pierced and tore the heart of the unfortunate beauty.

All at once the groaning woman became mute, her eyes dilated—terrified. A convulsive tremor seized her, and she had only power to extend one arm with a gesture full of alarm toward the street. Paca darted to the window, and glancing in the direction indicated by the arm and gaze of her mistress, saw—saw Las Navas at the head of his brigade: Las Navas, who at that instant raised his head, smiled, and gaily saluted his lady-love.

Paca gave a cry, and fell senseless. Mariquita, beside herself, clamored to heaven for mercy, shrieking out the occurrences of that night.

They thought her mad, and her mother ordered them to call a physician; but Paca, coming to herself, confirmed the story of her mistress. They went to the marsh, but nobody was found there. They questioned Las Navas; he had not left, had not been able to leave Jerez. This was unanimously confirmed by his companions.

Mariquita, after recovering from a long illness, wrote to her husband, and confessed her fault, begging him to pardon it, and allow her to enter a convent, to do penance. He gave this permission, the dispensation was granted, and Mariquita took the vows in the convent of bare-footed nuns at Cadiz, where, after an exemplary life, she died like a saint. Paca followed her to the convent.

NOTE.—This romance is true. The "Daughter of the Sun" was born in 1742, and died a nun in Cadiz in 1801, in the fifty-ninth year of her age. Don F. Micon, Marquis of Mérito, wrote a sonnet to her when she took the vows, which, though it has not much of its author's title, may serve to verify the tale.—Translated for the Argonaut from the Spanish, by Emma Frances Dawson.

LITERARY NOTES.

George Taylor's German romance of "Antinous," the beautiful Bythinian, who threw himself into the Nile as a sacrifice to the gods, which should save the life of his beloved patron, the Emperor Hadrian, has been well translated into English by Mary J. Safford. It is a story replete with charming descriptions of old Roman days. Published by W. Gottsberger, New York; for sale by Bancroft; price, 50 cents.

As a rule juvenile Sunday-school books are rather vapid affairs; but a gracefully written, and charmingly illustrated little volume has just been published under the title of "Little Twigs." We understand that it is written by a lady of this city. It resembles in style the well-known "Bessie Books" of Joanna Matthews. Published by the American Tract Society.

Some time ago a young English graduate wrote a clever sermon on "Who was Old Mother Hubbard?" It was modeled after the style of sermons which are too frequently heard at the present day, but which were more in vogue forty years ago. A similarly humorous sermon in reply has now been added, and the two appear under one cover. Published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York; for sale by Bancroft; price, 25 cents.

"Political Institutions," by Herbert Spencer, will be welcomed by his numerous admirers in this country as well as in Europe. It is the fifth part of the series embraced in the "Principles of Sociology," and consists of nineteen successive essays. Most of these essays have appeared from time to time, either in English or Continental publications. Some, however, are entirely new. Published by D. Appleton & Co., New York; for sale by James T. White & Co., 23 Dupont Street.

"The Mysteries of Marseilles," translated from the French by George D. Cox, differs from Emile Zola's later stories in that it possesses romance and comparative purity—two qualities which are decidedly lacking in his last few novels. It is the story of two lovers and their vicissitudes, and is absorbingly interesting from the first chapter. The studies of the various crimes concerned are especially clever. Published by Peterson & Co., Philadelphia; for sale by Billings, Harbourn & Co.; price, 75 cents.

Gustave Masson's "Dictionary of the French Language" is a model for the lexicons of all languages. The most appropriate and fitting equivalents and synonyms have been chosen, and idioms have received due attention. One of the most admirable features, however, consists of the chronological tables, which are numerous and varied, including all the topics which relate to French history, such as a long series of tables on French literature, the Republican Calendar, etc. Published and for sale by Macmillan & Co., London and New York; price, $1.

Henri Greville is a very clever writer, but in "Tania's Peril," which is now issued in an English form by George D. Cox, she made a lamentable failure. The scene is laid in Russia. A young man endeavors to seduce his friend's wife. Much of the story is taken up with his advances and her struggles to withstand temptation. She succeeds. The story is weak, possesses little of either plot or action, is translated badly, and altogether is a wretched failure. Published by Peterson & Co., Philadelphia; for sale by Billings, Harbourn & Co.; price, 50 cents.

Mr. Nadal, the author of "Impressions of London Social Life," has just issued a volume of "Essays at Home and Elsewhere." He is an American, who has of late years endeavored to imitate Emerson and Grant White in their studies of England and Englishmen. The present volume, however, contains four papers on American subjects out of the thirteen. While the essays possess a certain interest by reason of their agreeable style, they display little ability, and only serve to expose the shallowness of the author. Published by Macmillan & Co., New York; for sale by Bancroft; price, $1.50.

Dr. C. M. Newall is a well-known and popular Boston gentleman. When he announced, several months ago, that he was about to publish a novel, entitled "Kalai of Oahu," much interest was manifested, as the subject related to the Hawaiian Islands, where the author had spent many years. While the story is artistic, it by no means possesses the qualities of Hermann Melville's South Sea romances, and though the writer's powers of description are rich and vivid, they do not attain that characteristic which rendered Melville's stories at once sensuous, dreamy, or thrilling with excitement. Two of the finest bits of description in the volume are the scene where the goddess Pele appears to the lovers, and the fight between two kings at the end. Published by the author; for sale by booksellers, and also by Samuel Carson, 120 Sutter Street; price, $1.50.

Miscellany: Mrs. Ellen W. O. Kirk, the wife of the historian and editor of Lippincott's Magazine, is the author of the "Round Robin" novel entitled "A Lesson in Love."—Mrs. Fanny Kemble's "Records of Later Life" has already gone into the second edition.—Mr. T. B. Aldrich will return from Europe in the fall. —Mr. and Mrs. Howells will be gone a year. —The identity of "Q. P. Index" is at last discovered. The bearer of that singular nom de plume is Mr. William B. Griswold, assistant librarian of Congress. —The articles on Keats and Landor, in the forthcoming volume of the "Encyclopedia Britannica," are by Mr. Swinburne. —Curiosity is piqued as to the authorship of the novel, "A Transplanted Rose," running in Harper's Bazar. People in society feel that they are being sketched by an "insider." —Mrs. Burton N. Harrison and Mrs. John Sherwood are named by the guessers. —Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton and her daughter, Miss Harriet Stanton, and also Mr. Theodore Stanton, are living in France, where they are all doing literary work. —It is reported that A. Williams & Co., the publishers of "Cape Cod Folks," have paid one thousand dollars to Mrs. Conder Fisher, who figured so conspicuously in that novel. —Mr. Howells's "Modern Instance" is arousing more newspaper discussion than any other serial which has appeared in a long time. The characters of Marcia and Bartley, and the final disposition of their lives, are written about with as much interest as if they were actualities. —La Revue Artistique is a weekly publication which has just been started in France. It gives all sorts of information useful to artists, amateurs, and buyers.

Announcements: A complete edition of Charles Reade's novels, beautifully illustrated by distinguished draughtsmen, has just been brought out by Chatto & Windus of London. Du Maurier has drawn the designs for "Foul Play," while Fildes has taken "Peg Woffington," and William Small "Christie Johnstone." A new volume, "Readiana: Comments on Current Events," with a portrait of the novelist, is in press. —Madame Judith Gautier, who is perhaps the most thoroughly literary of all the female French writers now living, has just published a volume of stories under the title of "Isoline." —M. Francisque Sarcey, the distinguished French critic, has lately published an amusing book entitled "Les Misères d'un Fonctionnaire Chinois." It is a lively and ironical picture of the troubles which red-tape inflicts upon a child of the Celestial empire. —A portrait of Mark Twain, drawn from life by Abbott Thayer, and engraved by T. Cole, will be the frontispiece of the September Century, to accompany a biographical and critical sketch of the author of "Innocents Abroad," by W. D. Howells. The best of Mr. Howells's novels, "A Modern Instance," will be concluded in the October number of this magazine. —J. R. Osgood & Co. will soon publish in a neat pamphlet Lieutenant Danenbower's "Narrative of the Jeannette Expedition," revised and augmented, from the original newspaper report. It will be illustrated with the author's portrait, a picture of the Jeannette, a chart of her cruise, etc. All the other professed reprints are unauthorized and incorrect. —Miss Constance Fenimore Woolson is at Baden Baden, where she is engaged in completing a new novel. —Mr. Thomas Bailey Aldrich will collect in Russia material for a new book. —Mrs. Lynn Linton, who has recovered from her recent dangerous illness, has almost completed a new novel, the scene of which is laid partly in England and partly at Palermo. It is called "Ioue."

VANITY FAIR.

Surrounded by a bevy of her grandchildren, says the London correspondent of the New York Sun, the queen consented to show herself at the garden party at Marlborough House. During her brief appearance she was continually walking about, leaning on her son's arm. It is said that her majesty was not particularly pleased at her well-known wishes being disregarded on that occasion, and at the relaxation of etiquette in the matter of invitations. The Prince and Princess of Wales made their list, and issued three thousand cards, untrammelled by any consideration of previous presentations at drawing-room or levée as giving the entrée. Many faces were seen happy and triumphant, either young and pretty, celebrated or unknown, whose names were unrecognized by the higher authorities who preside over the august rites of the Court of St. James, and decree who may have the privilege of kissing the sovereign's hand. Sometimes, however, notwithstanding the scrupulous severity of the monarch, a black sheep enters the fold, or more accurately, a wolf clothed in the immaculate fleece cast over the intruder by the sponsorship of a dweller in the sacred precincts. Then a low murmur of disapproval hisses through the noble crowd, some icy shoulders are turned on the delinquent, the careless voucher is reproved, the Lord Chamberlain is held responsible, the royal lady frowns, and the too ambitious subject is gently warned that she shall never again do homage at that shrine. The ranks of the veterans draw closer, and a higher tone of exclusiveness prevails to atone for the passing weakness; while among her set in a distant town, unmindful of the humiliation that closed this part of her social career, the halo of that smuggled presentation will linger around the unscrupulous free lance who risked and played her all for such a stake. In her drives from railway station to palace—her only public appearance in her good city of London—the queen is closely guarded and anxiously watched over. A sombre silence generally receives the advent of the cortège, broken here and there by the jeering voice of a street Arab in shrill denunciation, or a derogatory appellation is hurled from the knife-board of an omnibus. No reverence is shown to the royal occupant, who flashes past in the glitter of drawn swords, no hat is lifted before the woman, no courtesy shown to the lady, who through the measured tramp of the escort, might catch such words as "Go it, Brown!" "Ta-ta, Brown—can't part with him!" "Oh, not for Joe!" implying a perfect understanding of the unwavering protection extended to the gillie sitting behind his royal mistress.

It is the fashion, says the American Queen, this summer to be sunburnt, among girls as well as young men. And the dainty belle of the Fifth Avenue ball-room sits calmly on some rocks by the sea, a volume of Goethe in her lap, her hat and parasol beside her, gloveless, suffering the intense rays of the sun to scorch and burn her delicate skin a deep-red, and then a brown, just for the sake of being in the fashion.

The Long Branch News tells of some bathers and bathing costumes at that resort. The most fashionable costumes are made of blue flannel, and trimmed with wide shaded braid. The sleeves are short, and the culotte, over which a short skirt is worn, extends to the knee, while close-fitting blue stockings encase the lower extremities. On the head a red silk handkerchief is displayed, under which is an oil-skin cap. Often-times red bosc is worn, and if so a blue handkerchief is preferred. A Washington lady wears a peculiar dress—it is a complete Zouave outfit, and as she comes down to her bath attended by a waiting-maid, she is verily "the cynosure of all neighboring eyes." At the Ocean Hotel bathing-ground there is a lady who wears a complete Olivette bathing-suit, (as worn in the last act of the opera,) with the exception of a short skirt, which extends to just above the knee. The waist is what is called a "Jersey," and is tight and close-fitting. Promenading along the beach many graceful swimmers belonging to the weaker sex may be seen. At the West End, Miss Kate Forsyth, the leading lady for John McCullough, is considered the best lady swimmer on the Jersey coast. She dives into the water without displaying the slightest fear or trepidation, outdaring many of her male friends. The Misses Jauch are very good swimmers. Their costumes are known as the Giroffé and Girofla bathing-suits, as one is trimmed with red and the other with blue, and, in fact, throughout the attire of each either red or blue prevails.

An English paper says: There is a new style of hair-cutting which has come out among young Americans inclined to the æsthetic this season. The hair is first trimmed close, and then, by the aid of the patent clipper, it is mottled with spots the size of a florin, at equal distances of a quarter of an inch. It is termed the "leopard cut," and is somewhat analogous to plaque-painting.

In speaking of Saratoga society, a correspondent of the Philadelphia Press remarks: "An hour later a pretty and winsome belle looks out slyly from beneath the wide-brimmed hat, with its drooping plumes, fixing her blue eyes softly upon the dark face of the Turkish ambassador, and half whispers: 'Please tell me, Aristarchi Bey—it does seem too horribly dreadful to ask!—but do please tell me'—here a blush and a sigh, and a downward look of the guilty blue eyes, 'please tell me how many wives you have?' The Bey looks up unusually grave, and solemnly replies: 'Seven!' The young lady looks agast for a moment, nearly faints, and then remembering it is the fashion of the Turkish country, quietly recovers, smiles her sweetest, and murmurs: 'Only seven? Why, somebody told me you had ten!' [Tableau.] An anxious mamma then rushes up, and begs 'Mr. Aristarchi' to come and be introduced to her daughters, who are 'dying to know things!' A wife or two more will certainly not make much difference to such a very-much-married-man, and one who believes in such a kind of matrimony might be useful even in a Christian community, since he could marry off all the daughters at once, débutantes and wall-flowers too. And while Aristarchi Bey goes off to be introduced to the ladies to save them from 'dying,' I may as well here remark that this gentleman happens to be a bachelor, a Greek, instead of a Turk, although coming from Constantinople, and would undoubtedly have Christian scruples against wedding more than one wife at a time, which praiseworthy example is not followed by all Christians here at the Springs."

At a recent elegant reception in London, some of the costumes worn were very striking. Mrs. Alma Tadema wore a dress of gold brocade, made with a cuirasse bodice, with shoulder straps of gold guipure, and a plain petticoat of gold color, trimmed with a deep gold ruche, the inside of which was lined with gray-green satin. In the hair, à la Romaine, were placed three yellow roses, and in her hand was a bunch of limp yellow flowers. Tan-colored gants de Suède and gold serpent bracelets completed this study in yellows.

A beautiful hand, says a Boston paper, is the rarest physical gift bestowed on womankind. A writer expatiating on this subject remarks its great rarity among even the best and most refined classes of society. He says the present craze for shapely hands has led to many strange observations, and the discovery that very few lovely women are blessed with lovely fingers. Some of the most refined women, singular to relate, have coarse digital extremities, while others of a gross and unintellectual type possess hands and wrists that might serve as a sculptor's model. It by no means follows that the hand is an index of character, for training and cultivation, a life of idleness, beside many other artificial causes, will often affect its shape and texture, and eradicate congenital blemishes. But one thing is certain—a perfect hand, so called, and a perfect foot never belong to the same body. Pauline Bonaparte came the nearest to proving an exception to the rule; but even her feet had defects which placed them outside the category. Her hands, however, as well as the rest of her wonderful person, have been pronounced absolutely perfect. It behooves mothers of new-born infants to watch and mould the tiny fingers of their offsprings if they wish them to grow up with well-shaped extremities. Nature is always willing to be assisted in her work, provided the aid is based on good sense and hygienic principles. Babies with prominent ears and flat snub noses can also be helped into lines of greater comeliness if parents and nurses will only repress and cultivate their tender cartilages in time.

At a great London jeweler's is exhibited a head ornament representing a bat almost the size of life, with outspread wings, and fiery eyes composed of a cluster of rubies. This extraordinary object is to be worn in front of a superb tiara of brilliants by the Duchess of Fernan Nunez at the royal gala fêtes at Madrid. The bat is regarded with great reverence among the tenants and survivors of the house of Fernan Nunez, the emblem of that ancient ducal family. The ladies of the family wear, on such occasions, this lugubrious image as a sign of their rank, and the last duchess is said to have appeared at court with a black velvet train richly embroidered with figures of the bat in gold and precious stones.

"Is it actually so," writes a young girl to the Philadelphia Progress, "that ladies exhibit their limbs, like ballet girls at the theatre, when they go in bathing at the seashore? I have never been to a summer resort, but I am going this summer; and when I went to the city the other day to buy a bathing costume, the storekeeper wanted to sell me one, the trousers of which hardly reached to my knees. He told me that was the proper costume. I think it decidedly improper, and insisted upon having a dress which covered me down to the ankles. I had read of these immodest costumes, but did not think that ladies wore them. Please tell me the truth about them." Yes, Miss Ella, replies the editor, it is actually so. Ladies (how ferociously you italicize that word) do exhibit their "limbs" at the seashore, but not exactly like the ballet-girls at the theatre. The ballet-girl takes good care to show handsome legs. If Nature has been unkind to her she calls Art to her aid. The ladies at the seashore can not do that. The waves would not respect the pads; they would get out of place, and that would be terrible. Consequently on the beach, at the bathing hour, all manner of legs, all shapes and sizes, are in view. But, Miss Ella, the custom is not an immodest one. I suppose that nine out of every ten ladies who bathe have their trousers stop at the knees. Nobody regards the style as at all out of the way or peculiar. In fact, the girl who is peculiar is the girl who dresses for the bath as you propose to dress. She is sure to attract notice, for she is unlike most of the others. She gets no credit for modesty. It is only believed that she hides her—well, "limbs" because she fears to have them seen in comparison with those of her companions. This fashion of bathing costume has many advantages. With its neat, dark stockings (stockings of loud colors can not be defended) it is far prettier than the old style. It gives greater freedom, and so is safer in the water. The low-necked ball-dress may be immodest, but it is mere prudery to call so the bathing-dress of the time. Go to Cape May and see for yourself. After you have taken one bath, you will, if you are a sensible girl, (and I think you are,) send your baggy breeches home, and buy a new get-up of the modern make.

Wasp waists, about which a good deal of unnecessary fuss is being made, are not produced by tight lacing, though undoubtedly there are women who will always wear their clothes tighter than is well for their health. It is owing entirely to the present style of dress that the figure now looks out of proportion about the waist line. Paniers, long bodices, tight sleeves set high in the shoulder, with fullness that stands up like a puff, are sufficient causes to make even an ordinary waist waspish. At a certain summer resort, the other day, a fashionably dressed girl was being much criticised for her "tight lacing," when she very good-naturedly asked the ladies who were offering their kind remarks what in their opinion ought to be the right number of inches of her belt. With one accord they agreed, considering her height and size, it should be twenty-two inches. It proved, on actual measurement, to be twenty-four, whereupon the "wasp waist" was voted a delusion, if not a snare, and some of the party thought they had made a slight mistake.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

That Bad Boy Again.

"There, I knew you would get into trouble," said the grocery man to the bad boy, as a policeman came along leading him by the ear, the boy having an empty champagne bottle in one hand, and a black eye; "what has he been doing, Mr. Policeman?" "Well, I was going by a house up here when this kid opened the door. He had a quart bottle of champagne, and cut the wire, and fired the cork at another boy, and the champagne went all over the sidewalk, and some of it went on me." The grocery man said he had better let the boy go, as his parents would not want their little pet locked up. So the policeman let go his ear, and started off. The grocery man turned to the boy, who was peeling a cucumber, and said: "Now, what kind of a circus have you been having, and what do you mean by destroying wine that way, and where are your folks?" "Well, I'll tell you. Ma she has got the hay-fever, and has gone to Lake Superior to see if she can't stop sneezing, and Saturday pa said he and me would go out to Oconomowoc and stay over Sunday, and try and recuperate our health. Pa said it would be a good joke for me not to call him pa, but to act as though I was his younger brother, and we would have a real nice time. I knowed what he wanted. He is an old masher, that's what's the matter with him, and he was going to play himself for a bachelor. Oh, thunder, I got on to his racket in a minute! He was introduced to some of the girls, and Saturday evening he danced till the cows came home. At home he is awful afraid of rheumatiz, and he never sits in a draft, but the water just poured off'n him, and he stood in the door and let a girl fan him till I was afraid he would freeze, and just as he was telling a girl from Tennessee, who was joking him about being a nold bach, that he was not sure as he could always hold out a woman-hater if he was to be thrown into contact with some of the charming ladies of the Sunny South, I pulled his coat, and said, 'Pa, how do you s'pose ma's hay-fever is to-night? I'll bet she is just sneezing the top of her head off.' Wall, sir, you just oughten seen that girl and pa. Pa looked at me as if I was a total stranger, and told the porter if that freckled-faced boot-black belonged around the house he better be fired out of the ball-room, and the girl said, 'The disgustin' thing!' I went to bed, and pa staid up till the lights were put out. He was mad when he came to bed, but he didn't lick me, 'cause the people in the next room would hear him, but the next morning he talked to me. He said I might go back home Sunday night, and he would stay a day or two. He sat around on the veranda all the afternoon, talking with the girls, and when he would see me coming along he would look cross. He took a girl out boat-riding, and when I asked him if I couldn't go along, he said he was afraid I would get drowned, and he said if I went home there was nothing there too good for me, and so my chum and me got to fring bottles of champagne, and he hit me in the eye with a cork, and I drove him out doors, and was just going to shell his earth-works, when the policeman collared me. Say, what's good for a black eye?"—Peck's Sun.

About Thrones.

From the papers it seems that King Kalakaua has recently ordered of a Boston house a new throne for his sitting-room. Thrones come high, but if a man is in the king business he has to have them. It seems to a man who don't know much about royalty that this pride, pomp, and circumstance must have its drawbacks. Suppose you are a king, for instance, and after you have turned the cat out of the back-door of the palace, and removed your ermine robe and laid it on a chair, and unbuttoned your royal suspenders, and hung your crown on the bed-post, and blown out the gas, you happen to think that you haven't wound the royal clock. You feel your way into the sitting-room, and put your eye out with a sceptre somewhere, trying to find the mantel, and then fall head over appetite over a marble throne. It would make a man mad, even if it made the blood of a royal family flow out through his nose. Kings are only mortal, and it occurs to us that when a king snoozes who has descended from the royal galoats away back, busts his nose on a hump-backed throne, and jams a bass-wood sceptre into his eye, he is going to use some harsh terms. In this country all men are sovereigns. Some of the royal family of America sit on a pale-blue plush lôte-à-lôte, and others sit on the floor, and permit their feet to dangle, but we are all princes or kings in our own right. We can call the President of the United States harsh names, if we feel like it, and we are far enough away, and we belong to the other party. Americans are free to tread their native beath, and criticise anybody they want to, but very few of them wear thrones. A large fifteen-hundred-pound throne would be a cumbersome thing to ship over the U. P. road whenever a free-born American sovereign moved from Omaha to Green River. That's why so few of us use them. No American's going to make himself bald-bearded wearing a sheet-iron crown with two and a half's worth of jewels on it, unless there's money in it. He prefers to just wag along without attracting attention so far as possible, and accumulate as much coin as he can. Still, the day may come when no family will feel perfectly comfortable without an eighty-six-dollar throne in the bouse. But it will have its drawbacks, and we hope the custom will never attain much standing in the country. A veneered throne in the sitting-room, with cracker-crumbs and bread-and-butter in the seat, would be of very little comfort to a man with democratic tastes. It would savor too much of an effete monarchy, and chill the warm glow of patriotic pride which every true American feels in the individual and universal freedom peculiar to our institutions. Beside, it would be, as we say, a very awkward thing to move about, and a poor thing to mortgage. It would hurt the family pride to mortgage the dear old throne, or to sell it to a second-hand furniture dealer. That is why we say that free-born American sovereigns had better plug along with the old style of chair, and thus give royalty in this country a black eye.—Boomerang.

A big brother at Fishkill, New York, made a young man marry his sister at the mouth of the revolver. It is understood that the young man is now kicking because the revolver did not go off.

PUBLISHERS' NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Subscription, $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance—postage prepaid. City subscribers served by Carriers at $4.50 per year, or 10 cents per week. Sample copies free. Single copies, 10 cents.
 News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders from the trade should be addressed.
 Persons mailing single copies of the Argonaut must affix a two-cent stamp.
 No traveling canvassers employed. Order by mail, or through your local News Dealer.
 Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as new addresses.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."

A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

ENTERED AT THE SAN FRANCISCO POSTOFFICE AS SECOND CLASS MATTER.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PIXLEY - - - - - Editor.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 19, 1882.

CONTENTS:

Page.	Page.
EDITORIALS:	WASHINGTON REMINISCENCES..... 4
An Open Letter to Leland Stanford—The Corrupt Practices of M. M. Estee's Boy Followers—The Reason Why Better Men Should be Chosen—The Bulletin's Uncalled for Attacks upon Justice Field—His Imperial Accidency's Regal Junketings—Blaine and Our Present Foreign Policy—General Lew Wallace and the Egyptian Government..... 8-9	INDIVIDUALITIES..... 4
WRAITH OF STEPHEN ARNOLD..... 12	THE SOCIETY EDITOR..... 4
CHICAGO NOVELETTES..... 12	THE COMIC MUSE..... 5
SARATOGA AND WHITE SULPHUR..... 3	GENIUS IN DISGUISE..... 5
OLD FAVORITES..... 3	A WIFE'S PUNISHMENT..... 6
AN ENGLISH HERO..... 3	LITERARY NOTES..... 6
	THE ALLIED HUMORISTS..... 7
	ANY CAB IN A STORM..... 10
	SENDING A TELEGRAM..... 10
	STORYETTES..... 11
	THE TUNEFUL LIAR..... 11
	DRAMA:
	Betsy B.'s Letter—Dramatic Gos- sip—Encouraging Native Talent 12
	A VOICE FROM THE NILE..... 14

The Democratic party is endeavoring to make the cry of "anti-monopoly" and "anti-railroad" so loud in the campaign that it shall drown all other questions. It is building up a colossal scarecrow, and stuffing it with sawdust and arming it with a wooden shot-gun, it is made to assume a formidable shape, and to seem a real terror. The long-headed wise ones of the Democracy, recognizing the fact that in a political campaign there can be only one issue at the top, and that the average Democratic brain is only capacious enough to consider one subject at a time, have subordinated all other questions to that of railroads and monopoly. The Democratic party has allied itself with the whisky interest to keep the Sunday law out of sight, and to elevate the railroad question to undue importance. We think the maintenance of the Sunday law of greater consequence to the moral, social, and political welfare of the people than any other. There is a large portion of the people of this State to whom the question of railroad fares, freights, discriminations, contracts, subsidies, etc., is not a practical one, because there is no railroad in their vicinity, and who, instead of baying any prejudice against them, are praying that a monopoly may come along and oppress them. There are certain parts of the State where the railroad system works without friction, and where the people feel that their property values have been increased, their business prospered, and themselves greatly inconvenienced. There are many intelligent and fair-reasoning business men who think the railroad authorities exercise power without mercy, are greedy and selfish beyond reason, and are not an unmixed beneficence. The discontented class is ever more active than the contented ones. The complainers are always more loudly demonstrative than those who are quietly grateful for favors. The Democracy has, we think, mistaken this clamor for public sentiment, and, in alliance with the whisky interest, has determined to make the railroad slogan the prominent and only war-cry of the campaign. It hopes thus to attain that heaven to which all Democratic leaders aspire—viz: office—and leave to its allies, the whisky-drinkers and saloon-keepers, the enjoyment of "Fiddlers' Green," that half-way house between hell and purgatory, where they may sell alcohol, make drunkards, and multiply criminals and paupers, by selling alcoholic drinks on Sunday, for their profit in coin and for the party's advantage in voters. To even say this much—indeed, to say anything in the direction of not abusing the railroad and the railroad people—is to subject one's self to the charge of being a railroad organ, or of having been subsidized. Every contemptible newspaper that lives on the whisky interest, and every individual hody-louse that crawls upon the person of manufacturer, jobber, or retailer of alcoholic drink, is quite certain that the editor is a hireling of monopoly. It requires more courage to advocate the business interests of a community, and to defend property, than it does to join in the clamorous discontent of a vicious mob that thinks property theft and a clean shirt the unpardonable sin against the Holy Ghost. It demands greater courage to do right than to do wrong. Revolving these things in our mind; anxious to have these formulated complaints against the railroad answered; recognizing that Governor Stanford is an able man; that he has mastered this subject; that he and his associates are largely interested in establishing between themselves and the business community relations of mutual confidence and friendship; and desirous also that the Republican party should have the advantage of any explanation he should make, we have prepared and sent to him the following letter, and have propounded to him the interrogations therein set forth. We hope he will answer them. We have caused him to be informed, and we here declare, that the columns of the Argonaut are open to any communication he pleases to make in answer to the questions we have asked, and any explanation he may desire to render.

We print the following open letter to Governor Stanford in confidence that he will be glad of the opportunity of answering the charges thus formulated against the institution of which he is the head, and we hope the friendly personal and political relations between the writer and himself, will justify him in making the Argonaut the medium of communicating his views on these subjects to the people of California.

ARGONAUT OFFICE, August 14, 1882.

Ex-Governor Leland Stanford—DEAR SIR: The prominent place occupied by you in the political history of the State; the relations you and your associates sustain to the material interests of this commonwealth, and especially to the interests of transportation, invest the views you may entertain upon these issues with general public interest.

An important State campaign has been opened by the convention held at San José. One resolution of the platform declares uncompromising hostility to railroad facilities for transportation in this State; declares in favor of material reduction in fares and freights, and in both general and specific terms seeks to make an indefinite sentiment of opposition to the railroads of the State the basis of the campaign.

In defense of this last general position assumed by the Democratic party, it is alleged—

First—That the railroad transportation facilities of the State of California constitute an oppressive monopoly.

Second—That the rates of transportation charged by the railroads of California are exorbitant and excessive to such a degree as to arrest the growth of the commonwealth, and to discourage and stifle production.

Third—That the principle of regulating freight tariffs upon the basis of what the article transported will bear rather than by the standard of the cost to the carrier of the service rendered, by means of freight classification, is erroneous, unjustifiable, and discriminating.

Fourth—That, in practice, the railroads of California discriminate arbitrarily and unjustly between individual shippers and between shipping points, showing favoritism to individuals and localities, to the obvious injury of the persons and places discriminated against.

Fifth—That merchants and manufacturers are, by force of existing conditions, coerced to enter into contracts to ship all goods imported by them by rail, to their disadvantage, and to serious loss and injury to their business.

Sixth—That the coercion alleged to be practiced by the railroads, as set forth in the above count, prevents competition by the ocean, raises the aggregate cost of transportation, entails additional cost upon all articles imported, and forces entire reliance upon overland railroad lines, to the injury of the commerce of this State.

Seventh—That freights are carried for longer distances—as, for instance, to terminal points—for less, or at the same rates, charged for shorter distances.

Eighth—That hostility to the railroad as a basis for political action is justified by reason of the facts, to wit: That the construction of the railroad system of the State was encouraged and aided by county, state, and national subsidies, and that in the processes of their construction the right of eminent domain was exercised in the condemnation of the right of way, and other important matters. That all these concessions and privileges placed you and your associates in the attitude of trustees for the public, and that it is unreasonable and unconscionable that you should be able to earn profits amounting, by your own exhibits, to something like nine millions a year, and which are necessarily drawn from the industries and commerce of this State.

Ninth—That an irreconcilable conflict exists between transportation and production.

Tenth—That material reductions in the rates of freight and fare are demanded by consideration of the interests of both labor and capital.

Eleventh—That the opening of the railroad route of transportation to gulf ports, by which the wheat, wool, wine, and other staple productions of this State will be transported to ships on the Atlantic seaboard, will drive from the Pacific Ocean, and the port of San Francisco, the import commerce now carried thereon, and place the producers of California at the mercy of monopolized lines of transportation for the carrying of their products.

Some of the points made in these interrogation are suggested by speeches, newspaper discussions, and what is claimed to be a public belief, irrespective of party.

Referring again to the allegations of abuses above enumerated, your explanation as to the facts alleged and your views of the general issues raised by them are respectfully solicited, and I shall be glad to give your reply as wide a circulation and the same publicity I have given to this open letter to you. I am, very respectfully,

FRANK M. PIXLEY, Editor Argonaut.

The Chronicle avows itself in favor of the nomination of Mr. M. M. Estee by the Republican Convention, and by cowardly insinuation charges the Argonaut with opposing him because he is hostile to the railroads. Whether Mr. Estee is opposed to the railroad or not, we do not know, nor is it our business to care. We think there are other, better, and stronger gubernatorial candidates, men who would make a better governor than Mr. Estee. So thinking, it is our privilege to so state. We are not intriguing against him, running ward clubs against him, or packing a convention with delegates in opposition to him. We do not like the kind of politics he indulges in, and we do not like the kind of political associates he runs with. We fear, if he should be elected through the agencies he is now using, that he would not be as independent, foot-loose, and free from personal promises and political entanglements as he ought to be. The incident at San José is thus commented upon by an independent journal of that place: "M. M. Estee made a mistake when he selected as his political managers the firm of Chute, Higgins & Gannon, for these politicians are making the same kind of fight for him that Chris Buckley and his crowd did for Hearst. It is a 'good bet' that Estee will come out of the fight as Hearst did, in which event the h'boys of San Francisco will be 'without a candidate. The presence of some forty Barbary Coast strikers in this city on Saturday, sent down by Dick Chute to carry the primaries in favor of Estee, will damage the Mercury's pet candidate before the convention. The respectable Republicans of this city and county do not care to ally themselves with a man like Estee, who resorts to such questionable practices to carry out his ends. Those who claim that he is not responsible for the dastardly outrage of Saturday must be remarkably fresh. Estee knows what kind of men Chute, Higgins, and Gannon are, and he knows that they are accustomed to use all sorts of reprehensible tricks and dodges to assist them in their work. The very fact that Chute & Co. are managing Estee's fight is enough to damn him in the estimation of all decent men." We do not vouch for any of the incidents which are alleged to have occurred at San José, but we do undertake to assert that the fight for Estee is made by the machine, and that the following named gentlemen are his prominent supporters in San Francisco: William T. Higgins, Esquire; Colonel James Gannon, Richard Chute, Esquire; Thomas Reynolds, ex-Democratic County Clerk; Alexander Badlam, Assessor; Hon. Michael Conroy; Mr. Weed, of the street-sweeping contract; Mr. Stuart, ex-Republican County Clerk, lately returned from the country; Hon. Dr. William B. May, ex-member of assembly; General Hardenberg, formerly of Sacramento; Christopher Buckley, Esquire, one of our most prominent Democratic party leaders; Samuel Rainey, his able assistant manager; Mr. Ross, Democrat, and foreman of an engine in the seventh ward; Peter Hopkins, member of the Democratic Central Committee; William B. Carr, Esq., formerly an active Republican manager in the Gorham campaign; Mr. Thomas Rogers, formerly contractor at Mare Island, and now of the Mint; John Martin, Esquire, now harbor-master; Philip McGovern; James Dyer, Esq., of the twelfth ward, and divers other gentlemen of marked prominence in our political affairs. The headquarters of these political gentlemen are at the saloon of Peter Hopkins, Esquire, at the Grand Hotel, at the "Mint" saloon on Commercial Street, and at the saloon kept by Mr. Christopher Buckley, the Democratic manager above alluded to. It is of such men that Mr. Estee's leadership is composed. It is in the saloons where they make their headquarters, and from whence their rank and file receive their orders, and go forth to hattle in the slums. It is by these men and such as these that the profits of street-sweeping are divided, to whom contracts come from the municipal government. It is to the followers and hodyguard of these men that the deputyships were given in the County Clerk's office under Stuart, and are now given in the Assessor's office under Alexander Badlam. It is such men who run hoards of supervisors, and who compose the lobby in the legislature; who debauch officials, and swell the taxation of this city and State to the extent of millions annually; who compose the idle cliques of tax-eaters around county court-houses; who blackmail corporations; who live on politics as an industry, and never perform a day of honest toil from the day of their birth till the hour of their final denunciation, which may be found in the twenty-fifth chapter of the Gospel according to Saint Matthew, the forty-first verse. The congregation will please sing:

"Hark! from the tombs a doleful sound;
Mine ears attend the cry;
Ye living men, come view the ground
Where you must shortly lie."

Our opposition to Mr. Estee is not because we have any candidate for office. We have recorded our appreciation of Joseph Russ, of Humboldt, and this has been followed up by his county sending to the State Convention representative gentlemen instructed to "steadfastly insist" on his nomination. We have given our opinion of the character and qualifications of James McM. Shafter, and this opinion is affirmed by the political action of the County of Marin, where he resides. Of the Hon. Mayor Blake, of San Francisco, and Judge Rhodes, of Santa Clara, we have borne testimony of worth and availability. Of Messrs. Swift, Pelton, Mansfield, Reed, Stearnes, and others we have not failed to write in full appreciation of their merits. We can add another name, that of the Hon. William H. Brown, long time senator from El Dorado County, a man of capacity and character, of excellent political record, of clean antecedents, and of intelligence and respectability, whom we would gladly support if nominated. This journal has no candidate for the office of governor, or for any other position. It has no personal object in view, and it has no personal interest to subserve. It will not support the Republican party in the interest of a bad candidate, and it will not advocate a bad, immoral, and cowardly platform in the interest of any candidate. We should be glad to have I. S. Belcher, of Marysville, on the ticket as candidate for judge of the Supreme Court, because he is a man of legal learning, large experience, and unquestioned integrity. We should be more than pleased to have our Republican Convention nominate Jackson Temple—a Democrat—for judge, because we think he possesses the courage that always ought, and usually does, accompany intelligence and integrity. We should like to see D. M. Kenfield renominated for the office of Controller, because we know, from a personal acquaintance of forty years, that he is honest, honorable, competent, and industrious, and because he had a struggle to vindicate the right of the Republican party to the office. He was elected to the office in 1876, to fill the unexpired term of Mandeville, who had died. He was deprived of it by a decision of the Supreme Court, because the governor had not designated that office in his official proclamation for an election. We think the decision was a political one. At the last election for State officers, Mr. Kenfield was again elected for four years, one year of which is lost by the new constitution—all together composing such a chapter of unfortunate and expensive incidents as to fairly entitle him to a renomination. If there is any member of the State government who desires a renomination, who has made an economical, honest administration of his office, and who is competent and sober, we are in favor of his renomination and continuance in office. We should be glad if all the subordinate offices of the State were filled with such men, and that they might be retained in office so long as their faculties are perfect, and then be pensioned for life.

The Bulletin has begun, or we should say renewed, its attacks upon Mr. Justice Field. The very able law writer—whether it is Mr. Upton or the Reverend Mr. Bartlett, we are not informed—who is employed by this journal to review the decisions of the inferior and superior courts of our own State, as well as the appellate tribunal of the Supreme Court of the United States, is not in accord with Judge Field in his recent decision concerning the laundry ordinance. While we are not disposed to question the soundness of Mr. Upton's law, the Reverend Mr. Bartlett's theology, or the ability of any of the Bulletin's learned specialists, we deprecate the necessity of assailing the personnel of the bench. The Bulletin grows saucy in a quarrel just to the extent that the person assaulted takes no notice of it; it is brave in the exact ratio of the non-resistance of its opponent. Justice Field can not reply to its assaults, and would not if he could. Between Justice Field and Mr. Fitch for twenty years there has existed a quarrel—if that can be called a quarrel when the judge has for all that time refused to permit the editor to speak to him. And all these years no opportunity has been allowed to pass in which Mr. Justice Field was not subjected to the pen-pricking attacks of both Bulletin and Call. The Argonaut is not the especial defender of the Federal judges; but if there is any branch of our judicial system of which California has a right to be justly proud, it is the Federal judiciary of California. For learning, industry, integrity, and cleanliness of social life, Messrs. Field, Sawyer, and Hoffman may challenge favorable comparison with the judges of any State of the Union. Their decisions have challenged wide attention from able lawyers throughout the country. Their opinions bear favorable comparison with any for ability and learning. These gentlemen have been called to the investigation of many novel and original questions, because of the peculiar conditions surrounding the country. There have been questions of real property, growing out of our political connection with Mexico; mining, agricultural, and water questions, turning upon our climate and the physical geography of our State; and commercial and race questions, depending upon our trade with and immigration from Asia. Justice Field has been required, in the higher field of judicial labor, to consider and determine the many serious legal questions which have arisen in the interpretation of our constitutional amendments, and the settlement of controversies growing out of our political condition since the abolition of slavery and the conclusion of our civil war. Justice Field, in a sense, may be accredited with the creation of a land and water code for our State; and now, after nearly thirty years of judicial service on the bench of California and in the Supreme Court of the United States, he can well afford, by his silence, to indicate the contempt that he undoubtedly feels toward the small men who earn their daily salt by attacks upon his personal or judicial character.

It is not surprising that the law excluding Chinese laborers from our country should bring up somewhat curious points of law for discussion. This law, we must admit, is in opposition to the traditions and customs of a country that has been altogether too indulgent in respect to its immigration laws. It was a new and necessary departure when our Congress had the courage to declare that an entire race should not find residence or even temporary employment in the United States of America. It seems harsh and unnecessary that we should deny Asiatics transit across our continent, or deny an English traveler the permission to be accompanied by a single Chinese servant, or a Chinese sailor the privilege of being discharged in the port where he shipped. Such cases have arisen. They are endeavoring to procure, and it is likely that the law will demand, some modification in reference to such incidents as we have named. If necessary, the law should be amended. It is not desirable that, in its exercise, the government or its people should be placed in a false position. We are neither cowards to fear an indirect invasion, nor are we inhospitable to the extent of refusing individual courtesies to strangers. We are not so unjust as to deny a Chinaman the right of discharge in the port of his enlistment, nor so inhuman as to refuse asylum to shipwrecked sailors or citizens of any country. We commend to our senators and representatives in Congress that they be prompt to concede all that common sense demands in the direction of amending the Chinese law. Such a course will meet the approval of all sensible and liberal-minded persons on this coast.

If it is true that a gang of roughs went from San Francisco to San José to manage the primary election there in the interest of the League of Freedom and Morris M. Estee, it is an evidence of a combination between Mr. Estee and the anti-Sunday law interest, and demonstrates they are like the two women grinding in the mill, together working the machine. If Mr. Estee were asked, he would indignantly deny that he had entrusted his campaign to the b'hoys interest; but it is none the less true that this class is working for him to its last man. It is also true that this kind of politician never works for patriotism or benevolence. Coin in hand, promises of office, and opportunity to pick up things on the deck of the party craft are the moving considerations for their service. The most prominent of our professional politicians, with the most notorious and objectionable of our party utensils, are earnestly working for the nomination of Mr. Estee. There could not have been found twenty-five men in San Francisco who would have volunteered to go to San José in the interest of any candidate for governor unless they had been paid for it. No respectable citizen would permit himself to be thus employed, and no decent Republican would engage in such an expedition. This San José incident is conclusive of an organized effort to run the Republican Convention in the combined interest of distillers and brewers, of jobbers and retailers of beer and whisky, and of M. M. Estee. The money used at San José, and being used in San Francisco, does not come from Mr. Estee, for he has none. In our opinion it comes from the League of Freedom and the gravel miners, whose candidate we understand, from good authority, Mr. Estee to be. We do not believe the scheme will work. The schemes of schemers very seldom do work. Mr. Estee will not be nominated for governor, and if he is, a good many people will vote against him, and very unwillingly for General Stoneman. It is not improbable that the Estee movement is a blind under which to bring out the Hon. Frank Page as a candidate for governor. Their mutual friends are suspiciously friendly just now.

The President of the United States, after his very arduous duties, now travels for the recuperation of his exhausted powers. The Navy Department places at his disposal for a pleasure voyage one of the steamships of the United States navy. It will be furnished and supplied at the expense of the government, and his excellency will have a set of jolly companions. Every one will have a jolly good time. This sounds almost regal. Queen Victoria has her yacht, and her private royal car, and we are very proud to know that at least our President can take a coasting voyage, and that, under a liberal interpretation of the law, he can venture more than three marine leagues from shore. His country is the deck over which floats the flag, and he may sail even to a foreign port, but he may not go ashore without working a forfeiture of his office. This is somewhat of a departure from the simplicity of those early times when Presidents found their way on horseback to and from the national capital; and we are not advised upon what authority of law the Secretary of the Navy places a government ship at the disposal of the gentleman whom we hire at a salary of fifty thousand dollars a year to perform the duties of the presidential office. We are quite pained to learn that the duties of his office are becoming so arduous and wearisome as to demand so great a strain upon the physical and mental strength of the executive. In this view of the case, it may be well to inquire whether the presidential term should not be reduced, and two years of this exhausting labor be all that we should require from the patriot who is called upon to fill the executive office. In view of the unhealthy and insalubrious climate of Washington in the summer months, driving the President to an annual pilgrimage to a seaside cottage, or a trip to the country fairs in pursuit of health and relief, would it not be well to establish the capital at Coney Island, St. Louis, or Long Branch? We are pleased to know that the President, having relinquished his ambition for the presidential nomination, is now driving a four-in-hand. Such departures as these are indications of national progress along a royal road. Our annual disbursements this year are three hundred millions of dollars. We remember the time when they were thirty millions. Wealth increases. Rich men now purchase most of the senatorial positions. We look forward with confidence to the time when the presidential position shall also become a matter of commerce.

The enemies of Blaine, both Democratic and Republican, have been so much occupied during the session in investigating his connection with Shipperd, that they have swamped the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and so occupied its time that it could not report the Nicaragua Canal bill. The result of all this Peru-Chile investigation business demonstrates that Mr. Secretary Blaine had an intelligent foreign policy, which, if it had not been abandoned by a stupid successor, and a jealous rival for presidential honors, would have reflected honor upon the American government. So far as it is understood by the people it is sustained; and if Mr. Blaine should ever make a presidential campaign upon the issues involved in the policy marked out by him during his brief incumbency of the office of Secretary of State, he will be warmly supported by all intelligent Americans. For the first time in the history of our country we have had a policy in this direction. His was a bold one, and for the very first time we had entered upon a diplomacy that dared to vindicate broad national interests, and had the courage to assume that the United States was so far a leading power among the governments of the world that it should assert its right to dominate this hemisphere. To permit no European interference in the countries that border our continent, or are embraced within our geographical boundaries, is the manifest destiny of our politics, and the party that has the courage to assert this doctrine will become the party of power.

General Lew Wallace, the American Minister at Constantinople, is accredited with having acquired great influence over the Sultan of Turkey. It is acknowledged generally that his advice to the Porte in the difficult and delicate circumstances in which he is placed is intelligent and disinterested. It seems to us that England has made the mistake of doing that with precipitance and haste which she might have done with greater deliberation. "Egypt for the Egyptians" is a sentiment that we applaud; but, all the same, it is but a sentiment, the luxury of which Egyptians will not be permitted to enjoy. "America for the Americans" is a patriotic and splendid sentiment. It does not mean, however, America for the American Indians, but America for the European aggressors who have invaded and conquered the country. Egypt is for the modern Egyptians, and those Europeans who have overrun the land. The Suez canal is for the world's commerce. The valley of the Nile is one of the world's granaries. Pyramids, sphinx, obelisks, and monuments are for the world's curious. The grand old river is one of the world's open water-ways for travel and commerce. Cairo and Alexandria are great metropolitan cities, to which the citizens of all countries must have the right to go, and pass through, and live in, without interference from Bedouins or Fellaheen. Egypt is destined to become nationalized, Europeanized, and if not Christianized, it must be at least civilized. If England has made a mistake, England will correct it, and we can not doubt that the ultimate outcome of this entire Egyptian business will find a lower and working classes in improved condition, and a better governed than it now is.

ANY CAB IN A STORM.

The Effect of a Queer Carriage Upon the Nephew of his Uncle

[Scene—Rue de la Faisanderie. Enter, from a stylish mansion, a young man irreproachably dressed, but with an anxious and excited look. He soliloquizes:]

"It's no use; I can't raise the money. My last hope of the twenty-five thousand francs has gone, and with it goes Jacqueline. She will become the prey of that cad, Victor, for he has no end of money. And yet, up till yesterday I had hoped to be able to obtain it from Fox. Fox could help me out. Fox should help me, for I've sent him customers for I don't know how many horses. But no! Fox lets me sink before his eyes with a heartless 'If your uncle will indorse your note, well and good; otherwise—no!' Ha! what's that? Rain! And of course not a hack to be had in this infernal quarter. Still, if I can reach the square before it comes down heavily, I shall be able to find a cah." [Sets off running. Thunder and lightning! The fountains of the great deep are broken up! He takes refuge in a doorway.]

"Well, I suppose a cah will pass in the course of a week. Confound Jacqueline! That angel to become the prey of that wretch for a mere twenty-five thousand miserable francs! And yet what am I to do? My cash is exhausted; so is my credit, and all my powers of invention fail me. No signs of the shower stopping, and I can't pass the night here; I shall have to make a bolt for it. Ha, what's that? A hack, a hack! Saved! Saved! Hi! Ho! Cahhy!" [Dashes out. The vehicle proves to be one of the hearse-coups of the Pompes Funèbres for the removal of remains to the railroad stations, with accommodations for the mourners or attendants.] "That's my luck to the last. One solitary vehicle in this quarter of the town, and it's a hearse!"

The Driver of the Hearse—If, sir, you wish to be set down anywhere, I'll take you. I've just been leaving an aged party at the railroad station, and his nephew went on with him.

The Gentleman—Well, I might as well, seeing that there is no other vehicle in sight. [Enters the coupé.] Somebody's nephew is in luck, anyway, but my uncle is hopelessly healthy; no chance of making a little excursion with him in this turnout. Only this morning he wrote to me to see Fox, and have him send him that new pair of bays. Hello, there's Thingummy! How are you? [Leans out of window and waves hand. His friend Thingummy stares, then makes a profound and reverential bow.] Hello, what the deuce ails Thingummy? Can I have offended him in any way? There's Whatshisname! Ta-ta, old boy! [Waves his hat to Whatshisname, who gazes upon him with shocked surprise, and howls gravely.] Now, what on earth is the matter with Whatshisname? What ails the whole lot of them? If they had resolved to cut me for card-sharps they couldn't be more icily ceremonious. Ah, the duke! [Bows. The old gentleman gazes upon him with compassion, and with a stern countenance executes the stateliest how of the ancient régime. The passenger is stupefied.] That's another of them! It can't be a lark—a practical joke—or the duke wouldn't be in it! Ho! Confound my stupidity, I see through it all. They don't know that I took this hearse to get out of the storm, but suppose that I am escorting some one near and dear to me to his long home. Strange, I never thought of that. Ha! by Jove, that's an idea. Ho, coachman, stop at Arthur Fox's, the horse-dealer, you know. [He is radiant, and shocks the few spectators by executing a war-dance of triumph in the coupé. They arrive at Fox's. Fox is seated at the stable-door smoking, as is his wont. He is petrified at the approach of the hearse. The gentleman descends, and approaches him with sadness, not unmixed with severity.] Ah! Fox, is that you? I thought I would take you in on my way. I was afraid my uncle's horses—

Fox—Precisely; I was just about to write to your uncle to say that they would be shipped to-morrow, as he had instructed.

The Gentleman [sighing deeply, and pointing towards the hearse]—My poor uncle!

Fox [uneasily]—What! The baron is—

The Gentleman—Yes; he is there! I am about to perform the last sad offices which—

Fox—But it must have been very sudden. Why, it was only last week that he wrote to me—

The Gentleman—Aye, and to me at the same time. Yes, [sighing,] it was very sudden; still at his age—

Fox—You seem to take your loss greatly to heart. Your feeling does you great honor, sir. Yet I fancy that many nephews in your place would be far from melancholy, because the old gentleman's death must put a good round sum in your pocket, at a time when it was very welcome, too, eh?

The Gentleman [with dignified but quiet reproach]—You need not remind me of that, Fox. No one should know it better than yourself, since only last week I—[going.]

Fox [button-holing him]—And so you are—er—the—the only traveling companion the baron has? Sad, sad, very sad. Did he leave any family?

The Gentleman—Alas, no; neither child nor child. I am the last of the race. [Wipes away a tear.]

Fox—Indeed! [With marked respect.] Still, it can't be very lively to be snubbed up in that hearse out there, with nobody but a corpse, even if it is that of your lamented uncle.

The Gentleman [aside]—I hope to heaven he won't volunteer to accompany me—that would be decidedly awkward. [Aloud.] My affliction is so great and so sudden that I prefer to be alone with it. A friend did offer to accompany me, but I declined his company.

Fox—The baron was rich, wasn't he?

The Gentleman—They say one hundred and fifty thousand francs a year, but people always exaggerate. I doubt if he had more than one hundred and twenty-five thousand.

Fox—That reminds me! What am I to do with those horses?

The Gentleman—Oh, that is no concern of mine, Fox, you know.

Fox [insinuatingly]—Yes, of course I know that, but a gentleman of your rank and wealth will want horses; you can't expect to do with that one hack—

The Gentleman—Certainly not; but that is a matter for after consideration. For the present, you know, Fox, what made by my poor uncle, I shall have little ready money to spare. In a year or two, however, I'll look in on you.

Fox—I need hardly say that if you are in need of money I can always find you any sum in reason.

The Gentleman [icily]—Oh, thank you, Fox; the fact is I did want to effect a temporary loan, but as you had told me that you were short of funds, of course I went elsewhere.

Fox—Oh, sir, you can understand that circumstances have changed. I mean that since I saw you I have unexpectedly received—. You haven't closed with the other party, have you?

The Gentleman—N-no, not exactly. That is to say, he was to bring me the forty thousand francs to-morrow morning.

Fox—I can let you have the money now, if you'll step in.

The Gentleman—Much obliged, but I am not so much pressed for money as all that.

Fox—Then I'll take you round the money to-night.

The Gentleman—I don't know. Still, as we are old acquaintances, I suppose—well, come round to my rooms at nine o'clock.

Fox [radiant]—Certainly; at nine o'clock, sharp. And you can tell the other party that an old friend, you know, insisted—

The Gentleman—Very well; bring the money round. Good-bye, Fox! [The driver of the hearse, who has been watching the scene, and who vaguely understands that his fare has been putting up a job of some kind on his boss, hugs himself with rapture. The gentleman enters the vehicle.]

The Driver—Where to now, sir?

The Gentleman [abstractedly]—Rue Royale.

Fox [who has been closing the door, in open-mouthed surprise]—What? Are you going to take the remains to your rooms?

The Gentleman—How? What? I don't understand.

Fox—You said to drive you to the Rue Royale.

The Gentleman—You misunderstood me, Fox. I said to Port Royal. That is where the remains are to be interred. There used to be a famous abbey there—it no longer exists, but you must have read of it—and my poor uncle was hereditary abbot; that is to say, his grandmother was. Early in the fourteenth century, to make a long story short, the abbey—but I see you are not up in the family history, Fox. At any rate, that is where we have had our family tomb for generations. Well, Fox, I'll see you to-night. To Port Royal, driver.

[The hearse moves away. Fox howls to the earth, and thinks it is supremely distinguished to have a family tomb in a hereditary abbey which no longer exists. Curtain.]—New York World—Translated freely from the French.

At a meeting of the Hayes Temperance Association in Washington, recently, says the Brooklyn Eagle, a gentleman present was invited to make a few remarks. He came to the front of the platform and said: "I have but a few words to address to you. I was horn and brought up in New Hampshire. My father was a strict teetotaler, and taught me the perils that lurk in the intoxicating bowl. Up to the time of his death I had never tasted a drop of liquor. When he died, a few years ago, we moved into the State of Maine, and after that I was drunk most of the time." The brethren got down on their knees and indulged in five minutes of silent prayer.

The Spiritualists have turned their attention to the Orient as a likely recruiting ground, and are trying to seduce the Hindoo into their ranks. But the Hindoo, under the influence of the English, has become acute and intelligent. At a séance given at Calcutta a few weeks ago a Bengalee gentleman completely upset the Spiritualist who presided over the entertainment. In the course of the proceedings he was touched on the nose by a being said to be from the other world, and represented as his father. "No," he replied, "that can not be. My father never washed himself, and the spirit's hand smells of soap."

Le Bal des Canotiers takes place at St. Germain on a Sunday evening in July or August. Nobody is paid to dance at it. The can-can is performed in a fast and furious manner. It used to be allowable for ladies to go to this ball in the dresses in which they bathed. If they were overheated, they asked their partners to plunge with them into the river, which they did in their nautical attire. The bathing-costume was a smart Bloomer arrangement. The trousers reached to the calf of the leg. Stockings might or might not be worn. Much fancy was displayed in the trimming of the oilskin cap.

X. has just finished a volume of musical criticism, in the course of which he has had occasion to deal with the works and talent of his friend Y. Unhappily, just as the book is going through the press the two friends have a falling out. With great presence of mind X. inserts a slip of paper in each volume, thus inscribed: "Erratum—p. 54, l. 21.—For 'Y., the eminent composer and distinguished musician,' read 'Y., the idiotic organ-grinder and clumsy and impudent plagiarist.'"

A young lady was looking at some hosiery, and asked the clerk: "How do you sell those?" at the same time holding up before him a long pair of zebra-colored ones. "Those are worth five dollars a pair," he answered. "Oh, my," twittered the giddy creature, "they come pretty high—don't they?" "Y-y-yes," stammered the bashful youth, "they come p-pr-pretty high; bu-bu-but you're pretty t-tall, you know."

Bob Ingersoll took a sea-bath at Long Branch Saturday, and subsequently suffered from a severe chill. It is believed, says the Chicago Tribune, that some member of the Adams family must have gone in swimming at Boston without notifying people further down the coast.

Says the Philadelphia News: "Mary Anderson has been sailing in her new yacht. She is very handsome, decidedly fast, has all the modern improvements, and has plenty of room on deck." We presume the News refers to the yacht.

SENDING A TELEGRAM.

Burdette Tells How the Average Man Conducts the Operation.

It was just after a railroad accident. I amused myself by watching my fellow-passengers. Presently one man reached a long arm over the little crowd clustered at the operator's window, and asked for a "blank telegraphic form," explaining that he "wished to send a telegraphic dispatch to his family." Now, when a man speaks of a "telegraphic dispatch" I always wake up and look at him, because the cumbersome title is too long. The use of it betrays the man who has little use for the telegraph. The more a man uses the wire, the shorter his terms. The more nearly he can come to saying "m's'g" the more content he is. And he doesn't call it a "telegraphic form"; he asks for a "blank," black or red, as the case may be. And he never "telegraphs" anybody. He "wires" them. So I watched this passenger write his "telegraphic dispatch." First he asked the operator:

"What day of the month is this?"

There was nothing unusual in that. All men ask that. You may know what date it is before entering the office; you may even have it impressed on your mind by having a note fall due on that day; but the moment you poise your pencil over the blank, that date flies from your mind like the toothache from a dentist's stairway.

The man was tall, with thick hair and a thin neck. His trousers were just about as much too short as his hair was too long, and he wore a shawl. That settled him. He spoiled three blanks before he got a "telegraphic dispatch" written to suit him. But even that is not very uncommon. A man always uses stationery more extravagantly in another man's office than he does at home. Then he wrote every word in the body of the dispatch very carefully and distinctly, but scrambled hurriedly over the address as though everybody knew that as well as he did, and dashed off his own signature in a blind-letter style, as though his name was as familiar to the operator as it was to his own family. But even this is not uncommon. A man will write "Cunningham" so that no expert under the skies can tell whether it was Covington, or Carrington, or Cummagen, or Carrenton, and when the operator points to it, and asks: "What is this?" the writer will stare at him in blank amazement for a moment, and then answer: .

"Why, that's my name!"

"Well, yes, I know that," the operator will say; "but what is your name?"

Then the man will gasp for breath, and catch hold of the desk to keep himself from falling, and finally shout:

"Why, Cunningham, of course!"

And look pityingly upon the operator, and then glance about the room with a pained, shocked expression, as one who should say:

"Gentlemen, you may not believe me, and I do not blame you, but heaven is my witness—here is a man who does not know that my name is Cunningham!"

Well, my tall man with the thin neck handed the operator the following explicit message:

Mrs. Sarah K. Follinsbee, Dallas Centre, Iowa.—MY DEAR WIFE: I left the city early this morning, after eating breakfast with Professor Morton, a live man in the temperance cause. I expected to eat dinner with you at home. But we were delayed by a terrible railroad accident on the railroad, and I narrowly escaped being killed. One passenger was terribly mangled, and has since died, but I am alive. The conductor says I can not make connection so as to come to Dallas Centre this morning, but I can get there by eight o'clock this evening. I bade to disappoint you, but can not help it. With love for mother and children, I am your loving husband,

ROGER R. FOLLINSBEE.

The operator read it, smiled, and said:

"You can save considerable expense, and tell all that is really necessary, I presume, by shortening the message down to ten words. We have no wire directly into Dallas, and will have to send this message part of the way over another line, which adds largely to the cost of transmission. Shall I shorten this for you?"

"No, oh, no," the man with a shawl replied, "I'll fix it myself. Ten words, you say?"

"Yes, sir."

The tall man with the short pantaloons went back to the desk with his message. Occasionally he would hold it from him at arm's length, after making an erasure, to get at the general effect. At last, after much scratching and erasing, and with many sighs, he came to the window and handed the operator the following expunged edition of his original message:

Mrs. Sarah K. Follinsbee—MY DEAR WIFE: I left the city—this morning after eating—Prof. Morton alive—cause I expected to eat—you at home. But we were delayed by a terrible railroad accident on the railroad. I—being killed—terribly mangled, and since died; but I am—the conductor—I can not—come to Dallas Centre—but I can—I hate—mother and the children. Your loving husband,

ROGER R. FOLLINSBEE.

The operator smiled once more, and in his quick, nervous way, that grows out of his familiar association with the lightning, made a few quick dashes with his pencil, and without adding or changing a letter in the original message, shriveled it down to its very sinews, like this:

Sarah K. Follinsbee, Dallas Centre, Iowa: Left city smorning; delayed by accident; all right; home sevening.

ROGER R. FOLLINSBEE.

"There, that is all right," he said, in the cheery magnetic way these operators have. "Fifty cents, sir; only twenty-five cents if we had our own wire into Dallas, sir; we'll have one next spring, too; saves you several dollars, sir. That's right, thank you."

And the man with the thin neck and thick hair went and sat down on a chair by the stove, and stared at that operator until the rescuing train came along, as though he was a worker of miracles. And when he got off the train at the junction for Dallas, I heard him whispering softly to himself: "Shfolinsbee—clishn smorning; nothin smatter; home saftnoon."

And I knew that he was practicing his lesson, and had "caught on."—Hawkeye.

Sarah Bernhardt gives her kid four hundred dollars a month for spending money. Probably a great many boys who read this will wish to goodness they had been born fatherless.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

The late Marquis of Westminster was a most peculiar man. He always dressed in a very shabby manner. On one occasion, while walking near Maidenpost Station, he encountered a boating-man, who had just arrived by a train from London. The latter was looking around for somebody to carry his satchel, and the old marquis caught his eye. Not recognizing the eccentric lord, the boating-man asked him if he wanted a job, and offered him sixpence to carry his valise to the inn, a quarter of a mile distant. "Make it a shilling, and I'm your man," said the marquis. "All right," said the other, and the marquis trudged on in front with his burden. Arriving at the inn, he received his shilling, and walked slowly away. The donor's astonishment when informed by a bystander of the rank and wealth of his porter may be better imagined than described.

One of Jonathan Edwards's daughters, who had some spirit of her own, had a proposal of marriage. The youth was referred to her father. "No," said that stern individual, "you can't have my daughter." "But I love her and she loves me," pleaded the young man. "Can't have her!" said the father. "May I ask," meekly inquired the suitor, "if you have heard anything against my character?" "No!" thundered the obstinate parent, by this time aroused; "I haven't heard anything against you; I think you are a promising young man, and that's why you can't have her. She's got a very bad temper, and you wouldn't be happy with her." The lover, amazed, said: "Why, Mr. Edwards, I thought Emily was a Christian— isn't she?" "Certainly she is," growled the conscientious parent; "but, young man, when you grow older you'll be able to understand that there's some folks that the grace of God can live with that you can't."

Frederick the Second had a special liking for Mendelssohn, who was very witty, as hunchbacks usually are, and he often gave him a seat at supper by his side. It so happened that some small ambassador—Germany was then divided into a number of microscopic countries with pigmy sovereigns—tried to chaff Mendelssohn, who with his quick repartee turned the tables at once on his adversary. Furious, his dwarfish excellency ran to the king, and complained of the plebeian being admitted to circles above his reach, etc. The king told him: "Mendelssohn was my guest, as you were, and you should not have joked him, or you should take the consequences." "Ah," said the ambassador, "he is a man who would consider nobody, and would offend your majesty if it so happened that for some imaginary reason he thought himself hurt. Let us try him, now. Will your majesty, at the next supper-party write on a piece of paper, 'Mendelssohn is an ass,' and put that paper, signed by your own hand, on his table?" "Well; if it is just for an experiment, and I am at liberty afterward to tell him that I by no means intended to offend him, I do not mind complying with your wish." "Agreed; only the paper must be signed under the words: 'Mendelssohn is one (ein) ass,' so that there can be no doubt in his mind that it comes from your majesty." The evening came. At the given moment all went to the ominous table and sat around it. The moment Mendelssohn sat down, being rather shortsighted and observing a paper, he took it very near his eye, and having read it, gave a start. "What is the matter?" asked the king, "no unpleasant news, I hope, Mendelssohn." "Well," said Mendelssohn, "some one has taken the liberty to joke with very bad taste with your majesty; I'd rather not—" "With me? Pray do not keep me waiting any longer. What is it?" "Why, somebody wrote here, 'Mendelssohn is one ass, Frederick the second.'"

One fine evening, says the World, as Frederic Berat and Toby Johannot were walking along the Place de la Madeleine, they espied a worthy bourgeois about to enter the 'bus for the Bastille. Approaching the stranger, Berat thus addressed him: "Sir, you seem to be awaiting the departure of this 'bus'?" "I am, sir," replied the stranger, somewhat surprised. "And you intend going to the Bastille by this 'bus'?" "Such is my intention, sir." "Sir, this vehicle will not start for five minutes, and you therefore have time to hear what I have to say." "That depends, sir, upon what you have to say." "What I have to say (gloomily) is of importance to me, sir, and to you. I have just been dining with my friend here—a very good dinner, and no lack of wine—" "But, sir, this has no earthly interest for me." "It has; hear me out. I will prove my confidence in you by admitting that I am drunk, and that when I am drunk, sir, I am the most blood-thirsty of men. My life or another man's life is as indifferent to me when I am in this condition as the ashes of my cigar." "Come, my friend," interrupts Johannot, "come along, and leave the gentleman alone." "That's all right; I want to talk with the gentleman. Now, sir, you want to go to the Place de la Bastille in this 'bus, don't you? You do. Very well. Now, I have decided that you are to go into that 'bus over there, and go to the Barrière de l'Etoile!" "Sir, are you mad?" "Excuse me, sir, but you are mistaken. I am not mad. I am drunk, which is still more shameful. Now, sir, you are sober; you have full possession of your senses; you are not going to quarrel with a poor inebriate like myself. It would be inexcusable on your part to do so. Your duty is to soothe me—to humor my hallucinations—to avoid a scene. Opposition may develop in me the unreasoning fury of a tiger. You will refuse to enter yonder 'bus? Very well. I will tear you from the steps of this 'bus; we shall fight; tomorrow you will send me a challenge; next day we shall meet in mortal combat. If you kill me, your conscience will accuse you perpetually of having picked a quarrel with a drunken man. If I kill you, it will be infernally stupid, and inconvenient besides. You are well though not fashionably dressed. You seem to be in comfortable circumstances; perhaps you will leave a widow and orphans. And what will you have perished for? Simply for trying to uphold a point of honor with a drunken man. It can not be. It must not be." This interview, being judiciously interrupted by appeals from Johannot to his friend to come home, and to the stranger not to excite the maniac, did not fail to convince the stranger, whom Berat conducted to the other 'bus with effusion, hailing him as his benefactor.

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

The Dodo.

"What is that, mother?"
"The dodo, my child;
His thoughts are weak and his brain is mild.
'Tis he that levels the empty gun
At his timid sister in dodo fun,
And rocks the boat on the summer lake
To hear the screaming ladies make.
He wears lean pants and tooth-pick shoes,
And hasn't an ounce of sense to lose.
Look at him close, as you see him pass.
He looks like a man but was made for an ass."
—Hawkeye.

The Candidate.

Who spends his time walking the streets,
And smiles on every one he meets,
Not even slighting the dead-beats?

The Candidate.

Who can not let a stranger pass
Without asking him to take a glass?
'Tis this queer mixture of clay and brass,

The Candidate.

Who when he sees you at your door,
Stops to chat an hour or more,
And tells you facts you knew before?

The Candidate.

Who makes it his particular biz
To ask you 'bout the health of 'Sis,'
And wants to know how the baby is?

The Candidate.

Who knows so much about the State,
And tells you what will be the fate
Of this country, soon or late?

The Candidate.

Who after the canvass is o'er
Announces politics a bore,
And knows old acquaintances no more?

The Candidate.

—Boston Transcript.

A Consultation.

A single doctor like a sculler plies;
The patient lingers, and by inches dies;
But two physicians, like a pair of oars,
Waft him with swiftness to the Stygian shores.
—London Medical Gazette.

Wortermelon Time.

Oh, wortermelon time is a-comin' round agin,
And they ain't no man a-livin' any tickler 'n me,
For the way I hanker after wortermelons is a sin—
Which is the why and wherefore, as you can plainly see.

They ain't no better thing in the vegetable line;
And they don't need much tendin', as every farmer knows;
And when they're ripe and ready for to pluck from the vine,
I want to say to you, they're the best fruit that grows.

I joy in my heart just to hear that rippin' sound
When you split one down the back, and jolt the halves in two,
And the friends you love best is gathered all around—
And you says unto your best friend, 'Oh, here's the core for you!'

Boys take to it natural, and I like to see 'em eat—
A slice of wortermelon's like a French harp in their hands,
And when they saw it through their mouth such music can't be beat.
'Cause it's music both the sperit and the stummick understands.

Oh, there's more in wortermelons than the purty-colored meat,
And the overflown' sweetness of the wortersquashed betwixt
The upward and the downward motion of a feller's teeth,
And it's the taste of ripe old age and juicy childhood mixed.

Oh, it's wortermelon time is a-comin' round ag'in,
And they ain't no man a-livin' any tickler than me,
For the way I hanker after wortermelons is a sin—
Which is the why and wherefore, as you can plainly see.
—Indianapolis Journal.

V. Hugo Dusenbury.

HIS POETIC VISION OF THE ANNUAL STEAL.

The Skookawahominy.

Two yards wide and all mud.

I breathe into my steam Calliope and celebrate the Skookawahominy Creek; I elevate my whoop for the Skookawahominy.

The mud turtle with his head on one hank,

The tail of him on the other.

The inch and a-half to spare.

You, oh, chip, too, I celebrate, vainly trying to float down that noble stream, in the eddies whirled, in a two-inch eddy tumultuously whirled.

The small boy in a red shirt, in butternut breeches dressed; the one suspender of him, the bent pin, the yard of twine, the hickory switch of him.

I celebrate the fishing he is doing. He is getting no fish; but it is all right; to me, Wait, it is the same.

Endeavor is much. I celebrate endeavor. Let us go and take a drink to endeavor.

Let us drink up the whole Skookawahominy. This is about one square drink.

The Congressman, in his seat uprising, the eye of the Speaker catching; the Speaker nearly deaf talking.

The glories of the Skookawahominy; the dimensions of it; the mighty fleets on its breast floating;
the urgent necessity of an appropriation.

The size of the appropriation; the largeness and healthiness of it; the getting of it; the vetoing thereof; the Congressmen over the President's veto passing it.

The Immediate Future. The American citizen with a rope, with a club likewise, outside the Capitol waiting.

The Congressman, thoroughly slugged, now suspended over the rippling waters of the Skookawahominy, pendulous, vibrant.

These things I celebrate, I, Walt, somewhat previous; but not so far off.
You hear me. Yawp!
—Walt Whitman, per V. Hugo Dusenbury, P. P. of Puck.

TO HOUSEKEEPERS.

If you wish to use goods of full weight and absolute purity, see your grocer supplies you with

KINGSFORD'S
OSWEGO
STARCH.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER.

WALTER BAKER & CO.'S
CHOCOLATE.

SMITH
BROTHERS'
PACKAGE
BORAX.

WM. T. COLEMAN & CO.
AGENTS,
121 and 123 Market Street,
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

PRIVATE ASYLUM,
For the Care and Treatment of Mental and Nervous Diseases.

THE PROPRIETARY INSTITUTION

called THE PACIFIC ASYLUM, where the insane of the State of Nevada have been kept for several years, will be opened as a PRIVATE ASYLUM for the care and treatment of Mental and Nervous Diseases, on the 10th of August, 1882, the Nevada patients having been removed to the new State Asylum at Reno. The buildings are capacious and comfortable, having been constructed for the accommodation of over two hundred patients, and they are pleasantly situated in the suburbs of Stockton, and are surrounded by attractive grounds of forty acres in extent, with cultivated gardens and pleasant walks. Its advantages over public institutions in facility of admission and in procuring extra accommodations if required, are obvious.
For terms and other particulars apply to the Proprietor and Superintendent, DR. ASA CLARK, Pacific Asylum,
Stockton, Cal. ASA CLARK, M. D.
References—DR. L. C. Lane, San Francisco,
Dr. G. A. Shurtleff, Stockton,
Sup't State Insane Asylum.

GEORGE MORROW.

GEORGE MORROW & CO.
(Established 1854.)

Commission Merchants
...AND...

DEALERS IN HAY AND GRAIN.

SHIPPING ORDERS A SPECIALTY. CONSIG-
MENTS SOLICITED.

39 Clay Street,

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

C. ADOLPHE LOW & CO.
Commission Merchants,
SAN FRANCISCO.

OFFICE IN NEW YORK, 42 CEDAR
Street

Liberal advances made on consignments.

S. & G. GUMP,
581 and 583 Market Street, S. F.,
Manufacturers

MIRRORS, CORNICES, HARDWOOD MANTLES, PICTURE
Frames, and Etc-a-Etc.

IMPORTERS OF GOUPIL'S ENGRAVINGS, CHRO-
MOS, PHOTOGRAPHS, ETC.

CALIFORNIA SUGAR REFINERY.
OFFICE, 325 Market St.
WORKS, Eighth and Brannan Sts.
C. SPRECKELS, President,
J. D. SPRECKELS, Vice-President,
A. B. SPRECKELS, Secretary.

PACIFIC ROLLING MILL CO.
San Francisco, Cal., Manufacturers of

RAILROAD AND MERCHANT IRON
Car and Locomotive Axles and Frames, and Hammered
Iron of every description. Rolled Beams, Angle, Channel,
and T Iron, Bridge, and Machine Bolts, Lag Screws, Nuts, Washers, etc. Steamboat Shafts, Cranks, Pistons, Connecting Rods, etc., etc. Highest price paid for Scrap Iron.

OFFICE, 202 MARKET STREET.

THE
AMERICAN SUGAR REFINERY
SAN FRANCISCO,
MANUFACTURERS OF ALL
Classes of Refined Sugars, including Loaf Sugar
for export.
C. ADOLPHE LOW, President.
Office—208 California Street.

IRA P. RANKIN.

A. P. BRAYTON

PACIFIC IRON WORKS
RANKIN, BRAYTON & CO.,

127 to 132 First Street, San Francisco.

Mining Machinery of all kinds, Sugar Mills, E
both Marine and Stationary, Boilers, etc., etc.

CHARLES R. ALLEN

Wholesale and Retail Dealer in COAL for House or Office by Telephone 308.

Agent Pittsburg Coal Mining Company,
118 and 120 Beale Street, S. F.

J. C. MERRILL & CO.,
Shipping and Commission Merchants

204 and 206 California Street,

SAN FRANCISCO.

The Regular Dispatch line of Packets to Honolulu, H.I.

PAYOT, UPHAM & CO
STATIONERS, BOOKSELLERS,

Commercial Printers,
and Blank Book Manufacturers

204 Sansome Street, near Pine.

TABER, HARKER & Co.,
IMPORTERS AND WHOLESALE
GROCERS, 208 and 210 California St., S.

The English papers which have been rather exco-riating Mr. Eben Plympton ever since his sojourn on the tight little island, were good enough last week to say nice things of him as the poet-lover of Feor-delisa in "The Fool's Revenge"; but they object to his pronunciation of the word "been" as "bin." They do not even sneer at it as an Americanism, and magnificently ignore the authority of Noah Webster. They simply allude to it as a mispronunciation. Perhaps no actor upon the stage has the Anglo-mania so badly as Mr. Eben Plympton, and to be thus caught up upon his carefully watched enunciation must go hard with him. To the rest of us it shows that the English ear is growing finer. Hitherto we have only been accused broadly and vaguely of twang. Now they are going to dip into our vowels and consonants, and we shall have a national phonetic war, and the stage will be the bloodless battle-field; for the American actor is becoming as thoroughly a fixture in the English metropolis as the English actor in Lester Wallack's British dramatic asylum. And I hope they will have at it as soon as they may; for, although I am willing to sing as lustily as any one, "Oh, wrap the flag around me, boys!" I should humbly ask to know why b double e n becomes "bin" in the American language?

"She says 'Don Quixote!'" cried some one, amazed, at the California, when Sarab Jewett declined to graft a hybrid Spanish accent upon her English, as she laughingly dismissed the claims of the Count de Carojac, for people are growing severely analytical nowadays. Sometimes they are reasonable about it, and sometimes not.

"My dear Betsy," said Jack, the other night, as we sat, deeply interested in the vicissitudes of the Streblow family; "my dear Betsy, I do not like to dissipate the expression of heatitude which rests at this moment upon your countenance. I quite appreciate the fact that you have been starving, metaphysically, of late in the theatres, and that you are enjoying all this very heartily; but, since you have called my attention so often to finish and detail, and all that sort of thing, may I mention a point? I find myself beginning to be a stickler, in fact, about these little things."

"Certainly, Jack; what is it?"

"The child, Betsy. Can it be possible that in this marvelous Union Square combination they have no patent process for elongating children for the exigencies of the drama? Two years are supposed to have elapsed since that deadly duel, yet here is little Natalie the same size to a hair. Most children at her age grow like weeds. Between six and ten they become excessively leggy, so to speak."

"My dear Jack," I interpose, gravely, "you are so ardent an advocate of realism that I will give you a rational explanation. The child began to grow according to the proper course of nature, but she has shrunk with too much kissing. You will observe that every one who comes upon the scene makes a light peck of affection at the child. The stronger ones lift her high in air, and give us a full view of her poor little legs dangling in the breeze, and her dear little pantaloons without any chiaro oscuro. The weaker ones simply nibble at her according to the popular custom, for there is nothing stagey in all this; it is a close copy from life. It is the doom of many children to be overkissed. Of course a mother's kiss is fond, frequent, irrational, and sweet. Others kiss children sometimes to carry off embarrassment, sometimes because they think it is expected of them, either by mother or child, sometimes merely for a pose, and sometimes because the child is an irresistible little innocent. Can any one think even for a moment that a child enjoys all this miscellaneous kissing? The insight of the little ones is shrewd and clear, and they know as well as older ones that there should be love in meeting lips."

"Betsy," cries Jack just here, "I have never been able to establish the connection between poetry and beer, but I know that I always become excessively thirsty when you veer off in this way, and if you will excuse a few moments' absence, I will admit that Natalie's growth was prematurely checked."

Jack, who once reveled only in broad effects, admitted later that he had taken quite a childish pleasure in the transition stages of John Streblow's hair, which, being only touched at the temples at first, became sprinkled with gray on the crown seven years later, and white at last.

"And now, Jack," I said, "now that you have really taken to noticing little things, can you tell me just when Stoddart is going to make a point?"

But Jack announced that to be a feat of some diffi-

"He mumbles so terribly, Betsy, and is so evidently accustomed to a smaller theatre, that I catch just one-third of what he says."

